Dedication

In memory of Liu Bang, the leader of the bandit rebellion who slew the snake near Mount Mangdan and who became Gaozu, the 1st Emperor of the Han Dynasty in 202 BCE and to the Liu clan of Zhongshan, Guangdong with love.

Characters

Protagonists (Alphabetical List)

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. | An Daoquan | Divine Doctor | 64 |
| 2. | Bai Sheng | Daylight Rat | 17 |
| 3. | Bao Xu | God of Death | 66 |
| 4. | Cai Qing | The Flower | 61 |
| 5. | Cai Fu | Iron Arm | 61 |
| 6. | Cao Zheng | Demon Carver | 16 |
| 7. | Chai Jin | Small Whirlwind | 8 |
| 8. | Chen Da | Leaping Tiger | 1 |
| 9. | Dai Zong | Divine Traveller | 35 |
| 10. | Deng Fei | Fiery Eyed Beast | 43 |
| 11. | Ding Desun | Arrow Struck Tiger | 69 |
| 12. | Dong Ping | Two Spears General | 68 |
| 13. | Du Qian | Sky Feeler | 10 |
| 14. | Du Xing | Demon Face | 46 |
| 15. | Duan Jingzhu | Golden Haired Dog | 59 |
| 16. | Fan Rui | Demon King of Disorder | 58 |
| 17. | Gongsun Sheng | Cloud Dragon | 14 |
| 18. | Gong Wang | Flowery Necked Tiger | 69 |
| 19. | Gu Dasao | Tigress | 48 |
| 20. | Guan Sheng | Great Halberd | 62 |
| 21. | Guo Sheng | Rival of Rengui* | 34 |
| 22. | Han Tao | Ever Victorious General | 54 |
| 23. | Hao Siwen | Jing Mu An | 62 |
| 24. | Hou Jian | Nimble Monkey | 40 |
| 25. | Hu San Niang | Ten Feet of Green | 46 |
| 26. | Hua Rong | Little Li Guang | 21 |
| 27. | Huang Xin | Supressor of Three Mountains | 32 |
| 28. | Huangfu Duan | Purple Bearded Uncle | 69 |
| 29. | Huyan Zhuo | Two Bludgeons General | 53 |
| 30. | Jiang Jing | Marvelous Mathematician | 40 |
| 31. | Jiao Ting | Disliked One | 66 |
| 32. | Jian Dajian | Jade Armed Craftsman | 38 |
| 33. | Kong Liang | Fiery Star | 31 |
| 34. | Kong Ming | Restless Star (comet) | 31 |
| 35. | Lei Heng | Winged Tiger | 12 |
| 36. | Li Gun | Flying Great Sage King Monkey | 58 |
| 37. | Li Jun | Muddy Water Dragon | 35 |
| 38. | Li Kui | Black Whirlwind; Iron Ox | 37 |
| 39. | Li Li | Hell's Judge | 35 |
| 40. | Li Ying | Striking Hawk | 46 |
| 41. | Li Yun | Black Eyed Tiger | 43 |
| 42. | Li Zhong | Tiger Fighting General | 4 |
| 43. | Lin Chong | Leopard's Head | 6 |
| 44. | Ling Zhen | Roaring Thunder | 54 |
| 45. | Liu Tang | Red Haired Demon | 13 |
| 46. | Lu Fang | Little Marquis of Wen | 34 |
| 47. | Lu Da | Tattooed Monk | 2 |
| 48. | Lu Junyi | Jade Qilin | 60 |
| 49. | Ma Lin | Iron Flute Immortal | 40 |
| 50. | Meng Kang | Jade Flagstaff | 43 |
| 51. | Mu Chun | Slightly Restrained | 36 |
| 52. | Mu Hong | Unrestrained | 36 |
| 53. | Ou Peng | Golden Winged Hawk | 40 |
| 54. | Pei Xuan | Iron Faced Clerk | 43 |
| 55. | Peng Qi | Heavenly Eyes General | 54 |
| 56. | Qin Ming | Thunderer | 33 |
| 57. | Ruan, the Second | Heavely King Who Stands His Ground | 14 |
| 58. | Ruan, the Fifth | Short Lived Second Brother | 14 |
| 59. | Ruan, the Seventh | Living King Yama | 14 |
| 60. | Shan Tinggui | Water God General | 66 |
| 61. | Shi En | Golden Eyed Tiger Cub | 27 |
| 62. | Shi Jin | Nine Tattooed Dragons | 1 |
| 63. | Shi Qian | Flea on the Drum | 45 |
| 64. | Shi Xiu | Life Risker | 43 |
| 65. | Shi Yong | Stone General | 34 |
| 66. | Song Jiang | Welcome Rain | 17 |
| 67. | Song Qing | Iron Fan | 17 |
| 68. | Song Wan | Diamond in the Clouds | 10 |
| 69. | Sun Er Niang | Night Witch | 16 |
| 70. | Sun Li | Sickly General | 48 |
| 71. | Sun Xin | Young General | 48 |
| 72. | Suo Chao | Urgent Vanguard | 12 |
| 73. | Tang Long | Cash Marked Leopard* | 53 |
| 74. | Tao Zongwang | Nine Tailed Tortoise | 40 |
| 75. | Tong Meng | River Churning Clam | 36 |
| 76. | Tong Wei | Cave Dragon | 36 |
| 77. | Wang Dingliu | Lightning Goddess | 64 |
| 78. | Wang Ying | Stunted Tiger | 31 |
| 79. | Wei Dingguo | Fire God General | 66 |
| 80. | Wu Song | Tiger Slayer | 22 |
| 81. | Wu Yong | Clever Star | 13 |
| 82. | Xiang Chong | Eight Arms Nezha† | 58 |
| 83. | Xiao Rang | Sacred Handed Calligrapher | 38 |
| 84. | Xie Bao | Double Tailed Scorpion | 48 |
| 85. | Xie Zhen | Double Headed Snake | 48 |
| 86. | Xu Ning | Spear Expert | 55 |
| 87. | Xuan Zan | Disgraced Son-in-law | 62 |
| 88. | Xue Yong | Sick Tiger | 36 |
| 89. | Yang Chun | White Speckled Snake | 1 |
| 90. | Yang Lin | Glorious Leopard | 43 |
| 91. | Yan Qing | The Prodigy | 60 |
| 92. | Yan Shun | Elegant Tiger | 31 |
| 93. | Yang Xiong | Sick Guan Suo | 43 |
| 94. | Yang Zhi | Blue Faced Brute | 11 |
| 95. | Yu Baosi | Dangerous Road Spirit | 67 |
| 96. | Yue He | Iron Flute | 48 |
| 97. | Zhang Qing | Arrow without Feathers | 69 |
| 98. | Zhang Qing | Market Gardener | 16 |
| 99. | Zhang Heng | the Boatman | 36 |
| 100. | Zhang Shun | White Fish | 36 |
| 101. | Zheng Tianshou | White Faced Squire | 31 |
| 102. | Zhou Tong | Little Tyrant | 4 |
| 103. | Zhu Fu | Laughing Tiger | 43 |
| 104. | Zhu Gui | Dry Land Crocodile | 10 |
| 105. | Zhu Tong | Lord of the Beautiful Whiskers | 12 |
| 106. | Zhu Wu | Intuitve Strategist | 1 |
| 107. | Zou Run | Horned Dragon | 48 |
| 108. | Zou Yuan | Forest Dragon | 48 |

Other Heroes outside the 108

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. | Chao Gai | Heavenly King | 013 |
| 2. | Cui Daocheng | Iron Buddha | 005 |
| 3. | Deng Long | Golden Eyed Tiger | 016 |

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| 4. | Fu An | Stinking Dickhead | 006 |
| 5. | Gao Qiu | Marshal of the Imperial Guard | 001 |
| 6. | Gao, Master | Heavenly King of Pleasure | 006 |
| 7. | Hu Cheng | Flying Tiger | 046 |
| 8. | Huang Wenye | Huang The Buddha | 040 |
| 9. | Huang Wenbing | Stinging Wasp | 40 |
| 10. | Jiang Zhong | Door God | 028 |
| 11. | Li Cheng | King of Heaven | 011 |
| 12. | Li Ji | Rabbit Hunter | 001 |
| 13. | Li the Fourth | Green Grass Snake | 006 |
| 14. | Liang | Grand Secretary | 011 |
| 15. | Luan Tingyu | Iron Staff | 046 |
| 16. | Niu Er | Hairless Tiger | 011 |
| 17. | Qiao (Boy) | Elder Brother Yun | 023 |
| 18. | Qiu Xiaoyi | Flying Ogre (Taoist) | 005 |
| 19. | Sun Ding | The Buddha | 007 |
| 20. | Wang Jin | | 001 |
| 21. | Wang Lun | White Clothes Scholar | 010 |
| 22. | Wang, Madame | Devil Acting as Watchman | 023 |
| 23. | Wen Da | Great Sword | 011 |
| 24. | Wu the Elder | Three Inches of Mulberry Bark | 023 |
| 25. | Ximen Qing | | 023 |
| 26. | Zhang the Third | Old Rat Who Crosses the Road | 006 |
| 27. | Zhi Zhen | Abbot | 003 |
| 28. | Zheng Guanxi | Bully of the Western Pass | 002 |

In the Vision

An Ch'en, winner of first place in the chin-shih examinations but displaced in favour of Ts'ai Yün because he is the younger brother of the proscribed figure, An Tun; becomes a protégé of Ts'ai Ching and is patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing, later rising to the rank of secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works; rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
An Ch'en's second wife.
An, Consort. See Liu, Consort.
An Tun (1042–1104), elder brother of An Ch'en, a high official whose name has been proscribed for his role in the partisan political conflicts of the late eleventh century.
An-t'ung, pageboy of Aunt Yang.
An-t'ung, pageboy of Miao T'ien-hsiu who is rescued by a fisherman and does his utmost to see justice done for the murder of his master.
An-t'ung, pageboy of Wang Hsüan.
Apricot Hermitage, Layman of. See Wang Hsüan.
Autumn Chrysanthemum. See Ch'iu-chü.
Barefaced Adept, Taoist master from the Fire Dragon Monastery in the Obdurate Grotto of the Vacuous Mountains from whom Yang Kuang-yen acquires the art of lying.
Bean curd-selling crone who identifies the home of Commander Yüan in Potter's Alley to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
"Beanpole, The." See Hui-ch'ing.
Black-robed lictor on the staff of Ho Hsin.
Black-robed lictor who announces the arrival of Chang Pang-ch'ang and Ts'ai Yu to congratulate Chu Mien.
Black Whirlwind. See Li K'uei.
Brocade Tiger. See Yen Shun.
Busybody who directs Ch'iao Yün-ko to Dame Wang's teashop when he is looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Cassia. See Li Kuei-chieh.
Chai Ch'ien, majordomo of Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital.
Chai Ch'ien's wife.
Chai Ching-erh, Sutra Chai, proprietor of a sutra printing shop in Ch'ing-ho.
Chai, Sutra. See Chai Ching-erh.
Ch'ai Chin, Little Whirlwind, Little Lord Meng-ch'ang, direct descendant of Ch'in Jung (921–59), emperor Shih-tsung (r. 954–59) of the Later Chou dynasty (951–60).
Ch'ai Huang-ch'eng, paternal uncle of Ch'ai Chin.
Ch'an Master Snow Cave. See P'u-ching.
Chang An, caretaker of Hsi-men Ch'ing's ancestral graveyard outside Ch'ing-ho.
Chang, Auntie, go-between who helps arrange Ch'en Ching-chi's marriage to Ko Ts'ui-p'ing.
Chang Ch'eng, a neighbourhood head in Ch'ing-ho.
Chang Ch'ing, a criminal innkeeper with whom Wu Sung seeks refuge after the murder of P'an Chin-lien.
Chang Ch'ing's wife.
Chang Ch'uan-erh, a garrulous chair-bearer in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Wei Ts'ung-erh.
Chang the Fourth. See Chang Ju-i.
Chang the Fourth. See Chang Lung.
Chang Hao-wen, Chang the Importunate, Chang the Second, proprietor of a paper shop in Ch'ing-ho, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo.
Chang Hsi-ch'un, a ballad singer maintained at one time as a mistress by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Chang Hsi-ts'un, an acquaintance of Hsi-men Ch'ing's who invites him to his home for a birthday party.
Chang Hsiao-hsien, Hsiao Chang-hsien, Trifler Chang, "ball clubber" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.
Chang the Importunate. See Chang Hao-wen.
Chang Ju-i, Chang the Fourth, wife of Hsiung Wang, employed in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household as a wet nurse for Kuan-ko and later for Hsiao-ko, sexual partner of Hsi-men Ch'ing after the death of Li P'ing-erh, finally married to Lai-hsing.
Chang Ju-i's mother.
Chang Ko (1068–1113), promoted to the post of vice-minister of the Ministry of Works for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Chang Kuan, brother-in-law of Ch'en Hung and maternal uncle of Ch'en Ching-chi, militia commander of Ch'ing-ho.
Chang Kuan's sister. See Ch'en Hung's wife, née Chang.
Chang Kuan's wife.
Chang Lung, Chang the Fourth, maternal uncle of Meng Yü-lou's first husband Yang Tsung-hsi who unsuccessfully proposes that she remarry Shang Hsiao-t'ang and quarrels with Aunt Yang when she decides to marry Hsi-men Ch'ing instead.
Chang Lung, judicial commissioner of the Liang-Huai region.
Chang Lung's elder sister (Chang the Fourth's elder sister), mother of Yang Tsung-hsi and Yang Tsung-pao.
Chang Lung's wife (Chang the Fourth's wife).
Chang Mao-te, Chang the Second, nephew of Mr. Chang, the well-to-do merchant who first seduces P'an Chin-lien; a major rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in the social world of Ch'ing-ho who, immediately after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, bribes Cheng Chü-chung to intervene with Chu Mien and have him appointed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's former position as judicial commissioner so he can take over where Hsi-men Ch'ing left off.
Chang Mao-te's son, marries Eunuch Director Hsü's niece.
Chang Mei, professional actor of Hai-yen style drama.
Chang, Military Director-in-chief, official in Meng-chou.
Chang, Mr., a well-to-do merchant in Ch'ing-ho who first seduces P'an Chin-lien.
Chang, Mrs., wife of Mr. Chang, née Yü.
Chang, Old Mother, go-between who tries to sell two inexperienced country girls, Sheng-chin and Huo-pao, to P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Chang, Old Mother, proprietress of an inn next door to Auntie Hsüeh's residence.
Chang Pang-ch'ang (1081–1127), minister of rites, promoted to the position of grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, puppet emperor of the short-lived state of Ch'u for thirty-two days in 1127.
Chang the Second. See Chang Hao-wen.
Chang the Second. See Chang Mao-te.
Chang Sheng, Street-skulking Rat, "knockabout" who, along with Lu Hua, shakes down Dr. Chiang Chu-shan at the behest of Hsi-men Ch'ing; later a servant in the household of Chou Hsiu, brother-in-law of Liu the Second; murders Ch'en Ching-chi when he overhears him plotting against him and is beaten to death by Chou Hsiu at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Chang Sheng's reincarnation. See Kao family of the Ta-hsing Guard.
Chang Sheng's wife, née Liu, sister of Liu the Second.
Chang Shih-lien, Ch'en Hung's brother-in-law, related to Yang Chien by marriage, an official in the Eastern Capital.
Chang Shih-lien's wife, née Ch'en, Ch'en Hung's elder sister.
Chang Shu-yeh (1065–1127), prefect of Chi-chou in Shantung, later pacification commissioner of Shantung, responsible for the defeat of Sung Chiang and his acceptance of a government amnesty.
Chang Sung, Little. See Shu-t'ung.
Chang Ta (d. 1126), official who dies in the defense of T'ai-yüan against the invading Chin army.
Chang, Trifler. See Chang Hsiao-hsien.
Ch'ang, Cadger. See Ch'ang Shih-chieh.
Ch'ang the Second. See Ch'ang Shih-chieh.
Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Cadger Ch'ang, Ch'ang the Second, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.
Ch'ang Shih-chieh's wife.
Ch'ang Shih-chieh's wife's younger brother.
Ch'ang Yü, Commandant, officer rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Chao, Auntie, go-between who sells Chin-erh to Wang Liu-erh.
Chao Chiao-erh, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Chao, Dr. See Chao Lung-kang.
Chao Hung-tao, domestic clerk on the staff of Yang Chien.
Chao I (fl. early 12th century), Duke of Chia, twenty-sixth son of Emperor Hui-tsung by Consort Liu.
Chao K'ai (d. c. 1129), Prince of Yün, third son of emperor Hui-tsung by Consort Wang.
Chao, Lama, head priest of the Pao-ch'ing Lamasery outside the west gate of Ch'ing-ho.
Chao Lung-kang, Dr. Chao, Chao the Quack, incompetent specialist in female disorders called in to diagnose Li P'ing-erh's fatal illness.
Chao Lung-kang's grandfather.
Chao Lung-kang's father.
Chao No, investigation commissioner for Shantung.
Chao the Quack. See Chao Lung-kang.
Chao, Tailor, artisan patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Chao-ti, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.
Chao T'ing (fl. early 12th century), prefect of Hang-chou, promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Judicial Review.
Chao, Widow, wealthy landowner from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing buys a country estate adjacent to his ancestral graveyard.
Chao Yu-lan, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Ch'e, Hogwash. See Ch'e Tan.
Ch'e Tan, Hogwash Ch'e, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.
Ch'e Tan's father, proprietor of a wineshop in Ch'ing-ho.
Ch'en An, servant in Ch'en Ching-chi's household.
Ch'en, Battalion Commander, resident on Main Street in Ch'ing-ho from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing declines to buy a coffin after the death of Li P'ing-erh.
Ch'en Cheng-hui (fl. early 12th century), son of Ch'en Kuan, surveillance vice-commissioner of education for Shantung.
Ch'en Ching-chi, secondary male protagonist of the novel, son of Ch'en Hung, husband of Hsi-men Ta-chieh, son-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing who carries on a running pseudo-incestuous affair with P'an Chin-lien that is consummated after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; falls out with Wu Yüeh-niang and is evicted from the household; drives Hsi-men Ta-chieh to suicide; attempts unsuccessfully to shake down Meng Yü-lou in Yen-chou; squanders his patrimony and is reduced to beggary; accepts charity from his father's friend the philanthropist Wang Hsüan, who induces him to become a monk with the Taoist appellation Tsung-mei, the junior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing; is admitted to the household of Chou Hsiu as a pretended cousin of P'ang Ch'un-mei who carries on an affair with him under her husband's nose; also has affairs with Feng Chin-pao and Han Ai-chieh, marries Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, and is murdered by Chang Sheng when he is overheard plotting against him.
Ch'en Ching-chi's grandfather, a salt merchant.
Ch'en Ching-chi's reincarnation. See Wang family of the Eastern Capital.
Ch'en, Dr., resident of Ch'ing-ho.
Ch'en, Dr.'s son, conceived as a result of a fertility potion provided by Nun Hsüeh.
Ch'en, Dr.'s wife, conceives a son in middle age after taking a fertility potion provided by Nun Hsüeh.
Ch'en Hung, wealthy dealer in pine resin, father of Ch'en Ching-chi, related by marriage to Yang Chien.
Ch'en Hung's elder sister, wife of Chang Shih-lien.
Ch'en Hung's wife, née Chang, sister of Chang Kuan, mother of Ch'en Ching-chi.
Ch'en Kuan (1057–1122), a prominent remonstrance official, father of Ch'en Cheng-hui.
Ch'en Liang-huai, national university student, son of Vice-Commissioner Ch'en, friend of Ting the Second.
Ch'en, Master, legal scribe who assists Wu Sung in drafting a formal complaint against Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Ch'en, Miss, daughter of the deceased Vice-Commissioner Ch'en whose assignation with Juan the Third results in his death.
Ch'en, Miss's maidservant.
Ch'en, Mistress. See Hsi-men Ta-chieh.
Ch'en the Second, proprietor of an inn at Ch'ing-chiang P'u at which Ch'en Ching-chi puts up on his way to Yen-chou.
Ch'en Ssu-chen, right provincial administration commissioner of Shantung.
Ch'en the Third, "cribber" in the licensed quarter of Lin-ch'ing.
Ch'en the Third, criminal boatman who, along with his partner Weng the Eighth, murders Miao T'ien-hsiu.
Ch'en Ting, servant in Ch'en Hung's household.
Ch'en Ting's wife.
Ch'en Tsung-mei. See Ch'en Ching-chi.
Ch'en Tsung-shan, ward-inspecting commandant of the Eastern Capital.
Ch'en Tung (1086–1127), national university student who submits a memorial to the throne impeaching the Six Traitors.
Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner, deceased father of Miss Ch'en.
Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner, father of Ch'en Liang-huai.
Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner's wife, née Chang, mother of Miss Ch'en.
Ch'en Wen-chao, prefect of Tung-p'ing.
Cheng Ai-hsiang, Cheng Kuan-yin, Goddess of Mercy Cheng, singing girl from the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hua Tzu-hsü, elder sister of Cheng Ai-yüeh.
Cheng Ai-yüeh, singing girl from the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai and Hsi-men Ch'ing, younger sister of Cheng Ai-hsiang.
Cheng, Auntie, madam of the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho.
Cheng, Battalion Commander's family in the Eastern Capital into which Hua Tzu-hsü is reincarnated as a son.
Cheng Chi, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
Cheng Chiao-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, niece of Cheng Ai-hsiang and Cheng Ai-yüeh.
Cheng Chin-pao. See Feng Chin-pao.
Cheng Ch'un, professional actor in Ch'ing-ho, younger brother of Cheng Feng, Cheng Ai-hsiang, and Cheng Ai-yüeh.
Cheng Chü-chung (1059–1123), military affairs commissioner, cousin of Consort Cheng, granted the title of grand guardian for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, accepts a bribe of a thousand taels of silver from Chang Mao-te to intervene with Chu Mien and have him appointed to the position of judicial commissioner left vacant by the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Cheng, Consort, (1081–1132), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, niece of Madame Ch'iao.
Cheng Feng, professional actor in Ch'ing-ho, elder brother of Cheng Ai Hsiang, Cheng Ai-yüeh, and Cheng Ch'un.
Cheng the Fifth, Auntie, madam of the Cheng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing.
Cheng the Fifth, Auntie's husband.
Cheng, Goddess of Mercy. See Cheng Ai-hsiang.
Cheng Kuan-yin. See Cheng Ai-hsiang.
Cheng, Third Sister, niece of Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng, marries Wu K'ai's son Wu Shun-ch'en.
Cheng T'ien-shou, Palefaced Gentleman, third outlaw leader of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain.
Cheng Wang. See Lai-wang.
Ch'eng-erh, younger daughter of Lai-hsing by Hui-hsiu.
Chi K'an, right administration vice commissioner of Shantung.
Chi-nan, old man from, who directs Wu Yüeh-niang to the Ling-pi Stockade in her dream.
Ch'i family brothel in Ch'ing-ho, madam of.
Ch'i Hsiang-erh, singing girl from the Ch'i family brothel in Ch'ing-ho.
Ch'i-t'ung, pageboy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
Chia, Duke of. See Chao I.
Chia Hsiang (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Chia Hsiang's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Chia Jen-ch'ing, False Feelings, neighbour of Hsi-men Ch'ing who intercedes unsuccessfully on Lai-wang's behalf.
Chia Lien, name to which Li Pang-yen alters Hsi-men Ch'ing's name on a bill of impeachment in return for a handsome bribe.
Chiang Chu-shan, Chiang Wen-hui, doctor who Li P'ing-erh marries on the rebound only to drive away ignominiously as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing becomes available again.
Chiang Chu-shan's deceased first wife.
Chiang, Gate God. See Chiang Men-shen.
Chiang, Little, servant of Ch'en Ching-chi.
Chiang Men-shen, Gate God Chiang, elder brother of Chiang Yü-lan, gangster whose struggle with Shih En for control of the Happy Forest Tavern in Meng-chou results in his murder by Wu Sung.
Chiang Ts'ung, Sauce and Scallions, former husband of Sung Hui-lien, a cook in Ch'ing-ho who is stabbed to death in a brawl with a fellow cook over the division of their pay.
Chiang Ts'ung's assailant, convicted of a capital crime and executed as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's intervention.
Chiang Wen-hui. See Chiang Chu-shan.
Chiang Yü-lan, younger sister of Chiang Men-shen, concubine of Military Director-in-chief Chang of Meng-chou who assists her husband and brother in framing Wu Sung.
Ch'iao, distaff relative of the imperial family whose garden abuts on the back wall of Li P'ing-erh's house on Lion Street, assumes hereditary title of commander when Ch'iao the Fifth dies without issue.
Ch'iao Chang-chieh, infant daughter of Ch'iao Hung betrothed to Hsi-men Kuan-ko while both of them are still babes in arms.
Ch'iao, Consort (fl. early 12th century), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, related to Ch'iao the Fifth.
Ch'iao the Fifth, deceased distaff relative of the imperial family through Consort Ch'iao whose hereditary title of commander passes to another branch of the family when he dies without issue.
Ch'iao the Fifth's widow. See Ch'iao, Madame.
Ch'iao Hung, uncle of Ts'ui Pen, wealthy neighbour and business partner of Hsi-men Ch'ing whose daughter, Ch'iao Chang-chieh, is betrothed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's son Kuan-ko while they are still babes in arms.
Ch'iao Hung's concubine, mother of Ch'iao Chang-chieh.
Ch'iao Hung's elder sister, Ts'ui Pen's mother.
Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng.
Ch'iao, Madame, Ch'iao the Fifth's widow, née Cheng, aunt of Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng, and of Consort Cheng.
Ch'iao T'ung, servant in Ch'iao Hung's household.
Ch'iao T'ung's wife.
Ch'iao Yün-ko, Little Yün, young fruit peddler in Ch'ing-ho who helps Wu Chih catch Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien in adultery.
Ch'iao Yün-ko's father, retired soldier dependent on his son.
Ch'ien Ch'eng, vice-magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district.
Ch'ien Ch'ing-ch'uan, traveling merchant entertained by Han Tao-kuo in Yang-chou.
Ch'ien Lao, clerk of the office of punishment in Ch'ing-ho.
Ch'ien Lung-yeh, secretary of the Ministry of Revenue in charge of collecting transit duties on shipping at the Lin-ch'ing customs house.
Ch'ien, Phlegm-fire. See Ch'ien T'an-huo.
Ch'ien T'an-huo, Phlegm-fire Ch'ien, Taoist healer called in to treat Hsi-men Kuan-ko.
Chih-yün, Abbot, head priest of Hsiang-kuo Temple in K'ai-feng visited by Hsi-men Ch'ing on his trip to the Eastern Capital.
Chin, Abbot, Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Eastern Peak on Mount T'ai.
Chin Ch'ien-erh, former maidservant in the household of Huang the Fourth's son purchased by P'ang Ch'un-mei as a servant for Ko Ts'ui-p'ing when she marries Ch'en Ching-chi.
Chin-erh, maidservant of Wang Liu-erh.
Chin-erh, singing girl in Longleg Lu's brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho.
Chin-erh, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Chin-erh's father, military patrolman whose horse is fatally injured in a fall and, for lack of replacement money, is forced to sell his daughter into domestic service.
Chin-kuei, employed in Chou Hsiu's household as a wet nurse for Chou Chin-ko.
Chin-lien. See P'an Chin-lien.
Chin-lien. See Sung Hui-lien.
Chin Ta-chieh, wife of Auntie Hsüeh's son Hsüeh Chi.
Chin-ts'ai, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.
Chin Tsung-ming, senior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.
Ch'in-tsung, Emperor of the Sung dynasty (r. 1125–27), son of Emperor Hui-tsung who abdicated in his favour in 1125, taken into captivity together with his father by the Chin dynasty invaders in 1127.
Ch'in-t'ung, junior pageboy in the household of Hua Tzu-hsü and Li P'ing-erh, originally named T'ien-fu but renamed when she marries into the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Ch'in-t'ung, pageboy of Meng Yü-lou who is seduced by P'an Chin-lien and driven out of the household when the affair is discovered.
Ch'in Yü-chih, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai.
Ching-chi. See Ch'en Ching-chi.
Ching Chung, commander of the left battalion of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, later promoted to the post of military director-in-chief of Chi-chou, and finally to commander-general of the southeast and concurrently grain transport commander.
Ching Chung's daughter for whom he seeks a marriage alliance with Hsi-men Kuan-ko but is refused by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Ching Chung's mother.
Ching Chung's wife.
Ch'iu-chü, Autumn Chrysanthemum, much abused junior maidservant of P'an Chin-lien.
Cho the Second. See Cho Tiu-erh.

Cho Tiu-erh, Cho the second, Toss-off Cho, unlicensed prostitute in Ch'ing-ho maintained as a mistress by Hsi-men Ch'ing and subsequently brought into his household as his Third Lady only to sicken and die soon thereafter.
Cho, Toss-off. See Cho Tiu-erh.
Chou, Censor, neighbour of Wu Yüeh-niang's when she was growing up, father of Miss Chou.
Chou Chin-ko, son of Chou Hsiu by P'ang Ch'un-mei the real father of which may have been Ch'en Ching-chi.
Chou Chung, senior servant in the household of Chou Hsiu, father of Chou Jen and Chou I.
Chou, Eunuch Director, resident of Ch'ing-ho whose invitation to a party Hsi-men Ch'ing declines not long before his death.
Chou Hsiao-erh, patron of Li Kuei-ch'ing and probably of Li Kuei-chieh also.
Chou Hsiu, commandant of the Regional Military Command, later appointed to other high military posts, colleague of Hsi-men Ch'ing after whose death he buys P'ang Ch'un-mei as a concubine and later promotes her to the position of principle wife when she bears him a son; commander-general of the Shantung region who leads the forces of Ch'ing-yen against the Chin invaders and dies at Kao-yang Pass of an arrow wound inflicted by the Chin commander Wan-yen Tsung-wang.
Chou Hsiu's first wife, blind in one eye, who dies not long after P'ang Ch'un-mei enters his household as a concubine.
Chou Hsiu's reincarnation, see Shen Shou-shan.
Chou Hsüan, cousin of Chou Hsiu's who looks after his affairs while he is at the front.
Chou I, servant in Chou Hsiu's household, son of Chou Chung and younger brother of Chou Jen, clandestine lover of P'ang Ch'un-mei who dies in the act of intercourse with him.
Chou I's paternal aunt with whom he seeks refuge after the death of P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Chou I's reincarnation. See Kao Liu-chu.
Chou Jen, servant in Chou Hsiu's household, son of Chou Chung and elder brother of Chou I.
Chou, Little, itinerant barber and masseur in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Chou, Miss, daughter of Censor Chou, neighbour of Wu Yüeh-niang's when she was growing up who broke her hymen by falling from a standing position onto the seat of a swing.
Chou, Ms., widowed second wife of Sung Te's father-in-law who commits adultery with him after her husband's death, for which Hsi-men Ch'ing sentences them both to death by strangulation.
Chou, Ms.'s maidservant.
Chou, Ms.'s mother.
Chou the Second, friend of Juan the Third.
Chou Shun, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing female lead parts.
Chou Ts'ai, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Chou Yü-chieh, daughter of Chou Hsiu by his concubine Sun Erh-niang.
Chu Ai-ai, Love, singing girl from Greenhorn Chu's brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, daughter of Greenhorn Chu.
Chu, Battalion Commander, resident of Ch'ing-ho, father of Miss Chu.
Chu, Battalion Commander's deceased wife, mother of Miss Chu.
Chu, Censor, resident of Ch'ing-ho, neighbour of Ch'iao Hung.
Chu, Censor's wife.
Chu family of the Eastern Capital, family into which Sung Hui-lien is reincarnated as a daughter.
Chu, Greenhorn, proprietor of a brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho situated next door to the Verdant Spring Bordello of Auntie Li the Third.
Chu Jih-nien, Sticky Chu, Pockmarked Chu, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter.
Chu Mien (1075–1126), defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, an elite unit of the Imperial Bodyguard that performed secret police functions; relative of Li Ta-t'ien, the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho; chief mover behind the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, for which service to the throne he is promoted to a series of high posts; one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
Chu Mien's majordomo.
Chu Mien's son, granted the post of battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Chu, Miss, daughter of Battalion Commander Chu.
Chu, Pockmarked. See Chu Jih-nien.
Chu, Sticky. See Chu Jih-nien.
Ch'u-yün, daughter of a battalion commander of the Yang-chou Guard purchased by Miao Ch'ing to send as a gift to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Ch'u-yün's father, battalion commander of the Yang-chou Guard.
Ch'un-hsiang, maidservant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.
Ch'un-hua, concubine of Ying Po-chüeh and mother of his younger son.
Ch'un-hung, pageboy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
Ch'un-mei. See P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Chung-ch'iu, junior maidservant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household serving at various times Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Wu Yüeh-niang.
Chung Kuei, policeman from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital into whose family Hsi-men Ta-chieh is reincarnated as a daughter.
Ch'ung-hsi, maidservant purchased by Ch'en Ching-chi to serve Feng Chin-pao.
Ch'ung Shih-tao (1051–1126), general-in-chief of the Sung armies defending against the Chin invaders.
Ch'ü, Midwife, maternal aunt of Lai-wang in whose house on Polished Rice Lane outside the east gate of Ch'ing-ho Lai-wang and Sun Hsüeh-o seek refuge after absconding from the Hsi-men household.
Ch'ü T'ang, son of Midwife Ch'ü, cousin of Lai-wang.
Coal in the Snow. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.
Died-of-fright, Miss, wife of Yang Kuang-yen.
False Feelings. See Chia Jen-ch'ing.
Fan family of Hsü-chou, peasant family into which Wu Chih is reincarnated as a son.
Fan Hsün, battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard.
Fan, Hundred Customers. See Fan Pai-chia-nu.
Fan Kang, next-door neighbour of Ch'en Ching-chi in Ch'ing-ho.
Fan, Old Man, neighbour of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Fan Pai-chia-nu, Hundred Customers Fan, singing girl from the Fan Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.
Fang Chen (fl. early 12th century), erudite of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices who reports that a brick in the Imperial Ancestral Temple is oozing blood.
Fang La (d. 1121), rebel who set up an independent regime in the Southeast that was suppressed by government troops in 1121.
Feng Chin-pao, Cheng Chin-pao, singing girl from the Feng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing purchased as a concubine by Ch'en Ching-chi, later resold to the brothel of Auntie Cheng the Fifth who changes her name to Cheng Chin-pao.
Feng Chin-pao's mother, madam of the Feng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing.
Feng, Consort (fl. mid 11th-early 12th centuries), Consort Tuan, consort of Emperor Jen-tsung (r. 1022–63) who resided in the palace for five reigns.
Feng Family Brothel's servant.
Feng Huai, son of Feng the Second, son-in-law of Pai the Fifth, dies of injuries sustained in an affray with Sun Wen-hsiang.
Feng, Old Mother, waiting woman in Li P'ing-erh's family since she was a child, continues in her service when she is a concubine of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh, wife of Hua Tzu-hsü, wife of Chiang Chu-shan, and after she marries Hsi-men Ch'ing, supplementing her income by working as a go-between on the side.
Feng the Second, employee of Sun Ch'ing, father of Feng Huai.
Feng T'ing-hu, left assistant administration commissioner of Shantung.
Fifth Lady. See P'an Chin-lien.
First Lady. See Wu Yüeh-niang.
Fisherman who rescues An-t'ung and helps him to locate the boatmen who had murdered his master.
Flying Demon. See Hou Lin.
Fourth Lady. See Sun Hsüeh-o.
Fu-jung, maidservant of Lady Lin.
Fu, Manager. See Fu Ming.
Fu Ming, Fu the Second, Manager Fu, manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's pharmaceutical shop, pawnshop, and other businesses.
Fu Ming's wife.
Fu the Second. See Fu Ming.
Fu T'ien-tse, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Golden Lotus. See P'an Chin-lien.
Good Deed. See Yin Chih.
Hai-t'ang, concubine of Chou Hsiu much abused by P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Han Ai-chieh, daughter of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh, niece of Han the Second, concubine of Chai Ch'ien, mistress of Ch'en Ching-chi to whom she remains faithful after his death, ending her life as a Buddhist nun.
Han, Auntie, wife of Mohammedan Han, mother of Han Hsiao-yü.
Han, Baldy, father of Han Tao-kuo and Han the Second.
Han, Brother-in-law. See Han Ming-ch'uan.
Han Chin-ch'uan, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, elder sister of Han Yü-ch'uan, younger sister of Han Pi.
Han Hsiao-ch'ou, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, niece of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Yü-ch'uan.
Han Hsiao-yü, son of Mohammedan Han and Auntie Han.
Han Lü (fl. early 12th century), vice-minister of the Ministry of Revenue, vice-minister of the Ministry of Personnel, brother-in-law of Ts'ai Ching's youngest son, Ts'ai T'ao, grants Hsi-men Ch'ing favourable treatment for his speculations in the salt trade.
Han, Master, formerly a court painter attached to the Hsüan-ho Academy, called upon by Hsi-men Ch'ing to paint two posthumous portraits of Li P'ing-erh.
Han Ming-ch'uan, Brother-in-law Han, husband of Meng Yü-lou's elder sister who lives outside the city gate of Ch'ing-ho; friend of Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i.
Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng, Mrs. Han, elder sister of Meng Yü-lou.
Han, Mohammedan, husband of Auntie Han, father of Han Hsiao-yü, renter of a room on the street front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property next door to that of Pen Ti-ch'uan and his wife, employed on the staff of the eunuch director in charge of the local Imperial Stables.
Han, Mrs. See Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng.
Han Pang-ch'i, prefect of Hsü-chou.
Han Pi, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho, elder brother of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Yü-ch'uan.
Han, Posturer. See Han Tao-kuo.
Han the Second, Trickster Han, younger brother of Han Tao-kuo, "knockabout" and gambler in Ch'ing-ho who carries on an intermittent affair with his sister-in-law, Wang Liu-erh, whom he marries after the death of Han Tao-kuo.
Han Tao-kuo, Posturer Han, husband of Wang Liu-erh, son of Baldy Han, elder brother of Han the Second, father of Han Ai-chieh, manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk store on Lion Street who absconds with a thousand taels of his property on hearing of his death, content to live off the sexual earnings of his wife and daughter.
Han Tao-kuo's paternal uncle, elder brother of Baldy Han.
Han, Trickster. See Han the Second.
Han Tso, boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Han Tsung-jen, domestic clerk on the staff of Yang Chien.
Han Wen-kuang, investigation commissioner for Shantung.
Han Yü-ch'uan, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, younger sister of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Pi.
Hao Hsien, Idler Hao, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.
Hao, Idler. See Hao Hsien.
Ho Ch'i-kao, left administration vice-commissioner of Shantung.
Ho Chin, assistant judicial commissioner of the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, promoted to the post of commander of Hsin-p'ing Stockade and later to the post of judicial commissioner in the Huai-an office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, thereby creating the vacancy filled by Hsi-men Ch'ing in return for the lavishness of his birthday presents to Ts'ai Ching.
Ho Chin-ch'an, singing girl from the Ho Family Bordello on Fourth Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
Ho Ch'in, son of Ho the Ninth who succeeds to his position as head coroner's assistant of Ch'ing-ho.
Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, Dr. Ho, son of Old Man Ho, physician in Ch'ing-ho.
Ho, Dr. See Ho Ch'un-ch'üan.
Ho, Eunuch Director. See Ho Hsin.

Ho Hsin (fl. early 12th century), Eunuch Director Ho, attendant in the Yen-ning Palace, residence of Consort Feng, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Ho Yung-shou, entertains Hsi-men Ch'ing on his visit to the Eastern Capital.
Ho-hua, maidservant of Chou Hsiu's concubine Sun Erh-niang.
Ho Liang-feng, younger brother of Magnate Ho.
Ho, Magnate, wealthy silk merchant from Hu-chou, elder brother of Ho Liang-feng, tries to buy P'an Chin-lien after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, patronizes Wang Liu-erh in Lin-ch'ing and takes her and Han Tao-kuo back to Hu-chou where they inherit his property.
Ho, Magnate's daughter.
Ho the Ninth, elder brother of Ho the Tenth, head coroner's assistant of Ch'ing-ho who accepts a bribe from Hsi-men Ch'ing to cover up the murder of Wu Chih.
Ho, Old Man, father of Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, aged physician in Ch'ing-ho.
Ho Pu-wei, clerk on the staff of the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho, Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who assists his son Li Kung-pi in his courtship of Meng Yü-lou.
Ho the Tenth, younger brother of Ho the Ninth, let off the hook by Hsi-men Ch'ing when he is accused of fencing stolen goods.
Ho Yung-fu, nephew of Ho Hsin, younger brother of Ho Yung-shou.
Ho Yung-shou, nephew of Ho Hsin, elder brother of Ho Yung-fu, appointed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's former post as assistant judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission as a reward for Ho Hsin's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, niece of Lan Ts'ung-hsi.
Hou Lin, Flying Demon, beggar boss in Ch'ing-ho who helps out Ch'en Ching-chi when he is reduced to beggary in return for his sexual favours.
Hou Meng (1054–1121), grand coordinator of Shantung, promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Hsi-erh, pageboy in the household of Chou Hsiu.
Hsi-men An. See Tai-an.
Hsi-men Ching-liang, Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandfather.
Hsi-men Ch'ing, principal male protagonist of the novel, father of Hsi-men Ta-chieh by his deceased first wife, née Ch'en, father of Hsi-men Kuan-ko by Li P'ing-erh, father of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko by Wu Yüeh-niang, decadent scion of a merchant family of some wealth from which he inherits a wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen of Ch'ing-ho, climbs in social status by means of a succession of corrupt sexual, economic, and political conquests only to die of sexual excess at the age of thirty-three.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter. See Hsi-men Ta-chieh.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's first wife, née Ch'en, deceased mother of Hsi-men Ta-chieh.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's father. See Hsi-men Ta.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandfather. See Hsi-men Ching-liang.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandmother, née Li.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's mother, née Hsia.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's reincarnation. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko and Shen Yüeh.
Hsi-men Ch'ing's sons. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko and Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, posthumous son of Hsi-men Ch'ing by Wu Yüeh-niang, born at the very moment of his death, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Yün Li-shou's daughter, claimed by the Buddhist monk P'u-ching to be the reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and spirited away by him at the end of the novel to become a celibate monk with the religious name Ming-wu.
Hsi-men Kuan-ko, son of Hsi-men Ch'ing by Li P'ing-erh, given the religious name Wu Ying-yüan by the Taoist priest Wu Tsung-che, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Ch'iao Chang-chieh, murdered by P'an Chin-lien out of jealousy of Li P'ing-erh.
Hsi-men Kuan-ko's reincarnation. See Wang family of Cheng-chou.
Hsi-men Ta, deceased father of Hsi-men Ch'ing whose business took him to many parts of China.
Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Mistress Ch'en, Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter by his deceased first wife, née Ch'en, wife of Ch'en Ching-chi, so neglected and abused by her husband that she commits suicide.
Hsi-men Ta-chieh's reincarnation. See Chung Kuei.
Hsi-t'ung, pageboy in the household of Wang Hsüan.
Hsiao-ko. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Hsia Ch'eng-en, son of Hsia Yen-ling, achieves status of military selectee by hiring a stand-in to take the qualifying examination for him.
Hsia-hua, junior maidservant of Li Chiao-erh who is caught trying to steal a gold bracelet.
Hsia Kung-chi, docket officer on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.
Hsia Shou, servant in the household of Hsia Yen-ling.
Hsia Yen-ling, judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, colleague, superior, and rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in his official career.
Hsia Yen-ling's son. See Hsia Ch'eng-en.
Hsia Yen-ling's wife.
Hsiang the Elder, deceased distaff relative of the imperial family through Empress Hsiang, consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85), elder brother of Hsiang the fifth.
Hsiang, Empress, (1046–1101), consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85).
Hsiang the Fifth, distaff relative of the imperial family through Empress Hsiang, consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85), younger brother of Hsiang the Elder, sells part of his country estate outside Ch'ing-ho to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Hsiao Chang-hsien. See Chang Hsiao-hsien.
Hsiao Ch'eng, resident of Oxhide Street and neighbourhood head of the fourth neighbourhood of the first subprecinct of Ch'ing-ho.
Hsiao-ko. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Hsiao-luan, junior maidservant of Meng Yü-lou.
Hsiao-yü, Little Jade, junior maidservant of Wu Yüeh-niang, married to Tai-an after Wu Yüeh-niang discovers them in flagrante delicto.
Hsiao-yüeh, Abbot, head priest of the Water Moon Monastery outside the south gate of Ch'ing-ho.
Hsieh En, assistant judicial commissioner of the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.
Hsieh, Fatty. See Hsieh the Third.
Hsieh Hsi-ta, Tagalong Hsieh, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.
Hsieh Hsi-ta's father, deceased hereditary battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard.
Hsieh Hsi-ta's mother.
Hsieh Hsi-ta's wife, née Liu.
Hsieh Ju-huang, What a Whopper, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo who punctures his balloon when he inflates his own importance.
Hsieh, Tagalong. See Hsieh Hsi-ta.
Hsieh the Third, Fatty Hsieh, manager of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Hsin Hsing-tsung (fl. early 12th century), commander-general of the Honan region who leads the forces of Chang-te against the Chin invaders.
Hsiu-ch'un, junior maidservant of Li P'ing-erh and later of Li Chiao-erh, finally becoming a novice nun under the tutelage of Nun Wang.
Hsiung Wang, husband of Chang Ju-i, soldier forced by his lack of means to sell his wife to Hsi-men Ch'ing as a wet nurse for Kuan-ko.
Hsiung Wang's son by Chang Ju-i.
Hsü, Assistant Administration Commissioner, of Yen-chou in Shantung.
Hsü-chou, old woman from, in whose house Han Ai-chieh encounters Han the Second.
Hsü, Eunuch Director, wealthy eunuch speculator and moneylender, resident of Halfside Street in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho, landlord of Crooked-head Sun and Aunt Yang, patron of Li Ming, original owner of Hsia Yen-ling's residential compound, major rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in the social world of Ch'ing-ho whose niece marries Chang Mao-te's son.
Hsü, Eunuch Director's niece, marries Chang Mao-te's son.
Hsü Feng, prefect of Yen-chou in Chekiang who exposes Meng Yü-lou's and Li Kung-pi's attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi.
Hsü Feng's trusted henchman who disguises himself as a convict in order to elicit information from Ch'en Ching-chi.
Hsü Feng-hsiang, supervisor of the State Farm Battalion of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, one of the officials who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.
Hsü the Fourth, shopkeeper outside the city wall of Ch'ing-ho who borrows money from Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Hsü Hsiang, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Hsü, Master, yin-yang master of Ch'ing-ho.
Hsü Nan-ch'i, military officer in Ch'ing-ho promoted to the post of commander of the Hsin-p'ing Stockade.
Hsü, Prefect, prefect of Ch'ing-chou, patron of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mout T'ai.
Hsü, Prefect's daughter.
Hsü, Prefect's son.
Hsü, Prefect's wife.
Hsü Pu-yü, Reneger Hsü, moneylender in Ch'ing-ho from whom Wang Ts'ai tries to borrow three hundred taels of silver in order to purchase a position in the Military School.
Hsü, Reneger. See Hsü Pu-yü.
Hsü Shun, professional actor of Hai-yen style drama.
Hsü Sung, prefect of Tung-ch'ang in Shantung.
Hsü Sung's concubine.
Hsü Sung's concubine's father.
Hsü, Tailor, artisan with a shop across the street from Han Tao-kuo residence on Lion Street in Ch'ing-ho.
Hsü the Third, seller of date cakes in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.
Hsü Tsung-shun, junior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.
Hsüeh, Auntie, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who also peddles costume jewelry, mother of Hsüeh Chi, sells P'ang Ch'un-mei into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, represents Hsi-men Ch'ing in the betrothal of his daughter Hsi-men Ta-chieh to Ch'en Ching-chi, proposes his match with Meng Yü-lou, arranges resale of P'ang Ch'un-mei to Chou Hsiu after she is forced to leave the Hsi-men household by Wu Yüeh-niang, arranges match between Ch'en Ching-chi and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing after Hsi-men Ta-chieh's suicide.
Hsüeh, Auntie's husband.
Hsüeh Chi, son of Auntie Hsüeh, husband of Chin ta-chieh.
Hsüeh Chi's son by Chin Ta-chieh.
Hsüeh, Eunuch Director, supervisor of the imperial estates in the Ch'ing-ho region, despite his castration given to fondling and pinching the singing girls with whom he comes in contact.
Hsüeh Hsien-chung, official rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Hsüeh, Nun, widow of a peddler of steamed wheat cakes living across the street from the Kuang-ch'eng Monastery in Ch'ing-ho who takes the ton-sure after the death of her husband and becomes abbess of the Ksitigarbha Nunnery, defrocked for her complicity in the death of Juan the Third, later rector of the Lotus Blossom Nunnery in the southern quarter of Ch'ing-ho who provides first Wu Yüeh-niang and then P'an Chin-lien with fertility potions, frequently invited to recite Buddhist "precious scrolls" to Wu Yüeh-niang and her guests.
Hsüeh, Nun's deceased husband, peddler of steamed wheat cakes living across the street from the Kuang-ch'eng Monastery in Ch'ing-ho.
Hsüeh-o. See Sun Hsüeh-o.
Hsüeh Ts'un-erh, unlicensed prostitute in Longfoot Wu's brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.
Hu, Dr., Old Man Hu, Hu the Quack, physician who lives in Eunuch Director Liu's house on East Street in Ch'ing-ho in the rear courtyard of which Hsi-men Ch'ing hides in order to evade Wu Sung, treats Hua Tzu-hsü, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Ch'ing without success, prescribes abortifacient for P'an Chin-lien when she becomes pregnant by Ch'en Ching-chi.
Hu, Dr.'s maidservant.
Hu the Fourth, impeached as a relative or adherent of Yang Chien.
Hu Hsiu, employee of Han Tao-kuo who spies on Hsi-men Ch'ing's love-making with Wang Liu-erh, accompanies his employer on his buying expeditions to the south, and tells him what he thinks about his private life in a drunken tirade in Yang-chou.
Hu, Old Man. See Hu, Dr.
Hu the Quack. See Hu, Dr.
Hu Shih-wen (fl. early 12th century), related to Ts'ai Ching by marriage, corrupt prefect of Tung-p'ing in Shantung who participates with Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling in getting Miao Ch'ing off the hook for murdering his master Miao T'ien-hsiu.
Hu Ts'ao, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing young male lead roles.
Hua the Elder. See Hua Tzu-yu.
Hua, Eunuch Director, uncle of Hua Tzu-yu, Hua Tzu-hsü, Hua Tzu-kuang, and Hua Tzu-hua and adoptive father of Hua Tzu-hsü, member of the Imperial Bodyguard and director of the Firewood Office in the Imperial Palace, later promoted to the position of grand defender of Kuang-nan from which post he retires on account of illness to take up residence in his native place, Ch'ing-ho; despite his castration engaged in pseudo-incestuous hanky-panky with his daughter-in-law, Li P'ing-erh.
Hua the Fourth. See Hua Tzu-hua.
Hua Ho-lu, assistant magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.
Hua, Mistress. See Li P'ing-erh.
Hua, Mrs. See Li P'ing-erh.

Hua, Nobody. See Hua Tzu-hsü.
Hua the Second. See Hua Tzu-hsü.
Hua the Third. See Hua Tzu-kuang.
Hua-t'ung, pageboy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household sodomized by Wen Pi-ku.
Hua Tzu-hsü, Hua the Second, Nobody Hua, nephew and adopted son of Eunuch Director Hua, husband of Li P'ing-erh, next-door neighbour of Hsi-men Ch'ing and member of the brotherhood of ten, patron of Wu Yin-erh and Cheng Ai-hsiang; cuckolded by Li P'ing-erh, who turns over much of his property to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he loses the rest in a lawsuit and dies of chagrin.
Hua Tzu-hsü's reincarnation. See Cheng. Battalion Commander's family in the Eastern Capital.
Hua Tzu-hua, Hua the Fourth, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.
Hua Tzu-hua's wife.
Hua Tzu-kuang, Hua the Third, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.
Hua Tzu-kuang's wife.
Hua Tzu-yu, Hua the Elder, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.
Hua Tzu-yu's wife.
Huai River region, merchant from, who employs Wang Ch'ao.
Huai River region, merchant from, who patronizes Li Kuei-ch'ing.
Huang An, military commander involved with T'an Chen in defense of the northern frontier against the Chin army.
Huang, Buddhist Superior, monk of the Pao-en Temple in Ch'ing-ho.
Huang Chia, prefect of Teng-chou in Shantung.
Huang Ching-ch'en (d. 1126), defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Wang Ts'ai's wife, née Huang, lavishly entertained by Hsi-men Ch'ing at the request of Sung Ch'iao-nien.
Huang Ching-ch'en's adopted son, granted the post of battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Huang the Fourth, merchant contractor in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Li Chih, ends up in prison for misappropriation of funds.
Huang the Fourth's son.
Huang the Fourth's wife, née Sun, daughter of Sun Ch'ing.
Huang-lung Temple, abbot of, entertains Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou en route to Ch'ing-ho from the Eastern Capital.
Huang, Master, fortune teller residing outside the Chen-wu Temple in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
Huang Mei, assistant prefect of K'ai-feng, maternal cousin of Miao T'ien-hsiu who invites him to visit him in the capital and appeals to Tseng Hsiao-hsü on his behalf after his murder.
Huang Ning, pageboy in the household of Huang the Fourth.
Huang Pao-kuang (fl. early 12th century), secretary of the Ministry of Works in charge of the Imperial Brickyard in Ch'ing-ho, provincial graduate of the same year as Shang Hsiao-t'ang.
Huang, Perfect Man. See Huang Yüan-pai.
Huang Yü, foreman on the staff of Wang Fu.
Huang Yüan-pai, Perfect Man Huang, Taoist priest sent by the court to officiate at a seven-day rite of cosmic renewal on Mount T'ai, also officiates at a rite of purification for the salvation of the soul of Li P'ing-erh.
Hui-ch'ing, "The Beanpole," wife of Lai-chao, mother of Little Iron Rod.
Hui-hsiang, wife of Lai-pao, née Liu, mother of Seng-pao.
Hui-hsiang's elder sister.
Hui-hsiang's mother.
Hui-hsiang's younger brother. See Liu Ts'ang.
Hui-hsiu, wife of Lai-hsing, mother of Nien-erh and Ch'eng-erh.
Hui-lien. See Sung Hui-lien.
Hui-tsung, Emperor of the Sung dynasty (r. 1100–25), father of Emperor Ch'in-tsung in whose favour he abdicates in 1125, taken into captivity together with his son by the Chin invaders in 1127.
Hui-yüan, wife of Lai-chüeh.
Hung, Auntie, madam of the Hung Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.
Hung the Fourth, singing girl from the Hung Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.
Hung-hua Temple in Ch'ing-ho, monk from, whom Hsi-men Ch'ing frames and executes in place of Ho the Tenth.
Huo-pao, eleven-year-old country girl offered to P'ang Ch'un-mei as a maidservant but rejected for wetting her bed.
Huo-pao's parents.
Huo Ta-li, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho who accepts Ch'en Ching-chi's bribe and lets him off the hook when accused of driving his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to suicide.
I Mien-tz'u, Ostensibly Benign, neighbour of Hsi-men Ch'ing who intercedes unsuccessfully on Lai-wang's behalf.
Imperial stables in Ch'ing-ho, eunuch director of, employer of Mohammedan Han.
Indian monk. See Monk, Indian.
Iron Fingernail. See Yang Kuang-yen.
Iron Rod. See Little Iron Rod.
Itinerant acrobat called in by Chou Hsiu to distract P'ang Ch'un-mei from her grief over the death of P'an Chin-lien.
Jade Flute. See Yü-hsiao.
Jade Lotus. See Pai Yü-lien.
Jen, Abbot, Taoist priest of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing to whom Wang Hsüan recommends Ch'en Ching-chi as a disciple; dies of shock when threatened with arrest in connection with the latter's whoremongering.
Jen, Abbot's acolyte.
Jen, Dr. See Jen Hou-ch'i.
Jen Hou-ch'i, Dr. Jen, physician in Ch'ing-ho who treats Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing without success, friend of Han Ming-ch'uan.
Jen T'ing-kuei, assistant magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.
Ju-i. See Chang Ju-i.
Juan the Third, dies of excitement in the act of making love to Miss Ch'en in the Ksitigarbha Nunnery during an assignation arranged by Nun Hsüeh.
Juan the Third's parents.
Jui-yün. See Pen Chang-chieh.
Jung Chiao-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai.
Jung Hai, employee of Hsi-men Ch'ing who accompanies Ts'ui Pen on a buying trip to Hu-chou.
Kan Jun, resident of Stonebridge Alley in Ch'ing-ho, partner and manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk dry goods store.
Kan Jun's wife.
Kan Lai-hsing. See Lai-hsing.
K'ang, Prince of. See Kao-tsung, Emperor.
Kao An, secondary majordomo of Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital through whom Lai-pao gains access to Ts'ai Yu.
Kao Ch'iu (d. 1126), defender-in-chief of the Imperial Bodyguard, granted the title of grand guardian for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park; one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
Kao family from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital, family into which Chou I is reincarnated as a son named Kao Liu-chu.
Kao family of the Ta-hsing Guard, family into which Chang Sheng is reincarnated as a son.
Kao Lien, cousin of Kao Ch'iu, prefect of T'ai-an, brother-in-law of Yin T'ien-hsi.
Kao Lien's wife, née Yin, elder sister of Yin T'ien-hsi.
Kao Liu-chu, son of the Kao family from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital, reincarnation of Chou I.
Kao-tsung, emperor of the Southern Sung dynasty (r. 1127–62), ninth son of Emperor Hui-tsung, Prince of K'ang; declares himself emperor in 1127 when the Chin invaders take emperors Hui-tsung and Ch'in-tsung into captivity; abdicates in favour of Emperor Hsiao-tsung in 1162.
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, wife of Ch'en Ching-chi in a marriage arranged by P'ang Ch'un-mei with whom he continues to carry on an intermittent affair; returns to her parents' family after Ch'en Ching-chi's death and the invasion by the Chin armies.
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's father, wealthy silk dry goods dealer in Ch'ing-ho.
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's mother.
Kou Tzu-hsiao, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing male lead roles.
Ku, Silversmith, jeweler in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing, employer of Lai-wang after he returns to Ch'ing-ho from exile in Hsü-chou.
Kuan, Busybody. See Kuan Shih-k'uan.
Kuan-ko. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko.
Kuan Shih-k'uan, Busybody Kuan, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.
Kuan-yin Nunnery, abbess of, superior of Nun Wang, frequent visitor in the Hsi-men household.
Kuang-yang, Commandery Prince of. See T'ung Kuan.
Kuei-chieh. See Li Kuei-chieh.
Kuei-ch'ing. See Li Kuei-ch'ing.
Kung Kuai (1057-1111), left provincial administration commissioner of Shantung.
K'ung, Auntie, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Ch'iao Hung's family in arranging the betrothal of Ch'iao Chang-chieh to Hsi-men Kuan-ko.
K'ung family of the Eastern Capital, family into which P'ang Ch'un-mei is reincarnated as a daughter.
Kuo Shou-ch'ing, senior disciple of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.
Kuo Shou-li, junior disciple of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.
Kuo Yao-shih (d. after 1126), turncoat who accepts office under the Sung dynasty but goes over to the Chin side at a critical point and is instrumental in their conquest of North China.
La-mei, maidservant employed in the Wu Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.
Lai-an, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
Lai-chao, Liu Chao, head servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, husband of Hui-ch'ing, father of Little Iron Rod, helps Lai-wang to abscond with Sun Hsüeh-o.
Lai-chao's son. See Little Iron Rod.
Lai-chao's wife. See Hui-ch'ing.
Lai-chüeh, Lai-yu, husband of Hui-yüan, originally servant in the household of a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang, loses his position on exposure of his wife's affair with her employer, recommended as a servant to Hsi-men Ch'ing by his friend Ying Pao, the son of Ying Po-chüeh.
Lai-chüeh's deceased parents.
Lai-chüeh's wife. See Hui-yüan.
Lai-hsing, Kan Lai-hsing, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, originally recruited by Hsi-men Ch'ing's father while traveling on business in Kan-chou, husband of Hui-hsiu, father of Nien-erh and Ch'eng-erh, helps to frame Lai-wang for attempted murder, married to Chang Ju-i after the death of Hui-hsiu.
Lai-pao, T'ang Pao, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household often relied upon for important missions to the capital, husband of Hui-hsiang, father of Seng-pao, appointed to the post of commandant on the staff of the Prince of Yün in return for his part in delivering birthday presents from Hsi-men Ch'ing to Ts'ai Ching, embezzles Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death and makes unsuccessful sexual advances to Wu Yüeh-niang, ends up in prison for misappropriation of funds.
Lai-pao's son. See Seng-pao.
Lai-pao's wife. See Hui-hsiang.
Lai-ting, pageboy in the household of Hua Tzu-yu.
Lai-ting, pageboy in the household of Huang the Fourth.
Lai-ting, pageboy in the household of Wu K'ai.
Lai-wang, Cheng Wang, native of Hsü-chou, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, husband of Sung Hui-lien, framed for attempted murder and driven out of the household in order to get him out of the way, carries on a clandestine affair with Sun Hsüeh-o before his exile and absconds with her when he returns to Ch'ing-ho after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death.
Lai-wang's first wife, dies of consumption.
Lai-wang's second wife. See Sung Hui-lien.
Lai-yu. See Lai-chüeh.
Lan-hsiang, senior maidservant of Meng Yü-lou.
Lan-hua, junior maidservant of P'ang Ch'un-mei after she becomes the wife of Chou Hsiu.
Lan-hua, elderly maidservant in the household of Wu K'ai.
Lan Ts'ung-hsi (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan.

Lan Ts'ung-hsi's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Lan Ts'ung-hsi's niece. See Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan.
Lang, Buddhist Superior, monk of the Pao-en Temple in Ch'ing-ho.
Lei Ch'i-yüan, assistant commissioner of the Shantung Military Defense Circuit.
Li An, retainer in the household of Chou Hsiu who saves P'ang Ch'un-mei's life when she is threatened by Chang Sheng and resists her blandishments when she tries to seduce him.
Li An's father, deceased elder brother of Li Kuei.
Li An's mother, persuades Li An to avoid entanglement with P'ang Ch'un-mei by seeking refuge with his uncle Li Kuei in Ch'ing-chou.
Li, Barestick. See Li Kung-pi.
Li Ch'ang-ch'i, father of Li Kung-pi, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho and later assistant prefect of Yen-chou in Chekiang.
Li Ch'ang-ch'i's wife, mother of Li Kung-pi.
Li Chiao-erh, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Second Lady, originally a singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello in Ch'ing-ho, aunt of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh, enemy of P'an Chin-lien, tight-fisted manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household finances, engages in hanky-panky with Wu the Second, begins pilfering Hsi-men Ch'ing's property while his corpse is still warm, ends up as Chang Mao-te's Second Lady.
Li Chih, Li the Third, father of Li Huo, merchant contractor in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Huang the Fourth, ends up dying in prison for misappropriation of funds.
Li Chin, servant in the household of Li Chih.
Li Chung-yu, servant on the domestic staff of Ts'ai Ching.
Li, Eunuch Director. See Li Yen.
Li family of the Eastern Capital, family into which P'an Chin-lien is reincarnated as a daughter.
Li Huo, son of Li Chih.
Li Kang (1083–1140), minister of war under Emperor Ch'in-tsung who directs the defense against the Chin invaders.
Li Kuei, Shantung Yaksha, uncle of Li An, military instructor from Ch'ing-chou patronized by Li Kung-pi.
Li Kuei-chieh, Cassia, daughter of Auntie Li the Third, niece of Li Chiao-erh and Li Ming, younger sister of Li Kuei-ch'ing, singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, deflowered by Hsi-men Ch'ing, who maintains her as his mistress for twenty taels a month, adopted daughter of Wu Yüeh-niang, betrays Hsi-men Ch'ing with Ting the Second, Wang Ts'ai, and others.
Li Kuei-chieh's fifth maternal aunt.
Li Kuei-ch'ing, daughter of Auntie Li the Third, niece of Li Chiao-erh and Li Ming, elder sister of Li Kuei-chieh, singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the Licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
Li K'uei, Black Whirlwind, bloodthirsty outlaw from Sung Chiang's band who massacres the household of Liang Shih-chieh and kills Yin T'ien-hsi.
Li Kung-pi, Bare Stick Li, only son of Li Ch'ang-ch'i, student at the Superior College of the National University, falls in love with Meng Yü-lou at first sight and arranges to marry her as his second wife, severely beaten by his father for his part in the abortive attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi, forced to return with his bride to his native place to resume his studies.
Li Kung-pi's deceased first wife.
Li Kung-pi's servant.
Li, Leaky. See Li Wai-ch'uan.
Li Ming, younger brother of Li Chiao-erh, uncle of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh; actor and musician from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho; employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing to teach Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang to sing and play musical instruments; driven out of the house by Ch'un-mei for having the temerity to squeeze her hand during a lesson but allowed to return on many subsequent occasions; assists Li Chiao-erh, Li Kuei-ch'ing, and Li Kuei-chieh in despoiling Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death.
Li Pang-yen (d. 1130), minister of the right, grand academician of the Hall for Aid in Governance, and concurrently minister of rites, alters Hsi-men Ch'ing's name to Chia Lien on a bill of impeachment in return for a bribe of five hundred taels of silver, promoted to the ranks of pillar of state and grand preceptor of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
Li P'ing-erh, Vase, Mrs. Hua, Mistress Hua, one of the three principal female protagonists of the novel, concubine of Liang Shih-chieh, wife of Hua Tzu-hsü, commits adultery with her husband's neighbour and sworn brother Hsi-men Ch'ing, wife of Dr. Chiang Chu-shan, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Sixth Lady, mother of Hsi-men Kuan-ko, dies of chronic hemorrhaging brought on by grief over the death of her son and Hsi-men Ch'ing's insistence on trying out his newly acquired aphrodisiac on her while she is in her menstrual period, commemorated in overly elaborate funeral observances that are prime examples of conspicuous consumption, haunts Hsi-men Ch'ing's dreams.
Li P'ing-erh's former incarnation. See Wang family of Pin-chou.
Li P'ing-erh's deceased parents.
Li P'ing-erh's reincarnation. See Yüan, Commander.
Li Ta-t'ien, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho, relative of Chu Mien, appoints Wu Sung as police captain and later sends him to the Eastern Capital to stash his ill-gotten gains with his powerful relative, accepts Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribes to abuse the law in the cases of Wu Sung, Lai-wang, Sung Hui-lien, Miao T'ien-hsiu, and others.
Li the Third, seller of won-ton in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.
Li the Third. See Li Chih.
Li the Third, Auntie, madam of the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, mother of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh, partially paralyzed, prototypical procuress who milks her customers for all she can get.
Li, Vice-Minister, employer of Licentiate Shui.
Li Wai-ch'uan, Leaky Li, influence peddling lictor on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who is mistakenly killed by Wu Sung in his abortive attempt to wreak vengeance on Hsi-men Ch'ing for the murder of his elder brother Wu Chih.
Li Yen (d. 1126), Eunuch Director Li, entertains Miao Ch'ing in his residence behind the Forbidden City in the Eastern Capital, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
Li Yen's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Liang, Privy Councilor. See Liang Shih-chieh.
Liang Shih-chieh, Privy Councilor Liang, regent of the Northern Capital at Ta-ming Prefecture in Hopei, son-in-law of Ts'ai Ching, first husband of Li P'ing-erh, forced to flee for his life when his entire household is slaughtered by Li K'uei.
Liang Shih-chieh's wife, née Ts'ai, daughter of Ts'ai Ching, extremely jealous woman who beats numbers of maidservants and concubines of her husband to death and buries them in the rear flower garden, forced to flee for her life when her entire household is slaughtered by Li K'uei.
Liang To, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Liang Ying-lung, commandant of security for the Eastern Capital.
Lin Ch'eng-hsün, judicial commissioner in the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.
Lin Hsiao-hung, younger sister of Lin Ts'ai-hung, singing girl in Yang-chou patronized by Lai-pao.
Lin, Lady, widow of Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan, mother of Wang Ts'ai, former mistress of P'an Chin-lien who learns to play musical instruments and to sing as a servant in her household, carries on an adulterous affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing under the transparent pretext of asking him to superintend the morals of her profligate son.
Lin Ling-su (d. c. 1125), Perfect Man Lin, Taoist priest who gains an ascendancy over Emperor Hui-tsung for a time and is showered with high-sounding titles, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Lin, Perfect Man. See Lin Ling-su.
Lin Shu (d. c. 1126), minister of works rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Lin Ts'ai-hung, elder sister of Lin Hsiao-hung, singing girl in Yang-chou.
Ling, Master, fortune teller in Ch'ing-ho who interprets Meng Yü-lou's horoscope when she is about to marry Li Kung-pi.
Ling Yün-i, prefect of Yen-chou in Shantung.
Little Iron Rod, son of Lai-chao and his wife Hui-ch'ing.
Little Jade. See Hsiao-yü.
Little Whirlwind. See Ch'ai Chin.
Liu, Assistant Regional Commander, officer of the Hsi-hsia army who gives a horse to Chai Ch'ien, who in turn presents it to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Liu Chao. See Lai-chao.
Liu Chü-chai, Dr., physician from Fen-chou in Shansi, friend of Ho Yung-shou who recommends him to Hsi-men Ch'ing when he is in extremis but whose treatment exacerbates his condition.
Liu, Company Commander, younger brother of Eunuch Director Liu, indicted for illicit use of imperial lumber in constructing a villa on a newly purchased estate at Wu-li Tien outside Ch'ing-ho, let off the hook by Hsi-men Ch'ing in response to a bribe proffered by Eunuch Director Liu.
Liu, Consort (1088–1121), Consort An, a favourite consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, mother of Chao I.
Liu, Dame, Stargazer Liu's wife, medical practitioner and shamaness frequently called upon by the women of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.
Liu, Eunuch Director, elder brother of Company Commander Liu, manager of the Imperial Brickyard in Ch'ing-ho, resides on an estate outside the south gate of the city, intervenes with Hsi-men Ch'ing to get his younger brother off the hook when indicted for misappropriation of imperial lumber but supplies Hsi-men Ch'ing with bricks from the Imperial Brickyard for construction of his country estate.
Liu, Eunuch Director, landlord of Dr. Hu's house on East Street in Ch'ing-ho.
Liu, Eunuch Director, resides near Wine Vinegar Gate on the North Side of Ch'ing-ho, patron of Li Ming.
Liu Hui-hsiang. See Hui-hsiang.
Liu Kao, commander of An-p'ing Stockade, friend of Shih En who gives Wu Sung a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation to him when he is sent there in military exile.
Liu, Mr., official serving in Huai-an who passed the chin-shih examinations the same year as Sung Ch'iao-nien.
Liu Pao, servant employed as a cook in Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk dry goods store.
Liu, School Official, native of Hang-chou, educational official in Ch'ing-ho who borrows money from Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Liu the Second, Turf-protecting Tiger, brother-in-law of Chang Sheng, proprietor of My Own Tavern west of the bridge in Lin-ch'ing, pimp and racketeer, boss of unlicensed prostitution in Lin-ch'ing, beaten to death by Chou Hsiu at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei after Chang Sheng's murder of Ch'en Ching-chi.
Liu the Second, Little, seller of ready-cooked food in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.
Liu Sheng, foreman on the domestic staff of Yang Chien.
Liu, Stargazer, husband of Dame Liu, blind fortune teller and necromancer who interprets P'an Chin-lien's horoscope, teaches her a method for working black magic on Hsi-men Ch'ing, and treats Hsi-men Kuan-ko ineffectually.
Liu the Third, servant of Company Commander Liu.
Liu Ts'ang, younger brother of Hui-hsiang, brother-in-law of Lai-pao with whom he cooperates in surreptitiously making off with eight hundred taels worth of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death and using it to open a general store.
Liu Yen-ch'ing (1068–1127), commander-general of the Shensi region who leads the forces of Yen-sui against the Chin invaders.
Lo, Mohammedan, one of the "ball clubbers" patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Lo Ts'un-erh, singing girl of Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsiang the Fifth.
Lo Wan-hsiang, prefect of Tung-p'ing.
Love. See Chu Ai-ai.
Lu Ch'ang-t'ui, Longleg Lu, madam of the brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho where Chin-erh and Sai-erh work.
Lu Ch'ang-t'ui's husband.
Lu, Duke of. See Ts'ai Ching.
Lu Hu, clerical subofficial on the staff of Yang Chien.
Lu Hua, Snake-in-the-grass, "knockabout" who, along with Chang Sheng, shakes down Dr. Chiang Chu-shan at the behest of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Lu, Longleg. See Lu Ch'ang-t'ui.
Lu Ping-i, Lu the Second, crony of Ch'en Ching-chi who suggests how he can recover his property from Yang Kuang-yen and goes into partnership with him as the manager of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Lu the Second. See Lu Ping-i.
Lung-hsi, Duke of. See Wang Wei.
Lü Sai-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho.
Ma Chen, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Ma, Mrs., next-door neighbour of Ying Po-chüeh.
Man-t'ang, maidservant in the household of Li Kung-pi.
Mao-te, Princess (fl. early 12th century), fifth daughter of Emperor Hui-tsung, married to Ts'ai Ching's fourth son, Ts'ai T'iao.
Meng Ch'ang-ling (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Meng Ch'ang-ling's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Meng-ch'ang, Little Lord. See Ch'ai Chin.
Meng the Elder, elder brother of Meng Yü-lou.
Meng the Elder's wife, Meng Yü-lou's sister-in-law.
Meng Jui, Meng the Second, younger brother of Meng Yü-lou, a traveling merchant constantly on the road.
Meng Jui's wife, Meng Yü-lou's sister-in-law.
Meng the Second. See Meng Jui.
Meng the Third. See Meng Yü-lou.
Meng Yü-lou, Tower of Jade, Meng the Third, one of the female protagonists of the novel, widow of the textile merchant Yang Tsung-hsi, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Third Lady, confidante of P'an Chin-lien, marries Li Kung-pi after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, forced to return with her husband to his native place in Hopei after their abortive attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi, bears a son to Li Kung-pi at the age of forty and lives to the age of sixty-seven.
Meng Yü-lou's elder brother. See Meng the Elder.
Meng Yü-lou's elder sister. See Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng.

Meng Yü-lou's son by Li Kung-pi.
Meng Yü-lou's younger brother. See Meng Jui.
Miao Ch'ing, servant of Miao T'ien-hsiu who conspires with the boatmen Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth to murder his master on a trip to the Eastern Capital, bribes Hsi-men Ch'ing to get him off the hook, and returns to Yang-chou where he assumes his former master's position in society and maintains relations with his benefactor Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Miao-ch'ü, teenage disciple of Nun Hsüeh.
Miao-feng, teenage disciple of Nun Hsüeh.
Miao Hsiu, servant in the household of Miao Ch'ing.
Miao Shih, servant in the household of Miao Ch'ing.
Miao T'ien-hsiu, a wealthy merchant of Yang-chou who is murdered by his servant Miao Ch'ing on a trip to the Eastern Capital.
Miao T'ien-hsiu's concubine. See Tiao the Seventh.
Miao T'ien-hsiu's daughter.
Miao T'ien-hsiu's wife, née Li.
Ming-wu. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Mirror polisher, elderly itinerant artisan in Ch'ing-ho who polishes mirrors for P'an Chin-lien, Meng Yü-lou, and P'ang Ch'un-mei and elicits their sympathy with a sob story.
Mirror polisher's deceased first wife.
Mirror polisher's second wife.
Mirror polisher's son.
Monk, Indian, foreign monk presented as the personification of a penis whom Hsi-men Ch'ing encounters in the Temple of Eternal Felicity and from whom he obtains the aphrodisiac an overdose of which eventually kills him.
Moon Lady. See Wu Yüeh-niang.
Ni, Familiar. See Ni P'eng.
Ni, Licentiate. See Ni P'eng.
Ni P'eng, Familiar Ni, Licentiate Ni, tutor employed in the household of Hsia Yen-ling as a tutor for his son, Hsia Ch'eng-en, who recommends his fellow licentiate Wen Pi-ku to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Nieh Liang-hu, schoolmate of Shang Hsiao-t'ang employed in his household as a tutor for his son who writes two congratulatory scrolls for Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Nieh, Tiptoe. See Nieh Yüeh.
Nieh Yüeh, Tiptoe Nieh, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.
Nieh Yüeh's wife.
Nien-erh, elder daughter of Lai-hsing by Hui-hsiu.
Nien-mo-ho. See Wan-yen Tsung-han.
Niu, Ms., singing girl in the Great Tavern on Lion Street who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal assault on Li Wai-ch'uan.
Old woman who tells the fortunes of Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Li P'ing-erh with the aid of a turtle.
Opportune Rain. See Sung Chiang.
Ostensibly Benign. See I Mien-tz'u.
Pai, Baldy. See Pai T'u-tzu.
Pai the Fifth, Moneybags Pai, father-in-law of Feng Huai, notorious local tyrant and fence for stolen goods in the area west of the Grand Canal.
Pai the Fourth, silversmith in Ch'ing-ho, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo.
Pai Lai-ch'iang, Scrounger Pai, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.
Pai Lai-ch'iang's wife.
Pai, Mohammedan. See Pai T'u-tzu.
Pai, Moneybags. See Pai the Fifth.
Pai, Scrounger. See Pai Lai-ch'iang.
Pai Shih-chung (d. 1127), right vice-minister of rites rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Pai T'u-tzu, Baldy Pai, Mohammedan Pai, "ball-clubber" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.
Pai Yü-lien, Jade Lotus, maidservant purchased by Mrs. Chang at the same time as P'an Chin-lien who dies shortly thereafter.
Palace foreman who plays the role of master of ceremonies at the imperial audience in the Hall for the Veneration of Governance.
Palefaced Gentleman. See Cheng T'ien-shou.
Pan-erh, unlicensed prostitute in Longfoot Wu's brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.
P'an Chi, one of the officials from the Ch'ing-ho Guard who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.
P'an Chin-lien, Golden Lotus, P'an the Sixth, principal female protagonist of the novel, daughter of Tailor P'an from outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho who dies when she is only six years old; studies in a girls' school run by Licentiate Yü for three years where she learns to read and write; sold by her mother at the age of eight into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang and Lady Lin where she is taught to play musical instruments and to sing; resold in her mid-teens, after the death of her master, into the household of Mr. Chang who deflowers her and then gives her as a bride to his tenant, Wu Sung's elder brother, the dwarf Wu Chih; paramour of Hsi-men Ch'ing who collaborates with her in poisoning her husband and subsequently makes her his Fifth Lady; seduces her husband's pageboy Ch'in-t'ung for which he is driven out of the household; carries on a running affair with her son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi that is consummated after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; responsible, directly or indirectly, for the suicide of Sung Hui-lien, the death of Hsi-men Kuan-ko, and the demise of Hsi-men Ch'ing; aborts her son by Ch'en Ching-chi; is sold out of the household by Wu Yüeh-niang, purchased by Wu Sung, and disemboweled by the latter in revenge for the death of his elder brother Wu Chih.
P'an Chin-lien's cat, Coal in the Snow, Snow Lion, Snow Bandit, longhaired white cat with a black streak on its forehead that P'an Chin-lien trains to attack Hsi-men Kuan-ko with fatal consequences.
P'an Chin-lien's father. See P'an, Tailor.
P'an Chin-lien's maternal aunt, younger sister of old Mrs. P'an.
P'an Chin-lien's maternal aunt's daughter, adopted by old Mrs. P'an to look after her in her old age.
P'an Chin-lien's mother. See P'an, old Mrs.
P'an Chin-lien's reincarnation. See Li Family of the Eastern Capital.
P'an, Demon-catcher. See P'an, Taoist Master.
P'an family prostitution ring operating out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, madam of.
P'an the fifth, white slaver, masquerading as a cotton merchant from Shantung, who operates a prostitution ring out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, buys Sun Hsüeh-o from Auntie Hsüeh, and forces her to become a singing girl.
P'an the Fifth's deceased first wife.
P'an the Fifth's mother.
P'an, old Mrs., widow of Tailor P'an, mother of P'an Chin-lien, sends her daughter to Licentiate Yü's girls' school for three years, sells her into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang and Lady Lin at the age of eight, resells her in her mid-teens into the household of Mr. Chang, frequent visitor in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household where she is maltreated by P'an Chin-lien who is ashamed of her low social status, adopts her younger sister's daughter to look after her in her old age, dies not long after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
P'an the Sixth. See P'an Chin-lien.
P'an, Tailor, father of P'an Chin-lien, artisan from outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho who dies when P'an Chin-lien is only six years old.
P'an, Taoist Master, Demon-catcher P'an, Taoist exorcist from the Temple of the Five Peaks outside Ch'ing-ho who performs various rituals on Li P'ing-erh's behalf but concludes that nothing can save her.
P'an, Taoist Master's acolyte.
P'ang Ch'un-mei, Spring Plum Blossom, one of the three principal female protagonists of the novel, originally purchased by Hsi-men Ch'ing from Auntie Hsüeh for sixteen taels of silver as a maidservant for Wu Yüeh-niang, reassigned as senior maidservant to P'an Chin-lien when she enters the household, becomes her chief ally and confidante; from the time that her mistress allows her to share the sexual favours of Hsi-men Ch'ing she remains loyal to her right up to and even after her death; after the demise of Hsi-men Ch'ing aids and abets P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'en Ching-chi, the discovery of which leads to her dismissal from the household; purchased as a concubine by Chou Hsiu, she bears him a son and is promoted to the status of principal wife, thereby rising higher in social status than any of the ladies she had formerly served as maidservant; comes to Wu Yüeh-niang's assistance when she is threatened by Wu Tien-en and condescends to pay a visit to her former mistress and to witness at first hand the signs of her relative decline; carries on an intermittent affair with Ch'en Ching-chi under her husband's nose and, after Chou Hsiu's death, dies in the act of sexual intercourse with his servant Chou I.
P'ang Ch'un-mei's deceased father who dies while Ch'un-mei is still a child.
P'ang Ch'un-mei's deceased mother who dies a year after Ch'un-mei's birth.
P'ang Ch'un-mei's reincarnation. See K'ung family of the Eastern Capital.
P'ang Ch'un-mei's son. See Chou Chin-ko.
P'ang Hsüan, clerical subofficial on the staff of Yang Chien.
Pao, Dr., pediatric physician in Ch'ing-ho called in to treat Hsi-men Kuan-ko who declares the case to be hopeless.
Pao-en Temple in the Eastern Capital, monk from, tries unsuccessfully to warn Miao T'ien-hsiu against leaving home before his fatal trip to the Eastern Capital.
Pao, Ms., singing girl in the Great Tavern on Lion Street who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal assault on Li Wai-ch'uan.
Pen Chang-chieh, Jui-yün, daughter of Pen Ti-ch'uan and Yeh the Fifth, concubine of Hsia Yen-ling.
Pen the Fourth. See Pen Ti-ch'uan.
Pen, Scurry-about. See Pen Ti-ch'uan.
Pen Ti-ch'uan, Scurry-about Pen, Pen the Fourth, husband of Yeh the Fifth, father of Pen Chang-chieh, manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various capacities, member of the brotherhood of ten in which he replaces Hua Tzu-hsü after his death.
Pen Ti-ch'uan's daughter. See Pen Chang-chieh.
Pen Ti-ch'uan's wife. See Yeh the Fifth.
Pin-yang, Commandery Prince of. See Wang Ching-ch'ung.
P'ing-an, pageboy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, absconds with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, is caught, and allows himself to be coerced by the police chief Wu Tien-en into giving false testimony that Wu Yüeh-niang has been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an.
P'ing-erh. See Li P'ing-erh.
Prison guard on Chou Hsiu's staff.
Pu Chih-tao, No-account Pu, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten whose place is taken after his death by Hua Tzu-hsü.
Pu, No-account. See Pu Chih-tao.
P'u-ching, Ch'an Master Snow Cave, mysterious Buddhist monk who provides Wu Yüeh-niang with a refuge in Snow Stream Cave on Mount T'ai when she is escaping attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi; at the end of the novel he conjures up a phantasmagoria in which all of the major protagonists describe themselves as being reborn in approximately the same social strata they had occupied in their previous incarnations; convinces Wu Yüeh-niang that her son Hsiao-ko is a reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and spirits him away into a life of Buddhist celibacy as his disciple.
Sai-erh, singing girl in Longleg Lu's brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho.
Sauce and Scallions. See Chiang Ts'ung.
Second Lady. See Li Chiao-erh.
Seng-pao, son of Lai-pao and Hui-hsiang, betrothed to Wang Liu-erh's niece, the daughter of Butcher Wang and Sow Wang.
Servant from the household of Chou Hsiu who is sent to fetch P'ang Ch'un-mei with a lantern.
Servant in the inn at the foot of Mount T'ai where Wu Yüeh-niang and Wu K'ai spend the night on their pilgrimage.
Servant from the Verdant Spring Bordello who runs errands for Li Kuei-chieh.
Sha San, Yokel Sha, one of the "cribbers" and "ball clubbers" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.
Sha, Yokel. See Sha San.
Shamaness brought to the Hsi-men household by Dame Liu to burn paper money and perform a shamanistic dance on behalf of the sick Hsi-men Kuan-ko.
Shang Hsiao-t'ang, Provincial Graduate Shang, son of Shang Liu-t'ang, widower in Ch'ing-ho whom Chang Lung proposes unsuccessfully as a match for Meng Yü-lou, provincial graduate of the same year as Huang Pao-kuang, assisted by Hsi-men Ch'ing when he sets out for the Eastern Capital to compete in the chin-shih examinations.
Shang Hsiao-t'ang's second wife.
Shang Hsiao-t'ang's son.
Shang Liu-t'ang, Prefectural Judge Shang, father of Shang Hsiao-t'ang, formerly served as district magistrate of Huang Pao-kuang's district and prefectural judge of Ch'eng-tu in Szechwan, resident of Main Street in Ch'ing-ho from whom both Li P'ing-erh's and Hsi-men Ch'ing's coffins are purchased.
Shang Liu-t'ang's deceased wife, mother of Shang Hsiao-t'ang.
Shang, Prefectural Judge. See Shang Liu-t'ang.
Shang, Provincial Graduate. See Shang Hsiao-t'ang.
Shantung Yaksha. See Li Kuei.
Shao Ch'ien, boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Shen, Brother-in-law, Mr. Shen, husband of Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister.
Shen Ching, resident of the Eastern Capital, father of Shen Shou-shan.
Shen, Mr. See Shen, Brother-in-law.
Shen, Second Sister, blind professional singer in Ch'ing-ho recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Wang Liu-erh but driven out of his household by P'ang Ch'un-mei when she refuses to sing for her.
Shen Shou-shan, second son of Shen Ching, reincarnation of Chou Hsiu.

Shen Ting, servant in the household of Brother-in-law Shen.
Shen T'ung, wealthy resident of the Eastern Capital, father of Shen Yüeh.
Shen Yüeh, second son of Shen T'ung, reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Sheng-chin, ten-year-old country girl offered to P'ang Ch'un-mei as a maidservant but rejected for befouling her bed.
Sheng-chin's parents.
Shih Cho-kuei, Plastromancer Shih, shaman in Ch'ing-ho who prognosticates about the sick Hsi-men Kuan-ko through interpreting the cracks produced by applying heat to notches on the surface of the plastron of a tortoise shell.
Shih En, son of the warden of the prison camp at Meng-chou who befriends the exiled Wu Sung, obtains his assistance in his struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern, and gives him a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation to Liu Kao when he is transferred to the An-p'ing Stockade.
Shih, Plastromancer. See Shih Cho-kuei.
Shih Po-ts'ai, corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.
Short-legged Tiger. See Wang Ying.
Shu-t'ung, Little Chang Sung, native of Su-chou, pageboy catamite and transvestite presented to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Li Ta-t'ien, placed in charge of Hsi-men Ch'ing's studio where he handles his correspondence and caters to his polymorphous sexual tastes, becomes intimate with Yü-hsiao and when discovered in flagrante delicto by P'an Chin-lien purloins enough of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property to make good his escape to his native place.
Shui, Licentiate, scholar of problematic morals unsuccessfully recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing as a social secretary by Ying Po-chüeh; after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death he is engaged by the remaining members of the brotherhood of ten to compose a funeral eulogy for Hsi-men Ch'ing in which he compares him to the male genitalia.
Shui, Licentiate's father, friend of Ying Po-chüeh's father.
Shui, Licentiate's grandfather, friend of Ying Po-chüeh's grandfather.
Shui, Licentiate's two sons, die of smallpox.
Shui, Licentiate's wife, elopes to the Eastern Capital with her lover.
Sick beggar whom Ch'en Ching-chi keeps alive with the warmth of his body when he is working as a night watchman.
Silver. See Wu Yin-erh.
Singing boys, two boy singers sent under escort all the way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's home in Ch'ing-ho by his host, Miao Ch'ing, after he expresses admiration for their singing at a banquet in the residence of Li Yen in the Eastern Capital.
Six Traitors, Ts'ai Ching, T'ung Kuan, Li Pang-yen, Chu Mien, Kao Ch'iu, and Li Yen.
Sixth Lady. See Li P'ing-erh.
Snake-in-the-grass. See Lu Hua.
Snow Bandit. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.
Snow Cave, Ch'an Master. See P'u-ching.
Snow Lion. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.
Snow Moth. See Sun Hsüeh-o.
Southerner who deflowers Cheng Ai-yüeh.
Spring Plum Blossom. See P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Ssu Feng-i, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Stand-hard. See Tao-chien.
Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho, cook from.
Storehouseman in charge of the local storehouse in Yen-chou Prefecture in Chekiang.
Street-skulking Rat. See Chang Sheng.
Sun, Blabbermouth. See Sun T'ien-hua.
Sun Chi, next-door neighbour of Ch'en Ching-chi.
Sun Ch'ing, father-in-law of Huang the Fourth, father of Sun Wen-hsiang, employer of Feng the Second, merchant in Ch'ing-ho engaged in the cotton trade.
Sun Ch'ing's daughter. See Huang the Fourth's wife, née Sun.
Sun Ch'ing's son. See Sun Wen-hsiang.
Sun, Crooked-head, deceased husband of Aunt Yang.
Sun Erh-niang, concubine of Chou Hsiu, mother of Chou Yü-chieh.
Sun Erh-niang's maidservant.
Sun Erh-niang's maidservant's father.
Sun Hsüeh-o, Snow Moth, originally maidservant of Hsi-men Ch'ing's deceased first wife, née Ch'en, who enters his household as part of her dowry; Hsi-men Ch'ing's Fourth Lady but a second-class citizen among his womenfolk whose responsibility is the kitchen; enemy of P'an Chin-lien and P'ang Ch'un-mei; carries on a clandestine affair with Lai-wang with whom she absconds when he returns to Ch'ing-ho after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; apprehended by the authorities and sold into Chou Hsiu's household at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei who abuses her, beats her, and sells her into prostitution in order to get her out of the way when she wishes to pass off Ch'en Ching-chi as her cousin; renamed as the singing girl, Yü-erh, working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, she becomes the kept mistress of Chang Sheng until his death when she commits suicide.
Sun Hsüeh-o's reincarnation. See Yao family from outside the Eastern Capital.
Sun Jung, commandant of justice for the two townships of the Eastern Capital.
Sun Kua-tsui. See Sun T'ien-hua.
Sun T'ien-hua, Sun Kua-tsui, Blabbermouth Sun, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter.
Sun T'ien-hua's wife.
Sun Wen-hsiang, son of Sun Ch'ing, brother-in-law of Huang the Fourth, involved in an affray with Feng Huai who dies of his injuries half a month later.
Sung Chiang (fl. 1117–21), Opportune Rain, chivalrous bandit chieftan, leader of a band of thirty-six outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh whose slogan is to "Carry out the Way on Heaven's behalf," slayer of Yen P'o-hsi, rescues Wu Yüeh-niang when she is captured by the bandits of Ch'ing-feng Stronghold and Wang Ying wants to make her his wife, eventually surrenders to Chang Shu-yeh and accepts the offer of a government amnesty.
Sung Ch'iao-nien (1047–1113), father-in-law of Ts'ai Yu, father of Sung Sheng-ch'ung, protégé of Ts'ai Ching, appointed regional investigating censor of Shantung to replace Tseng Hsiao-hsü, entertained by Hsi-men Ch'ing who presents him periodically with lavish bribes in return for which he gets Miao Ch'ing off the hook and does him numerous other illicit favours, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Sung Hui-lien, Chin-lien, daughter of Sung Jen, formerly maidservant in the household of Assistant Prefect Ts'ai who takes sexual advantage of her; sacked for colluding with her mistress in a case of adultery; marries the cook Chiang Ts'ung who is stabbed to death in a brawl; second wife of Lai-wang; carries on a clandestine affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing that soon becomes public knowledge; after Lai-wang is framed for attempted murder and driven out of the household she suffers from remorse and commits suicide.
Sung Hui-lien's reincarnation. See Chu family of the Eastern Capital.
Sung Hui-lien's maternal aunt.
Sung Jen, father of Sung Hui-lien, coffin seller in Ch'ing-ho who accuses Hsi-men Ch'ing of driving his daughter to suicide but is given such a beating by the corrupt magistrate Li Ta-t'ien that he dies of his wounds.
Sung Sheng-ch'ung (fl. early 12th century), son of Sung Ch'iao-nien, elder brother of Ts'ai Yu's wife, née Sung, regional investigating censor of Shensi suborned into traducing Tseng Hsiao-hsü by Ts'ai Ching.
Sung Te, commits adultery with Ms. Chou, the widowed second wife of his father-in-law, for which Hsi-men Ch'ing sentences them both to death by strangulation.
Sung Te's father-in-law, deceased husband of Ms. Chou.
Sung Te's mother-in-law, deceased mother of Sung Te's wife.
Sung Te's wife.
Sung T'ui, eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Ta T'ien-tao, prefect of Tung-ch'ang.
Tai-an, Hsi-men An, favourite pageboy of Hsi-men Ch'ing and his sedulous understudy in the arts of roguery and dissimulation; manages to stay on the right side of everyone with the exception of Wu Yüeh-niang who periodically berates him for his duplicity; married to Hsiao-yü after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing when Wu Yüeh-niang discovers them in flagrante delicto; remains with Wu Yüeh-niang and supports her in her old age in return for which he is given the name Hsi-men An and inherits what is left of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property and social position.
T'ai-tsung, emperor of the Chin dynasty (r. 1123–35).
T'an Chen (fl. early 12th century), eunuch military commander with the concurrent rank of censor-in-chief, appointed to replace T'ung Kuan in command of the defense of the northern frontier against the Chin army.
T'ang Pao. See Lai-pao.
Tao-chien, Stand-hard, abbot of the Temple of Eternal Felicity at Wu-li Yüan outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho.
T'ao, Crud-crawler, an elderly resident of Ch'ing-ho who is renowned for having sexually molested all three of his daughters-in-law.
T'ao-hua, maidservant in the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho.
T'ao, Old Mother, licensed go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Li Kung-pi in his courtship of Meng Yü-lou.
Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho, lector of.
Teng, Midwife, called in by Ying Po-chüeh when his concubine, Ch'un-hua, bears him a son.
Third Lady. See Cho Tiu-erh and Meng Yü-lou.
Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin. See Wu Chih.
Ti Ssu-pin, Turbid Ti, vice-magistrate of Yang-ku district who locates the corpse of Miao T'ien-hsiu after his murder by Miao Ch'ing.
Ti, Turbid. See Ti Ssu-pin.
Tiao the Seventh, concubine of Miao T'ien-hsiu, formerly a singing girl from a brothel on the Yang-chou docks, carries on an affair with her husband's servant, Miao Ch'ing, the discovery of which leads to the beating of Miao Ch'ing and the murder of Miao T'ien-hsiu in revenge.
T'ien Chiu-kao, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
T'ien-fu. See Ch'in-t'ung.
T'ien-hsi, senior pageboy in the household of Hua Tzu-hsü and Li P'ing-erh who absconds with five taels of silver when his master takes to his sickbed and vanishes without a trace.
T'ien Hu, bandit chieftan active in the Hopei area.
Ting, Director, Wu K'ai's predecessor as director of the State Farm Battalion in Ch'ing-ho, cashiered for corruption by Hou Meng.
Ting, Mr., father of Ting the Second, silk merchant from Hang-chou.
Ting the Second, Ting Shuang-ch'iao, son of Mr. Ting, friend of Ch'en Liang-huai, a silk merchant from Hang-chou who patronizes Li Kuei-chieh while on a visit to Ch'ing-ho and hides under the bed when Hsi-men Ch'ing discovers their liaison and smashes up the Verdant Spring Bordello.
Ting Shuang-ch'iao. See Ting the Second.
Ting the Southerner, wine merchant in Ch'ing-ho from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing buys forty jugs of Ho-ch'ing wine on credit.
Tou Chien (d. 1127), superintendant of the Capital Training Divisions and capital security commissioner.
Tower of Jade. See Meng Yü-lou.
Ts'ai, Assistant Prefect, resident of Ch'ing-ho from whose household Sung Hui-lien is expelled for colluding with her mistress in a case of adultery.
Ts'ai, Assistant Prefect's wife.
Ts'ai Ching (1046–1126), father of Ts'ai Yu, Ts'ai T'iao, Ts'ai T'ao, and Ts'ai Hsiu, father-in-law of Liang Shih-chieh, left grand councilor, grand academician of the Hall for Veneration of Governance, grand preceptor, minister of personnel, Duke of Lu, most powerful minister at the court of Emperor Hui-tsung, impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung, patron and adoptive father of Ts'ai Yün and Hsi-men Ch'ing, first of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
Ts'ai Ching's mansion in the Eastern Capital, gatekeepers of.
Ts'ai Ching's mansion in the Eastern Capital, pageboy in.
Ts'ai Ching's wife.
Ts'ai family of Yen-chou in Shantung, family of which Hsi-men Hsiao-ko is alleged to have been a son in his previous incarnation.
Ts'ai Hsing (fl. early 12th century), son of Ts'ai Yu, appointed director of the Palace Administration as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Ts'ai Hsiu, ninth son of Ts'ai Ching, prefect of Chiu-chiang.
Ts'ai, Midwife, presides over the deliveries of Li P'ing-erh's son, Hsi-men Kuan-ko, and Wu Yüeh-niang's son, Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Ts'ai T'ao (d. after 1147), fifth son of Ts'ai Ching.
Ts'ai T'iao (d. after 1137), fourth son of Ts'ai Ching, consort of Princess Mao-te.
Ts'ai Yu (1077–1126), eldest son of Ts'ai Ching, son-in-law of Sung Ch'iao-nien, brother-in-law of Sung Sheng-ch'ung, father of Ts'ai Hsing, academician of the Hall of Auspicious Harmony, minister of rites, superintendent of the Temple of Supreme Unity, rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, executed by order of Emperor Ch'in-tsung after the fall of Ts'ai Ching and his faction.
Ts'ai Yu's son. See Ts'ai Hsing.
Ts'ai Yu's wife, née Sung, daughter of Sung Ch'iao-nien, younger sister of Sung Sheng-ch'ung.
Ts'ai Yün, awarded first place in the chin-shih examinations in place of An Ch'en when the latter is displaced for being the younger brother of the proscribed An Tun, becomes a protégé and adopted son of Ts'ai Ching, appointed proofreader in the Palace Library, is patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing; after being impeached by Ts'ao Ho he is appointed salt-control censor of the Liang-Huai region where his illicit favours to Hsi-men Ch'ing abet his profitable speculations in the salt trade.
Ts'ai Yün's mother.
Tsang Pu-hsi, docket officer on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.
Ts'ao Ho, censor who impeaches Ts'ai Yün and thirteen others from the Historiography Institute who had passed the chin-shih examinations in the same year.

Tseng Hsiao-hsü (1049–1127), son of Tseng Pu, regional investigating censor of Shantung, reopens the case of Miao T'ien-hsiu's murder at the request of Huang Mei and arrives at the truth only to have his memorial suppressed when Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling bribe Ts'ai Ching to intervene; submits a memorial to the throne criticizing the policies of Ts'ai Ching that so enrages the prime minister that he suborns his daughter-in-law's brother, Sung Sheng-ch'ung, into framing him on trumped up charges as a result of which he is deprived of his office and banished to the furthest southern extremity of the country.
Tseng Pu (1036–1107), father of Tseng Hsiao-hsü.
Tso Shun, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Ts'ui-erh, maidservant of Sun Hsüeh-o.
Ts'ui-hua, junior maidservant of P'ang Ch'un-mei after she becomes the wife of Chou Hsiu.
Ts'ui Pen, nephew of Ch'iao Hung, husband of Big Sister Tuan, employee, manager, and partner in several of Hsi-men Ch'ing's enterprises.
Ts'ui Pen's mother, Ch'iao Hung's elder sister.
Ts'ui, Privy Councilor. See Ts'ui Shou-yü.
Ts'ui Shou-yü, Privy Councilor Ts'ui, relative of Hsia Yen-ling with whom he stays on his visit to the Eastern Capital.
Tsung-mei. See Ch'en Ching-chi.
Tsung-ming. See Chin Tsung-ming.
Tsung Tse (1059–1128), general-in-chief of the Southern Sung armies who retakes parts of Shantung and Hopei from the Chin invaders on behalf of Emperor Kao-tsung.
Tu the Third, maternal cousin of Ying Po-chüeh.
Tu the Third's pageboy.
Tu the Third's wife.
Tu Tzu-ch'un, privy councilor under a previous reign living in retirement in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho, engaged by Hsi-men Ch'ing to indite the inscription on Li P'ing-erh's funeral banderole.
Tuan, Big Sister, wife of Ts'ui Pen.
Tuan, Big Sister's father.
Tuan, Consort. See Feng, Consort.
Tuan, Half-baked. See Tuan Mien.
Tuan Mien, Half-baked Tuan, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Tuan, Old Mother, waiting woman in Lady Lin's household whose residence in the rear of the compound is used as a rendezvous by her lovers.
Tung the Cat. See Tung Chin-erh.
Tung Chiao-erh, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who spends the night with Ts'ai Yün at Hsi-men Ch'ing's behest.
Tung Chin-erh, Tung the Cat, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, patronized by Chang Mao-te.
Tung Sheng, clerical subofficial on the staff of Wang Fu.
Tung Yü-hsien, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
T'ung Kuan (1054–1126), eunuch military officer beaten up by Wu Sung in a drunken brawl, uncle of T'ung T'ien-yin, military affairs commissioner, defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, Commandery Prince of Kuang-yang, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.
T'ung Kuan's nephew. See T'ung T'ien-yin.
T'ung, Prefectural Judge, prefectural judge of Tung-p'ing who conducts the preliminary hearing in the case of the affray between Feng Huai and Sun Wen-hsiang.
T'ung T'ien-yin, nephew of T'ung Kuan, commander of the guard, director of the Office of Herds in the Inner and Outer Imperial Demesnes of the Court of the Imperial Stud.
Turf-protecting Tiger. See Liu the Second.
Tutor employed in the household of Miao Ch'ing.
Tz'u-hui Temple, abbot of, recovers the corpse of the murdered Miao T'ien-hsiu and buries it on the bank of the river west of Ch'ing-ho where it is discovered by Ti Ssu-pin.
Vase. See Li P'ing-erh.
Waiter in My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Wan-yen Tsung-han (1079–1136), Nien-mo-ho, nephew of Emperor T'ai-tsu (r. 1115–23) the founder of the Chin dynasty, commander of the Chin army that occupies K'ai-feng and takes Retired Emperor Hui-tsung and Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity.
Wan-yen Tsung-wang (d. 1127). Wo-li-pu, second son of Emperor T'ai-tsu (r. 1115–23) the founder of the Chin dynasty, associate commander of the Chin army that occupies K'ai-feng and takes Retired Emperor Hui-tsung and Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity, kills Chou Hsiu with an arrow through the throat.
Wang, Attendant, official on the staff of the Prince of Yün to whom Han Tao-kuo appeals through Hsi-men Ch'ing and Jen Hou-ch'i to be allowed to commute his hereditary corvée labor obligation to payments in money or goods.
Wang butcher, elder brother of Wang Liu-erh, husband of Sow Wang whose daughter is betrothed to Seng-pao.
Wang Ch'ao, son of Dame Wang, apprenticed to a merchant from the Huai River region from whom he steals a hundred taels entrusted to him for the purchase of stock, returns to Ch'ing-ho, and uses it as capital to buy two donkeys and set up a flour mill, becomes a casual lover of P'an Chin-lien while she is in Dame Wang's house awaiting purchase as a concubine.
Wang Chen, second son of Wang Hsüan, government student in the prefectural school.
Wang Ch'ien, eldest son of Wang Hsüan, hereditary battalion commander of the local Horse Pasturage Battalion of the Court of the Imperial Stud.
Wang Chin-ch'ing. See Wang Shen.
Wang Ching, younger brother of Wang Liu-erh, pageboy employed in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing as a replacement for Shu-t'ung after he absconds, sodomized by Hsi-men Ch'ing during his visit to the Eastern Capital, expelled from the household by Wu Yüeh-niang after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Wang Ching-ch'ung (d. 949), military commissioner of T'ai-yüan, Commandery Prince of Pin-yang, ancestor of Wang I-hsüan.
Wang Ch'ing, bandit chieftan active in the Huai-hsi area.
Wang Chu, elder brother of Wang Hsiang, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Wang, Consort (d. 1117), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, mother of Chao K'ai, the Prince of Yün, related to Wang the Second.
Wang, Dame, mother of Wang Ch'ao, proprietress of a teahouse next door to Wu Chih's house on Amythest Street on the west side of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who is also active as a go-between and procuress; go-between who proposes the match between Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang; inventor of the elaborate scheme by which Hsi-men Ch'ing seduces P'an Chin-lien; suggests the poisoning of her next-door neighbour Wu Chih and helps P'an Chin-lien carry it out; intervenes on behalf of Ho the Tenth when he is accused of fencing stolen goods with the result that Hsi-men Ch'ing gets him off the hook and executes an innocent monk in his stead; after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, when Wu Yüeh-niang discovers P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'en Ching-chi, she expells her from the household and consigns her to Dame Wang, who entertains bids from Magnate Ho, Chang Mao-te, Ch'en Ching-chi, and Chou Hsiu before finally selling her to Wu Sung for a hundred taels of silver plus a five-tael brokerage fee; that same night she is decapitated by Wu Sung after he has disemboweled P'an Chin-lien.
Wang, Dame's deceased husband, father of Wang Ch'ao, dies when she is thirty-five.
Wang, Dame's son. See Wang Ch'ao.
Wang, distaff relative of the imperial family. See Wang the Second.
Wang family of Cheng-chou, family into which Hsi-men Kuan-ko is reincarnated as a son.
Wang family of the Eastern Capital, family into which Ch'en Ching-chi is reincarnated as a son.
Wang family of Pin-chou, family in which Li P'ing-erh is alleged to have been formerly incarnated as a son.
Wang the First, Auntie, madam of the Wang Family Brothel in Yang-chou.
Wang Fu (1079–1126), minister of war impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung.
Wang Fu's wife and children.
Wang Hai-feng. See Wang Ssu-feng.
Wang Han, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.
Wang Hsiang, younger brother of Wang Chu, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.
Wang Hsien, employee of Hsi-men Ch'ing who accompanies Lai-pao on a buying trip to Nan-ching.
Wang Hsüan, Layman of Apricot Hermitage, father of Wang Ch'ien and Wang Chen, friend of Ch'en Hung, retired philanthropist who provides aid to Ch'en Ching-chi three times after he is reduced to beggary and who recommends him to Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.
Wang Hsüan's manager, in charge of a pawnshop on the street front of his residence.
Wang Huan (fl. early 12th century), commander-general of the Hopei region who leads the forces of Wei-po against the Chin invaders.
Wang I-hsüan, Imperial Commissioner Wang, descendant of Wang Ching-ch'ung, deceased husband of Lady Lin, father of Wang Ts'ai.
Wang I-hsüan's wife. See Lady Lin.
Wang I-hsüan's son. See Wang Ts'ai.
Wang, Imperial Commissioner. See Wang I-hsüan.
Wang K'uan, head of the mutual security unit for Ch'en Ching-chi's residence in Ch'ing-ho.
Wang Lien, henchman on the domestic staff of Wang Fu.
Wang Liu-erh, Wang the Sixth, one of the female protagonists of the novel, younger sister of Butcher Wang, elder sister of Wang Ching, wife of Han Tao-kuo, mother of Han Ai-chieh; paramour of her brother-in-law, Han the Second, whom she marries after her husband's death, of Hsi-men Ch'ing, to whose death from sexual exhaustion she is a major contributor, and of Magnate Ho, whose property in Hu-chou she inherits.
Wang Liu-erh's niece, daughter of Butcher Wang and Sow Wang, betrothed to Seng-pao, the son of Lai-pao and Hui-hsiang.
Wang Luan, proprietor of the Great Tavern on Lion Street in Ch'ing-ho who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal attack on Li Wai-ch'uan.
Wang, Nun, Buddhist nun from the Kuan-yin Nunnery in Ch'ing-ho which is patronized by Wu Yüeh-niang, frequently invited to recite Buddhist "precious scrolls" to Wu Yüeh-niang and her guests, recommends Nun Hsüeh to Wu Yüeh-niang who takes her fertility potion and conceives Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, later quarrels with Nun Hsüeh over the division of alms from Li P'ing-erh and Wu Yüeh-niang.
Wang, old Mrs., neighbour of Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan who appears in Wu Yüeh-niang's nightmare.
Wang, Old Sister, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.
Wang Ping (d. 1126), commander-general of the Kuan-tung region who leads the forces of Fen-chiang against the Chin invaders.
Wang Po-ju, proprietor of an inn on the docks in Yang-chou recommended to Han Tao-kuo, Lai-pao, and Ts'ui Pen by Hsi-men Ch'ing as a good place to stay.
Wang Po-ju's father, friend of Hsi-men Ch'ing's father, Hsi-men Ta.
Wang Po-yen (1069–1141), right assistant administration commissioner of Shantung.
Wang the Second, distaff relative of the imperial family through Consort Wang, landlord of Wu Chih's residence on the west side of Amythest Street in Ch'ing-ho, purchaser of Eunuch Director Hua's mansion on Main Street in An-ch'ing ward of Ch'ing-ho, maintains a private troupe of twenty actors that he sometimes lends to Hsi-men Ch'ing to entertain his guests.
Wang Shen (c. 1048–c. 1103), Wang Chin-ch'ing, commandant-escort and director of the Court of the Imperial Clan, consort of the second daughter of Emperor Ying-tsung (r. 1063–67).
Wang Shih-ch'i, prefect of Ch'ing-chou in Shantung.
Wang the Sixth. See Wang Liu-erh.
Wang, Sow, wife of Butcher Wang whose daughter is betrothed to Seng-pao.
Wang Ssu-feng, Wang Hai-feng, salt merchant from Yang-chou who is set free from prison in Ts'ang-chou by Hou Meng, the grand coordinator of Shantung, as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's intervention with Ts'ai Ching.
Wang the Third. See Wang Ts'ai.
Wang Ts'ai (1078–1118), Wang the Third, feckless and dissolute third son of Wang I-hsüan and Lady Lin, married to the niece of Huang Ching-ch'en, tries unsuccessfully to borrow three hundred taels of silver from Hsü Pu-yü to purchase a position in the Military School, pawns his wife's possessions to pursue various singing girls in the licensed quarter including those patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing, tricked into becoming the adopted son of Hsi-men Ch'ing during his intrigue with Lady Lin, continues his affair with Li Kuei-chieh after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Wang Ts'ai's wife, née Huang, niece of Huang Ching-ch'en.
Wang Tsu-tao (d. 1108), minister of personnel.
Wang Tung-ch'iao, traveling merchant entertained by Han Tao-kuo in Yang-chou.
Wang, Usher, official in the Court of State Ceremonial who offers the sixteen-year-old wife of his runaway retainer for sale as a maidservant through Old Mother Feng.
Wang, Usher's runaway retainer.
Wang, Usher's runaway retainer's wife.
Wang Wei, supreme commander of the Capital Training Divisions, Duke of Lung-hsi, granted the title of grand mentor for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Wang Ying, Short-legged Tiger, second outlaw leader of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain who wants to make Wu Yüeh-niang his wife when she is captured by his band but is prevented from doing so by Sung Chiang.
Wang Yu, commander of a training division rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Wang Yü, subofficial functionary on the domestic staff of Ts'ai Ching deputed by Chai Ch'ien to carry a message of condolence to Hsi-men Ch'ing and a personal letter from Han Ai-chieh to Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.
Wang Yü-chih, singing girl from the Wang Family Brothel in Yang-chou patronized by Han Tao-kuo.
Wei Ch'eng-hsün, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Wei Ts'ung-erh, a taciturn chair-bearer in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Chang Ch'uan-erh.
Wen, Auntie, mother of Wen T'ang, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Ch'en Ching-chi's family at the time of his betrothal to Hsi-men Ta-chieh, resident of Wang Family Alley on the South Side of town, active in promoting pilgrimages to Mount T'ai, patronized by Lady Lin for whom she acts as a procuress in her adulterous affairs including that with Hsi-men Ch'ing, involved with Auntie Hsüeh in arranging the betrothal between Chang Mao-te's son and Eunuch Director Hsü's niece.
Wen Ch'en, one of the officials from the Ch'ing-ho Guard who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.
Wen Hsi, military director-in-chief of Yen-chou in Shantung.
Wen, Licentiate. See Wen Pi-ku.
Wen, Pedant. See Wen Pi-ku.
Wen Pi-ku, Warm-buttocks Wen, Pedant Wen, Licentiate Wen, pederast recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing by his fellow licentiate Ni P'eng to be his social secretary, housed across the street from Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence in the property formerly belonging to Ch'iao Hung, divulges Hsi-men Ch'ing's private correspondence to Ni P'eng who shares it with Hsia Yen-ling, sodomizes Hua-t'ung against his will and is expelled from the Hsi-men household when his indiscretions are exposed.

Wen Pi-ku's mother-in-law.
Wen Pi-ku's wife.
Wen T'ang, son of Auntie Wen.
Wen T'ang's wife.
Wen, Warm-buttocks. See Wen Pi-ku.
Weng the Eighth, criminal boatman who, along with his partner Ch'en the Third, murders Miao T'ien-hsiu.
What a Whopper. See Hsieh Ju-huang.
Wo-li-pu. See Wan-yen Tsung-wang.
Wu, Abbot. See Wu Tsung-che.
Wu, Battalion Commander, father of Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, and Wu Yüeh-niang, hereditary battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard.
Wu, Captain. See Wu Sung.
Wu Ch'ang-chiao, Longfoot Wu, madam of the brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.
Wu Ch'ang-chiao's husband.
Wu Chih, Wu the Elder, Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, elder brother of Wu Sung, father of Ying-erh by his deceased first wife, husband of P'an Chin-lien, simple-minded dwarf, native of Yang-ku district in Shantung who moves to the district town of Ch'ing-ho because of a famine and makes his living by peddling steamed wheat cakes on the street, cuckolded by P'an Chin-lien with his landlord, Mr. Chang, and then with Hsi-men Ch'ing, catches P'an Chin-lien and Hsi-men Ch'ing in flagrante delicto in Dame Wang's teahouse but suffers a near-fatal injury when Hsi-men Ch'ing kicks him in the solar plexus, poisoned by P'an Chin-lien with arsenic supplied by Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Wu Chih's daughter. See Ying-erh.
Wu Chih's deceased first wife, mother of Ying-erh.
Wu Chih's second wife. See P'an Chin-lien.
Wu the Elder. See Wu Chih.
Wu the Fourth, Auntie, madam of the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
Wu, Heartless. See Wu Tien-en.
Wu Hsün, secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Wu Hui, younger brother of Wu Yin-erh, actor and musician from the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.
Wu, Immortal. See Wu Shih.
Wu K'ai, eldest son of Battalion Commander Wu, elder brother of Wu the Second, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, and Wu Yüeh-niang, father of Wu Shun-ch'en, brother-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing, inherits the position of battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard upon the death of his father, deputed to repair the local Charity Granary, promoted to the rank of assistant commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard in charge of the local State Farm Battalion as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's influence with Sung Ch'iao-nien, accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang on her pilgrimage to Mount T'ai after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing and is instrumental in rescuing her from attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi.
Wu K'ai's son. See Wu Shun-ch'en.
Wu K'ai's wife, Sister-in-law Wu, mother of Wu Shun-ch'en, sister-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing and a frequent guest in his household.
Wu, Longfoot. See Wu Ch'ang-chiao.
Wu the Second, second son of Battalion Commander Wu, younger brother of Wu K'ai, second elder brother of Wu Yüeh-niang, brother-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing and manager of his silk store on Lion Street; engages in hanky-panky with Li Chiao-erh for which he is denied access to the household by Wu Yüeh-niang when it is discovered after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing although he continues to manage the silk store and later, along with Tai-an, the wholesale pharmaceutical business; accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and Hsi-men Hsiao-ko when they flee the invading Chin armies to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan; ten days after the climactic encounter with P'u-ching in the Temple of Eternal Felicity and Wu Yüeh-niang's relinquishment of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko to a life of Buddhist celibacy he accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, and Hsiao-yü back to their now truncated household in Ch'ing-ho.
Wu the Second. See Wu Sung.
Wu the Second's wife, wife of Wu Yüeh-niang's second elder brother.
Wu Shih, Immortal Wu, Taoist physiognomist introduced to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Chou Hsiu who accurately foretells his fortune and those of his wife and concubines as well as Hsi-men Ta-chieh and P'ang Ch'un-mei; when Hsi-men Ch'ing is on his deathbed he is called in again and reports that there is no hope for him.
Wu Shih's servant boy.
Wu Shun-ch'en, son of Wu K'ai, husband of Third Sister Cheng.
Wu, Sister-in-law. See Wu K'ai's wife.
Wu Sung, Wu the Second, Captain Wu, younger brother of Wu Chih, brother-in-law of P'an Chin-lien; impulsive and implacable exponent of the code of honour; becomes a fugitive from the law for beating up T'ung Kuan in a drunken brawl; slays a tiger in single-handed combat while on his way to visit his brother and is made police captain in Ch'ing-ho for this feat; rejects attempted seduction by P'an Chin-lien and tells her off in no uncertain terms; delivers Li Ta-t'ien's illicit gains from his magistracy to the safe keeping of Chu Mien in the Eastern Capital; returns to Ch'ing-ho and mistakenly kills Li Wai-ch'uan while seeking to avenge the murder of his brother; is sentenced to military exile in Meng-chou where he is befriended by Shih En and helps him in his struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern; is framed by Military Director-in-chief Chang with the help of his concubine, Chiang Yü-lan, the younger sister of Chiang Men-shen, in revenge for which he murders his two guards and the entire households of Military Director-in-chief Chang and Chiang Men-shen; sets out for An-p'ing Stockade with a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation from Shih En but is enabled by a general amnesty to return to Ch'ing-ho where he buys P'an Chin-lien from Dame Wang for a hundred taels of silver and disembowels her to avenge the death of his brother; once more a fugitive he disguises himself as a Buddhist ascetic with the help of the criminal innkeepers Chang Ch'ing and his wife and goes to join Sung Chiang's band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh.
Wu-t'ai, Mount, monk from, who solicits alms from Wu Yüeh-niang for the repair of his temple.
Wu Tien-en, Heartless Wu, originally a Yin-yang master on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who has been removed from his post for cause; makes his living by hanging around in front of the yamen and acting as a guarantor for loans to local officials and functionaries; crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing; member of the brotherhood of ten; manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various of his enterprises; misrepresents himself as Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law and is appointed to the post of station master of the Ch'ing-ho Postal Relay Station in return for his part in delivering birthday presents from Hsi-men Ch'ing to Ts'ai Ching; receives an interest-free loan of one hundred taels from Hsi-men Ch'ing to help cover the expenses of assuming office; promoted to the position of police chief of a suburb of Ch'ing-ho after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing he apprehends the runaway P'ing-an and coerces him into giving false testimony that Wu Yüeh-niang has been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an but when Wu Yüeh-niang appeals to P'ang Ch'un-mei he is dragged before Chou Hsiu's higher court and thoroughly humiliated.
Wu Tsung-che, Abbot Wu, head priest of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho, presides over the elaborate Taoist ceremony at which Hsi-men Kuan-ko is made an infant Taoist priest with the religious name Wu Ying-yüan, later officiates at funeral observances for Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Wu Yin-erh, Silver, elder sister of Wu Hui, singing girl from the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley of the licensed quarter in Ch'ing-ho, sweetheart of Hua Tzu-hsü, adopted daughter of Li P'ing-erh.
Wu Ying-yüan. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko.
Wu Yüeh-niang, Moon Lady, one of the female protagonists of the novel, daughter of Battalion Commander Wu, younger sister of Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, and an elder sister; second wife and First Lady of Hsi-men Ch'ing who marries her after the death of his first wife, née Ch'en, in a match proposed by Dame Wang; stepmother of Hsi-men Ta-chieh, mother of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko; a pious, credulous, and conventional Buddhist laywoman who constantly invites Nun Wang and Nun Hsüeh to the household to recite "precious scrolls" on the themes of salvation, retribution, and reincarnation, who has good intentions but is generally ineffectual at household management and is not a good judge of character; colludes with Hsi-men Ch'ing in taking secret possession of Li P'ing-erh's ill-gotten property but quarrels with him over admitting her to the household; suffers a miscarriage but later takes Nun Hsüeh's fertility potion and conceives Hsi-men Hsiao-ko who is born at the very moment of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; thoughtlessly betroths both Kuan-ko and Hsiao-ko to inappropriate partners while they are still babes in arms; makes a pilgrimage to Mount T'ai after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death and narrowly escapes an attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi and capture by the bandits on Ch'ing-feng Mountain; expels P'an Chin-lien, P'ang Ch'un-mei, and Ch'en Ching-chi from the household when she belatedly discovers their perfidy but is unable to cope effectively with the declining fortunes of the family; forced to seek the assistance of P'ang Ch'un-mei when she is threatened by Wu Tien-en she has no alternative but to accept the condescension of her former maidservant; while fleeing from the invading Chin armies to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan she encounters P'u-ching and spends the night in the Temple of Eternal Felicity where she dreams that Yün Li-shou threatens her with rape if she refuses to marry him; still traumatized by this nightmare, she allows P'u-ching to persuade her that Hsiao-ko is the reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and relinquishes her teenage son to a life of Buddhist celibacy without so much as asking his opinion; on returning safely to Ch'ing-ho she adopts Tai-an as her husband's heir, renaming him Hsi-men An, and lives in reduced circumstances, presiding over a truncated household, until dying a natural death at the age of sixty-nine.
Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, wife of Brother-in-law Shen.
Yang, Aunt, widow of Crooked-head Sun, paternal aunt of Yang Tsung-hsi and Yang Tsung-pao, forceful advocate of Meng Yü-lou's remarriage to Hsi-men Ch'ing after the latter offers her a hundred taels of silver for her support, quarrels with Chang Lung when he tries to prevent this match.
Yang Chien (d. 1121), Commander Yang, eunuch military officer related to Ch'en Hung by marriage, commander in chief of the Imperial Guard in the Eastern Capital, bribed by Hsi-men Ch'ing to intervene on his behalf against Wu Sung and in favour of Hua Tzu-hsü, impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung, reported in a letter from Chai Ch'ien to Hsi-men Ch'ing to have died in prison in 1117.
Yang, Commander. See Yang Chien.
Yang the Elder. See Yang Kuang-yen.
Yang Erh-feng, second son of Yang Pu-lai and his wife, née Pai, younger brother of Yang Kuang-yen, a gambler and tough guy who scares off Ch'en Ching-chi when he tries to recover the half shipload of property that Yang Kuang-yen had stolen from him.
Yang Kuang-yen, Yang the Elder, Iron Fingernail, native of Nobottom ward in Carryoff village of Makebelieve district in Nonesuch subprefecture, son of Yang Pu-lai and his wife, née Pai, disciple of the Barefaced Adept from whom he acquires the art of lying, husband of Miss Died-of-fright, con man employed by Ch'en Ching-chi who absconds with half a shipload of his property while he is in Yen-chou trying to shake down Meng Yü-lou and invests it in the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing only to lose everything when Ch'en Ching-chi sues him with the backing of Chou Hsiu and takes over ownership of the tavern.
Yang Kuang-yen's father. See Yang Pu-lai.
Yang Kuang-yen's mother, née Pai.
Yang Kuang-yen's pageboy.
Yang Kuang-yen's wife. See Died-of-fright, Miss.
Yang, Poor-parent. See Yang Pu-lai.
Yang, Prefect. See Yang Shih.
Yang Pu-lai, Poor-parent Yang, father of Yang Kuang-yen and Yang Erh-feng, brother-in-law of Yao the Second.
Yang Sheng, factotum on the domestic staff of Yang Chien.
Yang Shih (1053–1135), Prefect Yang, prefect of K'ai-feng, protégé of Ts'ai Ching, agrees under pressure from Ts'ai Ching and Yang Chien to treat Hua Tzu-hsü leniently when he is sued over the division of Eunuch Director Hua's property by his brothers Hua Tzu-yu, Hua Tzu-kuang, and Hua Tzu-hua.
Yang T'ing-p'ei, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Yang Tsung-hsi, deceased first husband of Meng Yü-lou, elder brother of Yang Tsung-pao, nephew on his father's side of Aunt Yang and on his mother's side of Chang Lung, textile merchant residing on Stinkwater Lane outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho.
Yang Tsung-hsi's maternal uncle. See Chang Lung.
Yang Tsung-hsi's mother. See Chang Lung's elder sister.
Yang Tsung-hsi's paternal aunt. See Yang, Aunt.
Yang Tsung-pao, younger brother of Yang Tsung-hsi, nephew on his father's side of Aunt Yang and on his mother's side of Chang Lung, brother-in-law of Meng Yü-lou.
Yang Wei-chung (1067–1132), commander-general of the Shansi region who leads the forces of Tse-lu against the Chin invaders.
Yao family from outside the Eastern Capital, poor family into which Sun Hsüeh-o is reincarnated as a daughter.
Yao the Second, brother-in-law of Yang Pu-lai, neighbour of Wu Chih to whom Wu Sung entrusts his orphaned niece Ying-erh when he is condemned to military exile in Meng-chou; gives Ying-erh back to Wu Sung when he returns to Ch'ing-ho five years later only to repossess her after the inquest on P'an Chin-lien's murder when Wu Sung once more becomes a fugitive; later arranges for her marriage.
Yeh the Ascetic, one-eyed illiterate Buddhist ascetic employed as a cook by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh of the Water Moon Monastery outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho, physiognomizes Ch'en Ching-chi when he is reduced to penury and working nearby as a day laborer.
Yeh Ch'ien, prefect of Lai-chou in Shantung.
Yeh the Fifth, wife of Pen Ti-ch'uan, mother of Pen Chang-chieh, originally a wet nurse who elopes with her fellow employee Pen Ti-ch'uan, carries on an intermittent affair with Tai-an while at the same time complaisantly accepting the sexual favours of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Yen the Fourth, neighbour of Han Tao-kuo who informs him of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death when their boats pass each other on the Grand Canal at Lin-ch'ing.
Yen P'o-hsi, singing girl slain by Sung Chiang.
Yen Shun, Brocade Tiger, outlaw chieftan of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain who is persuaded by Sung Chiang to let the captured Wu Yüeh-niang go rather than allowing Wang Ying to make her his wife.
Yin Chih, Good Deed, chief clerk in charge of the files in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission who recognizes that Lai-wang has been framed by Hsi-men Ch'ing and manages to get his sentence reduced and to have him treated more leniently.
Yin Ching, vice-minister of the Ministry of Personnel.
Yin Ta-liang, regional investigating censor of Liang-che, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Yin T'ien-hsi, Year Star Yin, younger brother of Kao Lien's wife, née Yin, dissolute wastrel who takes advantage of his official connections to lord it over the Mount T'ai area with a gang of followers at his disposal, colludes with Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai, in attempting to rape Wu Yüeh-niang when she visits the temple on a pilgrimage after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; later killed at Sung Chiang's behest by the outlaw, Li K'uei.
Yin, Year Star. See Yin T'ien-hsi.
Ying, Beggar. See Ying Po-chüeh.
Ying-ch'un, disciple of Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho.
Ying-ch'un, senior maidservant of Li P'ing-erh who after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing agrees to be sent to the household of Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital and is raped by Lai-pao on the way.
Ying the Elder, eldest son of the deceased silk merchant Master Ying, elder brother of Ying Po-chüeh, continues to operate his father's silk business in Ch'ing-ho.
Ying the Elder's wife.
Ying-erh, daughter of Wu Chih by his deceased first wife, niece of Wu Sung, much abused stepdaughter of P'an Chin-lien who turns her over to Dame Wang when she marries Hsi-men Ch'ing; repossessed by Wu Sung when he returns from the Eastern Capital after the death of her father; consigned to the care of his neighbour Yao the Second when he is condemned to military exile in Meng-chou after his first abortive attempt to avenge the murder of her father; taken back by Wu Sung on his return to Ch'ing-ho five years later and forced to witness his disembowelment of P'an Chin-lien and decapitation of Dame Wang; repossessed by Yao the Second after the inquest and provided by him with a husband.
Ying, Master, father of Ying the Elder and Ying Po-chüeh, deceased silk merchant of Ch'ing-ho.
Ying Pao, eldest son of Ying Po-chüeh, recommends his friend Lai-yu to Hsi-men Ch'ing who employs him as a servant and changes his name to Lai-chüeh.
Ying Po-chüeh, Ying the Second, Sponger Ying, Beggar Ying, son of the deceased silk merchant Master Ying, younger brother of Ying the Elder, father of Ying Pao and two daughters by his wife, née Tu, and a younger son by his concubine Ch'un-hua; having squandered his patrimony and fallen on hard times he has been reduced to squiring wealthy young rakes about the licensed quarters and living by his wits; boon companion and favourite crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten; a clever and amusing sycophant and opportunist he has the art to openly impose on Hsi-men Ch'ing and make him like it while he is alive and the gall to double-cross him without compunction as soon as he is dead.
Ying Po-chüeh's concubine. See Ch'un-hua.
Ying Po-chüeh's elder daughter, married with the financial assistance of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Ying Po-chüeh's grandfather, friend of Licentiate Shui's grandfather.
Ying Po-chüeh's second daughter, after the death of her father she is proposed by Auntie Hsüeh as a match for Ch'en Ching-chi but turned down by P'ang Ch'un-mei for lack of a dowry.

Ying Po-chüeh's son by his concubine Ch'un-hua.
Ying Po-chüeh's wife, née Tu, mother of Ying Pao and two daughters.
Ying the Second. See Ying Po-chüeh.
Ying, Sponger. See Ying Po-chüeh.
Yu, Loafer. See Yu Shou.
Yu Shou, Loafer Yu, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.
Yung-ting, pageboy in the household of Wang Ts'ai.
Yü, Big Sister, blind professional singer in Ch'ing-ho frequently invited into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household to entertain his womenfolk and their guests.
Yü Ch'un, Stupid Yü, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.
Yü-erh. See Sun Hsüeh-o.
Yü-hsiao, Jade Flute, senior maidservant of Wu Yüeh-niang, carries on an affair with Shu-t'ung the discovery of which by P'an Chin-lien leads him to abscond and return to his native Su-chou; after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing agrees to be sent to the household of Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital and is raped by Lai-pao on the way.
Yü, Licentiate, master of a girls' school in his home in Ch'ing-ho where P'an Chin-lien studies for three years as a child.
Yü-lou. See Meng Yü-lou.
Yü Shen (d. 1132), minister of war who suppresses Tseng Hsiao-hsü's memorial impeaching Hsia Yen-ling and Hsi-men Ch'ing for malfeasance in the case of Miao Ch'ing, rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
Yü, Stupid. See Yü Ch'un.
Yü-t'ang, employed in Chou Hsiu's household as a wet nurse for Chou Chin-ko.
Yü-tsan, concubine of Li Kung-pi, originally maidservant of his deceased first wife, who enters his household as part of her dowry, reacts jealously to his marriage with Meng Yü-lou and is beaten by him and sold out of the household.
Yü-wen, Censor. See Yü-wen Hsü-chung.
Yü-wen Hsü-chung (1079–1146), Censor Yü-wen, supervising secretary of the Office of Scrutiny for War who submits a memorial to the throne impeaching Ts'ai Ching, Wang Fu, and Yang Chien.
Yüan, Commander, resident of Potter's Alley in the Eastern Capital into whose family Li P'ing-erh is reincarnated as a daughter.
Yüan-hsiao, senior maidservant of Li Chiao-erh who is transferred to the service of Hsi-men Ta-chieh at the request of Ch'en Ching-chi after her former mistress leaves the household, accompanies her new mistress through her many vicissitudes while also putting up with the capricious treatment of Ch'en Ching-chi in whose service she dies after he is reduced to penury.
Yüan Yen, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing subsidiary female roles.
Yüeh Ho-an, vice-magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.
Yüeh-kuei, concubine of Chou Hsiu much abused by P'ang Ch'un-mei.
Yüeh-niang. See Wu Yüeh-niang.
Yüeh the Third, next-door neighbour of Han Tao-kuo on Lion Street who fences Miao Ch'ing's stolen goods and suggests that he approach Hsi-men Ch'ing through Wang Liu-erh to get him off the hook for the murder of Miao T'ien-hsiu.
Yüeh the Third's wife, close friend of Wang Liu-erh who acts as an intermediary in Miao Ch'ing's approach to Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Yün, Assistant Regional Commander, elder brother of Yün Li-shou, hereditary military officer who dies at his post on the frontier.
Yün-ko. See Ch'iao Yün-ko.
Yün Li-shou, Welsher Yün, Yün the Second, younger brother of Assistant Regional Commander Yün, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various of his enterprises, upon the death of his elder brother succeeds to his rank and the substantive post of vice-commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard, later appointed stockade commander of Ling-pi Stockade at Chinan where Wu Yüeh-niang seeks refuge with him from the invading Chin armies but dreams that he attempts to rape her.
Yün Li-shou's daughter, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.
Yün Li-shou's wife, née Su, proposes a marriage alliance to Wu Yüeh-niang while they are both pregnant and formally betroths her daughter to Hsi-men Hsiao-ko after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Yün, Little. See Ch'iao Yün-ko.
Yün, Prince of. See Chao K'ai.
Yün the Second. See Yün Li-shou.
Yün, Welsher. See Yün Li-shou.

Juan Chi (210-63)

There is a vile place, reached through side roads,
Where there are heaps of deer and pigs:
It is not made beautiful by the fair and clean,
But is the resort of the filthy and impure....
[Here] the Three Chin concocted their alliances
And Cheng and Wei[8] spread their disorder....
That is why violence ran loose within families
And poisoned hate sprang up between husband and wife.
These people still had boundless desires to do bad:
How could it be long before they gave vent to them? ...
With its back to the mountains, facing the waters,
The region was filthy, full of egotism,
So that in the small quarters and border towns
No one would deny the bad things said of it....
Arrogant menials from small towns
Lived here.
The waterways lead, by the quickest route,
To Lake Tung-t'ing and to the state of Ch'u,
And they carry [southern] influences [to Tung-p'ing],
Directly to it, and to its entire domain.
Thus they inherited [southern] customs
And were without rules, without models:
Not barbarians, they still followed no laws,
And came to do harm.
... in their cooperative ventures, each vaunts his own power;
They turn away from reason and towards debauchery.
Extolling the passions and chasing after profit,
The only thing they respect is excess.

The Outline of the History of Song

Song Jiang, a bandit from Huainan, plundered several prefectures east of the capital but Zhang Shuye, the prefect of Haizhou, defeated and subdued him.
The historian concludes: Pardoning is the greatest grace of the emperor; punishing is the greatest law of a gentleman. Song Jiang plundered the counties east of the capital, a crime deserving death. The book uses "surrender" instead of "execution," indicating he was pardoned at the time. For a thief is not born a thief. His father and brothers failed to educate him, hunger and cold drove him, and his talent and strength were insufficient to be displayed. Thus, he aimlessly entered the wilderness, gathered a band of thieves, first robbing, then raising an army—all these factors played a role. But who truly caused the failure to educate him, the hunger and cold, and the inability to display his talent and strength? "All the people are guilty but the guilt lies with me." Is this not true of Cheng Tang's words? Who is not someone who would not steal even if rewarded? If the ruler has already implicated them, and then punished them, and a benevolent person is in power, and the people can do as they please, how can this be considered acting on behalf of Heaven to govern the people? Therefore, to depose them without punishing them is a great favour from the Son of Heaven and a good law for dealing with thieves. If it were a virtuous person, then they would certainly not be able to fully punish their crimes and record them as thieves. A virtuous person is not unaware of the beginning of thievery, nor is he born a thief, and even after being pardoned, the joy and renewal afterward will prevent him from stealing again. A virtuous person believes that the Son of Heaven's duty is to nourish all people; to nourish all people means to cherish their lives, even the smallest creatures are related to God's heart in giving life. The duty of a virtuous person is to educate all people; to educate all people means to love them with a heart full of love, and even for a day or two, to be as cautious as if walking on frost and ice. Therefore, after a theft, those who truly refrain from stealing can be pardoned by the Emperor, who can remove them from the wrath of boiling water and place them on a comfortable bed. This is what is meant by opening the gates of virtuous conduct wide above the nine heavens. However, even after a theft, there may not be no more thieves. A virtuous person must first identify their wickedness and punish them with the mighty Yu tripod. This is what is meant by the three-foot pen that truly embodies the wrath of thunder. For a pardon granted in a single day is the Emperor's grace; what remains unchanged for a hundred generations is the virtuous person's law. Although Song Jiang surrendered, it was recorded as a theft. This is the strict record of the Spring and Autumn Annals, intended to demonstrate caution, prevent future occurrences, rectify people's hearts, and assist the king's rule. Later generations, failing to understand this, have lavished praise on these unofficial historians, crowning them with the name of loyalty and righteousness, and then endlessly admiring them. Alas! Who was this man? Did he not harbour rebellious intentions?
When Zhang Shuye defeated Song Jiang and forced him to surrender, the History of Song extensively recorded it, saying, "Who was the one who governed Haizhou?" It was I. Why Zhang Shuye? Because I was truly capable of governing Haizhou. Why? Because a virtuous person eats the food of the ruler, receives the ruler's orders, is allocated the ruler's land, and governs the ruler's people; thus, he is called the governor of a certain prefecture. "Governing" means being in charge of its affairs. If the elderly are not at ease, you know their well-being; if the young are not yet cared for, you know their upbringing; if the hungry are not fed, you know to plant trees and raise livestock; if the cold are not clothed, you know to cultivate silkworms and mulberry trees; if the labourers are not yet rested, you know to give them rest; if the sick are not yet healed, you know to heal them; if the foolish are not yet taught, you know to teach them; if the virtuous are not yet promoted, you know to promote them. Only in this way can one be said to have fulfilled his duties. For three years he reported on his duties, and his ruler rewarded him with feasts, presented him with poems and songs, treated him with exceptional favour, and invited him to the imperial palace. Indeed, the prefect was a true pillar of the emperor's court, not merely a figurehead. Since the officials' integrity was compromised, many have become power holders. The people have abandoned their fields, yet the officials are unaware; the people are idle, yet the officials are unaware; the people are starving, yet the officials are unaware; the people are increasingly resorting to robbery, yet the officials are unaware. As such, it is inevitable that bandits will rise up like swarms. And when asked about the city walls, the officials know nothing; when asked about the weapons and armor, the officials know nothing; when asked about the provisions, the officials know nothing; when asked about the horses, the officials know nothing. Alas! Having learned nothing, he deceives his ruler, saying, "I know about such and such a prefecture." What do you know about such and such a prefecture? The History of Song states that Zhang Shuye defeated and subdued Song Jiang but only gave high praise to the one who was appointed Prefect of Haizhou, indicating that he was highly regarded.
The historian's words in this regard are a lenient assessment. If an official is to govern a certain prefecture, what is truly unknown to him? He knows how to navigate complex situations; he knows how to curry favour with powerful figures; he knows how to exacerbate tax collection; he knows how to impose fines and redemptions; he knows how to apprehend wealthy households through connections; he knows how to cultivate relationships with cunning clerks. What he truly does not know, he is utterly ignorant; yet what he does know, he knows perfectly well. Alas! Alas! To be utterly ignorant is not only unfit to be an official; but to be utterly ignorant is tantamount to being a thief! If only we had someone like Zhang Shuye, with the remaining strength from defeating Song Jiang, to strike down all those who had fallen!

Abridged History of the Song Dynasty

Song Jiang rose to become a bandit, leading thirty-six men to roam the Hebei region, plundering ten prefectures, with government troops daring not to challenge his might. Hou Meng, the prefect of Haozhou, submitted a memorial, stating that Jiang possessed extraordinary talent and that it would be better to pardon him and send him to subdue Fang La to redeem himself. The emperor appointed Meng as prefect of Dongping but he died before taking office. Zhang Shuye was then appointed prefect of Haizhou. As Jiang approached Haizhou, Shuye sent spies to ascertain his direction. Jiang went directly to the coast, hijacking more than ten large ships and filling them with salt. Shuye recruited a thousand brave men, setting up an ambush near the city, while sending out light troops to lure the enemy into a battle at sea. Strong soldiers were hidden near the shore, waiting for the enemy to engage, then setting fire to the ships. Hearing this, the bandits lost their will to fight. The ambush troops seized the opportunity, capturing Jiang's deputy, and Jiang surrendered.
The historian concludes: This shows that nothing in the world is impossible but there are simply no people willing to do it. When Song Jiang rose up in Hebei with thirty-six men, plundering ten prefectures, none of the local officials dared to harm him. At that time, would anyone still say that he was like a hungry beast easily subdued or a wildfire easily extinguished? Then, by the grace of the court, Zhang Shuye arrived. Zhang Shuye was merely the governor of ten prefectures; he was not the one who received the most food from the emperor or the most favour from the state. Furthermore, Song Jiang was not only powerful in the ten prefectures but also cowardly in Haizhou. Yet, before, they allowed him to plunder and kill without anyone daring to do anything; afterwards, he was captured in a single day, swept away like a whirlwind. This is nothing more than this: the officials of the ten prefectures each had their own wives and children, their own wealth and possessions, their own salaries and positions, and their own lives. With so many concerns and no clear plan, they were caught off guard by the sudden attack of the bandits. Zhang Shuye, however, had no wives and children to cherish, no wealth to worry about, no position to seek, and no life to fear. Whether to act or not was his duty as a subject; whether to help or not was entirely up to the emperor's will. And yet, those thirty-six men like Song Jiang had already surrendered themselves to his command. Alas! History records that Shuye recruited a thousand men to die for him; how could anyone know that Shuye was indeed the foremost warrior to fight to the death! The commentary says, "He is willing to risk his life in the face of danger." It also says, "He is fearful in the face of adversity, and good at planning and achieving success." It also says, "If I fight, I will win." It also says, "He can be entrusted with the fate of a hundred li." Zhang Shuye possessed these qualities; was he not a worthy minister of the state?
Hou Meng's attempt to pardon Song Jiang and send him to punish Fang La was fraught with eight errors. Firstly, the mighty Song Dynasty, unable to subdue a single bandit, resorted to a plan involving a pardon. While the euphemisms of "pardon" and "redemption" were elegant, they were in reality a plea for appeasement, undermining the dignity of the court—this was the first error. Secondly, murderers are executed, and rebels are exterminated—this was the law. Thirdly, the looting had spread to ten prefectures, the atrocities committed were considerable, yet to lightly discuss pardon undermined the laws of the state—this was the second error. Fourthly, Fang La's arrival was devastating, yet there was no sign of the imperial army's fury; instead, the emperor looked to the thirty-six outlaws to be wiped out—this demonstrated the lack of capable men at the time—this was the third error. Fifthly, luring one bandit to attack another, hoping for a two-way fight where one would be injured, was a scheme that none of the bandits could conceal and laugh at—this only emboldened the rebels to unite and further embolden them—this was the fourth error. Martial arts are something that heroes and valiant men of the world obtain by sacrificing their heads and limbs. Now, it is suddenly used as a breeding ground for thieves, causing strong men to lose their dignity. This is the fifth point. The Book of Changes says, "When the four suburbs are surrounded by fortifications, it is a disgrace to the high officials." Now, no one is willing to step forward to relieve the ruler's worries but instead, the emperor merely wants to use imperial edicts as a means to quell the chaos. This is the sixth point.
Those who are guilty can be pardoned, while the innocent are tempted; from this point on, there is no way to govern the world—this is the seventh point. If one claims his talent is exceptional, then why wasn't he employed before the theft, and why was he recommended after the theft? Who was the prime minister at that time? Such a complete reversal—this is the eighth point. Alas! A wise man considers one word wise, another unwise; like Hou Meng, he was fortunate enough to die. If Tuo Zhen had known Dongping, who would have known he wouldn't have greatly ruined public affairs and become a laughingstock! He Luo, lacking understanding, still followed this doctrine, resulting in the wicked commentary of the Continuation of Water Margin.
Original Publisher's Preface
Sima Qian said, "The 'Difficulty of Persuasion' and 'Solitary Indignation' were written by sages and worthies out of indignation." From this, we can see that the ancient sages and worthies would not have written if they had not been indignant. To write without indignation is like shivering without being cold or groaning without being sick. Even if one writes, what is the point?

Water Margin was written out of indignation. Since the Song Dynasty's decline, with its corrupt practices, the virtuous were relegated to lower positions while the wicked were elevated, eventually leading to barbarians being superior and the Central Plains relegated to inferior status. For a time, even the emperors and ministers were like sparrows in their halls, paying tribute and submitting to the Song, willingly kneeling before the dogs and sheep! Shi Nai'an and Luo Guanzhong, though living under the Yuan Dynasty, remained loyal to the Song. Though born in the Yuan era, they were truly indignant about the Song's fate. Therefore, indignant at the two emperors' northern capture, they claimed to have decisively defeated the Liao to vent their anger; indignant at the Song's cowardly peace after its southward migration, they claimed to have annihilated Fang La to vent their anger. Who, then, vented their anger? It was none other than the bandits who had gathered at Water Margin the other day! It is impossible not to call them loyal and righteous; therefore, Shi Nai'an and Luo Guanzhong wrote Water Margin and named it "Loyalty and Righteousness."

Why is "loyalty and righteousness" attributed to the Water Margin? The reason is understandable. Why are all the members of the Water Margin loyal and righteous? The cause is also understandable. It is natural that those of lesser virtue serve those of greater virtue, and those of lesser wisdom serve those of greater wisdom. But if those of lesser wisdom are used to command others, and those of greater wisdom are used to command others, would they willingly serve without shame? This is like using a small force to bind someone, and having a large force bind someone—would they willingly submit without complaint? This would inevitably lead to the gathering of all the great and virtuous men in the world into the Water Margin. Therefore, it is acceptable to say that the members of the Water Margin are all great and virtuous men, loyal and righteous.

Yet none were as loyal and righteous as Song Jiang. Looking at the 108 heroes, they shared the same merits and demerits, the same life and death; their loyalty and righteousness were comparable to Song Jiang's. Song Jiang alone, though living in the Water Margin, had his heart set on the imperial court, single-mindedly seeking amnesty and dedicating himself to serving his country. Ultimately, he faced great calamity, achieved great merit, and even committed suicide by poison, willing to die alongside them. His fierce loyalty and righteousness truly won over the hearts of the 108 heroes. Therefore, he was able to form a brotherhood at Liangshan and become their leader. In the final campaign against Fang La, more than half of the 108 heroes perished.

Then Zhishen passed away peacefully at Liuhe Temple, Yan Qing wept as he bid farewell to his lord, and the two boys devised a plan at Hunjiang. Song Jiang was not unaware of this but he thought it was merely a clever and discerning scheme by a petty man to ensure his own safety, something that a man loyal to his lord and righteous to his friends would never stoop to. This is what Song Jiang is all about, and this is why he is called "loyal and righteous."

Is this Biography unnecessary? Is this Biography not worth reading? Therefore, those who govern a country cannot afford not to read it. Upon reading this Biography, one will realize that "loyalty and righteousness" are not found in the Water Margin but are all found at the emperor's side. Wise prime ministers cannot afford not to read it. Upon reading this Biography, one will realize that "loyalty and righteousness" are not found in the Water Margin but are all found in the court. The Ministry of War, holding the reins of military and national affairs, and the governors-general, entrusted with the affairs of the state, also cannot afford not to read it. If one reads this Biography even for a single day, one will realize that "loyalty and righteousness" are not found in the Water Margin but are all found among trusted and reliable officials. Otherwise, if they are not found in the court, not at the emperor's side, not among trusted and reliable officials, where are they found? In the Water Margin. This is the purpose of this Biography. If those who enjoy reading it use it as a basis for discussion, and those who use it for military strategy, they will only use it to showcase their own strengths. Where then can one find the so-called loyalty and righteousness?

Written by Li Zhi, Zhuowu of Wenling

Written by Sun Pu of Hulin on a midsummer day in the year of Gengxu, beside the 3 Lives Stone.

"Preface to the Loyal and Righteous Water Margin"; "ancient sages" in Burning Books is "ancient saints"; "sparrows in the hall" in Burning Books is "sparrows in the hall"; the two instances of "肯" are "肓" in Burning Books: "而使大力缚于人" is "而使大力者缚于人"; "不在干城心腹" is "不在干城心心"; "资其谈柄" is "资其谈柄". The Wuqionghui edition of the Three Great Bandits edition contains this preface, titled "Preface to Reading the Loyal and Righteous Water Margin". The biggest difference in this preface is that "驯致夷狄处上" is changed to "驯致边陲处上"; "甘心屈膝于犬羊" is changed to "甘心屈膝于时势". The remaining text also has minor differences: "古之圣贤" is "古之贤圣" in this version; "不病而呻吟" is "不病而呻唫" in this version; "不病而呻唫也" is followed by the phrase "可耻什么甚焉" in this version; "冠讠倒施" is "冠履倒施" in this version; "处堂燕雀" is "处堂燕鹊" in this version; "实愤宋事也" is "实愤宋事也" in this version; "而使大力者缚于人" is "而使大力者缚于人" in this version; "为壹百单八人之主" is the lord of one hundred and eight men. "This version reads 'for the 108 men'; 'And Zhishen passed away in meditation'; 'And Zhishen passed away in meditation'; 'Read this biography once' in two places; 'Read this biography once a day' in this version; 'Not a trusted confidant'; 'Not a trusted confidant'; 'What this biography describes'; 'What is done in loyalty and righteousness'; 'It provides a basis for discussion'; 'Each sees their strengths'; 'Each sees their strengths'; 'How can one see what is called loyalty and righteousness'?"" The preface to the "Three Bandits" edition published by Hayashi Kyubei is titled "Preface to Reading the Loyal and Righteous Water Margin." The text of this preface is basically the same as the "Three Bandits" edition but the parts altered in the "Three Bandits" edition are not altered in this edition. Other differences include: the phrase "Who dares to vent their anger?" in the "Three Bandits" edition is "Who dares to vent their anger? No way!"; the phrase "It provides material for discussion" in the "Three Bandits" edition is "It provides material for discussion"; the phrase "What is done in loyalty and righteousness" in the "Three Bandits" edition is "What is done in this story"; the phrase "Is this not what is called loyalty and righteousness?" in the "Three Bandits" edition is "How can I see what is called loyalty and righteousness?". The 120-chapter complete edition held by Peking University Library also has this preface, titled "Preface to Reading the Loyal and Righteous Water Margin." The biggest difference in this preface is that it changes "to quell Fang La to vent their anger" to "to suppress the three bandits to vent their anger." The rest of the text is basically the same as the Lin Jiubingwei edition but there are also some minor differences. The Lin edition reads "From this perspective," while this edition reads "From this perspective." The Lin edition reads "May I ask if it is to vent one's anger? How could it be?" while this edition reads "May I ask who is venting their anger?"

My devotion to Mr. Zhuowu is one of outward conformity and inner devotion; I am nothing but his. I will not speak what he has not spoken, nor read what he has not read. Some may call it madness, others eccentricity but I forget myself, knowing only that Mr. Zhuowu exists. His passing has only increased his fame, broadened his teachings, and spread his books. Even fragments and single words left to the world are treasured like precious herbs, seemingly poised to sweep across the universe—how magnificent! His immortality is assured. Yet, while seventeen may marvel at his writings and thirteen at his character, upon examining one's own heart, none of them have ever considered Mr. Zhuowu.

Since my travels to Wu, I visited Prefect Chen Wuyi and met Yuan Wuyai. Before I could even finish my greetings, he immediately inquired about the master, his sincerity as a student overflowing from his brow, as if he himself possessed the spirit of Zhuo Wu. Subsequently, I visited him several times, and in every conversation, he would mention Master Zhuo. He earnestly sought Master Zhuo's posthumous words and annotated posthumous works. Was Wuyai mad? Or was he eccentric? I searched my belongings and found with me two books: Master Zhuo's annotated edition of The Water Margin and The Collected Works of Yang Shengan. I took them and gave them to him. Wuyai was overjoyed, as if he had found a priceless treasure, and wished to share them with the world. I asked, "Which of the two books comes first?" Wuya replied, "Water Margin is about loyalty and righteousness, and loyalty and righteousness are about Water Margin. Whether you know me or condemn me, Zhuo Lao's Spring and Autumn Annals are close to this. It comes first, Water Margin! It comes first, Water Margin!" I laughed and said, "Yes, yes! Only Zhuo Lao could have expressed the spirit of Water Margin, and only Wuya could have expressed the spirit of Zhuo Lao. I have served Mr. Zhuo Wu the longest but Wuya has understood Mr. Zhuo Wu the most deeply. I am ashamed of Wuya! But Wuya is not me, so who can express Wuya's spirit? I have not failed Mr. Zhuo Wu, and Wuya has not failed my visit." Then we looked at each other and laughed, brewed tea and sipped it together, taking Mr. Zhuo Wu's narration of Water Margin and reading it aloud in unison. The Xujiang River roared, as if responding. I forgot Wuya, and Wuya forgot me; all we knew was Mr. Zhuo Wu.

Yang Dingjian, a man from Fengli in Chu, wrote this on a boat on the Xujiang River.

"Commentary on the Complete Story of Loyalty and Righteousness in the Water Margin"

I. The transmission originated from Zuo Zhuan, yet some critics still consider it a misrepresentation; how much more so from unofficial accounts! However, since the intention is to offer advice and punishment, even if it is a misrepresentation, it is not a crime. Modern novelists produce a multitude of works, many of which deviate from the classics and cannot be used as teachings. Some use the subject to expound on morality, aiming to punish theft, adultery, and falsehood, and to serve as a warning; others merely pick up bits and pieces instead of the whole book, or embellish and deviate from common knowledge; while they may appeal to those seeking novelty, they actually harm the decline of refined taste. How much better is this book that is correct? Ancient sages compared it to Ban Gu and Sima Qian; I believe it surpasses Qiu Ming, and it almost bears the legacy of the Spring and Autumn Annals. Therefore, it is fitting to call it a transmission.

I. Liangshan Marsh belonged to Yanzhou Prefecture in Shandong Province. The local gazetteer refers to it as Luo, stating it was eight hundred li long, a name given by the local authorities. However, the ancients, wanting to level this marsh, found it difficult to store water that was no small feat. The historical records do not mention Liangshan or Song Jiang, because it was neither a bandit's territory nor a bandit's man; therefore, it is simply named "Shuihu" (Water Marsh). "Hu" means water's edge, a somewhat empty term. It is likely that under the rule of the emperor and his subjects, Jiang would not dare to occupy this marsh. Perhaps it was a desire to live by the sea? The naming by Luo Guanzhong is indeed subtle!

I. Loyalty and righteousness are the virtues of serving one's lord and being a friend. Those who are disloyal and unrighteous, though dead, will have their words, however eloquent, forgotten. These 108 men are a gathering of loyalty and righteousness in the mountains and forests; these 120 chapters are a record of loyalty and righteousness in writing. If we find them in official histories, we can look to unofficial accounts; if we find them in official documents, we can look to the common people. This is intended to influence virtuous people, while preventing petty people from using it for their own selfish purposes. Therefore, Li Shi added the words "loyalty and righteousness," and there is a reason for this.

First, commentary on books aims to convey the author's intent and enlighten the reader. A successful commentary is like adding the finishing touch, revealing the author's spirit; a poor one is like smearing paint on the cheek, defiling the original work. It cannot be treated lightly. This work meticulously points out the main theme of a book, the insightful observations of a chapter, and the essence of a single sentence, making it clear that this is a work of unofficial history, relevant to society and beneficial to literature, quite different from traditional commercial publications. Like accurately following a musical score or hitting the mark with a needle on a bronze figure, the pen has both a tongue and eyes, making the reader see and hear—this is the most valuable aspect of commentary.

First, this book has already vividly depicted the situation, thus constituting a sketch from life. To add further embellishment with painting would be superfluous. Nevertheless, how many people can truly see literature in the zither and Yao in the wall? Therefore, the paintings of Yuntai and Lingyan, and the depictions of the displaced people in seclusion, can evoke emotion and sorrow in the viewer, making them feel as if they are facing the scene themselves. Thus, such depictions are indispensable. Now, I have taken a new approach, not following the old style. Some details are highlighted outside the main text, while others are incorporated into the chapters. I only select the best, not valuing quantity.

Firstly, the ancient version contained Luo Guanzhong's "Words of Wisdom," which supposedly included events such as the "Lady Lamp Flower," but these are no longer available. Later generations either selectively omitted these events due to the constraints imposed by the Four Great Bandits, or removed them because they were considered too cumbersome (120 chapters). All these omissions are lost. Guo Wu's revised version that is the original version, cleverly moved the story of Yama (the Beast Goddess) that is excellent. His removal of Wang and Tian from the bandit group and the addition of the Liao Kingdom is a clever way of resolving conflicts. Those who are unaware of true mastery are quite different; for example, the chapter on Wang Jin's opening is not included in this version. This is what distinguishes it from other novels and makes it a saint among novels!

First, the old version eliminated the tedium of poetry and lyrics, addressing both the simplification of events and the confusion of the viewer, making it quite direct and clear. However, some instances where this style was used to describe human nature, thus disrupting the flow of the text, could not be entirely eliminated. Therefore, this version has been revised and expanded: some parts are adapted from the original and added, while others contradict the ancient meaning and add what was not present. The aim is to use both admonition and punishment, along with playful banter, to move the reader and enlighten their mind, leaving them with a profound sense of appreciation.

I. Regarding the pronunciation of characters, the old edition was quite skillful but there were still many errors and inconsistencies. For example, the first quoted word contained four errors. Comparing this edition with the old edition will reveal the rest. As for the errors of writing "耐" as "奈" and "躁" as "燥," these are clearly typos. If "戴" is confused as "带," "煞" as "殺," and "閂" as "束," and if "冲" and "衝" are indistinguishable, and "逕" and "竟" are unclear, then the meanings become contradictory. Such errors are too numerous to list, and all have been corrected. While the pronunciation is appended to the characters for easier reading, the discontinuity in pronunciation is unpleasant for laypeople. Therefore, it is listed at the end for easy reference. Those with distant pronunciations are listed separately, and those with different pronunciations are listed separately. If half a character is readable and its common meaning is understandable, it may be omitted.

First, every author must have a basis for their work. This book is based on facts and events, so there is no need to consult other books for verification. Moreover, the names and numbers of people in the Song Jian and Xuanhe Yishi are verifiable, and the Qixiu Leigao also records names and describes the thirty-six Heavenly Spirits and seventy-two Earthly Fiends of Guanzhong. Now, I have listed the hometowns and origins of 108 people in these two documents for easy reference and to aid in discussion.

First, the chronicler provides a summary, and the compiler adds profound insights. Li Kui, for example, has already been mentioned in the biography as "The Biography of Shou Zhang." Others such as Lu Da, Lin Chong, Wu Song, Shi Xiu, Zhang Shun, Li Jun, and Yan Qing could each have their own biographies to illustrate their beginnings and ends. The book's elegant language, even its dialectal banter, is captivating. It is highlighted here because this book is a treasure trove of gems. Su Shi said, "The method of reading is to focus on one thing at a time." If even novels possess such beauty, how much more so official histories?

PUBLISHERS' PREFACES

1

Originally, the creation of written records was a means for the sages of old to unite the people's hearts and establish the way of governance. Its origins lie in knotted ropes, and its development culminated in the Six Classics. Those who wielded the bamboo slips and pen were all those in positions of authority and possessing the virtue of sages. In the position of a sage, one has authority; possessing the virtue of a sage, one knows the reasons. Having authority and knowing the reasons, one is both able to create and compelled to create. Therefore, the I Ching guides people towards good; the Book of Rites prevents them from doing evil; the Book of Documents encompasses the changes of the heavens; and the Book of Poetry harmonizes the understanding of human nature. Thus, the I Ching is a book of action; the Book of Rites is a book of restraint; the Book of Documents is a book to be feared; and the Book of Poetry is a book to be enjoyed. Therefore, it is said that the I Ching is round and the Book of Rites is square, the Book of Documents is enduring and the Book of Poetry is grand. It is also said that the I Ching does not reward, yet the people are encouraged; the Book of Rites does not anger, yet the people avoid it; the Book of Documents is the altar outside the temple; and the Book of Poetry is the hall before the morning court. If one could have the I Ching but not the Book of Documents, then it would no longer be the Book of Documents. If one could have the I Ching and the Book of Documents but not the Book of Poetry, then it would no longer be the Book of Poetry. If one could have the I Ching, the Book of Documents, and the Book of Poetry but not the Book of Rites, then it would no longer be the Book of Rites.Those who possess the virtue of a sage understand the reasons behind things; understanding the reasons, they know that the I Ching, Book of Documents, Book of Poetry, and Book of Rites each have their own reasons, and none can be discarded. Those who possess the virtue of a sage and hold a position of authority have the power; having this power, they can then create the I Ching, and later, desiring to create the Book of Documents, the Book of Poetry, and the Book of Rites, all of which they can accomplish with effort, and no one can criticize their actions. Those who do not hold a position of authority lack the power; lacking the power, they cannot avoid creating—this is the case of Confucius. Confucius did not hold a position of authority but possessed the virtue of a sage; possessing the virtue of a sage, he understood the reasons; understanding the reasons, he could not refrain from creating—this is the case of the Spring and Autumn Annals.Confucius would surely say, "Those who understand me, are they only those who study the Spring and Autumn Annals? Those who condemn me, are they only those who study the Spring and Autumn Annals?" Why is this so? Those who understand me only through the Spring and Autumn Annals are those who, in order to understand the principles of Heaven, study the Book of Changes; in order to connect events to the day, study the Book of Documents; in order to compile the Book of Poetry, study the Book of Rites, study the Book of Poetry, and in order to promote good and prohibit evil: all these are what is meant by having the virtue and knowing the reasons, knowing the reasons and being unable to stop writing, and being unable to stop writing, thus combining the strengths of the four classics into one book, thus he has never actually written one. This lack of originality is Confucius's intention. Those who condemn me only through the Spring and Autumn Annals are those who, in ancient times, only the emperor examined texts. Since Confucius, a commoner, wrote the Spring and Autumn Annals, later generations of cunning and eloquent people have all produced their own versions. As the writings continued for a long time, all sorts of wild and varied opinions arose; rulers read them and became confused above, while the people read them and became bewildered below. This inevitably led to chaos and destruction, even affecting the Six Classics. Confucius was not unaware of this, yet he still continued writing; this is why Confucius lamented his own guilt. Someone might ask: Was Confucius truly guilty? The answer is: Confucius was not guilty. Confucius knew the reason but because he considered himself a commoner and dared not readily create anything, he compiled the classics from historical records, without establishing separate texts but simply writing "Spring, the First Month of the King" at the beginning. If one says: The old ones are the books of the feudal lords, the new ones are the books of the Son of Heaven. By taking the books of the feudal lords and manually transforming them into the books of the Son of Heaven, Confucius did not grant the feudal lords the right to compile books. Confucius refused to grant the right to write books to the feudal lords, so how could he possibly grant it to the common people? Therefore, writing books is the business of sages. Anyone who writes books but is not a sage should be executed, and his books should be burned. Writing books is the domain of sages and emperors. Anyone who writes a book but is not an emperor should be executed, and the book should be burned. Why? Because a book written by someone other than a sage undermines the Way; a book written by someone other than an emperor undermines order. Undermining the Way and order is tantamount to blasphemy. Blasphemy, then, must be burned! And those who engage in blasphemy, then, must be executed! Therefore, the Qin dynasty's burning of books was not only the will of the First Emperor but also the will of Confucius. The fact that Confucius did not burn books while the First Emperor did shows that Confucius not only lacked the right to write books but also lacked the right to burn them. If the First Emperor burned books and even the sacred scriptures, then he had the right but lacked the virtue; lacking virtue, he did not understand the reason; not understanding the reason, he burned them all. Therefore, burning the Bible was the fault of the First Emperor; burning books was his achievement. Soon after the rise of the Han Dynasty, there was a great search for lost books. Many officials at court presented books as tribute. Consequently, scholars from all over the country claimed to possess books, and the number of books obtained in a short time exceeded that before the burning. From ancient times to the present, people know that burning books is a terrible calamity but how could they know that seeking books is an even worse calamity? Burning books means there are no books in the world; because there are no books in the world, the books of the sages survive. Seeking books means there are books in the world; because there are books in the world, the books of the sages perish. Burning books is to prohibit people from writing books. Seeking books is to allow people to write books. As for allowing people to write books, what will they not do? Those who understand the teachings of the sages have books; those who rebel against the teachings of the sages also have books. Those who proclaim the emperor's decrees have books; those who violate the emperor's decrees also have books. If the governance of the Three Dynasties were truly applied, those who understand the teachings of the sages and proclaim the emperor's decrees would still not be permitted. Why? Because they would be abhorred for destroying the Way and order, and the common people would not be at peace. How could one go so far as to betray the teachings of the sages, defy the decrees of the emperor, and openly write one's own book? Originally, it was only those above who had a liking for it that were even more fervently indulged by those below. Fathers, sons, brothers, and clans gathered to write, and after a long period of work, their talents overflowed. While it's true that imperial edicts require eloquent words, what's wrong with indulging oneself? But how can one tolerate the depiction of demons and monsters, and the slander of sages and worthies, when the pen is already flowing freely? Therefore, while those who rebelled were executed, biographies of "wandering heroes" were created; while those who humiliated others were celebrated in "commercial works." The intention was to explore the extremes of the bizarre and unconventional, to the point of heart-wrenching pain, to reach the heavens above and the netherworld below, to be utterly satisfied and unstoppable. Initially, such works were kept privately among the lower classes, merely circulated among them, fearing only that their superiors would forbid them. But as time went on, the superiors gradually noticed them, and upon seeing them, they couldn't help but be pleased, and not only did they not forbid them. Books that defy doctrine and decree are now so widely accepted that the emperor not only no longer forbids them but even rejoices in them. How can the people of the world possibly fear them anymore? Their authors are alarmed and inform each other; their readers are alarmed and inform each other. After this alarming announcement, everyone follows suit, and there is no one who does not write them, no one who does not read them. As a result, the sages' remaining classics are reduced to only one or two chapters; the books of various schools cannot be carried even if an ox's axle breaks, nor can they be stored in entire palaces. The emperor's edicts are merely covered with earth; the books of various schools are only titled with silk and labeled with gold and jade. This has gradually led to the present day, and the resulting calamity is beyond description. People who do not know how to steal will become thieves after reading various books; people who do not know how to be licentious will become licentious after reading various books; people who do not know how to deceive will become deceitful after reading various books; people who do not know how to cause chaos will become chaotic after reading various books. My previous statement that those who write books not by sages corrupt the Way, and those who write books not by emperors corrupt governance, is merely concerned that their interpretations of classical texts will confuse the people; and that their methods of governance will be presented to the people in a way that is too clear. If the people are confused, they will find it difficult to believe; if they are presented with too much clarity, they will find it difficult to govern. Therefore, I have concluded that these books corrupt the Way and governance that is tantamount to unfounded speculation. Such people should be executed, and their books should be burned. It is not that they truly deviate greatly from the sacred scriptures or are extremely harmful to the rule of the king, yet they are still like this. As for the books of today, how could they be what the First Emperor anticipated when he created characters, or what he anticipated when he burned them? Indeed, execution alone is insufficient to cover their crimes, and burning alone is insufficient to erase their traces. The root of the problem lies in the Han people's edict to retrieve the lost books that truly opened the floodgates. Therefore, it is said that the calamity of burning books is severe but the calamity of seeking books is even more severe. The calamity of burning books lies in the simultaneous burning of the Bible. With the Bible burned, the people do not turn to good; this is the crime of the First Emperor that can never be forgiven for eternity. The calamity of seeking books lies in the simultaneous circulation of private books. With the circulation of private books, the people become utterly wicked; this is the crime of the Han people that can never be forgiven for eternity. However, since the Bible was burned, it eventually became widely known in later generations; in this case, the First Emperor's crime can still be forgiven. But if private books were circulated, and the disaster caused by them spread beyond redemption, then the crime of the Han people will never be forgiven. Alas! When a virtuous person reaches this point, listening is futile, and prohibition is impossible; what then can be used to govern him? It is said: I have heard that sages wrote books with virtue, and ancient people wrote books with talent. Knowing that sages wrote books with virtue, one understands that the Six Classics are all the dregs of the sages' teachings; readers should value their spiritual understanding and not merely nitpick over words and phrases to claim to be engaged in classical studies. Knowing that ancient people wrote books with talent, one understands that all schools of thought expound their essence; readers should quickly discard them and not pick up scraps to claim subtle insights. As for those who can spiritually understand the books of the sages, I know that only now will I dare not write a commentary on the I Ching, a commentary on the Book of Documents, a commentary on the Book of Poetry, a commentary on the Book of Rites, or a commentary on the Spring and Autumn Annals. Why? I am truly ashamed of my lack of virtue and fearful of the inadequacy of my writing, both of which greatly offend the sages' hearts. As for those who truly dare to abandon the works of various schools, I know that only now will they refuse to write an expanded version of Zhuangzi, a sequel to Sao, a post-historical work, a pseudo-poem, or a new version of anecdotal writings. Why? I am truly ashamed of my inadequacy, yet I merely engage in a torrent of criticism; this truly makes me a slave to the ancients. If the water cannot be cooled, it is better not to add fuel to the fire; if avoiding the shadow only increases the shadow, it is better to teach one not to chase after it. When a wicked person writes a book and presents it with the virtues of a sage and the talents of an ancient person, it is because those who study under a sage find it difficult to speak, and those who observe the works of a talented person find it difficult to write. This is also the way of stopping the pursuit of knowledge. However, the virtue of a sage is truly beyond the reach of ordinary people; and since it is beyond the reach of ordinary people, it is something I, a mere youth, dare not attain today. The talents of the ancients, however, may be comparable to those of ordinary people; and since they are comparable to those of ordinary people, it is something I, a mere youth, cannot presume to reach. The talents of the ancients are not passed down through generations, nor can they be matched by one another. Zhuangzi had his talents, Qu Yuan had his talents, Sima Qian had his talents, Du Fu had his talents, and so on, down to Shi Nai'an and Dong Jieyuan. Talent, in this context, refers to material ability. The ability to pierce the clouds and obscure the sun originates from the breaking of the pit and the separation of the pod; in the process of breaking the pit and separating the pod, one possesses the power to pierce the clouds and obscure the sun; in the process of piercing the clouds and obscuring the sun, one does not deviate from the power of breaking the pit and separating the pod—this is what is meant by material ability. The word " 才" (cái) also refers to "to tailor" or "to design". One may have a complete brocade in hand but not a complete brocade before the eyes; one may not have a complete garment before the eyes but a complete garment in the mind; one can know the sleeves by seeing the collar; one can know the shawl by seeing the lapel. The collar is not the sleeve, and the lapel is not the shawl, yet they complement each other, front and back, seemingly separate, yet perfectly combined. This is the meaning of " 裁" (cái). People today only know that talent enables one to conceive ideas but they don't know that the ancients used talent after conceiving ideas; they only know that talent enables one to establish a framework but they don't know that the ancients used talent after establishing a framework; they only know that talent enables one to polish sentences but they don't know that the ancients used talent after polishing sentences; they only know that talent enables one to write words but they don't know that the ancients used talent after writing words. This is even a debate with caution. Those who say that talent enables one to conceive ideas, establish a framework, polish sentences, and write words are people who outwardly never boast of their masterpieces, nor inwardly have ever endured hardship. They casually put pen to paper, thinking themselves right but they don't know that their so-called talent is not the talent of the ancients. It is precisely something they cannot do with their hands yet are ashamed of in their hearts. To speak of talent that extends beyond the initial conception, to the arrangement, refinement, and placement of words—this is a person whose brush has left and right strokes, whose ink has right and wrong strokes; if the left brush is unsatisfactory, switch to the right; if the right brush is unsatisfactory, switch to the left; if the right ink doesn't appear, switch to the wrong ink; if the wrong ink doesn't appear, switch to the right ink; wherever the mind goes, the hand follows; wherever the mind doesn't go, the hand also goes; wherever the mind doesn't go, the hand also doesn't go. When the mind and hand both reach the pinnacle of literary achievement, that is the sacred realm of writing. When the mind and hand both reach the pinnacle of writing, that is the divine realm of writing. When the mind and hand both don't reach the pinnacle of writing, that is the transcendent realm of writing. If an article lacks both heart and hand, it is merely a blank page devoid of words, sentences, structure, and thought. Only those who can command the attention of countless generations to read my writing possess a profound and clear understanding, a well-defined structure, resounding sentences, and vibrant words. This is because, when the pen touches the paper, the writing flows naturally, not a sudden and abrupt event. Therefore, according to the world's definition of talent, one who writes easily is a talented person; according to the ancients' definition of talent, one who writes with difficulty is a talented person. The saying "writing easily" implies swift and spirited writing; the saying "writing with difficulty" implies a life-or-death struggle, a lifeless face. Therefore, the works of Zhuangzi, Qu Yuan, Sima Qian, Du Fu, as well as Shi Nai'an and Dong Qichang, all exemplify the saying that one's heart and breath were exhausted, and one's face was like that of a dead man, before one's talent flowed freely and was finally able to complete a book. The brilliance of Zhuangzi, Qu Yuan, Sima Qian, and Du Fu is such that it needs no further discussion. As for Shi Nai'an's work, it too must have reached the point of exhaustion, with his heart and breath exhausted and his face like that of a dead man, before his talent flowed freely and was finally able to complete a book. Only then can we know that the ancients were not careless in their writing. Yet, people of the world still refuse to assess their own abilities and give up writing prematurely. Therefore, such people are truly not worthy of execution, and their works are truly not worthy of burning. As a commoner, I have no power to forbid anyone from writing books. Yet, I suddenly take a book from a swineherd, break it down into sections, and manage to prevent any unwritten books from being written, and render all existing books obsolete. This is a feat that even the sage marvels at, a feat of purifying the world, more miraculous than the fire of Qin. Hence, in the first chapter, I outline the general rise and fall of ancient and modern classics. Though I dare not call myself a hero of literature, I am but a small part of the effort that sealed the gates.

2

Those who observe things judge by their names; those who discuss people discern their intentions. Shi Nai'an, in his novel Water Margin, wrote about Song Jiang, deeming him utterly despicable and utterly repulsive, completely unlike any other Chinese writer. Yet, later generations, driven by some insatiable troublemaker, mistakenly attributed this to "loyalty and righteousness." Alas! Is loyalty and righteousness truly found in Water Margin? Loyalty is the highest virtue in serving superiors; righteousness is the great principle in governing subordinates. Loyalty in serving superiors, righteousness in governing subordinates—this is the quality of a prime minister. Loyalty is the great way to treat others; righteousness is the good way to conduct oneself. Loyalty in dealing with others, righteousness in dealing with oneself—this is the way of a sage. As for the "Water Margin" mentioned by Nai'an, it means that there is water on the shore of the king's land, and what is outside the water is called "Margin," which means to keep away from it. Keeping away from it means that it is a vicious thing in the world, something that the world should attack; it is a hateful thing in the world, something that the world should abandon. If loyalty and righteousness existed in "Water Margin," would loyalty and righteousness be vicious and hateful things in the world? Moreover, if there is loyalty and righteousness in "Water Margin," does the state lack loyalty and righteousness? A ruler is still a ruler, and a minister is still a minister; how can there be no loyalty and righteousness in the state? Although this is a criticism of the minister's words, it is difficult to explain to my ruler. A father is still a father, and a son is still a son; how can there be no loyalty and righteousness in the family? Although this is a criticism of the son's words, it is difficult to explain to my father. Therefore, those who write "Water Margin" with loyalty and righteousness must have a heart that opposes their ruler and father, and this cannot be ignored. And what about Song Jiang and his 108 companions? Why did they end up in Water Margin? In their youth, they were all like jackals and tigers; in their prime, they were all capable of murder and robbery; later, they were all victims of cruel punishments; and in their final days, they were all thieves who raised poles and chopped down trees. If a true ruler were to rise up and execute them, even a thousand or ten thousand would be happy. How could they have escaped the axe and chopping block of the Song Dynasty? Those 108 who managed to escape the Song Dynasty, who knows how many hundreds of thousands or even millions of others might try to repeat their fate in later generations? Nai'an was worried about this, so he wrote the biography Water Margin, intending that while the 108 might escape execution upon their own death, they could not escape exile afterward—this was the will of a virtuous man. And yet, to presumptuously bestow loyalty and righteousness upon them—should this be a warning or an exhortation? Jackals and tigers are described with the eyes of auspicious beasts and majestic phoenixes; murderers and thieves are praised as Boyi and Yan Yuan; those with mutilated features are honoured with the purity of the upper class; those who raise poles and cut down trees are lauded as loyal and obedient. Since their names and realities contradict each other, and their right and wrong are distorted to such an extreme, then almost no one in the world or future generations should regard them as lofty figures but only Song Jiang and his 108 companions, whom they aspire to emulate! Therefore, judging from Nai'an's Water Margin, it is like the historian's Taowu, fully recording the external cunning and the internal evil, so as to punish the already dead hearts of those who came before, and to prevent future generations from having such hearts. Judging from today's version of "The Water Margin," it is no different from Song Jiang's scheme of recruiting others and Wu Yong's claims. "No evil goes to the court, no beauty goes to the outlaws"—this is something that thieves would be proud to read, and even non-thieves would become thieves upon reading it. Alas! Names are the outward manifestation of things; wills are the outward manifestation of people. If names are unclear, I doubt the book; if wills are not upright, I doubt the person. To omit "Loyalty and Righteousness" while retaining "Water Margin" is a small matter in preserving Nai'an's book but a great matter in preserving Nai'an's will. Although I am a minor official, I have the worries of my time. If future generations of respectful and prudent gentlemen can understand my will, perhaps they will not change my words!

3

Shi Nai'an's Water Margin consists of seventy volumes in the main text, plus one volume of the prologue, and the original preface is also in one volume, totaling seventy-two volumes. Now I will explain the bow to you. Preface: When I was ten years old, I entered the village school and, as was customary, read books such as the Great Learning, the Doctrine of the Mean, the Analects, and Mencius but I was completely confused. I often whispered to my classmates: What is the purpose of studying these books? I also saw adults reciting them all night long, and they seemed to enjoy it very much but I didn't know what they found enjoyment in. I also wondered how many books there were in the world, and what they all said, and whether they were all the same. I could never understand these things. Next year I will be eleven years old, and I will often be slightly ill. When I am sick, I must ask for leave from school. Since I am not fond of playing, and the adults forbid me from playing, I will only use books for communication. The first book I read was the Lotus Sutra. Next, I read Qu Yuan's Li Sao. Next, I read Sima Qian's Records of the Grand Historian. Next, I read a popular version of Water Margin. These were all discoveries made during my illness at the age of eleven. Li Sao has many unfamiliar characters, and although I like it, I don't understand it very well, only memorizing one or two lines to recite. I understand more about the Lotus Sutra and Records of the Grand Historian but my courage is not strong enough, and I will never be able to read them. As for the book I keep in my arms day and night, I can say that I have no problem with Water Margin.I often see fathers and elder brothers in this world who forbid their children from reading any books, nor do they ever introduce them to any adults or teachers. This is a grave mistake. When a son is ten years old, his mind begins to develop. If he is not allowed to read all kinds of books and has other interests, and is not allowed to be among adults and teachers, it is tantamount to driving him to associate with servants. When you were five years old, I allowed you to sit in a corner. Now that you are ten, I am giving you this book not because I spoil you but because this is the proper way to teach you. I still remember reading Water Margin at the age of eleven, after which I developed an insatiable thirst for knowledge. I have never actually seen a book and yet understood it perfectly; that is the only truth. But reflecting on it now, this is certainly not wrong. Of all the writings in the world, none surpasses Water Margin; of all the gentlemen who investigate things, none surpasses Mr. Shi Nai'an. If a scholar can truly purify his mind and investigate things, and thus develop brilliant writing, wouldn't he be a pillar of the literary world? However, simply being able to read Water Margin well is already more than enough to qualify him as a person. The novel Water Margin narrates the lives of 108 characters, each with their own temperament, character, appearance, and voice. If one were to draw several faces with one hand, one would inevitably depict brothers; if one were to blow several sounds with one mouth, one would inevitably produce two spitting sounds. Shi Nai'an, with his single-minded focus, managed to create 108 characters, each exquisitely rendered. This is because he spent ten years meticulously studying things, achieving a single moment of profound understanding. Thus, he could depict hundreds of thousands of people with a single stroke of the brush that was not difficult for him. There is a method to investigating things that you should know. The method of investigating things takes loyalty and forgiveness as its gate. What is loyalty? All things in the world arise from causes and conditions; therefore, loyalty need not be learned, for it is naturally present in the world, and there is no law that is not loyal. Fire is loyal, eyes are loyal, therefore my perception is loyal; bells are loyal, ears are loyal, therefore my hearing is always loyal. Since I am loyal, then people are loyal, thieves are loyal, dogs and rats are loyal. Even thieves, dogs, and rats are not without loyalty; this is what is meant by forgiveness. Only then can things be investigated, only then can human nature be fully realized, and only then can we assist in the creation and nurturing of things, and participate in the workings of Heaven and Earth. People of this world, as I know them, first and foremost do not understand the law of dependent origination. Without understanding dependent origination, they do not understand loyalty. Without loyalty, how can they understand forgiveness? It is like fathers who have two children yet cannot understand themselves. They say to their wives: "Eyebrows are eyebrows, eyes are eyes, noses are noses, mouths are mouths, yet the elder child is not the younger, and the younger child is not the elder. Why is this?" They do not realize that they and their wives have created this situation together. The husband does not understand his children, so he asks his wife. The reason is that through the causes and conditions of husband and wife, their children are born. There is no greater loyalty in the world than that between husband and wife; there is no greater loyalty in the world than that towards one's children. If one understands this principle and sees the faces of all people in the world, and observes the affairs of husband and wife, how can one not understand the myriad differences in their relationships? Loyalty and forgiveness are the measures that measure all things. The laws of cause and effect are the tools that cut the world. Shi Nai'an holds such measures in his left hand and such tools in his right, yet he only describes the temperament, character, appearance, and voice of 108 characters—this is merely a small test. If his writing has its own rules for words, sentences, chapters, and sections, what difference is there? I enjoy reading Water Margin, and at the age of twelve, I obtained an ancient copy from the Guanhua Hall collection. I copied it day and night, correcting my own errors, and after four, five, six, seven, or eight months, the task was completed, and this is the copy I have now. This is not my method of reading Water Margin; Water Margin itself is the method of reading all books. I once heard someone say that Zhuangzi's writing is unrestrained, while the Records of the Grand Historian is magnificent. At first, I agreed but now I suddenly laugh. People of all times and present are talking to the blind; they are truly ignorant, merely causing children's stomach aches! How could Zhuangzi's writing be unrestrained? How could the Records of the Grand Historian be magnificent? They probably don't understand what Zhuangzi is saying but only see his sudden mentions of fish transformations and ox butchering, unable to find the root cause, and thus consider it unrestrained; they only see that the Records of the Grand Historian mainly records the struggle between Liu Bei and Xiang Yu, and other events mostly involve revenge killings and acts of loyalty, and thus consider it magnificent. If one truly reads it using the method I use to read Water Margin, then one can say that both Zhuangzi's and the Records of the Grand Historian are precise and rigorous. Not only that but all the books in the world that are truly intended to be preserved in famous mountains and passed down to future generations are meticulously written. What is meant by meticulousness and rigor? It means that each character has its own rules, each sentence its own rules, each chapter its own rules, and each section its own rules. If one were to mix Zhuangzi's writing with the Records of the Grand Historian, it would not resemble the Records of the Grand Historian; conversely, if one were to mix Zhuangzi's writing with the Records of the Grand Historian, it would not resemble Zhuangzi. This is because Zhuangzi intended to expound on the Way of the Sages, while the Records of the Grand Historian merely expressed his resentment. Their intentions differed, and they could not work together; this is a natural consequence and not surprising. However, if we set aside the arguments within and focus solely on the underlying sentiment, then only Zhuangzi could have written the Records of the Grand Historian, and only Zichang (Zhuangzi) could have written the Zhuangzi. How do I know this? I know it from reading the Water Margin.Even the most minor art of writing has its merits, and our Party, though outstanding, still needs refinement. Throughout history, the greatest sages and worthies have all used their writing to glorify themselves. Take the Analects, for example—is it not the subtle words of Confucius, a pure and concise collection of texts? Yet, those skilled in discussing the Way discuss the Way, and those skilled in discussing literature discuss literature. I have observed their composition, and how exquisitely wonderful it is! In the chapter "Learning," the phrase "Isn't it so?" is uttered three times; in the chapter "Sighing over the Gu," the character "Gu" appears four times, while the rest contain only one "not" and two "how." "When substance prevails over form, it is rustic; when form prevails over substance, it is pedantic"—these are the interplays in their writing; "Those who know it are not as good as those who love it, and those who love it are not as good as those who delight in it"—these are the principles passed down. The movement and stillness of mountains and rivers, joy and longevity, are like the opposite growth of trees; "Zilu asked about what he had heard, and that's how he acted" is like the frequent beating of the morning drum. Other works cannot be listed exhaustively but they are all generally excellent. The Zhuangzi and the Records of the Grand Historian are each considered unparalleled for millennia, and people throughout history have marveled at their origins. But in my own view, how could they possess such versatility? They merely use a few chapters to expand upon and extend the ideas, drawing parallels to other works. The novel Water Margin recounts the lives of 108 people, all of whom are outlaws, and their deeds are nothing more than robbery and murder. They are morally corrupt and lack integrity, truly beyond redemption. However, I wish to disregard their outward appearances and instead focus on their underlying principles. This book, with its seventy chapters and hundreds of thousands of words, is quite lengthy. Yet, to grasp its essence is like examining a passage or two from the Analects—clear and bright, serene and insightful, serene and refreshing. Is it not comparable to the works of Zhuangzi and Records of the Grand Historian? Otherwise, how could it be so? If one insists on scrutinizing their outward appearances, then half of the fifteen sections of the Airs of the States are filled with licentious and vulgar content; nineteen out of ten of the records in the Spring and Autumn Annals are about murder. Have we not heard of those who abhorred the gods' treachery and thus abandoned the Yu Tripod, or those who hated the Taowu and thus executed Yi Xiang? This principle is perfectly clear and easily understood. Alas! At the age of ten, a person's senses begin to develop, like the sun rising in the east, shining brightly. Even if I wanted to forbid you from seeing such a book, how could I? Now I know I cannot forbid it, and I have instead taken out my old annotations and readily handed them to you. I have always believed that the writing of Water Margin is exquisite and rigorous, and that reading it is the key to reading all books. If you truly master this method, and after you finish your studies next year, you can use it to read all the books in the world, and it will be as easy as splitting bamboo. Only then will you truly appreciate that Shi Nai'an's Water Margin is the essence of literature. Otherwise, you will only be like a child skimming the surface. This would not only be a disservice to Shi Nai'an but also a great disservice to me. Think about this; how can I not feel overwhelmed?

February 15th, the 14th year of Emperor Chongzhen's reign

Foreword

A Chinese man should not marry after 30 years of age; should not enter the government service after the age of 40; should have no more children after the age of 50; and should not travel after the age of 60. This is because the proper time for those things has passed. At sunrise, the country is bright, fresh, and you dress, wash, and eat your breakfast but before long, it is noon. Then you realize how quickly time passes. I am always surprised when people talk about other people's ages, because what is a lifetime but a small part of a much greater period? Why talk about insects when the whole world is before you? How can you count time by years? All that is clear is that time passes, and all the time there is a continual change going on. Some change has taken place ever since I began to write this. This continual change and decay fills me with sadness. What excites pleasure in me is the meeting and conversing with old friends. But it is very galling when my friends do not visit me because there is a biting wind, or the roads are muddy through the rain, or perhaps because they are sick. Then I feel isolated. Although I myself do not drink, yet I provide spirits for my friends, as my family has a few fields in which we grow millet. In front of my house runs a great river, and there I can sit with my friends in the shadow of the lovely trees. I have four old women to do the cooking and household affairs, and 10 small boys also who act as messengers. And when they have nothing to do they fill up their spare time in making brooms and mats. If all my friends came there would be 16 but because of the weather, there are seldom more than six or seven here. When they come, they drink and chat, just as they please but our pleasure is in the conversation and not in the liquor. We do not discuss politics because we are so isolated here that our news is simply composed of rumours and it would only be a waste of time to talk with untrustworthy information. We also never talk about other people's faults because in this world, nobody is wrong, and we should beware of backbiting. We wish to injure no one and therefore our conversation is of no consequence to anyone. We discuss human nature about which people know so little because they are too busy to study it. My friends are all broad-minded, and well educated but we do not keep a record of our conversations. The reason for this is

1. We are too lazy and do not aspire to fame
2. Talking gives us pleasure but to writing would give trouble
3. None of us would be able to read it again after our deaths, so why worry
4. If we wrote something this year, we should probably find it all wrong the next year.

I have written these seventy chapters of the Water Margin just for my own pleasure after my friends had left, or when they had not turned up owing to the weather. I have had no preconceived plan but have jotted these items down just as they occurred to me, sometimes when sitting outside near the bamboo fence, or at early dawn when lying on my couch in pensive mood. But someone may ask, "As you did not write down your friends' conversations, why have you written this book?" To which I reply because: I have

1. only done this to fill up my spare time and give pleasure to myself
2. written it so that the uneducated can read it as well as the educated
3. Used this style of composition because it is such a trifle.
4. It is just a hotchpotch and cannot make me famous or even discredit me

Alas! Life is so short that I'll not even know what the reader thinks about it but still I'll be satisfied if a few of my friends will read it and be interested. Also, I don't know what I may think of it in my future life after death because then I may not be able to even read it. So why think anything further about it?

Shi Nai'an/Jin Shengtan

How to Read *the 5th Book of Genius

01. When reading a book the first thing to be taken into account is the state of mind of the author when he wrote it. For example, the Shih- chi [Records of the Historian] was the product of Ssu-ma Ch'ien's [b. 145 B.C.] bellyful of stored-up resentment.1 Therefore he poured [his emotions] into the writing of the collective biographies of the knights- errant and the money-makers.2 Even in the other biographies, whenever he comes to accounts of great generosity or assassination, he cannot stop his exclamations of admiration. The whole Shih-chi can be summed up by the phrase "people all have their moments of crisis,"3 and this is the main concern of Ssu-ma Ch'ien's lifetime of writing. The Shui-hu chuan, on the other hand, is a different matter. Its author, Shih Nai-an,4 had no bellyful of stored-up resentment he needed to let out.5 Well-fed, warm, and without anything else to do, carefree at heart, he spread out paper and picked up a brush, selected a topic [t'i-mu JS @], and then wrote out his fine thoughts and polished phrases [chin-hsin hsiu-k'ou $S<L>$I P]. Therefore his judgments do not go against those of the sages.6 People of later times7 were unaware of this and went so far as to add the characters for "loyal" [chung ,¾] and "righteous" [i j|] to the title and considered its writing to be similar to Ssu-ma Ch'ien's writing of the Shih-chi to express his resentment [fa-fen chu-shu !$111¾ H]. This is precisely what ought not to be done.

02. The Shui-hu chuan contains substantial sections of serious writing but the author hates Sung Chiang with a passion and portrays him so that, on seeing him, readers will scorn him as much as if he were a piece of meat that neither dog nor swine would come near. However, this is something others have not noticed up to now.

03. The reason the Shui-hu chuan singles out Sung Chiang for detesta tion is because it intends to destroy the chief rebel. The rest [of the rebel band] are forgiven.

04. Someone may ask: "When Shih Nai-an was looking for a topic [t'i-mu Ü @ ] on which to write out his fine thoughts and polished phrases, there were all the topics in the world available to him. Why did he go and choose this one?" The answer is: "He was tempted by the fact that just as there are thirty-six major heroes,9 there are thirty-six different personalities [hsing-ko t£f6]. Out of these a fine story could be concocted [chieh-chuan]."

05. The topic [t'i-mu S @] is the most important thing when writing a book. As long as the topic is a good one, the book will be well done.

06. Someone may ask: "How about the topics [t'i-mu S @] of books such as the Hsi-yu chi [The Journey to the West] and the San-kuo yen-i [The Romance of the Three Kingdoms]?" The answer is: "Neither of them is any good. In the standard history of the Three Kingdoms period [220-80] there are too many characters and events and too much conversation. The author's pen cannot move or turn at will. It is just like an official sending a message through his attendant. The latter can only use his voice to transmit what he has been told. Indeed, how dare he add or subtract a word? The Hsi-yu chi, on the other hand, is too fantastic. The author just made it up paragraph by para graph. It is like setting off fireworks on New Year's Eve—they explode one group after another with no connecting link [kuan-ch'uan] between. When we read it, we can stop at any place."

07. All the literary devices used in the Shui-hu chuan are taken from the Shih-chi, yet the former surpasses the latter in many places. As for the very best aspects of the Shih-chi, they can all be found in the Shui-hu chuan.

08. When you read a book, you should widen and deepen your range of vision. For example, if you take them in at a single glance, the 71 chapters of the Shui-hu chuan that cover more than two thousand pages, really constitute a single composition. The various events and devices in those pages are used as methods to begin [ch'i J§], continue [ch'eng 7^], change direction [chuan ft], and sum up [hop] the composition. However, if read over too drawn out a period of time, these devices cannot be detected by the reader.

09. The Shui-hu chuan was not written carelessly. We need only note that Sung Chiang's name does not appear until chapter 1710 to realize that the author must have thought the matter over more than a hundred times. If the book had been written carelessly, then Sung Chiang would certainly have been treated from the beginning in chapter 1 but then the text would be nothing but a straightforward accounting, with no play in it.

10. I have said that the Shui-hu chuan is superior to the Shih-chi but nobody believes me. Really, I wasn't talking nonsense. The truth is that in the Shih-chi words are used to carry events [i-wen yun-shih], while in the Shui-hu chuan events are produced from the words [yin-wen sheng-shih HJ χ it (J]. When you use words to carry events, you first have events that have taken place in such-and-such a way, and then you must figure out a piece of narrative for them. To use words to produce events, on the other hand, is quite different. All you have to do is follow where your pen leads. To cut down what is tall and make tall what is short is all up to you.
11. The author of the Shui-hu chuan was a man of surpassing intelligence. As for his book, it is going to portray 108 bandits, yet it begins with the portrait of a filial son as a frontispiece [men-mien]. This is the first proof of the author's surpassing intelligence. Of the 36 bandits who are incarnations of heavenly stars and the 72 bandits who are incarnations of earthly stars, it is 3 earthly stars who are the first to become bandits. Clearly, this shows that they are acting against the will of Heaven. This is the second proof. The chief of the bandits is Sung Chiang, yet the author purposely does not let him take this position right away. Instead, he creates Ch'ao Kai to "cover" [kai li] him. This is proof number three. Both the heavenly and earthly stars are relegated to a secondary position and are not allowed to appear at the very beginning. This is proof number four. The book ends with the words "peace under Heaven." This is the fifth proof of the author's surpassing intelligence.
12. The words "stone tablet" [shih-chieh 5£ig] appear three times and each occurrence marks a major section of the Shui-hu chuan.
13. The Shui-hu chuan does not talk about ghosts, spirits, or other strange and exotic matters. This is where its power surpasses other books. In the Hsi-yu chi, whenever the author is at a loss as to what to do, the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin of the Southern Seas comes to the rescue.
14. The Shui-hu chuan does not contain literary language particles like chih 5L,hu^,che^i, and yeh ^b,.18 Each individual character is made to speak in his own individual way. This is truly marvellous skill!
15. For every character who appears in the Shui-hu chuan a clear-cut biography [lieh-chuan] is provided. As for the events contained within them, each section further forms an independent unit in itself. Sometimes two or three chapters will form such a unit. Sometimes it takes just five or six sentences.
16. Other books you read through once and stop but one never tires of reading the Shui-hu chuan because it succeeds completely in describing the different personalities [hsing-ko t£f#] of all 108 people.
17. When the Shui-hu chuan describes the personalities of 108 persons, there are truly 108 different personalities. In other books, the people they describe all look the same, be they as many as a thousand or as few as two.
18. In the Shui-hu chuan each chapter has its principle of organization [chang-fa $?£], so does each sentence [chii-fa ^¾¾] and each word [tzu-fa]. As soon as a young person can read a little, he should be taught to read the book carefully over and over again. If he can appreciate all the fine points in the Shui-hu chuan, reading other books will be as easy as splitting bamboo.
19. The account of the rescue of Sung Chiang from the execution ground in Chiang-chou is already extremely unusual,20 but later on there is the account of the rescue of Lu Chiin-i from the execution ground in Taming fu which is even more unusual.21 The account of Pan Chin-lien's adultery with Hsi-men Ch'ing is already extremely unusual,22 but later on there is the account of P'an Ch'iao-yiin's adultery with P'ei Ju-hai which is even more unusual.23 The account of Wu Sung's fight with the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge is already extremely unusual,24 but later on there is the account of the killing of the tigers at the I River by Li K'uei which is even more unusual.25 Truly, the author's genius is unfathomable.
20. The rescue of someone from an execution ground, adultery, and fighting with tigers are all extremely difficult topics [t'i-mu H @]. One almost feels that there is no way to begin. Yet the author was not only undaunted, he even insisted on giving two accounts of each.
21. The Hsuan-ho i-shih !3¾¾^ [Anecdotes from the Hsiian-ho Reign Period] records the names of all thirty-six major heroes. We can see then that these thirty-six people did exist. We must be aware however, that many events within the seventy chapters were made up out of thin air [p'ing-k'ung tsao-huang] by the author. Yet, after read ing the seventy chapters we have become acquainted with the thirty-six characters. Just mention any one of them, and we feel we have known him well for a long time. Such is the power of the author's pen!
22. Of the 108 heroes, Wu Sung must be rated as belonging to the upper-high [shang-shang _h_h] category of character.27 Shih Ch'ien and Sung Chiang, being the same sort of person, must both be rated as belonging to the lower-low [hsia-hsia TT] category of character.
23. Lu Chih-shen is of course a character of the upper-high [shang- shang _h_h] category. He is shown to have an honest heart and an imposing physique. As for roughness, he is indeed a little rough. As for meticulosity, he is also quite meticulous. Yet, for some reason I feel that there are many places where he is not the equal of Wu Sung. IfLu Chih- shen is already a pinnacle among men, then Wu Sung must simply be a heavenly god, standing high above the others.
24. Just in the description of rough men alone, the Shui-hu chuan uses many methods of description. For example, the roughness of Lu Chih-shen is that of a man of hasty temperament, that of Shih Chin the impulsiveness of youth, that of Li K'uei wildness; the roughness of Wu Sung is that of an untrammelled hero; the roughness of Juan the Seventh comes from his pent-up sorrow and anger; and the roughness of Chiao T'ing is simply his bad temper.
25. Li K'uei is a character of the upper-high [shang-shang _h_h] cate gory. He is shown as a creature of great simplicity without a speck of guile in his body. It would seem that in his eyes none of the other 107 leaders in the mountain lair are worthy of his approval. Mencius's saying, "Wealth and honour cannot lead him to immoderation, poverty and obscurity cannot change his purpose, external authority cannot force him to kneel down."29 applies to him exactly.
26. It seems that in writing a composition, one must first have in mind a reason [yiian-ku Hc #t] for writing. If there is a reason behind it, no matter what one writes about, it will turn out to be excellent writing. If there is no reason behind it, there is no way to write. Even if one can produce something, it will be as dry and unpleasant as chewing wax.
27. Just take the portrayal of Li K'uei. Isn't it true that every episode about him is absolutely marvelous writing? Yet few notice that all these episodes come right after events dealing with Sung Chiang, and this is why they are so unspeakably marvelous. Because the author vehemently hates Sung Chiang's deceitfulness, after each episode about him there always follows another one about Li K'uei's guilelessness to form an unflattering contrast [hsing-chi )& Ψ]. Although the author's purpose was to reveal the wickedness of Sung Chiang, he has unexpectedly brought out the wonderfulness of Li K'uei. This is like stabbing with a spear—your main purpose is to kill someone, and yet in the process you display the technique of your school of spear fighting.
28. Recently, there was someone who did not grasp the author's intention in pairing Sung Chiang and Li K'uei. He selected out all the passages about Li K'uei into a separate volume called Shou-chang wen-chi MIU^M [The Collected Writings of the Magistrate of Shou-chang]. He indeed can be said to be one who eats human excrement—not a very good dog.
29. In the portrayal of Li K'uei, every feature is incomparable. The author truly possesses a most natural [hua-kung ^c X] and lifelike [hsiao- wu fi| %/] style. Leaving aside the rest, just consider the fact that Li K'uei has an elder brother Li Ta and thus must be the second eldest in his family. However, all his life he insists on calling himself Li the First. Not until an emergency arises and he must change his name does he finally call himself Li the Second.31 You might say he is quick-witted but stop and think how foreign such matters really are to him.
30. Even a truly great and heroic man can sometimes be induced by money to agree to something. Only Li K'uei cannot be bought by any amount of silver. You must wait until he is willing to do the thing of his own accord. He is truly in a class by himself.
31. Lin Ch'ung is, of course, a character belonging to the upper- high [shang-shang] category but he is made to appear too ruthless. He can anticipate, he can endure, he can control himself firmly, he can do things thoroughly; all this makes one afraid of him. Such a person will certainly be able to make his way in the world but he will also harm his physical constitution a great deal.
32. Wu Yung must be considered an upper-high [shang-shang _h_h] character. He is as tricky as Sung Chiang but he has a more upright heart than Sung does.
33. Sung Chiang relies solely on trickery to get people to do his bidding but Wu Yung's direction of the band's efforts is out in the open and aboveboard. He is appropriate as a military commander.
34. The difference between Wu Yung and Sung Chiang is that the former is willing openly to call himself the "Star of Wisdom" [chih-to hsing] while the latter always speaks of himself as sincere and unrefined.
35. Sung Chiang thinks that he has Wu Yung in the palm of his hand when actually it is Wu Yung who has Sung Chiang under his thumb. Both know this within their hearts, and yet on the outside both pretend not to know anything of it. Truly fascinating writing!
36. Hua Jung naturally belongs to the upper-high [shang-shang] category. He is portrayed as being so cultured and refined!
37. Juan the 7th belongs to the upper-high [shang-shang] category. He is shown to be of an altogether different complexion from the rest. Of the 108 characters, he must be considered the most straightforward. He thinks straightforwardly and speaks straightforwardly. Meeting up with him, all pollution melts away.
38. Both Yang Chih and Kuan Sheng are of the upper-high [shang- shang _h_h] category of character. Yang Chih is portrayed as the scion of an old family, while Kuan Sheng is presented as the veritable incarnation of Kuan Yu.
39. Ch'in Ming and So Ch'ao are both characters of the middle-high [shang-chung] category.
40. Shih Chin can only be ranked in the middle-high [shang- chung _h φ] category because the second part of his story is not well done.
41. The author expended a lot of effort on Hu-yen Cho but he is only a character of the middle-high [shang-chung Ji φ] category.
42. Lu Chiin-i and Ch'ai Chin are only characters of the middle- high [shang-chung _h Φ ] category. In the story of Lu Chiin-i, the author has done his best to create the image of an heroic man of social standing. In the end, however, Lu Chiin-i is not without a certain awkwardness. It's like painting a camel—although it is an imposing creature, when we look at it we feel that it is not very handsome. Ch'ai Chin doesn't have anything to recommend him except his hospitality.
43. Between Chu T'ung and Lei Heng. Chu T'ung comes off better but both are just in the middle-high [shang-chung _t.f$>] category of characters.
44. Between Yang Hsiung and Shih Hsiu, Shih Hsiu comes off better. While Shih Hsiu is in the upper-middle [chung-shang φ Ji] cate gory of characters, Yang Hsiung can only be placed in the lower-middle [chung-hsia] category.
45. Kung-sun Sheng is just an upper-middle [chung-shang φ Ji] char acter, functioning only as a reserve player.
46. Li Ying is just a character of the upper-middle [chung-shang φ J;] category. This ranking, however, is based on considerations of status and precedence, not on how he is actually portrayed.
47. Juan the Second, Juan the Fifth, Chang Heng, and Chang Shun are all upper-middle [chung-shang φ Ji] characters, as are Yen Ch'ing, Liu T'ang, Hsu Ning, and Tung P'ing.
48. Tai Tsung is a lower-middle [chung-hsia ΦT] character. Except for his ability to travel at superhuman speed, he doesn't have anything else to recommend him.
49. I hate those young people who, when they read, ignore the art of writing itself. As long as they can remember a few incidents from the book, they consider themselves to have read it. Since even the Chan-kuo ts'e IkH ñÏ [Intrigues of the Warring States]34 and the Shih-chi are passed over as nothing but collections of incidents, how much more so is this the fate of the Shui-hu chuan?
50. The Shui-hu chuan contains a lot of literary devices that cannot be found in other books. In what follows, I will point out just a few of them.
51. Advance insertion [tao-ch'afa #JjfjjE]. This means that things or people that will be important in a later part of the book are inconspicu ously inserted into the narrative ahead of the place where they take on real importance. Examples of this are the first mention of the Father and Son Inn next door to the smithy in the village at the foot of Mt. Wu- t'ai,36 [the first mention of] the vegetable garden of the Great Hsiang- kuo Monastery adjacent to the Temple of the Eastern Peak,37 P'an Chin- hen's mention of going with Dame Wang to see the tiger,38 and Li K'uei's recruitment of T'ang Lung into the band when he was out buying dates.
52. Simultaneous narration [chia-hsiifa 3*ξ|£ïE]· This means that two people in great haste want to speak at the same time. It cannot be that after one has finished speaking, the other then begins. The author must write the speeches with one stroke of the pen [so that they seem to be simultaneous]. For example, in the Wa-kuan Monastery Ts'ui Tao-ch'eng says, "Calm down, Brother Monk, and let me ..." and Lu Chih-shen says, "Out with it! Out with it! Speak!"
53. Snake in the grass or [discontinuous] chalk line ["ts'ao-she hui-hsien fa" ^¾¾¾¾¾]-41 Examples of this are the frequent mention of the word "club" [shao-pang B$#] when Wu Sung crosses Ching-yang Ridge,42 and the continual appearance of the word "curtain" [lien-tzu Mir] in the passages set [in Pan Chin-lien and Wu Ta's home] on Amethyst Street.43 Read in haste, there seems to be nothing there but a closer look reveals a connecting thread [hsien-so !¾¾] which, if pulled, draws the whole sequence together.
54. Detailed and extended narration [ta lo-mofa ^cHi !1¾]. Examples of this are Wu Yung's persuasion of the three Juan brothers,44 Yang Chih's contest in arms in the Northern Capital [Ta-ming fu],45 Dame Wang's persuasion of Hsi-men Ch'ing.46 Wu Sung's fight with the tiger,47 the besieging of Sung Chiang in Huan-tao Village,48 and the second attack on the Chu Family Village.
55. Needles wrapped in cotton and thorns hidden in the mud ["mien- chen ni-tz'u fa" !¾!!ifS'iJft]. One example is Sung Chiang's refusal to take off his cangue when asked to do so by Hua Jung.50 Another example is that each time Ch'ao Kai wants to leave the mountain lair, Sung Chiang exhorts him not to but the last time he doesn't do this. From somewhere beyond the actual words comes a sharp knife which sticks into its target.
56. Whitening the background to bring out the foreground ["pei- mien p'u-fen fa" #tBMI&ft]· For example, in order to set off Sung Chiang's deceitfulness, the author unobtrusively portrays Li K'uei's straightforwardness; and to set off Shih Hsiu's sharpness, he unobtru sively portrays Yang Hsiung's dullness.
57. Displaying the bait [nung-yinfa #3!¾]. This means that when there is an important section of writing it is best not to start in abruptly; rather, a passage of minor interest should be used to lead into it. For example, before Yang Chih fights So Ch'ao he first fights Chou Chin. Before Dame Wang lays out the ten-step plan for seducing P'an Chin- lien, she first enumerates the five prerequisites for the successful seducer. The Chuang Tzu U^p says, "The wind begins at the tips of the green duckweed and becomes strong at the mouth of the big cave."54 The Li- chi it IB [Book of Rites] states, "When the people of Lu want to make sacrifice to Mt. T'ai, they must first make sacrifice to the P'ei Woods."
58. The otter's tail [t'a-weifa SiJiS]. At the end of an important section things should not come to a sudden stop; rather, after-ripples [yti- po ^¾] from the main story are used to bring about a gradual tapering off [yen-yang 2¾¾]. For example, after Imperial Delegate Liang returns from the tournament held outside the eastern city wall, the magistrate of Yüη-ch'eng hsien, Shih Wen-pin, presides in his yamen.56 After Wu Sung kills the tiger, he meets two hunters [dressed in tiger skins] on his way down the ridge.57 Again, after the massacre in the Hall of the Mandarin Ducks, there is the mention of the moonlight over the moat around the city wall.
59. Direct repetition of topic [cheng-fan fa IEiES]- For example, after the account of Wu Sung's fight with the tiger, there are accounts of Li K'uei's killing of four tigers and of the quarrel between the two Hsieh brothers and the Mao family over a tiger.59 After the story of Pan Chin- lien's adultery with Hsi-men Ch'ing, there is that of P'an Ch'iao-yun with P'ei Ju-hai.60 After the rescue of Sung Chiang from the execution ground at Chiang-chou, there is that of Lu Chiin-i in Ta-ming fu. After the account of Ho T'ao's attempt to capture the robbers, there is that of Huang An's trying to capture the same robbers.62 After the story of Lin Ch'ung's exile, there is that of Lu Chun-i's exile.63 Also, after the release of Ch'ao Kai by Chu T'ung and Lei Heng, there is the release of Sung Chiang by the same pair.64 This means that the author, for his amusement, deliberately repeats [fan 2E] the topic [t'i-mu g @] and yet has the ability not to borrow any detail or stroke from the previous treatment. Truly, he is bursting with methods and techniques.
60. Incomplete repetition of topic [liieh-fanfa 8¾¾¾]. Examples are Lin Ch'ung's purchase of a sword followed by Yang Chih's selling of a sword,65 the parts played by the urchins T'ang Niu-erh and Yun-ko, the beating of Butcher Cheng in his butcher shop and the beating of "Door God" Chiang in K'uai-huo Forest.67 and Lu Chih-shen's trying out his monk's staff at Wa-kuan Monastery and Wu Sung's trying out his monk's dagger on top of Centipede Ridge.
61. Extreme avoidance of narrative frugality [chi pu-sheng fa ffi?f< iSS]· For example, in order to make Sung Chiang commit a crime, the author first arranges to put the gold into his document bag. Prior to this, he sets up Yen P'o-hsi's affair with Chang Wen-yiian, and even before that he mentions Sung Chiang's taking of Yen P'o-hsi as his concubine and his donation of a coffin to the Yen family. However, all of these things are not part of the main story.
62. Extreme narrative frugality [chi shengfa 8¾¾]. For example, after Wu Sung is given a hero's welcome in Yang-ku hsien, he runs into Wu Ta, who just happens to have moved into the same town.70 Another example is Sung Chiang's eating fish soup at the Lute Pavilion and suffering an upset stomach for several days on end.
63. Introducing new twists into the narrative just as you are about to bring it to a close ["yii-ho ku-tsung fa]. For example, after the rescue boats under Li Chun, the two Chang brothers, the two T'ung brothers, and the two Mu brothers have already arrived at the White Dragon Temple, Li K'uei wants to fight his way back into the city.73 After both Chao Neng and Chao Te have left the Temple of the Dark Goddess of the Nine Heavens in Huan-tao Village, soldiers trip on the root of a tree and call out.74 The reader is thus given an extra fright at the end of the narrative sequence.
64. Clouds cutting the mountains in half ["heng-yiin tuan shan fa" íí β iff UJ ft]· For example, after the second attack on the Chu Family Village, there is suddenly inserted the story of Hsieh Chen and Hsieh Pao's quarrel with Squire Mao over the carcass of a tiger and their subsequent jailbreak. Another example is that during the siege of Taming fu there is suddenly inserted the episode of the robbery and murder committed by "River Hopping Devil" Chang Wang and "Slippery Loach" Sun the Fifth.76 This is because when an episode is too long, it may seem tiresome [to the reader]. Therefore the author inserts a passage into the middle of the episode so as to separate it into two parts.
65. Joining a broken zither string with glue ["luan-chiao hsii-hsien fa]. For example, on his way to Liang-shan-po to inform Sung Chiang of Lu Chiin-i's arrest, Yen Ch'ing comes upon Yang Hsiung and Shih Hsiu. The two parties do not know each other. Moreover, since they are travelling on out-of-the-way roads between Liang- shan-po and Ta-ming fu, how could they happen to be on the same road? The author casually brings about the first coincidence by using Yen Ch'ing's shooting of the magpie with his lucky arrow to divine the fate of his master to lead him to Yang Hsiung and Shih Hsiu. Then Yen Ch'ing fells Shih Hsiu with one blow of the fist and Yen Ch'ing's name is revealed in the ensuing tussle. All this is meticulously planned.
66. Formerly when young people read the Shui-hu chuan, they learned many irrelevant matters from it. Although the punctuation and com mentary [tien-yueh WiKj] of my edition is only rough and incomplete, after the young people read it, they will have learned many literary devices. They will not only know that there are numerous literary devices in the Shui-hu chuan, they will also be able to detect even the literary devices in the Chan-kuo ts'e and the Shih-chi. Formerly, when young people read the Chan-kuo ts'e and the Shih-chi, they would only pay attention to the irrelevant matters. This is really laughable.
67. The Shui-hu chuan is, after all, only a work of fiction. Young people are anxious to read it. Once they have read it, unexpectedly it will cause them to learn a number of literary methods.
68. Once young people have learned these literary methods, they will want to read without stopping such works as the Chan-kuo ts'e and the Shih-chi. The benefit of the Shui-hu chuan to young people is great.
69. Formerly, the Shui-hu chuan was read even by peddlers and yamen runners. Although not a word has been added or subtracted in this version, it is not destined for petty people. Only those with refined thoughts and feelings can appreciate it.

How to Read the Plum in the Golden Vase

01. The author has invented [p'i-k'ung chuan-ch'u] the three characters [whose names make up the title], P'an Chin 4¾ -lien, Li P'ing Si-erh, and Ch'un-met fa. Notice how he brings them together into one place and then disperses them again. In the first half [ch'ien pan- pu M ^fP] of his work the focus is on P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh but in the second half [hou pan-pu 'i£¥3] it is on Ch'un-mei. In the first half Hsi-men Ch'ing manages, by hook and by crook, to obtain for himself the gold [Chin ife-lien] and the vase [P'ing St-erh] that had belonged to other men; but in the second half the plum blossom [Ch'un-mei Ig] which was his to begin with falls easily into the hands of another man.
02. The action begins in the Yü-huang miao [Temple of the Jade Emperor]I and ends in the Yung-fu ssu [Temple of Eternal Felicity], and both these temples are introduced in the first chapter.3 These two are places of pivotal importance [kuan-chien ch'u] in the book.
03. First Wu Shen-hsien [Wu the Immortal] surveys Hsi-men Ch'ing's household at its height,4 then Huang Chen-jen [His Holiness Huang] sustains it somewhat in its decline,5 and finally Master P'u-ching purges the sins of the main characters.6 The way in which these episodes are correlated [chao-ying MM] is highly significant.
04. Wu Shen-hsien's mirrorlike forecast of the fates of the members of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household7 is a kind of summation [chieh-shu !¾¾] but Ch'en Ching-chi is conspicuously absent. P'an Chin-lien is not pre sent when her fellow ladies lightheartedly have their fortunes told by means of the tortoise,8 but she makes good the deficiency by what she says when she comes on the scene immediately afterward,9 so she is not really left out. It is only Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'un-mei who are not included here but Li P'ing-erh's two appearances in Hsi-men Ch'ing's dreams!0 supply the missing data for him. It is not until Ch'en Ching-chi is physiognomized by Yeh T'ou-t'o [Yeh the Ascetic].11 however, that his final fortune is foretold.
05. Before introducing P'an Chin-lien,12 the author introduces Li P'ing-erh.13 Only after Hsi-men Ch'ing takes P'an Chin-lien into his household14 does the author introduce Ch'un-mei.15 However, before Hsi-men Ch'ing takes P'an Chin-lien into his household, he first marries Meng Yii-lou.16 Again, before Hsi-men Ch'ing takes Li P'ing-erh into his household,17 the author introduces Ch'en Ching-chi.18 The skill with which these elements of the plot are dovetailed [ch'uan-ch'a % g] cannot be described in words. But the way in which the author goes on to weave in [chia-hsieh ^M] the stories of Sung Hui-lien, Wang Liu-erh, Pen the Fourth's wife, Ju-i, and the rest only demonstrates once again that he has mastered the creative skills of Heaven [t'ien-kung ^ X] itself.
06. Those who really know how to read the Chin P'ing Mei appreciate the second half [hsia pan-pu F^8|5], yet it is also only those who really know how to read it who prefer the first half [shang pan-puh]· You can only understand this after having fully savored scenes, of which there are too many to enumerate, such as those where the play about Han Hsiang-tzu's quest for his uncle, Han Yii, is performed!9 and where the song "Alas! Life Is like a Dream" is called for20 during the celebrations that mark the birth of Kuan-ko and Hsi-men Ch'ing's appointment to office.

07. The Chin P'ing Mei exhibits certain regular structural devices ["pan-ting ta chang-fa" $2¾!^¾¾?¾]. For example, whenever P'an Chin- lien gets angry about something, the author arranges to have Meng Yii-lou at her side. This is done without any variation each time and is a seasoned stylistic technique [chang-fa lao-ch'u #5¾¾]¾]. Another example is the way that every time Hsi-men Ch'ing is about to go out drinking at someone else's place, some guest or official turns up for a visit and he has to delay his departure in order to entertain him. This is a major structural device [chang-ja 5¾] used in the chapters after the birth of Kuan-ko and Hsi-men Ch'ing's appointment to office.
08. Each of the hundred chapters of the Chin P'ing Mei is constructed by means of the structural device of juxtaposing two episodes [liang-tui chang-ja], so that there are two hundred episodes in all. How ever, there are some chapters in which the transition [kuo-chieh j$t[5] between the two episodes is effected by means of a single expression, while there are others in which the two episodes are mortised [kuo-hsia] by a hidden tenon [sun]. For example, Chao Yiian-t'an's tiger performs this function in chapter 1. There are some chapters in which the two episodes are further sub divided, the author narrating the first half of the first episode, shifting to the first half of the second, then going back to finish off the first, and only then going on to complete the second episode. There are some chapters in which the two episodes are completely intermingled [san-wu ts'o-tsung, and there are some in which the treatment of other matters is inserted into the narration of the two main episodes. In short, the two episodes form the framework [t'iao-kan] of each chapter. If you savor carefully the way in which they are handled from one chapter to another, you will know what I mean.
09. It is true that two episodes are juxtaposed [tso-tui fFff] in every chapter of the Chin P'ing Mei but there are also cases of episodes in different chapters that parallel each other at a distance [yao-tui 'MM]- Examples of this include the parallel episodes [tut ff] of P'an Chin-lien playing the p'i-p'a22 and Li P'ing-erh playing elephant chess23 and the paired episodes [tui ft] of the hiding of the wine pot24 and the theft of the gold bracelet.25 I could go on but there are too many to enumerate fully.
10. In the first half [ch'ien-pan ItJ^] of the book, the motif of "cold" [leng ] is repeated so effectively that one can hardly bear to read on whereas in the second half [hou-pan] the motif of "heat" recurs but is not readily apparent to the reader. In the first half the motif of "cold" occurs where the greatest "heat" is being described. If you savor these passages you will know what I mean. The way that the motif of "heat" occurs in the second half can be seen in the description of Meng Yii-lou's visit to Hsi-men Ch'ing's grave where the author provides an elaborate description of the beauties of spring on the Ch'ing-Ming Festival.
11. In this book there are examples of the most dubious and un important characters who nevertheless play significant roles, such as Han Ai-chieh. Innumerable women appear in the work but why does the author choose to end it with the example of Han Ai-chieh's integrity? He has a profound reason for doing so. Han Ai-chieh's mother, Wang Liu-erh, becomes a prostitute, and Han Ai-chieh herself, after her return from the Eastern Capital, also engages in this profession,28 but as soon as she becomes interested in Ch'en Ching-chi, she remains faithful to him until death.29 If we compare this with the way in which Li P'ing-erh and Ch'un-mei treat their husbands, Hua Tzu-hsii and Chou Hsiu, it cer tainly puts them to shame. If we compare P'an Chin-lien's conduct after meeting Hsi-men Ch'ing with that of Han Ai-chieh after meeting Ch'en Ching-chi, we see that she is unfaithful first with Ch'in-t'ung,30 later on with Ch'en Ching-chi,31 and finally even with Wang Ch'ao,32 so that she is not even the equal of a repentant prostitute. Thus the author concludes [chieh] his book with Han Ai-chieh in order to put to shame the other female characters and to emphasize the contrast between a repentant prostitute who can preserve her integrity and those who not only fail to correct their faults while living in luxury but, abandoning all integrity and shame, go unrepentant to their deaths.
12. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei we must pay attention to the significant features of the spatial setting [ta chien-chia ch'u ^:^1¾¾]. These include the location of P'an Ch'in-lien and Ch'un-mei in one place and Li P'ing-erh in another and the placing of all three of them in the single larger setting of the front garden. The fact that P'an Chin-lien and Ch'un-mei are placed together accentuates the isolation of Li P'ing-erh. The fact that P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh live close to each other in the garden allows their jealousy to flourish, while the fact that Wu Yiieh-niang lives far removed from them gives Ch'en Ching-chi his chance to get at P'an Chin-lien.
13. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei we must pay attention to the points at which one element in the narrative is used to lead into another [ju-sunch'u AloiS]- For example, the theme of slaying a tiger is introduced [ch'a-ju SA] amid the joking in the Yu-huang miao.33 The fact that Hua Tzu-hsu is Hsi-men Ch'ing's next-door neighbour is introduced when he is proposed for membership in the brotherhood.34 In chapter 8, when P'an Chin-lien is suffering from the heat, during her tirade at Tai- an the information that Hsi-men Ch'ing has taken Meng Yu-lou into his household is introduced.35 Li Kuei-chieh is brought out [ch'a ch'u jgtB] when Hsi-men Ch'ing asks Ying Po-chueh where he has been the last few days.36 Ch'en Ching-chi's establishment of intimacy with P'an Chin- hen is introduced on the occasion of the completion of the summer- house.37 Wang Liu-erh's submission to Hsi-men Ch'ing's demands is introduced as a result of Chai Ch'ien's request for a concubine.38 Li P'ing-erh's pregnancy is introduced in the course of her bout with Hsi- men Ch'ing in the Fei-ts'ui hsiian [Kingfisher Pavilion].39 The origin of Li P'ing-erh's illness is introduced with the trial of the Indian monk's medicine.40 The monk P'u-ching is introduced into the story as a result of the events in the Pi-hsia kung [Temple of the Goddess of the Iridescent Clouds].41 Li Kung-pi is introduced on the occasion of the visit to Hsi- men Ch'ing's grave,42 and the first indication that there is anything going on between Tai-an and Hsiao-yu is introduced when he is sent home for the fur coats.43 Such examples of the author's ability to accom plish his aims without leaving a trace are innumerable. This is due to the skill with which he employs indirect [ch'u-pi ¢^] and unexpected [ni-pi j^^] techniques to tell his story. He is not willing to start a new narrative thread [t'ou-hsti M^] from scratch or to use direct [chih-pi S^] or straightforward [shun-pi HH H] techniques to tell his story. There is no end to the separate narrative threads in this book, and if each of them were started from scratch, one could not even count them. When I take up my brush I also try to use indirect and unexpected techniques but, unlike the author, I am unable to be indirect [ch'u ft] without leaving traces or to be unexpected [fit 5¾] without tipping my hand. This is what makes his book so marvellous.
14. There are many episodes in the Chin P'ing Mei in which the clandestine activities of some of the characters are disclosed [p'o-chan] to others. For example, Hsi-men Ch'ing's sexual intercourse with Pan Chin-lien during the funeral service for her husband is overheard by the monks outside the window;44 P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'in- t'ung is discovered by Sun Hsueh-o, and the even more incriminating perfume sachet that P'an Chin-lien has given him is also found on Ch'in-t'ung's person; P'an Chin-lien discovers Hsi-men Ch'ing's secret assig nations with Li P'ing-erh over the garden wall46 and stumbles upon Sung Hui-lien's affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing;47 Li P'ing-erh's remarks in the Fei-ts'ui hsiian are overheard by P'an Chin-lien,48 but her own antics in the grape arbour are witnessed by T'ieh-kun; no sooner does Hsi- men Ch'ing accept the bribe of stolen goods from Miao Ch'ing than he incurs the wrath of the regional inspector;50 no sooner does Wu Yiieh- niang implore the aid of the magistrate in her suit against Ch'en Ching- chi51 than P'ing-an gives false testimony against her in the court of Wu Tien-en; immediately after P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'en Ching-chi is first consummated, Hsi-men Ch'ing actually touches the evidence without realizing it,53 and when Hsi-men Ch'ing burns moxa on Wang Liu-erh's pudendum, Hu Hsiu is an unseen witness to the scene.54 Exam ples of this kind are too many to enumerate. In general, the author uses this risky technique [hsien-pi] in order to show the predicaments to which human emotions can lead. But even more remarkable is the way in which he enables the characters whose clandestine activities are dis closed to cover their tracks with plausible alibis so that he does not have to waste his energy on tedious explanations. This is why his technique is so miraculous [hua-pi].
15. There are instances in the Chin P'ing Mei in which the author seems to have deliberately created episodes or characters that appear from nowhere and disappear for no apparent reason [wu-wei]. Shu- t'ung is an example. Who knows how much planning went into the author's creation of this single character? It goes without saying that he serves the purpose of depicting Hsi-men Ch'ing's depravity and poly morphous promiscuity but it is not so apparent that the author has created Shu-t'ung in order to prepare the ground for the departure of another character from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. What is the expla nation for this? Li P'ing-erh and Wu Yiieh-niang start out estranged but end up on intimate terms. Pan Chin-lien and Wu Yiieh-niang start out on intimate terms but end up estranged. Although the rift between them develops over the expulsion of Lai Chao and the banishment of Lai Wang, it need never have been as serious as it becomes when P'an Chin-lien throws her tantrum.57 This tantrum is precipitated by Yu- hsiao's willingness to repeat every word of Wu Yueh-niang's private conversation to P'an Chin-hen. Why should Yu-hsiao tell her everything? Because she has accepted her three conditions. Why does she accept these three conditions? Because P'an Chin-lien discovers her affair with Shu-t'ung.60 The author does not want to have to account for the affair between Yu-hsiao and Shu-t'ung from scratch at this point in the narative, so he describes the hiding of the wine pot and the ill will it engenders at an earlier point. But the reason why the author goes to such pains [yao-yao hsieh lai] is because he needs P'an Chin-lien to have her tantrum. Why is this? The [tantrum] episode is needed to account for the fact that when P'an Chin-lien has to depart from the household, Wu Yiieh-niang abandons her to her fate without the slightest regret and P'an Chin-lien's downfall is complete.62 How can anyone say that there is a single example of irrelevant [wu-wei] writing in the Chin P'ing Mei?
16. In the Chin P'ing Mei the author devotes serious attention to the description [cheng-ching hsieh] of 6 women, and of these he really concentrates on only 4, that is, Wu Yiieh-niang, Meng Yii-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh. But he describes Wu Yiieh-niang only because of the requirements of the plot [ta-kang JzM] and uses different techniques to depict Meng Yii-lou because she is a person of superior gifts who resents her unjust neglect. Thus he describes Wu Yiieh-niang only because he has to and is unwilling to describe Meng Yii-lou the way he does his other characters. Neither one of them is given full treatment [cheng hsieh JEM]- The full treatment is reserved for Li P'ing-erh and Pan Chin-lien. But again, he describes Li P'ing-erh by what he does not say about her that is to say, he describes her while keeping his focus [hsieh-ch'i] elsewhere. This is because the focus of his description is always on P'an Chin-lien. Because he always concentrates [tan-hsieh WM] on P'an Chin-lien, it is no wonder that she emerges as the most vicious of all his characters. Such, indeed, is the awesome power of the writer's brush.
17. There are 2 characters in the Chin P'ing Mei to whom the author devotes special attention and whose final fates are also noteworthy: Ch'un-mei and Tai-an. While she is still only one of the maidservants, the author indicates in numerous passages that Ch'un-mei possesses a sense of self-esteem and ambition that sets her apart from the others. While he is still only one among the many menservants, Tai-an is described by the author in passage after passage as being adept at pleasing people in everything he does. Why does the author insist on having Ch'un-mei become a lady of rank and Tai-an a man of wealth and position64 at the end of the book? In order that his novel on the theme of "heat and cold" (yen-liang l¾¾) should illustrate the reversal of fortunes [fan-an]. Notice how the other characters can only see that the Ch'un-mei before them is merely a maidservant—they have no idea that later she will become a lady of rank. Notice how they only see that the Tai-an before them is merely a manservant—they have no idea that later he will become a man of wealth and position. When their status changes, not only do others look upon Ch'un-mei and Tai-an in a new light and pay court to them, even Wu Yiieh-niang has to look on them differently, treating Ch'un-mei as her social superior and placing herself under Tai-an's protection after the decline of the Hsi-men family. Of what utility then is judging people according to transitory social status [yen-liang]? The author's acupuncture [chen-pien] uses satiric barbs instead of regular needles. In order to make the later reversal of their fortunes plausible, the author must first demonstrate the special qualities of Ch'un-mei and Tai-an.
18. What need does the author have for the characters Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsiieh-o? He uses Li Chiao-erh to imply that even before Hsi- men Ch'ing meets P'an Chin-lien or Li P'ing-erh he is already a dissolute wastrel who is capable of any crime. In his treatment of P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh, he describes certain of Hsi-men Ch'ing's crimes in full [shih-hsieh MM], whereas in his treatment of Li Chiao-erh he describes others of Hsi-men Ch'ing's crimes by implication [hsu-hsieh f&M]- If the crimes that are actually described are as bad as they are, those that are not portrayed leave us free to wonder how many other indescribable crimes he has committed in the past. How deep is the author's hatred of Hsi- men Ch'ing! As for Sun Hsueh-o, why should the author devote the space he does to this person of humble origins whose status is only that of a maid servant who has been seduced by her master? This is an example of the author's Bodhisattva-like compassion. How could the retribution [pao St] due a character as vicious as Hsi-men Ch'ing be complete without his wife's becoming a prostitute?67 But since the author has already decided to handle Wu Yiieh-niang in a different way, he certainly could never bring himself to reduce her to this. Meng Yü-lou is an innocent victim of Hsi-men Ch'ing's depravity, so the author could scarcely endure to expose her to any additional suffering for the sake of punishing Hsi-men Ch'ing. Li Chiao-erh is a prostitute to begin with. Li P'ing-erh is destined to play a role in Hsi-men Ch'ing's retribution while he is still alive. As for Pan Chin-lien, not only does she have a nemesis of her own but even if she were to become a prostitute, it would not harm Hsi-men Ch'ing and might even be beneficial to P'an Chin-lien, who would probably be nothing loath. How could this be called retribution? Thus the author describes Sun Hsueh-o as being reduced to prostitu tion68 in order to accentuate the retribution visited upon Hsi-men Ch'ing and at the same time unobtrusively to bring to a conclusion [an- chieh Bf |8] the case of Sung Hui-lien.69 As for the subsequent incidents involving Chang Sheng and Ch'en Ching-chi, they are merely dictated by the exigencies of the plot [ch'ing yin wen sheng fa] and represent an expedient tidying up [sui-shou shou-shih] of loose ends. Otherwise how could Sun Hsiieh-o's life as a prostitute be brought to a conclusion [chieh-kuo]?
19. Li Chiao-erh represents the role of money [ts'ai in the realm of sex . This is apparent from the fact that she takes charge of the household accounts71 and that she lines her pockets before leaving the household. Wang Liu-erh represents the role of sex in the realm of money. When she meets with Hsi-men Ch'ing she is always talking about business deals,73 getting maidservants and houses,74 fixing up things for Miao Ch'ing,75 and so forth, all of which profitable subjects are broached by way of sex
20. The author needs Sung Hui-lien in his book in order to bring out as completely as possible the viciousness of P'an Chin-lien. This early trial of her powers against Sung Hui-lien foreshadows what she does later on out of jealousy of Li P'ing-erh. How can we see this? When Sung Hui-lien succeeds in attracting her master's attentions, it is P'an Chin-lien who first becomes aware of it,76 just as it is she who first catches sight of Ying-ch'un pretending to call the cat as a signal for Hsi-men Ch'ing's assignation with Li P'ing-erh.77 How does P'an Chin- lien's willingness to send Ch'un-mei with a brazier to warm the grotto for Hsi-men Ch'ing and Sung Hui-lien78 differ from her urging Hsi- men Ch'ing to take Li P'ing-erh into his household and offering to share her quarters with her for the time being?79 How do her apparent willing- ness to forgive Sung Hui-lien when she kneels and throws herself upon her mercy and all the other tricks by which she keeps the upper hand over her80 differ from her pretending to be drunk when Li P'ing-erh first enters the household and saying to her, "Now we walk together on the same path"?81 How does her double-tongued troublemaking between Sun Hsüeh-o and Sung Hui-lien82 differ from her telling tales about Li P'ing-erh to Wu Yüeh-niang?83 To make a long story short, Lai Wang's narrow escape from death84 and the needless suicide of Sung Hui-lien are both P'an Chin-lien's doing. The author times this subplot to coincide with Li P'ing-erh's entry into the household for the express purpose of providing her with a warning but she does not realize her danger and actually befriends P'an Chin-hen. How fitting that disaster should not be long in overtaking her and that she should suffer the fate of which she has been so clearly forewarned [hou-ch'e chungfu]. This episode that I interpret as an early trial of her powers, greatly accentuates P'an Chin-lien's viciousness but the author has also created here a cautionary example [yang-tzu] for those who do not know how to keep danger at a distance. If you read this episode inattentively you may think that it describes nothing more than Hsi-men Ch'ing's having another affair with the wife of one of his servants. But Hsi-men Ch'ing is a man who kills husbands in order to take their wives and money, protects servants who have killed their master,87 and puts the law of the land up for sale, so the author scarcely needs to create [chuan ft] this episode merely to add another item to the roster of his crimes. The reader, however, is often deceived by the author.
21. Why does the author in the later part of his narrative depict the relationship between the wet nurse Ju-i and Hsi-men Ch'ing? This is also clearly directed against P'an Chin-lien, for it demonstrates that her successful elimination of Sung Hui-lien and Li P'ing-erh has been an exercise in futility. How can we see this? When Sung Hui-lien dies, P'an Chin-hen is delighted but then Kuan-ko is born and Li P'ing-erh wins Hsi-men Ch'ing's favour.89 When Kuan-ko dies90 and Li P'ing-erh follows him to the grave,91 P'an Chin-hen is again delighted; but before she knows it, the fragrance of Ju-i's cosmetics attracts Hsi-men Ch'ing's attention by the very side of his dead favourite's spirit tablet.92 Every time P'an Chin-lien eliminates a rival another comes to take her place. No matter how good she may be at maintaining her lover's favour and gaining the upper hand, what can she do in the face of a situation like this but acknowledge the futility of her efforts and retire from the field? Thus the author's portrayal of Ju-i is really a means of getting at P'an Chin-lien and of expressing the indignation he feels on behalf of Sung Hui-lien and Li P'ing-erh.
22. But why does the author devote space to the various singing girls such as Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Ai-yueh? They serve the purpose of demonstrating the insatiability, frivolity, and vulgarity of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh are purposeful duplications [t'e-fan] of P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh, respectively, demonstrating that by taste and affinity the latter pair are indistinguish able from prostitutes and that though they may never have actually engaged in that trade, their wantonness and depravity are such that they not only show the same proclivities as prostitutes but will go even further than they do. The author portrays Cheng Ai-yueh in yet another way—as fragrant, smooth, and soft—in order to bring out the un relieved boorishness of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who is depicted by contrast [fan-ch'en] as being incapable of fully appreciating even the refinements of a high-class whore.
23. Why has the author created Wang Liu-erh, Pen the Fourth's wife, and Lady Lin? These three characters are depicted in different ways and serve different purposes. The depiction of Wang Liu-erh is solely in tended to illustrate the theme that money [ts'ai] commands sex [se]. If you observe the lengths to which she goes to ingratiate herself with Hsi-men Ch'ing when he is alive and the alacrity with which she absconds with his property as soon as he is dead,94 you will see that in the relationship between them, Hsi-men Ch'ing is using money to seek sex and Wang Liu-erh is using sex to seek money. Hsi-men Ch'ing's death follows upon a visit to Wang Liu-erh.95 so that in the end he finds both sex and money to be empty [k'ung 0]. When Wang Liu-erh subse quently meets Ho Kuan-jen, she ends up using sex to seek money just as before.96 Indeed, though sex can move people, it is no match for money which can be used anywhere for any purpose and is loved by everyone. Thus the author does not conclude \chieh |g] the story of Wang Liu-erh, who symbolizes the lust for money, until his last chapter. The author has created Pen the Fourth's wife as a means of revealing Tai-an's character. He shows that Hsi-men Ch'ing, who seeks only to indulge his own insatiable desires, is unaware of the fact that the example he sets will be followed by his subordinates, who have already learned from him how underlings can take advantage of their masters. Thus, Tai-an's seduction of Hsiao-yii that eventuates in his marriage to her,97 is foreshadowed [fu-hsien {£&!] in his relations with Pen the Fourth's wife.98 You may say that Pen the Fourth's wife is used as a foil to depict [p'ei-hsieh $$M] Wang Liu-erh but this is a subsidiary function. As for Lady Lin, she serves as a vehicle for expressing the incalculable resentment the author feels in his heart for P'an Chin-lien. Not only does he have her murdered and mutilated," but he is not satisfied until he has damned even the household in which she got her start in life and the persons who taught her to be what she is. How can we see this? P'an Chin-hen is sold as a child into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang where she is taught to sing and dance.100 To argue that she is utterly devious and shameless from birth is not consonant with the doctrines that conscience is innate and that human nature is basically good. I am sure that she was not necessarily as dissolute as this at the age of three or four. During the time when she was a member of Imperial Commissioner Wang's establishment, if the male members of the house hold had shown respect for propriety and righteousness and the female members of the household had honoured chastity and integrity so that obscene words and deeds were neither to be heard nor seen, then, even if she had been dissolute to begin with, she would have been transformed into a chaste girl. How is it that this imposing imperial commissioner neither pacifies distant peoples in the name of the Son of Heaven nor proclaims the imperial majesty and virtue but, instead, when the ten- year-old daughter of a tailor enters his household, devotes his leisure time to teaching her how to paint her face with cosmetics and encour ages her to put on airs. If he carries on like this with a lowly serving maid, the way he conducts himself with his legitimate wife can be imagined. How fitting that his son, Wang San-kuan, should be a good- for-nothing profligate and his own wife, Lady Lin, a dissolute adulteress. Who is there to blame but himself? But what the imperial commissioner teaches P'an Chin-lien results in incalculable harm to many people, from Wu Ta in the beginning to Hsi-men Ch'ing at the end. It is certainly fitting that the imperial commissioner's retribution [huan-pao 31¾] should come in the form of Lady Lin's adultery with Hsi-men Ch'ing. This is why I say the author has a profound hatred for P'an Chin-lien, a hatred that extends even to the household in which she got her start in life, and this is why he devotes attention to Lady Lin. But Chang Ta-hu also contributes to P'an Chin-lien's corruption, so why does the author neglect him? The answer is that it is his nephew, Chang Erh-kuan, who takes over Hsi-men Ch'ing's official post after the latter's death, and it is he whom Ying Po-chiieh persuades to take Li Chiao-erh into his household.103 Clearly, he is another Hsi-men Ch'ing who will suffer a similar indescribable retribution for his own sins. In this novel, undescribed but implied incidents ("pu cho pi-mo ch'u") occur without number. In the case of Chang Erh-kuan, the author has hidden another large book between the lines of his text [wu-pi ch'u]. This is an example of material implied but not directly written out on the page ["pi pu tao erh i tao"].
24. As for the depiction of Wu Yueh-niang in the Chin P'ing Mei, people all say that Hsi-men Ch'ing is lucky to have such a wife. They do not understand that the author describes Wu Yueh-niang's crimes in such a subtle way [yin-pi] that people do not realize what he is up to. How can we see this? A husband is the person whom a wife looks up to and depends upon for the remainder of her life. If her husband spent large sums of money on concubines in order to secure a male heir and Wu Yueh-niang raised no objections, this would truly be an ideal mar riage and she would be an exemplary wife. But Hsi-men Ch'ing murders husbands in order to steal their wives that is the conduct of a gangster. Now, when a husband engages in the conduct of a gangster and his wife does not tearfully remonstrate with him but instead neither expresses approval nor disapproval, treats him as a stranger whose welfare is no concern of hers, and regards her compliance as a virtue, can such an attitude withstand scrutiny? As for her relationship with Ch'en Ching- chi, the author goes out of his way to emphasize Wu Yueh-niang's responsibility for bringing the fox into the chicken coop.104 an act of indescribable folly. When she finally gets wind of her son-in-law's adul tery with Pan Chin-lien, she can think of nothing better to do than to keep the doors locked in the daytime.105 Afterward, when she drives Ch'en Ching-chi out of the household,106 sends his wife back to him, and agrees to sell Ch'un-mei to Chou Hsiu,108 she is merely adjusting her rudder to the wind without any convictions of her own. Moreover, her fondness for hearing Buddhist nuns recite pious texts and her in discriminate burning of incense are not proper activities for a wife to engage in. It follows from all this that the words "did not pay much attention to his studies"109 are the source of the complete ruination of both Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yueh-niang. How can we see this? If Hsi- men Ch'ing had adhered to the rules of propriety himself, he would have been able to mould his wife accordingly. But instead, merely because he pays no attention to his studies, Wu Yueh-niang, who has the capac ity for goodness, also ends up lacking any understanding of the dictates of propriety. Her everyday activities show no evidence of the protocol a wife should observe in her relations with her husband but only a lot of superficial gestures in that direction. Wu Yueh-niang is described as a woman with good intentions who is ignorant of propriety. But good intentions alone are not enough, for ignorance of propriety can lead to incalculable harm. IfWu Yueh-niang is ultimately responsible for Ch'en Ching-chi's evil deeds, how much worse might things have been if she were not even well intentioned? However, although it is Wu Yueh- niang who makes Ch'en Ching-chi's crimes possible, it is Hsi-men Ch'ing who must bear responsibility for having failed to set a proper example for his wife.
25. In the art of writing there is a mode of description characterized by the incremental repetition ["chia i-pei hsieh-fa" in] [of a motif]. This book excels at this type of incremental description [chia-pei hsieh]. For example, after describing Hsi-men Ch'ing's "heat" [je] the author goes on to describe that of the two censors, Ts'ai and Sung,110 then that of Grand Marshal Huang,111 then that of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, and finally the "heat" of the imperial court itself. This is the incremental repetition [chia i-pei in —fS] of [the motif of ] "heat." After describing Hsi-men Ch'ing's "cold" [leng ^] the author goes on to describe Ch'en Ching-chi in the Beggars' Rest.114 Grand Preceptor Ts'ai's exile,115 and finally the captivity of the emperors Hui-tsung and Ch'in-tsung.116 This is incremental repetition of [the motif of] "cold." In brief, the incremental repetition of [the motif of ] "heat" is used especially to show the way that "heat" of the sort Hsi-men Ch'ing attains is no rare thing but Hsi-men Ch'ing knows nothing but to rely on his wealth to commit crimes. The incremental repetition of [the motif of] "cold" is used precisely to show that "cold" of the sort Hsi- men Ch'ing experiences knows no limit but this is a point that Hsi-men Ch'ing himself fails to see.
26. The author insists upon describing Wu Yueh-niang as a pious Buddhist. Does the reader understand the reason for this? In his opening remarks the author enjoins us to purify our six senses.118 so we can anticipate that he will certainly conclude [chieh fp] his work by showing that the two words money [ts'ai M] and sex [se fe] are empty [k'ung 5]. But only a monk will do to exemplify the conclusion [chieh |pj that everything is empty. Hsi-men Ch'ing is not the sort of person to repent before his dying day, and after his death who is there to play this role? Even if Wu Yueh-niang, after her husband's death, were to dis regard the family property and take the tonsure, what would that have to do with the author's use of Hsi-men Ch'ing to exemplify Buddhist doctrine? Thus the only thing is to have Hsi-men Ch'ing himself take the vows. But how is one to get around the fact that he is already dead? The author, after some hesitation,119 arranges to have Hsiao-ko born at the very hour of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death,120 so that in the end he may repent and achieve deliverance.121 The author's mind is that of a Confu cian sage but he has taken the compassionate vow of a Bodhisattva in the hope that there should be no one in the world who conceals his faults to the end or fails to correct them. He hopes that even those who die unrepentant may be able to correct their faults in the life to come. What magnanimity and compassion the author shows for Hsi-men Ch'ing and how great are his efforts to admonish future generations! The author has this denouement [ta chieh-shu ^15¾] in mind from the outset but he does not want baldly to introduce Master P'u-ching all of a sudden at the end to spirit Hsiao-ko away without tying this into the rest of the narrative [wu-t'ou wu-hsii MMM^]- First, to do that would be to use a hackneyed narrative cliche [hsim-ch'ang k'o-chiu ^?¾¾¾].122 Second, the ending would then seem unconnected [t'o-lo 8¾¾] with the body of the text and would appear contrived [hen-chi 3¾¾]. Therefore he must depict the motif of Wu Yueh-niang's Buddhist piety off and on throughout his narrative so that it appears and disappears like a snake in the grass or a [discontinuous] chalk line [ts'ao-she hui-hsien ^¢6 #<§!]. He especially describes Wu Yiieh-niang's pilgrimage to the Pi-hsia kung in order to lead up to the scene in the Hstieh-chien rung [Snow Stream Cave], where he gives the reader a glimpse of P'u-ching.124 It is not until ten years later in the narrative that he brings them together again in the Yung-fu ssu, where all the major characters in the novel reappear in a phantasmagoria only to fade finally from sight, one after the other. Thus the biography [chuan ^] of each of the characters, all of whom are fated to suffer separation in this life and the next, is brought to a conclu sion [chieh |p]. This is the grand finale [ta chieh-shu] in which the myriad threads [ch'ien-chen wan-hsien T" ft Hit] of the author's narrative are all resolved and allowed to recede into the great void from whence they came. Thus, in depicting Wu Yiieh-niang's Buddhist piety the author is certainly not merely describing in a general way the everyday practices of a lay believer for the benefit of pious village women. The marvelous quality of this book lies in the skill with which the arteries that connect widely separated elements of the plot [ch'ien-li fu-mai] are concealed. The author never resorts to facile writing [i-an chih pi] or the use of elements for which connections [sun] have not been prepared. That is why the Ch'in P'ing Mei surpasses all other books.
27. It is also necessary to keep in mind that the author, in the course of his depiction of Wu Yiieh-niang's Buddhist piety, also unobtrusively [yin |§] describes the numerous secret plots and devious schemes of the three Buddhist nuns, such as inducing Wu Yiieh-niang to burn incense at night [as a means of effecting a reconciliation with Hsi-men Ch'ing] and procuring for her a drug to insure conception.127 There is nothing they will not stoop to. Thus, the author's description of Wu Yiieh- niang's Buddhist piety is also a means of depicting the darker side of her character. The reader should be aware of this.

28. Meng Yü-lou is the only major character in the book whom the author allows to come to a decent end.128 Why is this? She functions as a contrastive foil to Li P'ing-erh and P'an Chin-lien. After suffering the misfortune of the early death of her first husband, although she is unable to remain faithful to his memory, at least she lives in quiet seclusion and leaves it to a go-between to find her a match. When she enters Hsi-men Ch'ing's household although she may be open to criticism for her unseemly haste, this is a common occurrence among widows. She suffers grievously from her husband's neglect but bears it patiently and is willing to make the best of her fate. This is where her superiority to all the other women in the novel shows up. Ch'un-mei consistently gives herself airs, while Meng Yü-lou is consistently circumspect. Thus, it turns out that Ch'un-mei falls victim to her desires!30 whereas Meng Yu-lou, after undergoing a period of hardship, achieves long-lasting happiness.

29. The episode in which Ch'en Ching-chi goes to Yen-chou (in an abortive attempt to blackmail Meng Yü-lou) seems superfluous (she- tsu ¢£,¾) at first glance but in fact the author uses it for three purposes ("i-pi erh san-yung"). First, it provides the cause for Ch'en Ching-chi's sudden descent in the world to the point that he is forced to resort to the Beggars' Rest.132 Second, it prepares the way (fu-hsien f£ H) for the suicide of Ch'en Ching-chi's wife, the daughter of Hsi-men Ch'ing.133 Third, it demonstrates that Meng Yü-lou in her marriage to Li Kung-pi has really allied herself with an understanding mate whose lifelong companionship will make up for the three or four years of unhappiness she has endured in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing. How can we see this? The reason why Meng Yu-lou is unmoved by Ch'en Ching-chi's blandishments is that she is in love with her husband, and Li Kung-pi, in turn, would rather die than give up his wife. Can a love that one would rather die than forsake be anything but true love? It is clear that Meng Yü-lou will not have to complain of her husband's infidelities in her old age. If we take a look at Meng Yu-lou's attractive personality, it is clear that she is really a beauty of the first rank but Hsi-men Ch'ing remains infatuated by his prior conquest, P'an Chin-lien. Thus, the author's description of Meng Yii-lou is clearly intended to emphasize the fact that Hsi-men Ch'ing is a vulgar plebian who is only bent on slaking his lust but has no appreciation for true beauty.

30. When Meng Yu-lou enters Hsi-men Ch'ing's household she does so with full observance of the proprieties.134 If we compare this with the furtive way in which Hsi-men Ch'ing carries off P'an Chin-hen and his adulterous liaison with Li P'ing-erh, the difference is greater than that between Heaven and earth. These modes of matrimony also differ in what they portend of good and ill. Meng Yü-lou's marriage to Li Kung-pi is also arranged for and carried out with full observance of the proprieties.137 If we compare this to the way in which Li Chiao-erh departs the household after the haggling of the old bawd,138 Sun Hsüeh-o elopes by night with Lai Wang,139 and P'an Chin-lien is led away by Dame Wang without a farewell tear,140 the difference between the auspicious and the inauspicious is clear. Thus, the author has made a point pf depicting this true beauty in order to prove how incapable Hsi- men Ch'ing is of appreciating any refinement.

31. P'an Chin-Hen and Li P'ing-erh no sooner enter Hsi-men Ch'ing's household than they are subjected to humiliation,141 Meng Yii-lou is the only person in the household who is never criticized from beginning to end. Truly, the author had a point in doing this.

32. Hsi-men Ch'ing is an undiscerning scoundrel, Wu Yüeh-niang is an artful hypocrite, Meng Yii-lou is endearing. P'an Chin-lien is in- human, Li P'ing-erh is infatuated, Ch'un-mei is unruly, Ch'en Ching- chi is a frivolous nonentity, Li Chiao-erh is lifeless, Sun Hsiieh-o is stupid, Sung Hui-lien does not know her place, and Ju-i is a mere surrogate. As for the rest, Wang Liu-erh, Lady Lin, Li Kuei-chieh, and the like can scarcely be considered human. Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and company are utterly unconscionable, and Grand Preceptor Ts'ai and the censors, Ts'ai and Sung, might just as well never have been born.

33. Shih-tzu chieh [Lion Street] is the setting in which Wu Sung finally murders P'an Chin-lien to avenge his brother's death.142 It is there that Hsi-men Ch'ing almost loses his life!43 and that Hua Tzu-hsü also comes to grief not long afterward.144 Hsi-men Ch'ing frequents it [in order to carry on his affair with Li P'ing-erh] and later on Wang Liu-erh moves there on Hsi-men Ch'ing's account.146 P'an Chin-lien twice visits it to enjoy the Lantern Festival.147 The author uses this street to depict to perfection the way in which petty people, in their self- importance, indulge their evil desires while remaining oblivious to their ominous surroundings.

34. The Chin P'ing Mei is a veritable Shih-chi [Records of the Histo rian; by Ssu-ma Ch'ien, b. 145 B.C.] but the Shih-chi, though it contains both individual biographies [tu-chuan ®fl] and collective biographies \ho-chuan -n (#), treats each biography separately. The hundred chapters of the Chin P'ing Mei, on the other hand, constitute a single biography [chuan fif] in which hundreds of characters are treated. Though the pre sentation is discontinuous [tuan-tuan hsu-hsu WWWIWi\, each character has a biography of his own. Thus, it is obvious that the author of the Chin P'ing Mei could have written a Shih-chi. Since he has already ac complished a more difficult task, what difficulty would he have found in accomplishing an easier one?

35. I have often noticed that those who write commentaries [p'i #t] to any particular book often insist upon criticizing other books as a means of raising the status of the one they are concerned with. They do not realize that literature is in the public domain. The fact that one work of literature is marvelous does not prevent other works from being mar velous too. Ifl happen to appraise the marvelous qualities of a particular work, the marvelous qualities of other works do not eclipse the marvels of the one with which I am primarily concerned. If I were to write a work myself, I could not claim that once my work appeared, the other works in the world had ceased to be marvelous. Nor could I claim that there were not in the world any works more marvelous than mine. Why should one, then, when writing a commentary on any work, treat it as if it were one's own and feel the necessity to prove that no work in the world is its equal? This only reveals a selfish and narrow mind that would certainly be incapable of producing good writing. If one is in capable of writing well oneself, how can one comment on the good writing of others? When I say that it would have been easier to compose the Shih-chi than the Chin P'ing Mei, I refer to the fact that its component parts are presented separately [fen-tso 5"]¾] whereas those of the Chin P'ing Mei are integrated [ho-tso # I¾]. If Ssu-ma Ch'ien himself were to be reborn, I am sure that he would not say that I was being partial to the Chin P'ing Mei. I am not claiming that the Shih-chi is any less marvelous than the Chin P'ing Mei; yet the Chin P'ing Mei has succeeded in captur ing the marvelous qualities of the Shih-chi. The successes and failures of works of art can only be understood by the discerning. I confine myself to appreciating the marvelous qualities of the works with which I am particularly concerned. Why should I worry about whether the authors are ancient or modern, engage in debates on their behalf, or apologize for them?

36. The writers of novels never divulge their names, either because they have some axe to grind (yti-i in their works or because they contain covert references to real people. Since the authors have decided to abide by the principle of only speaking well of others without dwelling on their faults ("yin-e yang-shan chih pi" and conceal the real names of the people on whom their characters are modeled and since they choose not to divulge their own real names, why are men of later times so anxious to search for clues to the underlying reality and call every person by his right name? How petty such desires are! Moreover, hearsay in such matters is generally apocryphal and not to be taken seriously. To sum the matter up in a word: if the author had not had intense feelings he would never have written the book. If the persons whom he wished to describe duly make their appearance in his book but the author, who had such intense feelings about them, could not bring himself to name them explicitly, it would be the height of inanity for us, who have no such intense feelings ourselves, to insist on identifying them. Therefore I shall ignore the theory that Hsi-men Ch'ing was in- tended to represent Yen Shih-fan [1513—1565], whose style was Tung-lou (Eastern Tower) and whose childhood name was Ch'ing-erh. As for the person who wrote this book, I shall simply refer to him as the author. Since he did not choose to attach his name to the book, why should I try to second-guess him? Recently I saw a work called Ti-ch'i ts'ai-tzu shu [The Seventh Work by and for Geniuses: an edition of the P'i-p'a chi with commentary by Mao Lun and his son, Mao Tsung-kang which is full of speculation about Wang the Fourth. Although every commentator is entitled to his own views, I wonder if the time spent on these inconclusive speculations might not be better devoted to appreciation of the literary techniques embodied in the work. I merely record this here in order to make my position clear to my contemporaries.

37. The Shih-chi contains chronological tables and the Chin P'ing Mei is also full of specific dates. At the very outset it is stated that Hsi-men Ch'ing is twenty-seven sui. When Wu Shen-hsien physiognomizes him he is said to be twenty-nine sui.151 On his deathbed he is said to be thirty-three sui. But Kuan-ko is stated to have been born in the fourth year of the Cheng-ho reign period [1114], during the cyclical year ping- shen [1116], and to have died in the fifth year of the Cheng-ho reign period [1115], during the cyclical year ting-yu [1117]. Now if Hsi- men Ch'ing's son was born when he was twenty-nine sui during the cyclical year ping-shen [1116], he should have been thirty-three sui during the cyclical year keng-tzu [1120]. But Hsi-men Ch'ing is said to have died during the cyclical year wu-hsti [1118]. The death of Li P'ing-erh should also have taken place in the fifth year of the Cheng-ho reign period [1115] but is stated to have occurred in the seventh year of that period [1117].156 These are all places where the author has deliberately introduced incongruities [ts'en-tz'u chih ch'u # H: ,i JsS ] into the chronol ogy. Why has he done so? Because this book is different from other novels. The events of these three or four years appear to be accounted for day by day, hour by hour. We are told whether it is spring or autumn, cold or hot, that such-and-such a day is someone's birthday, that such- and-such a person is invited for a visit on such-and-such a day of such- and-such a month, that such-and-such a day is the day of a particular festival. AU elapsed time seems to be scrupulously accounted for. But if the author had arranged the chronology of these three to five years so that there would be no discrepancies whatever, his work would really have constituted no more than a daily record of the events in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, as some benighted critics have alleged. Thus the author has deliberately introduced discrepancies into the chronology. The multitudinous events of these three to five years of prosperity are brought vividly to life, day-by-day, and festival by festival. They are not mechanically [ssu-pan ?ES] strung together. Although they are arranged in order and you can tick them off one by one, they still have the power to dazzle the reader into feeling as though he has lived through each and everyday. This is marvelous writing. When skill reaches this level the miraculous plane [hua -ft] is reached. I dare not treat such a timeless literary masterpiece as just a work of ordinary fiction.

38. The hundred chapters of this work constitute a single chapter. Only if you expand your view until you can read it as a single chapter will you be able to appreciate its overall structure [ch'i-chin ch'u].

39. These hundred chapters were not written in a day but they were conceived on particular days at particular times. If you try to imagine how the author conceived of this wealth of individually structured episodes you will come to realize how much planning, interweaving [ch'uan-ch'a I?¾], and tailoring [ts'ai-chien Scli] was required.

40. If you read the Chin P'ing Mei as a description of actual events you will be deceived by it. You must read it as a work of literature in order not to be deceived by it.

41. If you read the Chin P'ing Mei as a work of literature by the author you will stiU be deceived by it. You must read it as though it were your own work in order not to be deceived by it.

42. Though you should certainly read it as though it were your own work it is even better to read it as a work that is still in its early planning stages. Only if you start out with the assumption that you will have to work out every detail for yourself in order to avoid being deceived wiU you avoid being deceived.

43. The prerequisites for a successful literary creation can be summed up in the two words emotion and reason [ch'ing-li]. The key to this long work of a hundred chapters is also only these two words, emotion and reason. If you can determine the particular mixture of emotion and reason in a character's heart you have captured the character. Though this character's speech may be mixed in with those of many others, whenever he opens his mouth, what he says will express his particular balance of emotion and reason. It is not that his emotion and reason are revealed only when he opens his mouth but that only after the author has determined his balance of emotion and reason is he able to open his mouth. Thus the process involved in depicting any number of characters is the same as that involved in depicting any one, and it is possible in this way to produce a work with the plenitude of this great hundred-chapter novel.

44. In the Chin P'ing Mei the description of seemingly unrelated events is often inserted [chia-hsu at points of high tension in the development of the plot. Thus, the episode in which Hsi-men Ch'ing marries Meng Yii-lou!58 is introduced fch'a into the narrative just before P'an Chin-lien is taken into his household.159 The marriage of Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, is inserted into the episode about his marriage to Meng Yii-lou.160 Wu Tien-en's loan from Hsi- men Ch'ing is inserted right after the birth of Kuan-ko.161 Ch'ang Shih-chieh comes to request a loan just at the point when Kuan-ko is about to die.162 The episode in which Yii-hsiao accepts P'an Chin-lien's three conditions comes at the time of Li P'ing-erh's death.163 The invitation to Grand Marshal Huang occurs in the middle of the arrangements for Li P'ing-erh's funeral.164 All of these are examples of deliberate retardation at points of high tension in the narrative ("pai-mang-chung ku tso hsiao- hsien chih pi" How could anyone but an author richly endowed with talent be capable of such effects? There are also cases like that in which Wu Sung demands to know Hsi-men Ch'ing's whereabouts from Manager Fu. During this point of such high tension, the information that the manager receives a salary of two taels of silver a month is slipped in.165 These are examples of the incidental use of a light touch [ch'ing-pi to bring out an essential truth [shen-li and do not belong under the heading of the technique [chang-fa discussed above.

45. One of the marvelous things about the Chin P'ing Mei is the expert use of the device of duplication [ fan-pi without being repeti- tive [fan For example, the author depicts an Ying Po-chiieh and then goes on to depict a Hsieh Hsi-ta but throughout the work Ying Po- chiieh remains Ying Po-chueh and Hsieh Hsi-ta remains Hsieh Hsi-ta. Each of them retains a distinct identity and mode of conversation so that there is never the slightest confusion between them. He depicts a P'an Chin-Hen and then goes on to depict a Li P'ing-erh. This could be described as repetitive, yet from first to last, whether they are to gether or apart, there is never the slightest confusion between them in their words or acts. He depicts a Wang Liu-erh and then insists upon going on to depict the wife of Pen the Fourth. He depicts a Li Kuei-chieh and then insists upon going on to depict a Wu Yin-erh and a Cheng Ai- yiieh. He depicts a Dame Wang and then insists upon going on to depict an Auntie Hsiieh, a Dame Feng, an Auntie Wen, and a Dame T'ao. He depicts a Nun Hsiieh and then insists upon going on to depict a Nun Wang and a Nun Liu. All of these are examples of the marvelous way in which the author purposely duplicates characters [t'e-t'e fan-shou ^f ¥f$\L Ψ] and yet succeeds in individualizing each character so that they all remain distinct.

46. In the Chin P'ing Mei Hsi-men Ch'ing is never drawn with cul tivated strokes [wen-pi UljiE], Wu Yiieh-niang is never drawn with ob vious strokes [hsien-pi gf |t], Meng Yü-lou is always drawn with attrac tive strokes [ch'iao-pi iiKt], P'an Chin-lien is never drawn with dull strokes [tun-pi I¾¾!:], Li P'ing-erh is never drawn with profound strokes [shen-pi 5¾¾], Ch'un-mei is always drawn with disdainful strokes [ao-pi fit I'], Ch'en Ching-chi is never drawn with appealing strokes [yiin-pi], Hsi-men Ta-chieh is never drawn with refined strokes [hsiu-pi 5I¾], Ying Po-chueh is never drawn with dull-witted strokes [tai-pi :¾¾], and Tai-an is never drawn with stupid strokes [ch'un-pi MM]- Thus, each of the characters is successfully individualised.

47. At the beginning [ch'i-t'ou |E||() of the Chin P'ing Mei the author introduces a man and a woman into his narrative only to let them go and then proceeds to do the same thing with another man and woman at the end [chieh-mo I¾¾]. Pu Chih-tao and Cho Tiu-erh are the characters he lets go at the beginning and Ch'u-yiinI66 and Li An are the characters he lets go at the end. Pu Chih-tao is let go at the beginning in order to create a vacancy in the brotherhood and thus leave room for his place to be filled by Hua Tzu-hsii. The author is unwilling simply to introduce Hua Tzu-hsii into his narrative directly [chih-ch'u fitti], nor does he wish to give his game away by describing only nine of the ten sworn brothers, thus leaving a vacancy which he will have to bring in Hua Tzu-hsii to fill. Therefore he introduces Pu Chih-tao only so that he can remove him at his conve nience and thereby create a vacancy in the brotherhood that will provide an opening for the introduction of Hua Tzu-hsii.167 Moreover, the introduction of Hua Tzu-hsii into the narrative provides a convenient occasion for the introduction of Li P'ing-erh at the same time.168 Other wise, if he had initially introduced Hua Tzu-hsii as one of the sworn brothers, it would have necessitated additional explanation when the time came to introduce Li P'ing-erh. Thus, although Pu Chih-tao is created for the purpose of providing a vacancy for Hua Tzu-hsii to fill, he also serves to provide an opening [hsieh-tzu W* Ψ] for the introduction of Li P'ing-erh. Since his only function is to provide an opening of this kind, what point would there be in making up a significant name for him? But since a name of some kind is required, why not simply call him Pu Chih- tao [puns with "do not know" ^FftIS]? Thus his name becomes Pu Chih-tao. As for Cho Tiu-erh, she too is let go in order to create a vacancy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household for Meng Yii-lou to fill. Before marrying Meng Yü-lou, Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken Cho Tiu-erh into his house hold but after she has been replaced by Meng Yii-lou, Hsi-men Ch'ing forgets about her completely.169 How different this is from Hsi-men Ch'ing's response to the death of Li P'ing-erh. Day after day he keeps vigil by her coffin or has paper money burnt on her behalf. Her servant girls and the wet nurse keep vigil in her empty chambers!70 and she twice appears to Hsi-men Ch'ing in his dreams.171 Cho Tiu-erh, by contrast, is allowed to drop completely out!72 of Hsi-men Ch'ing's mind. This is why she is called Tiu-erh [puns with "one who gets dropped" SIS]. Thus the author lets these two characters go at the beginning of his work in order to make room for the introduction of other characters. What of the other characters the author introduces at the end of his work only to let go? Ch'u-yiin [Clouds of Ch'u] is introduced as a device to convey indirectly [ying-tzu jp {▪ ) the idea that the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing will disperse as readily as luminescent clouds at sun set.173 Though beauty may be inexhaustible, man's life is finite; when death comes to your door, though you should possess beauties such as Hsi Shih and Wang Ch'iang,174 what will they avail you? Thus the author introduces Ch'u-yiin only in order to reinforce the truths ex pressed in the prologue of his book. Li An is introduced for the same reason as Han Ai-chieh and like her is accorded the author's most favourable treatment [man-hsii chih pi]. He introduces this filial son, a man of rectitude and honour, to serve as a rock in midstream that is unmoved by the torrent [chung-liu ti-chu 43¾¾¾:)- Why is this? Of the hundreds of characters in this book, from the Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching at the top of the social scale to Hou Lin-erh and his ilk at the bottom, there is hardly a decent person to be found. Those who are not the sort who welcome their own defilement or voluntarily prostitute themselves are the kind who attach themselves to the powerful or toady to the rich. If there were no Li An, the sole example of a filial son, would this not be tantamount to the extinction of men of conscience? Observe how the author tells the tale of the mutual reliance of Li An and his mother to show him as a filial son who maintains his chastity as though it were jade and will let no injury befall the body that he has inherited from his parents.176 in contrast to the likes of Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi who are really inferior to pigs and dogs. Thus, in the last part [mo-chieh] of his narrative the author lets these two characters go but cannot do the same for the rest of his cast. In fact, he makes a special point of letting these [aforementioned] characters go in order to stimulate critical self-examination on the part of his readers.

48. If the author had chosen to describe Hua Tzu-hsu as one of the brotherhood often at the beginning of the book, why could he not have simply introduced Li P'ing-erh at the same time? Before the author took up his brush, his conception of Li P'ing-erh had already taken shape. Since his conception of Li P'ing-erh had already taken shape, her secret assignation and willing adultery with Hsi-men Ch'ing, her marriage to Chiang Chu-shan, and her subsequent marriage to Hsi-men Ch'ing had all been worked out in the author's mind before he thought about the problem of what name to give her husband. Since her husband is not required to do anything more than supply the function implied by that term, though his presence may be necessary, he scarcely seems to have any real existence; and so the author gives him the name Tzu-hsii (empty or unreal]. A vase [p'ing] exists to hold flowers [hua], so the author gives him the surname Hua. It occurred to the author, as he was beginning his task, that he should provide a formal biographical sketch [cheng-chuan IE fill of Hsi-men Ch'ing. If he did not introduce Li P'ing-erh in the course of his biog raphy [chuan flf ] of Hsi-men Ch'ing, how was he to work her case [kung- an £ sg J into the story? If he had chosen to deal with her separately, he could not have had Hsi-men Ch'ing say in the opening scene that his next-door neighbour is named Hua So-and-so and his wife's name is such and such.181 Her separate introduction at a different point would have been an intrusion for which there would have been no connecting threads to what went before ["wu t'ou-hsii chih pi" j&'MWi^iM] and thus would have been unacceptable. Suppose he had waited until after Pan Chin-lien had been taken into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household!82 to introduce Li P'ing-erh into his narrative? Other novels tend to narrate one incident after another, providing the necessary connecting threads [t'ou-hsii liH] for each incident at the time but the Chin P'ing Mei relies purely on the technique of Ssu-ma Ch'ien ["T'ai-shih-kung pi-fa"]. Now, among the writings of Ssu-ma Ch'ien that were designed to focus on a particular person how could any piece be considered worthy of him if it did not prefigure at the very beginning the pivot [shu-niu flsi 'iH ] on which events would turn, so that it would function like the collar of a coat or the calyx of a flower? Nowadays when people write a play they always introduce the roster of major characters in the first few scenes. How much the more might one expect this to be true of the Chin P'ing Mei that is one of the most extraordinary books in the world? Thus, the author could not begin a new section from scratch [ling- ch'u t'ou-hsii] to introduce Li P'ing-erh but instead took advan tage of the introduction of Hua Tzu-hsii into the brotherhood of ten to touch on Li P'ing-erh. Now, if Ying Po-chiieh and the other members of the group had not already been introduced as the boon compan ions of Hsi-men Ch'ing, what reason would there have been for an oath of brotherhood? If the author had introduced Hua Tzu-hsu as one of the original ten members of the brotherhood, then they would have been in constant contact with each other. In that case, in chapter i, when Hsi- men Ch'ing and Ying Po-chiieh meet, Hua Tzu-hsu would be familiar to both of them, and there would be no reason for Hsi-men Ch'ing to mention his wife, let alone the fact that they are next-door neighbours or that his wife is a fine person. Thus the author has chosen not to make Hua Tzu-hsu a member of the original brotherhood so that he can use this occasion to bring him into it and give Hsi-men Ch'ing a reason for mentioning the fact that they are next-door neighbours. By these means Li P'ing-erh is introduced, the fact of their being next-door neighbours is made clear, and the whole situation of Hua Tzu-hsu's household is vividly implied without being explicitly described in words [pu-yen chih piao]. This in turn has led the author to think of the death of Pu Chih-tao!85 as providing a reason for Hsi-men Ch'ing to think of asking Hua Tzu-hsii to join the brotherhood. The author achieves his effects with such supernatural skill ["shen- kung kuei-fu chih pi"] that the twists and turns [ch'ii-che] of the plot beguile the reader without permitting him to see where the golden needle has done its work ["chin-chen chih i tu"]. That is why I say that his mode of composition is purely that of Ssu-ma Ch'ien [Lung-men wen-tzu]. Whenever I concentrate my atten tion on this kind of writing, following its every twist and turn and exploring its structure [ch'i-chin], I feel just as though I were discovering the extraordinary sights of the five sacred mountains and the three islands of the immortals. I can never tire of pleasures such as these.

49. In the Chin P'ing Mei even the jokes and songs are all pertinent to the occasion and contribute to the desired effect. They may reveal some thing of the meaning of the chapter in which they occur, fill in [tsu ^] something from a previous chapter, or divulge [t'ou 3f ] something about the chapters to come. I will devote a separate comment [chu] to each of them as they occur.

50. There is no feature of the art of writing that is not illustrated in the Chin P'ing Mei. It would be impossible to describe them all ade quately at one time, so I will point them out in my comments at the beginning of the chapters in which they occur.

51. In the Chin P'ing Mei lewd language is used more often by Pan Chin-lien and Wang Liu-erh than by anyone else, with Li P'ing-erh running a poor third. Among the others, Wu Yueh-niang and Meng Yii-lou are each shown using it only once, and Ch'un-mei's practice in this respect is only hinted [tien-jan] at. Why is this? The only time Wu Yueh-niang is shown using lewd language is on the night before she sweeps snow to make tea. This scene is intended to show both Wu Yueh-niang and Hsi-men Ch'ing in an unfavourable light. The only time Meng Yii-lou is shown using lewd language is on the night when her bitterness culminates in an upset stomach. This scene is intended to indicate the injustice that Meng Yii-lou has to suffer and to show Hsi- men Ch'ing in an unfavourable light. It is not really the author's intent in these scenes to depict Wu Yueh-niang or Meng Yii-lou as lascivious. As for Ch'un-mei, the author wishes to save her for the task of illustrating the reversal of fortunes [yen-Hang fan-an], so he has to preserve her dignity and can only hint [ying-hsieh] at her sexual behaviour. The author has put into the mouths of P'an Chin-lien and Wang Liu-erh totally shameless and utterly unspeakable things, so intolerable that even Li Kuei-chieh and Cheng Ai-yiieh could never have brought themselves to say them. By so doing the author expresses his profound condemnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who is really less than human, for when he is exposed to such bestiality he actually expresses a preference for it. It follows that when Wang Liu-erh and P'an Chin-lien both get a crack at him on the same day, it is the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.188 This is the real point that the author wishes to make. As for Li P'ing-erh, she is capable of forbearance, yet she brings troubles on herself; she doesn't meddle in other peoples' affairs, yet she causes Hua Tzu-hsii to die of chagrin, invites her own seduction, and remarries without a qualm. Thus she is not really very different from P'an Chin-lien, and there is no reason why the author should not also exhibit her in an unfavourable Ught. But Li P'ing-erh is weak whereas P'an Chin-lien is ruthless, so the author has depicted her lewdness somewhat more favourably than P'an Chin-lien's. Moreover, Li P'ing-erh signs her own death warrant when she permits Hsi-men Ch'ing to try out his aphrodisiac on her while she is in her menstrual period.189 Thus the author emphasizes the point that when women are given to concupiscence, if they do not hurt others they will hurt themselves. Alas! It is a fearful thing indeed. As for the likes of Sung Hui-lien and Ju-i, they do not possess anything in the way of moral character that might inhibit the author from portraying them in an offensive light. As I have already pointed out (see item twenty-three above), the author is motivated to create Lady Lin of the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang by his desire to visit retribution [pao-ying #JS] upon the household in which Pan Chin- lien got her start in life, so there is no reason for him not to depict her in an offensive light.

52. The Chin P'ing Mei should not be read in a desultory fashion. If you read it that way you will only read the obscene passages. Only if you take several days and read it all the way through will you perceive the connecting nerves and arteries [kuan-t'ung ch'i-mai JtSSSR] that act like a single thread upon which the author has strung together his succession of rising and falling actions [ch'i-fu].

53. Anyone who says the Chin P'ing Mei is an obscene book has only taken the trouble to read the obscene passages. I read this book exactly as though it were a work by Ssu-ma Ch'ien [Shih-kung wen-tzu].

54. If the author of the Chin P'ing Mei were to have written another book about loyal ministers and filial sons, he would have been certain to produce an original work on these subjects that depicted its characters with uncanny fidelity to life [mo-shen hsiao-ying ¢¢¢^¾], capturing their very spirit [chui-hun ch'u-p'o]. How do I know this? I know it from his success in representing [mo-hsieh] adulterous men and lascivious women.

55. Nowadays, if a Buddhist monk reads the Chin P'ing Mei openly he is sure to be criticized, so he can only read it on the sly. People do not understand that only a true monk is fit to read the Chin P'ing Mei.

56. Nowadays, if a scholar reads the Chin P'ing Mei his parents and teachers are sure to forbid it, and they themselves do not dare to read it openly. People do not understand that only a true scholar is able to read the Chin P'ing Mei properly. Anyone who reads it on the sly is really reading an obscene book.

57. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei must have been an avatar of Sudhana!90 in order to be able to escape so dexterously from all his narrative problems and always find a happy solution. Otherwise, it is hard to imagine how he could have done it.

58. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei must have had the capacity to become a Bodhisattva in order to be able to achieve such extraordinary literary effects ["lin-chiao feng-tsui wen-tzu"}.

59. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei must have experienced danger, difficulty, poverty, and sorrow and must have been thoroughly acquainted with the ways of the world in order to be able to depict the inner spirit of his characters with such verisimilitude [mo-shen].

60. However, if the author had felt it necessary to have personally experienced everything he describes in order to produce this book, the Chin P'ing Mei could never have been written. Why is this? The various licentious women in the book engage in illicit relations with men in a variety of different ways. If the author had to have personally experienced all of these things in order to understand them, how could he have done it? Thus, it is apparent that there is nothing a genius [ti'ai-tzu ^f-] can not apprehend if he concentrates his mind upon it.
61. Once his concentration has enabled him to apprehend what he needs to know about a character, the author must be able to become that character himself [hsien-shen S#] before he can speak for him. Thus, he has actually become the various licentious women whom he describes, and he is able to expound his lesson through them.
62. The author succeeds in portraying each of the characters in his book with utter fidelity to human nature [jen-ch'ing A'fra ]· He transforms himself [hua-shen ft#] into a multitude of guises, representing all sorts of people in order to expound his lesson through them.
63. While portraying each of his characters with utter fidelity to human nature [jen-ch'ing AIFR)5 the author is also faithful in his portrayal of the way of Heaven [t'ien-tao ^Jl]. From ancient times it is in ways such as these that Heaven has punished the wicked, rewarded the good, and overthrown the powerful and unscrupulous. When we read this book, it seems as though there must have been a person with brush in hand inside the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing, across from the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho hsien, recording everything that happened, great and small, first and last, down to the very plates and bowls. It seems so real that we can hardly believe that the author took brush in hand, spread out a sheet of paper before him, and made it all up. That is why I say that the author's portrayal is faithful to the way of Heaven.
64. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points that are only sketched in outline [pai-miao ή JH]. The novice who can appreciate the points that are only sketched in outline will learn to write with unusual economy and skill.
65. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points where a particular narrative line is sloughed off [t'o-hsieh ch'u]· The novice who appreciates the points where a particular nar rative line is sloughed off will learn to be original in his handling of transitions [kuo-chieh wen-tzu].
66. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points where the author gets out of his difficulties [pi-nan ch'u]. The novice who appreciates the way in which he finds easy ways to get out of his difficulties ["pi-nan chiu-i ch'u" S H St Jj Jg] will learn to prefer the light touch [ch'ing-pi gui] to the heavy [chung-pi M.V-] and will learn how to make his writing deft and ingenious.
67. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points where the author handles a proliferation of events with apparent ease ["shou-hsien shih-mang ch'u"]- The novice who learns how to do this will be able to handle complicated passages [fan-yen wen-tzu].
68. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points where plot elements are intertwined [ch'uan-ch'a ch'u IPíífβ]· The novice who learns how to do this will be able to write ornate and dazzling passages.
69. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei one should pay attention to the points in the text where narrative sections come together [chieh-hsueh] where new sections begin [fa-mai], and where the episodes are linked or correlated [chao-ying MiM] with each other. The novice who learns how to do this will be able to appreciate the Tso-chuan t£ M [The Tso Commentary], the Kuo-yii Hfg [Conversations of the States], the Chuang Tzu ffi^·, the Li-sao MM [Encountering Sorrow], the histories, and the philosophers.
70. In reading the Chin P'ing Mei, one should pay attention to the points where the author takes special pains. Only if one understands why the author takes special pains at the points where he does, is one fit to read the Chin P'ing Mei or to say that he knows how to read literature.
71. When I was a child learning to read and write in school I once saw the teacher punish one of my fellow students while saying to him, "I've told you to study the text word by word, not swallow it whole." I was still very young at the time and on overhearing these words took them very much to heart. Thereafter, when reading a text I would hnger over each character as though it were a syllable from an aria in a K'un-ch'u % ft opera, drawing out its pronunciation and repeating it over and over again. I would not stop until I had made each word my own. I particu larly remember doing this with the phrase "to love antiquity and be dili gent in investigating it."191 No more than three days after I had begun to do this the teacher set us, as a topic for an examination essay, the hne "the superior man maintains his dignity and does not wrangle."192 I felt as I wrote that the task did not seem too hard. When my essay was completed the teacher was greatly surprised and thought I must have copied from someone else, for he had no other way to account for my rapid progress. I was unable to explain it myself. After this the teacher made a point of keeping an eye on me. When he saw that I sat with my head bent over the table, following the text with one hand as I read it out loud, one character at a time, he exclaimed in delight, "So you weren't deceiving me after all," and turning to the rest of the class admonished them to follow my example. Although I do not claim to have mastered anything yet, I am con vinced that in reading a book one should not try to digest it in large chunks at a time. This is true not only of works in the literary language but even of novels like the Chin P'ing Mei. If one trys to take in large chunks of it at a time it will seem as tasteless as chewing wax. The only thing one will be aware of is page after page of women's talk, and one will be unable to see it for the marvelous work of literature that it is. If one is not concerned with it as a marvelous work of literature but only anxious to read about the marvelous things it contains, one deserves only contempt.
72. Before reading the Chin P'ing Mei, one should sit in contempla tion for three months. Otherwise his vision may be so clouded that he will miss the point.
73. Lack of talent is due to carelessness, and carelessness is due to inattention. These two traits tend to reinforce each other. Not only will such a person be unable to write well himself but he will not even be able to recognize good writing when he sees it. Such a person should never be permitted to read the Chin P'ing Mei.
74. If a person who writes indifferently to begin with does not write better after reading the Chin P'ing Mei, he should burn his writing implements and take up the plow for his enjoyment. There is no longer any need for him to trouble himself with trying to write.
75. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei is certainly a genius [ts'ai-tzu ^fT] but his learning is that of a Bodhisattva, not that of a Confucian sage, for his message is that everything is empty [k'ung g?]. If he had taken the further step to nonemptiness he would have written a different book.
76. The Chin P'ing Mei concludes [chieh] with emptiness [k'ung] but if we look carefully we will see that it is not complete emptiness. This is apparent from the fact that the author brings his work to a conclusion [chieh |p] with the transfiguration of Hsiao-ko ^ If [filial son] that signifies the fact that filiality [hsiao] has the power to transform all evils.
77. The Chin P'ing Mei is characterized by an air of resentful indig nation but then its author is certainly a reincarnation of Ssu-ma Ch'ien [who was wrongfully castrated].
78. The Chin P'ing Mei is a book that is intended to correct people's faults, as can be seen from the fact that it concludes [chieh fg] with the example of Han Ai-chieh. The pun in her name expresses the idea of "seeking at 3t [moxa] that is three years old in order to cure an illness that has lasted seven years."194 [That is to say, though there may be a cure for your illness, you won't be able to find it when you need it unless you have prepared it in advance.]
79. The Chin P'ing Mei is the work of a person who has achieved great enlightenment. That is why he describes all the failings of Buddhist monks and nuns. Only by so doing could he reveal himself to be a real Bodhisattva or truly enlightened.
80. If the author of the Chin P'ing Mei had not chosen to write about the mundane affairs of the vulgar world he could certainly have written works as elegant and romantic as the Hsi-hsiang chi jSffIffi [Romance of the Western Chamber] and its like.
81. People who are unable to write themselves ought never to be permitted to read the Chin P'ing Mei or it may affect them just the way vulgar people say it will. For people who are writers themselves, reading the Chin P'ing Mei is just like reading the Shih-chi.
82. The Chin P'ing Mei is a work that women should never be per mitted to see. Nowadays there are many men who read passages out loud to their wives or concubines while taking their pleasure with them inside the bed curtains. They do not realize that, even among men, there are few who recognize the force of exhortation and admonition or respond appropriately to what they read. How many women are there who are capable of responding appropriately to what they read? What would be the consequences if they were to imitate, however slightly, the things they read about? Its literary style and technique [wen-fa :¾¾, pi-fa ^¾] are not such as could or should be studied by women. If they are well educated enough to do so they should be encouraged to read the Tso-chuan, the Kuo-yii, the Shih-ching fifgi [Classic of Poetry], and other classics and histories. But if the Chin P'ing Mei is a book that ought not to be read, why should I write a commentary [p'i #fc] on it and thus do an injury to the world? Such a question does not take into account the fact that I really believe the Chin P'ing Mei to be a literary masterpiece that cannot be allowed to go unread but that, at the same time, it is a book that is unfit for the eyes of women. It is the fear that some may fail to heed this admonition and then hold the Chin P'ing Mei to blame for the conse quences that has led me to raise this issue here, for I am unwilling to acknowledge that it is the book itself that is at fault. Now among those men who have some knowledge of how to read a book, who does not read the Chin P'ing MeP. Those who read it and find it enjoyable are a source of anxiety to the Chin P'ing Mei; anxiety lest they not know why it should be enjoyed and only enjoy it for its licentiousness. Where this is the case, the Chin P'ing Mei may do the reader an injury. But, in fact, it is not the Chin P'ing Mei that injures him but he who injures himself. Those who read it and find it objection able are a source of sorrow to the Chin P'ing Mei, sorrow over the fact that although it actually contains nothing objectionable, they insist on objecting to its descriptions of licentiousness. Where this is the case, the reader is doing the Chin P'ing Mei an injury. But, in fact, it is not the reader who does the injury nor the Chin P'ing Mei itself but Hsi-men Ch'ing who does it. What does it mean to say that the Chin P'ing Mei does the reader an injury? People who are not good readers are careless and superficial. If you give them the classics and histories to read, they will not be able to get all the way through them. By contrast, they may enjoy reading the Chin P'ing Mei but will dislike reading the second half [hsia-pan F ^ ] of the book. In such a case, the Chin P'ing Mei may be thought to do the reader an injury. What does it mean to say that the reader injures himself? Now, if one person explains the meaning of theft to another, so that he will know what to guard himself against but the other person takes advantage of the information to acquire the art of thievery, it is not the fault of the original informant. The one who heard the explanation of theft was already a thief by nature. In like manner, the Chin P'ing Mei ought not to be held responsible for the responses of its superficial readers. What does it mean to say that the reader does the Chin P'ing Mei an injury? The author of the Chin P'ing Mei employed all the power, wisdom, and intelligence at his disposal to depict his adulterous men and lascivious women, corrupt officials and wicked servants, pimps and whores. He drained himself mentally and physically in order to create this literary masterpiece. Now, if benighted readers should succeed in con vincing the rest of society that this literary masterpiece should be re garded as an obscene book and kept out of sight, then the labours of the author who drained himself mentally and physically to create this masterpiece not only for his own benefit but also for that of the gifted writers of all time, would be undone by vulgar men and would prove to have been expended in vain. This is what is meant by saying that the reader does the Chin P'ing Mei an injury. What does it mean to say that it is Hsi-men Ch'ing who does the Chin P'ing Mei an injury? If the reader would not read the book as an account of Hsi-men Ch'ing's affairs but employ his own literary imagi nation in the attempt to discover retroactively the secrets of the author's marvelous effects, it would be more valuable to him than reading the Shih-chi in its entirety. But, unfortunately, no sooner does he begin to read than he becomes absorbed in what Hsi-men Ch'ing is doing and becomes oblivious to the pains expended on the composition by the author. That is why I say that Hsi-men Ch'ing does the Chin P'ing Mei an injury. Nevertheless, readers continue, as before, to misread it as the Chin P'ing Mei of Hsi-men Ch'ing, rather than appreciating it as the work of its author. I have seen someone's comment on the Chin P'ing Mei which states that it is a voluminous daily record of the events in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.195 This is so benighted as to be laughable. On what day of what month in what year did he see the author employed in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing, engaged in writing a daily record of the events there? But there is even someone who, when he reaches the point where Ch'en Ching-chi seduces P'an Chin-lien and gets Ch'un-mei into the bargain,196 waxes indignant on Hsi-men Ch'ing's behalf over the fact that Ch'en Ching-chi should have been able to steal these two pearls. This pedant does not realize that he has misread the situation again. P'an Chin-hen did not originally belong to Hsi-men Ch'ing, neither did the author create Ch'un-mei so that she might be a permanent possession of his. This episode is deftly drawn with the author's subtle brush as part of his marvelous design. What need is there for this pedant to vent his blind indignation from the sidelines? Thus, the readers of the Chin P'ing Mei are many but those who do not read it well are also many. Although I would not be so presump tuous as to say that I have succeeded in getting to the bottom of the author's mind, I have felt compelled to write this commentary [p'i Jtt], despite my own inadequacies, by the desire to defend him against all the undeserved calumnies that have been heaped upon him. I would also like to be able to open the drowsy eyes of aspiring writers to the author's achievement while at the same time making some small contribution to the rules of literary composition ["wen-chia chih fa-lii" Sl^ift^]. Who can say that this is not worthwhile?
83. The Chin P'ing Mei consists of two halves [pan-chieh ^¾]. The first half [shangpan-chieh _h^|fe] is "hot" [je *] and the second half [hsia pan-chieh T^lfe] is "cold" [leng J^] but in the first half there is "cold" in the "heat" and in the second half there is "heat" in the "cold."
84. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei, in the course of describing the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing, also describes quite a few other house holds, such as those of Wu Ta, Hua Tzu-hsii, Ch'iao Hung, Ch'en Hung, Wu K'ai [Wu Yiieh-niang's elder brother], Chang Ta-hu, Impe rial Commissioner Wang, Ying Po-chiieh, Chou Hsiu, and Hsia Yen- ling. This list does not include the household of Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital, or those of Hsi-men Ch'ing's employees, or the relatives by marriage with whom Hsi-men Ch'ing is not on intimate terms. These households alone would account for most of the important officials and prominent families in Ch'ing-ho hsien. Thus, through the description of one man the author has described an entire district. Alas! "Such a chief criminal is greatly to be abhorred."197 I have not even taken into account the households that suffer complete ruination or gross abuse at Hsi-men Ch'ing's hands. How detestable! How detestable!
85. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei depicts Hsi-men Ch'ing as being without a single relative. He has no parents alive in the generation above his, no children or grandchildren in the generation below his, and no siblings in his own generation. Luckily for him, Wu Yueh-niang does not insist upon her prerogatives as his legitimate second wife. If she had persisted in giving him the silent treatment on P'an Chin-lien's account,198 what pleasure could Hsi-men Ch'ing have found in life? Yet even with this reprieve he does not correct his faults or engage in self- cultivation but abandons himself to evil without compunction. It is no wonder that he should go to his death unrepentant.
86. All the relatives of Hsi-men Ch'ing described in the book are false relatives. Kinsman Ch'iao [Ch'iao Hung] is a false kinsman. Kinsman Chai [Chai Ch'ien] is an even falser kinsman. Whose paternal aunt is Aunt Yang? She is a false paternal aunt. Ying Po-chiieh is a false brother. Hsieh Hsi-ta is a false friend. As for the Hua brothers [siblings of Hua Tzu-hsii], they are even more laughable. This is really carrying falseness to the point where it becomes hard to comprehend. Ch'en Ching-chi twice wears mourning,199 but he is a false filial son. As for the brothers- in-law Shen [husband of Wu Yiieh-niang's eldest sister] and Han [hus band of Meng Yii-lou's eldest sister], we hear nothing of their wives, so they are also false brothers-in-law. The only relatives Hsi-men Ch'ing has are Wu the First [Wu K'ai] and Wu the Second [Wu Yiieh-niang's second brother], and the latter is a very shadowy figure. Wu the First is not a bad sort, and that is why in the end he helps Wu Yiieh-niang out on a number of occasions.200 Hsi-men Ch'ing does not have a single relative from his own family. The retribution [pao-ying #(fi] meted out by Heaven is cruel enough but the author's hatred for him is also virulent. How is it that the people of this day who have a full comple ment of relatives treat them so coldly and only wish they could find a way of getting rid of them? What sort of attitude is that?
87. Why does the author of the Chin P'ing Mei feel it necessary to describe Hsi-men Ch'ing as being alone in the world without a single relative? Only by so doing can be bring out the laughableness of his "heat" [je *] at the beginning and the completeness of his "cold" [leng ^] at the end, a cold that can never become warm again.
88. Although the author's allegorical purpose [yii-yen ^Hli] is served by making the fate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's family in Ch'ing-ho hsien so utterly "cold" [leng (¾] that not a single person is left to perpetuate it, it is also his hatred for such people that causes him to make sure that there can never be so much as the hope of a rekindled ember. Indeed, a writer, too, can be ruthless!
89. In the Chin P'ing Mei there is a Li An who is a filial son,202 a Wang Hsiian who is a charitable man,203 an An-t'ung who is a faithful servant,204 a Huang Mei who is a generous friend,205 a Tseng Hsiao-hsii who is a loyal official,206 and a Wu Sung who is both a hero and a devoted brother.207 Who can say that in this novel's world of lust and desire the will of Heaven and the virtue of the people have been com pletely obliterated?
90. Although there are numerous good characters in the Chin P'ing Mei, all of them are men. There is not a single good woman. If we count them off, the only one who remains faithful to a single mate is Wu Yiieh-niang. But she does not understand that the role of a wife is to govern her household with propriety and that she herself is responsible for much of the trouble that occurs. Han Ai-chieh's final fidelity to the memory of Ch'en Ching-chi is certainly commendable but the relation ship to which she shows such fidelity is not itself a proper one, and her earlier life is anything but blameless.208 As for Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, her mother takes her away,209 and since the author does not tell us what becomes of her, we cannot be sure how she turns out. Egregious, indeed, is the yin H nature of women. Although it can scarcely be said that there are no examples of chastity among them, yet they find it all too easy to abandon it. Everything depends on the sort of family instruction each woman receives. Only one who recognizes this can take on the fearful responsibility of setting a proper example for his womenfolk. This is a matter in which the head of a family cannot be too careful.
91. In the Chin P'ing Mei, there are two Taoist masters [Wu Shen- hsien210 and Huang Chen-jen211] and a living Buddha [P'u-ching] and yet they are unable to undo the damage done by a single profane monk. Who is this profane monk? The one who gives Hsi-men Ch'ing the aphrodisiac.
92. Since it is Hsi-men Ch'ing who provides the poison that kills Wu Ta,214 someone is bound to appear with the poison that proves to be Hsi-men Ch'ing's undoing.215 How can an immortal [Wu Shen-hsien], a Taoist master [Huang Chen-jen], or a living Buddha [P'u-ching] be of any avail against the will of Heaven?
93. The Chin P'ing Mei should not be read inattentively. If the reader allows his attention to wander he will go astray.
94. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should keep a spittoon handy in order to have something to bang on.
95. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should keep a sword ready to hand so that he can hack about him to relieve his indignation.
96. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should hang a bright mirror [ching it] in front of himself so that he can see himself fully revealed.
97. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should keep a good wine by his side so that he can drink lustily in order to dispel the reek of worldliness.
98. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should burn fine incense on his desk in order to express his gratitude to the author for creating this literary masterpiece, in all its intricacy [ch'ii-ch'ii che-che ft ft iff Jf ], for his enjoyment.
99. The reader of the Chin P'ing Mei should keep fragrant tea on his table as an offering of thanks to the author for his pains.
100. The Chin P'ing Mei is a clear example of what the Zen school calls exercising one's powers after having attained perfect mastery. In my commentary [p'i #t] on the Chin P'ing Mei I call attention to the places where the author's perfect mastery is evident.
101. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei did not know that he had achieved any such thing as perfect mastery. In my commentary [p'i #t] I also call attention to the places where he did not know what perfect mastery he had achieved.
102. The Chin P'ing Mei begins [ch'i |E] and concludes [chieh £g] with "emptiness" [k'ung 5].216 In my commentary [p'i $t] I do no more than call attention to this fact. I would certainly not presume to use the word "emptiness" to denigrate the Confucian sages.
103. The author of the Chin P'ing Mei is faithful in every particular to human nature [jen-ch'ing Atra] and the principles of Heaven [t'ien-li ^I]. This shows that he has truly attained complete enlightenment, and in this he is not empty [k'ung].
104. The Chin P'ing Mei is a work of enormous scale and yet it required the most meticulous thought to produce.
105. The Chin P'ing Mei is a cautionary work [ch'eng-jen ti shu f8EA 0¾¾] that may be said to be admonitory in intent. Nevertheless, it has also been described as a book that immerses its reader in the ways of the world [ju-shih ⅄ Ur]. But one could also say that it is a book that enables its reader to escape from the ways of the world [ch'u-shih].
106. The three characters of the title Chin P'ing Mei [literally, "plum blossoms in a golden vase"] constitute a metaphor for the author's ac complishment. Although this book embodies so many of the beauties of spring, every blossom and every petal of which cost the author the creative powers of spring [ch'un-kung] itself to evoke, these beauties should be placed in a golden vase where they can diffuse their fragrance in a cultivated environment and adorn the desks of men of literary talent for all time. They must never be allowed to become the playthings of the rustic or the vulgar. Indeed, plum blossoms in a golden vase depend for their effect on the ability of human effort to enhance the handiwork of Heaven [t'ien-kung ^ I]. In like manner, the literary quality of this book is such that it seems, in passage after passage, to have stolen the creative powers of nature [hua-kung] itself.
107. This book was written as a continuation [chi fg] of the Sha-kou chi [The Slaying of the Dog; a famous play on the theme of brotherly lovej.217 In place after place it alludes [ying-hsieh SPII] to the relationship between brothers. Even Ho the Ninth has a younger brother, Ho the Tenth;218 Yang the First has a younger brother, Yang the Second; Chou Hsiu has a younger brother, Chou Hsuan;220 and Han Tao-kuo has a younger brother, Han the Second.221 As might be expected, it is only Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'en Ching-chi who do not have any brothers.
108. The story begins [ch'i] with Meng Yu-lou playing the guitar [t'an-yuan, puns with t'an-yuan, to sigh with resentment] and concludes [chieh] with Han Ai-chieh carrying her guitar [pao-yuan, puns with pao-yuan to harbour resentment]. This is because the author had a bellyful of outraged tears but no place to shed them. Therefore, he created the Chin P'ing Mei as an outlet for his tears.

PREFACE

The Plum in the Golden Vase is an obscene book. In praising it as highly as he did, Yüan Hung-tao was merely giving indirect expression to his own discontent, not bestowing his approbation on the Plum in the Golden Vase. Nevertheless, the author did have intentions of his own that were admonitory rather than hortatory. For example, many women play a role in the story but the fact that the author chose to emphasize only the names of Pan Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Ch'un-mei by including them in his title is an instance of the type of historiography exemplified by the Tao-wu of the State of Ch'u. Thus, Chin-lien dies for her adultery, P'ing-erh dies for her burden of sins, and Ch'un-mei dies for her licentiousness, each of them coming to a more horrendous end than any of the other women. The author has availed himself of Hsi-men Ch'ing to depict the great villains of the world. He has availed himself of Ying Po-chüeh to depict the petty clowns [3] of the world. He has availed himself of all these wanton women to depict the female clowns and villains of the world. So effective is his delineation that we cannot but break into a sweat as we read. Thus, his intentions are admonitory rather than hortatory. I have remarked, "He who reads the Chin P'ing Mei and responds with a feeling of compassion's a Bodhisattva; apprehension's a superior man; enjoyment's a petty person; and emulation's no better than a beast."

My friend Ch'u Hsiao-hsiu once accompanied a young man to a banquet at which live entertainment was provided. When the point came in the play at which the Hegemonic-King feasted at night the young man drooled with admiration, saying, "How can the life of a real man be anything but this?"

"The fact's," responded Hsiao-hsiu, "that it's only by way of contrast with the denouement at Wu-chiang that the dramatist's inserted this scene." Those present who overheard this remark sighed at the prescience of his comment. Only those who grasp the significance of this statement should be permitted to read the Chin P'ing Mei. Otherwise, Yuan Hung-Tao may be accused of having been a flagrant instigator of venery. The people of this world must be exhorted not to follow in the footsteps of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Casually indited en route to Su-chou by the Pearl-juggler of Eastern Wu in the last month of winter (28 December to 25 January), 1617–18

THE TZ'U-HUA

I venture to observe that in writing the story of the plum in the golden vase the Scoffing Scholar of Lanling has focused his attention on the manners of the age, about which he has something significant to say. Of the 7 feelings natural to humankind (joy, anger, sadness/melancholy, fear, love, disliking, and liking), melancholy is the most intractable. For such men of superior wisdom as may occasionally appear in the natural course of evolution, the fogs and ice that melancholy engenders disperse and splinter of their own accord, so there is no need to speak of such as these. Even those of lesser endowment know how to dispel melancholy with the aid of reason so that it may be prevented from encumbering them. Among the many who fall short of this however, have been unable to achieve enlightenment in their hearts, and do not have access to the riches of the classic tradition to alleviate their melancholy, those who escape its infection are few. It is in consideration of this fact that my friend, the Scoffing Scholar has poured the accumulated wisdom of a lifetime into the composition of this work, consisting of 100 chapters in all. Its striking rhetoric that minced and roasted for every mouth appeals to every taste is designed to illuminate the cardinal human relationships, discourage sexual promiscuity, distinguish between the pure and the impure, edify both the good and the un-good, and expound the secrets of flourishing and decay, failure and success through the inexorable working of karmic cause and effect in such a way that they lie utterly revealed before the reader's eyes. From its beginning to its end the strands of the plot are as intricately articulated as the conduits of the circulatory system and are like myriad skeins of silk that flutter in the wind without ever becoming entangled. So enticingly are these effects accomplished that the reader may perhaps be beguiled into forgetting his melancholy with a smile. It is scarcely to be denied that in this work, the language encroaches on the vulgar and the atmosphere is redolent of rouge and powder. But I would assert that such allegations miss the point. The first poem in the book of poems) has been characterised by Confucius as expressing "Pleasure that does not extend to wantonness and sorrow that does not lead to injury. Wealth and distinction are things that man desires" but few are able to attain them without resort to wantonness. Sorrow and resentment are sentiments that man dislikes but few are able to experience them without injury to themselves. I have surveyed such productions of fabulists of earlier times as Lu Ching-hui's New wick-trimming tales, Yüan Chen's Ying-ying; Chao Pi's Emulative frowns collection, Luo Guanzhong's Outlaws of the Marsh, Ch'in Chün's A pleasing tale of passion, Lu Mei-hu's Elegant vignettes of spring yearning, and Chou Li's Pure conversations by candlelight) as well as such later works as the story of Lord As You Like It and the tale of Chang Yü-hu. Their diction is so demanding that readers are often unable to enjoy them and discard them before reaching the end. As for this story, although it may be couched in the everyday language of the marketplace or the idle chatter of the boudoir, even a three-foot-tall lad can derive as much pleasure from it as he would if he were enabled to suck the nectar of Heaven or pluck the tusk of leviathan, [19]so easy is it for him to understand. Although it may not be the equal of the works of former days, its purport and its rhetoric are outstanding enough to make it worthy of consideration. In addition, with regard to the moral reformation of the age, the reproof of vice and encouragement of virtue, the purification of the mind and cleansing of the heart, [20]it cannot fail to make a small contribution.[21] As for those events that take place in the bedchamber, everyone feels attracted to them, on the one hand, and repulsed by them, on the other. Of those who are not sages or worthies like Yao and Shun, [22]there are few who escape entanglement. It is on this account that even the best of those who have attained wealth and distinction allow their hearts to be swayed and their intentions to be deflected. Behold: how secluded are the high halls and spacious structures,[23] the cloudy windows and misty chambers;[24] how magnificent are the golden screens and embroidered bedding; how enticing are the clouds of hair tumbling in disarray,[25] the creamy texture of swelling breasts; how assiduous are the cavorting of the cock phoenix and his mates; how extravagant are the brocade garments and the rare repasts; [26] how devoted are the women of beauty and men of talent[27] as they descant upon the breeze and apostrophize the moon; how abandoned are the fragrant tongues as the jadelike drops of saliva commingle; how reckless are the pair of jade wrists, tugging and re-tugging at the ropes, and the pair of golden lotuses, tossing and retossing on the swing. [29]Surely this is happiness. Yet, when joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow.[30] Occasions for separation will occur, bringing haggard countenances in their wake, for this is inevitable. The need to "Pluck a sprig of plum blossoms to entrust to a courier,"[31] or resort to a square of silk to be conveyed by a fish, [32]cannot then be avoided.

A stranger came from far away
And gave me a pair of carp.
I summoned my son to cook the carp
In which there was a letter on a square of silk.

Calamitous missteps and disruptive dislocations[33] will become inescapable. Sacrifice of life to blade and sword can no longer be prevented. For in the world of light there is the imperial law, in the world of darkness there are ghosts and spirits, [34] that cannot be evaded.[35] And as for the propositions that if you defile the wife and children of another your own wife and children will be defiled,[36] or that calamity is the result of accumulated misdeeds and good fortune the reward of virtue,[37] they may all be subsumed under the rubric of the workings of the cycle of retribution. Thus, "Heaven has its spring, summer, autumn, and winter," [38] just as "Man has his sorrows and joys, partings and reunions." [39] There is no reason to be surprised that this is so. As for those who act in accord with Heaven's seasons, in the long term their descendants will continue to prosper, and in the short term they will serenely enjoy their allotted days. As for those who act in defiance of Heaven's seasons, they will sacrifice life and reputation, for calamity will strike before they can turn on their heels. [40] Since no man in this world can escape the periodic revolutions of the times, [41] those who remain unscathed by cruel fate and untainted by disgrace are fortunate indeed. That is why I have observed that the Scoffing Scholar in writing this story has something significant to say.

Written by the Master of Delight in his studio in Bright Worthy Village

COLOPHON

The story of the Plum in the Golden Vase is a fable created by a prominent figure of the Chia-ching reign period[1] whose satirical shafts were directed at contemporary targets. But is not the explicitness with which he exposes the uglier aspects of human life also consistent with the purpose of our former teacher, Confucius, in not deleting the airs of Cheng and Wei from the Book of Poems? The way that, in incident after incident, he has taken pains to sow the seeds of karmic cause and effect shows that the author was also a man of great compassion. Those who help to disseminate this book in the future will earn immeasurable merit. The ignorant go so far as to regard this as an obscene book. In so doing not only do they fail to comprehend the author's purpose but they also unjustly repudiate the intentions of those who would disseminate it. It is the purpose of this colophon to make this clear.

Written by Nien-kung

4 STANZAS TO THE POEM BURNING INCENSE

1
Gardens of Paradise, Isles of the Blest,
The storied towers of Golden Valley,
Are scarcely equal to a thatched cottage for pure seclusion.
Where wildflowers embroider the ground,
Is that not also elegant?
Appropriate to spring,
Appropriate to summer,
Appropriate to autumn.
Wine is mature, ready for straining,
Guests arrive, fit for retaining.
Here is no glory, here no disgrace, here no sorrow.
Step back and relax.
What reason for that?
Only, when tired to sleep,
When thirsty to drink,
When drunk to sing.
2
A short angled wall,
Low roughhewn windows,
A tiny pond, no bigger than a pimple.
Amid serried peaks,
By green waters,
There is a little wind,
There is a little moonlight,
There is a little coolness.
Life's ordinary needs fulfilled,
By bamboo table, on rattan couch,
Look to what lies before the eyes, the water's hue, and the mountain's light.
If guests appear and there's no wine,
What's wrong with plain conversation?
Just, carefully brew the tea,
Gently warm the cup,
Fastidiously pour the water.
3
Situated amid water and bamboo,
I love my cottage.
Rocks lie clear beneath the stream like randomly placed steps.
The design of my retreat is personal,
Along lines delicately wrought.
It is secluded,
It is elegant,
It is comfortable.
At ease, without restraint,
What is this like?
Leaning on the railing, I gaze into the water and watch the fish.
From breeze and blossoms, snow and moonlight,
I have wrested the freedom,
To burn some incense,
Make some comments,
Read some books.
4
Sweep away the dust,
Conserve the moss,
Before the door, let the red leaves cover the steps.
The scene might be depicted in a painting,
But that it still continues to surprise,
With only a few boles of pine,
Few stalks of bamboo,
Few sprigs of plum.
Flowers and trees are so cultivated,
That they come into bloom one after another.
As for the events of the morrow, leave them to Heaven.
Let wealth and distinction,
Come when they will.
I'll simply go where I please,
Abide by my lot,
Unbutton my collar.

STANZAS ON THE 4 VICES TO THE POEM PARTRIDGE SKY

DRUNKENNESS
Wine depletes the spiritual resources and destroys the home;
It causes speech to become incoherent, makes conduct riotous.
Estrangement from family, loss of friends, derive there-from;
Deeds of injustice and ingratitude are all its doing.
One ought not to imbibe,
From the flowing cup.
If you are able to obey this injunction, you cannot go wrong.
The foundering of all your undertakings may be traced to this.
From now on, when you entertain guests, serve them tea.
LUST
Do not become enamored of glossy black hair and beautiful complexions;
Cease to hanker after crimson powder and halcyon-feathered ornaments.
What ravages man's body and shortens his life are those bewitching figures;
Beauties capable of toppling kingdoms and cities are more alluring still.
Be not beguiled,
Husband your cinnabar fields (regions of vital heat).
Those who are able to diminish their desires live longer years.
From this time on, abandon all thought of casual amours;
Within paper curtains decorated with plum blossoms sleep by yourself.
AVARICE

Money and silk, gold and pearls, may pile up in your coffers;
But, unless they are gotten legitimately, forgo their greedy acquisition.
Family and friends, honesty and integrity, are often forfeited for gain;
Even the feelings that bind father and son are sometimes sacrificed for profit.
Pull back your hand,
Restrain yourself,
Lest body and mind be fraught with care, both day and night.
Your descendants, of course, will have the fortunes that befit them;
On their behalf, you can spare yourself anticipatory worry.
ANGER
Do not resort to violence or endeavour to show off your prowess;
By brandishing fists, rolling up sleeves, or displaying your spirit.
Once you let the flames of your temper escape your control;
You will subsequently stew with anxiety at the calamitous results.
Don't go overboard,
Avoid catastrophe;
Be advised, the best policy is to be tolerant in all things.
When it is appropriate to let things go, you should let them go;
When you can make allowances for people, you should make allowances.

When wealth has taken wing, the streets seem desolate.
The strains of flute and stringed zither are heard no more.
The brave long sword has lost its terror; its splendour is tarnished.
The precious lute is broken, faded its golden star.
The marble stairs are deserted; only the autumn dew visits them now.
The moon shines lonely where once dancing feet and merry songs were.
The dancers are departed: the singers have gone elsewhere.
They return no more.
Today they are but ashes in the Western Tombs.
Beautiful is this maiden; her tender form gives promise of sweet womanhood,
But a two-edged sword lurks between her thighs, whereby destruction comes to foolish men.
No head falls to that sword: its work is done in secret,
Yet it drains the very marrow from men's bones.

This poem was written by one Lü Yan [Lü Dongbin], an immortal whose name in religion was Master Chunyang. He lived in the dynasty of Tang and spent his days in the pursuit of virtue and the mortification of the flesh. So he attained to paradise, leaving this mortal world, and there was given to him a seat in the Purple Palace. The gift of immortality was bestowed upon him, and he was made the Governor of the Eight Caverns that are above, whence he brings succour to them in trouble and adversity. It seems, unfortunately, too true that they who live in this world can never wholly free themselves from their bondage to the Seven Feelings and the Six Desires. There is no escape from the fatal circle of Wine and Women, Wealth and Rage. Sooner or later the end comes to every man, and he must give up his hold upon all of these, for, after death, they will avail him nothing. Experience would seem to show that of these four evils, women and wealth most surely bring disaster. Let us for a moment consider the case of one who falls upon evil times, so that he finds himself in sore need, suffering misfortunes whereof he never dreamed. At night he searches diligently for a grain of rice, and finds the morrow must be foodless. In the morning he rises and looks around the kitchen but cannot discover even the makings of a fire. His family is hungry and cold; his wife and children are starving, and he knows not where to turn for food. Where shall he find the money to buy wine? Worse even than this, his relatives and friends turn aside their eyes, and show him nothing but coldness and contempt. There may have been a time when the poor wretch had ambitions; now they must perish, for he is in no position to enter into rivalry with others. Then there is the man who squanders his wealth to purchase the delights of love. It matters not how great that wealth may be, in one adventure he may cast away ten thousand golden pieces. Should he crave for wine, he will find it precious indeed, precious as molten jade, for to the outpouring of amber cups there is no end. Should it be rank he seeks, his wealth may conjure up spirits; a gesture may bring servants running to serve him, and a nod may summon his attendants. Men will flock to his presence and press forward to curry favour with him. They will hasten to abase themselves before his majesty, even to lick his sores and set their tongues where tongue should not be set. Only so long as he maintains his power will this continue: when once his influence is gone, they will shrug their shoulders and wait on him no more. No trial is harder to bear than this change from hot to cold. Are not both the upstart and they who fawn upon him sufferers from the plague of wealth? Then there is the danger that is to be had from women. Look around the world, I pray you. Liuxia Hui, though a fair lady seated herself upon his knee, remained unmoved. Where in these days shall we find conduct such as his? And he of Lu, who when a maid would have come to him, made fast his door and would not let her enter; where shall we find one like him? Or to Guan Yunchang who, with a lighted candle, kept chaste watch until the dawn? How many such heroes can history make known to us? What shall we say of those who, though they have four wives already, daily go forth to spend their substance on unlawful loves, unceasingly craving amorous delights? For the moment we will leave them, for there is that kind of lustful beast who cannot see a woman of even ordinary comeliness, without devising a hundred or a thousand plots to seduce her. He ensnares the woman, craving the pleasure of a moment, and for this neglects the affection of his friends, and takes no heed for the governance of his own household. To attain this paltry end, he pours forth countless wealth and casts immeasurable treasure to the dogs. His wantonness exceeds all bounds, and then come disputes, bloodshed, and all manner of evil. He is doomed. His wife and children are forever ruined and his business brought to the dust. Such a man was Shi Jilun who, for love of his mistress Lu Zhu, died wretchedly in prison, though, at one time, the masses of his wealth were high enough to touch the skies. Another was Bawang [Xiang Yu] of Chu, whose heroism might have uprooted mountains. Because of his madness for Yu Ji [Concubine Yu], his head hung in Gaixia. The gate of Love may be the gate of Life but just as surely is it the gate of Death. Time and time again, our common sense reminds us of this fact; and yet our hearts still carry us away. So do men fall victims to the plague of love. It is easy to talk thus of women and of wealth, yet there is none who is forever free of these plagues. If, in the entire world, there be one who appreciates the truth, he will tell us that all our piles of gold and silver, all the jade we treasure, can never follow us beyond the grave. They are but refuse, no more worth than dust and slime. Our wealth may be so great that nothing can contain it, our rice so plentiful that it may rot because we cannot consume it: to our dead bodies it will be of no avail; all will become corruption and decay. Our lofty palaces and spacious halls will bring no joy to us when we are in the grave. Our silken gowns and our embroidered skirts, our robes of fur and wraps of sable, what are they but worthless rags, for all the pride our bones will take in them? Those charming dainty maidens who serve our lusts so well, whose skill in self-adornment is so exquisite: when once the veil is torn aside, what shall we find in them but falseness? Are they not like a general who, when the signal is given for battle, can only manifest his valour by the noise he makes? Those scarlet lips, those white and glistening teeth, that flashing of eyes and dallying with the sleeve: if true understanding were vouchsafed us, we should know them for the loathsome grimaces of the powers of Hell within the palace of the Prince of Hades. The silken hose, the tiny feet are like the pick and shovel that dig our graves. Soft dalliance upon the pillow, the sport of love upon the bed, are but the forerunners of an eternity wherein, within the Fifth Abode of Hades, we shall be boiled in boiling oil. Well does the Diamond Sutra speak of this foolish life "as dream and as illusion; as lightning and as dew." For though at the end of life all things are vain, during life men cannot bear the loss even of a trifle. We may be so strong that, unaided, we can lift a cauldron or tow a ship but, when the end draws near, our bones will lose their strength and our sinews their power. Though our wealth may give us mountains of bronze and valleys of gold, they will melt like snow when the last moment comes. Though our beauty outshine the moon, and the flowers dare not raise their heads to look on us, the day will come when we shall be nothing but corruption, and men will hold their noses as they pass us by. Though we have the cunning of Lu Jia and Sui He, it will avail us nothing when our lips are cold, and no word may issue from our mouths. Let us then purify our senses, and put upon us the garment of repentance, that so, contemplating the emptiness and illusion of this world, we may free ourselves from the gate of birth and death, and, falling not into the straits of adversity, advance towards perfection. Thus, only may we enjoy leisure and good living and still escape the fires of Hell. I am brought to these reflections upon the true significance of wine and women, wealth and rage, remembering a family that, once flourishing, sank at length into a state of deepest misery. Then neither worldly wisdom nor ingenuity could save it, and not a single relative or friend would put forth a hand to help. For a few brief years the master of this household enjoyed his wealth, and then he died, leaving behind a reputation that none would envy. There were many in that household who always sought to flatter, to do well for themselves, to join in amorous pleasures, to stir up strife, and to turn their influence to their own profit. At first it seemed that all was well with them, yet it was not long before their corpses lay in the shadow, and their blood stained the deserted chamber.

Prologue
Reputation will not stay,
While the years still haste away:
Literary fame's a vain endeavour;
Paring ice and snipping snow,
Hoping from words' idle flow
To forge a blade of magic temper.
We judge the kings of ages past,
Assess their empire's right to last;
We see the Seven in turn rampage
Through restless years of a warring age:
Man's rise and fall, light as the willows',
Life but an empty boat on the billows.
So many have gone who once gained fame,
So many more who sought acclaim,
And many too who found and forsook it.
Into the Yangtze the moon dips swiftly,
The wilderness sprouts fields and causeways.
But who'd go looking for fish in an oak?
The fleeing ape leaps in the dark,
At sight of the bow, the bird turns back.
So just drink the cup, and lend an ear
To the new melody sounding here.
Ending the gloom of that unruly age,
The clouds disperse to unveil a flawless sky;
Fresh dews from Heaven, Nature's thirst assuage,
And ancient culture's placed again on high.
Silk robes are seen in all the streets and lanes,
In every quarter flutes and zithers sound;
Unbroken peace throughout the land now reigns,
And boundless ease, where spring's delights abound.

These verses are said to have been written by a famous scholar in Song times, when Emperor Shen Zong reigned. The scholar's name was Shao Yaofu,[2] and he was also known as the Taoist master Serene Virtue. The preceding period of the Five Dynasties, from the end of the Tang Dynasty, had been, alas, a time of ceaseless troubles. Suppose in the morning Liang held sway, by evening it was the house of Jin. Rightly was it written:

Emperors Zhu, Li, Shi, Liu and Guo
Founded Liang, Tang, Jin, Han and Zhou;
Fifteen emperors in a row
Bring fifty years of civil war.

Then the wheel of destiny turned and Emperor Tai Zu,[3] the Martial, was born at Jiamaying. When this heroic progenitor came into the world, a red light filled the sky, together with a mysterious fragrance, that still hung on the air the following morning. It was the God of Thunder himself who had come down to be born among men! The new emperor was filled with martial valour, endowed with far-seeing wisdom, and had no equal even in olden times. He wielded a staff as tall as himself, and reduced four hundred military and civil districts to submission. He swept the land clear and restored order to the central plains. The dynasty became known as Illustrious Song; the capital was established at Bianliang. This opened a succession of nine reigns and 8 emperors, lasting 4 centuries. It was for these reasons that Master Shao Yaofu wrote:

"The clouds disperse to unveil a flawless sky."

For it was indeed as if the people had at last been allowed the view of a clear sky once more. At that time there was on Mount Flower, the sacred peak in the West, a holy man named Chen Tuan, a saintly Taoist who could cast the future by observing the winds and rains. One day when he rode down from the mountain on his donkey, heading for the road to Huayin, he overheard some travellers saying, "The latest news from the Eastern Capital is that Chai Shizong has ceded the throne to Marshal Zhao." This news rejoiced Chen Tuan's heart. He raised both hands to his temples and laughed so heartily he fell off his donkey. When they asked him, "Why?"

He answered: "This will assure the stability of the universe. All will accord with heaven's will on high, earthly law below, and human happiness betwixt the two."

The abdication occurred in the year 960. The new emperor who came to the throne reigned for 17 years during which there was universal peace. He was succeeded by his brother, Tai Zong who reigned 22 years before relinquishing the throne to Zhen Zong who in turn would cede it to Ren Zong. Now Ren Zong was in fact an incarnation of the Barefoot Immortal, from the upper world. The moment he was born into this world of ours, he began to cry night and day without cease. An imperial edict was published, calling for help to provide a remedy. Heaven was moved to send down the Evening Star, in the guise of an old man who stepped up and grabbed the imperial edict, declaring that he could cure the Prince's crying. An official of the court admitted him to an audience with Zhen Zong. The Emperor was pleased to grant him entry to the inner courts so that he might examine the prince. The old man marched straight in, picked up the prince and whispered eight words to him, whereupon the child ceased his crying. Then without even divulging his name, the old man vanished in a sudden gust of wind. And what were they, these 8 words the old man whispered to the infant? "Peace star and martial star guide your reign." For the Jade Emperor had in fact assigned 2 stars from the Purple Constellation to watch over this ruler: for civil affairs, Bao Zheng, member of the Longtu Academy and Governor of Kaifeng; for military affairs, General Di Qing who led an army against Western Xia. These two wise ministers came forward to assist the new emperor whose 42-year rule was divided into nine imperial periods. For the 1st 9 years that coincided with the period of the reign named Tian Sheng, beginning with his accession in 1022, there was perfect peace in the land, with abundance of the five cereals and great content among the people, so much so that objects lost on the road by day were returned to their owners and no one needed to lock their doors at night. This was known as the first abundance. The following 9 years were also a time of prosperity, known as the second abundance. And for the 9 years after that, up to the 2rd year of the Jia You period, there were also rich harvests — the 3rd abundance. These 3 9-year stretches, 27 years in all, were popularly known as the triple abundance. The people lived in great contentment. But just when happiness is at its height, trouble is born. In the third year of Jia You, in spring, the plague struck. From the south of the Yangtze River to the 2 capitals, not a single human habitation escaped contagion. A flood of petitions, from every province and district, inundated the court. In and around the Eastern Capital a good half of the population died, civil and military. Bao Zheng, the lord chamberlain and Governor of Kaifeng district, undertook personally the preparation and distribution of medicaments for the benefit of the people in an attempt to save their lives. But it was to no avail; the plague intensified. All the civil and military dignitaries then held council. There they were, gathered together in the Court of the Water-clock, awaiting the dawn court when they planned to petition the emperor. Their intention was to ask him to offer prayers for delivery from the plague. And it was in consequence of this that 36 celestial powers came down to earth and 72 terrestrial powers came to dwell with men and the empire of the Song was shaken to the roots, Zhao's kingdom by storms assailed. For as the poem says:

Nurtured in plenty by a bounteous age
The people bathe in Nature's friendly charms;
Till peacetime arts are forced to quit the stage,

And music cedes its place to war's alarms;
While to the Marshes many a hero turns,
And in the mountain fortress strong men wait;
For of the world's ever-changing ups and downs
The master plan is drawn by Heaven and Fate.

There is a lyric to the tune Pleasing Eyes[6] that goes:

The hero grips his Hook of Wu,
Eager to cut off ten thousand heads.
How is it that a heart forged out of iron and stone,
Can yet be melted by a flower?
Just take a look at Hsiang Yü and Liu Pang:[3]
Both cases are equally distressing.
They had only to meet with Yü-chi[4] and Lady Ch'i,[5]
For all their valor to come to naught.[6]

The subject of this lyric is the words passion and beauty, 2 concepts that are related to each other as substance is to function. Thus, when beauty bedazzles the eye, passion is born in the heart. Passion and beauty evoke each other; the heart and the eye are interdependent. This is a fact that, from ancient times until the present day, gentlemen of moral cultivation ought never to forget. As 2 men of the Chin dynasty once said, "It is people just like ourselves who are most affected by passion"; [7] and "Beauty is like the lodestone which exerts its unseen pull on the needle even when obstacles intervene. If this be true even for nonsentient objects, how much the more must it be so for man, who must spend his days striving to survive in the realm of passion and beauty?"[8]

"The hero grips his Hook of Wu." Hook of Wu is the name of an ancient sword. In those days there were swords with names such as Kan-chiang, Mo-yeh, T'ai-o, Hook of Wu, Fish Gut, and Death's-head. [9] The lyric speaks of heroes with temperaments of iron and stone and the sort of heroic prowess that vaults across the heavens like a rainbow, who yet did not escape the fate of allowing their ambitions to be blunted by women. It then goes on to refer to the Hegemon-King of Western Ch'u, whose name was Hsiang Chi, or Hsiang Yü. Because the First Emperor of the Ch'in dynasty [10] was so lacking in virtue that he garrisoned the Five Ranges to the south, built the Great Wall to the north, filled in the sea to the east, constructed the O-pang Palace[11] in the west, swallowed up the 6 States, buried the scholars alive, and burned the books,[12] Hsiang Yü rose up in rebellion against him and was joined by the King of Han, whose name was Liu Chi, or Liu Pang. Liu Pang rolled up like a mat the territory in which the capital of the First Emperor had been located and thus put an end to the Ch'in dynasty. Later he and Hsiang Yü agreed to make the Hung Canal[13] a boundary line between their territories and divided the empire between them. Now, in the course of their conflict, Hsiang Yü was able, with the help of plans provided by Fan Tseng,[14] to defeat the King of Han in seventy-two military engagements. But he was so infatuated with his favourite, Yü-chi, who possessed the kind of beauty that can topple kingdoms, that he took her with him on his campaigns so they could be together day and night. The result of this was that he was finally defeated by Liu Pang's general, Han Hsin,[15] and had to flee by night as far as Yin-ling, where the enemy troops caught up with him. Although Hsiang Yü was defeated, he might have sought help from the area east of the Yangtze River but he could not bear to part with Yü-chi. Hearing the armies that surrounded him on all sides singing the songs of his homeland, the region of Ch'u, he realized that his situation was hopeless and expressed his sorrow in song:

My strength can uproot mountains,
My valour knows no peer;
But the times are against me,
And my steed will run no more.
My steed will run no more,
So what can I do?
Oh, Yü-chi, Yü-chi,
What is to be done?[16]

When he finished singing his face was streaked with tears. "Your highness must be sacrificing important military considerations on my account," Yü-chi said to him.

"Not really," the Hegemon-King replied. "It's just that we can't bear to give each other up. Moreover, you're such a beauty that Liu Pang, who is a ruler addicted to wine and women, is sure to take you for himself if he should see you."

"I'd rather die in an honest cause than compromise myself in order to save my life," Yü-chi wept. Then asking Hsiang Yü for his sword, she slit her throat and died. The Hegemon-King was so moved by her act that, when the time came, he followed suit by cutting his own throat. A historian has composed a poem to commemorate this event:

Gone was the strength that could uproot mountains, the dream of hegemony destroyed;
Laying aside his sword, he merely sang that his steed would run no more.
As bright moonlight flooded the encampment beneath the liquescent sky;
How could he bear to turn back his head and bid Yü-chi farewell?[17]

Now the King of Han, Liu Pang, was originally no more than a neighbourhood head in Ssu-shui. Yet, with his three-foot sword in hand, he slew the white snake [18] and rose in righteous revolt in the mountainous area between the districts of Mang and Tang. Three years later he destroyed the Ch'in dynasty, and in the fifth year of his reign destroyed the Ch'u, thereby winning the empire for himself and establishing the Han dynasty.[19] But he became infatuated with a woman whose maiden name was Ch'i. Lady Ch'i gave birth to a son whose title was Prince Ju-i of Chao. [20] Because Empress Lü[21] was jealous of her and wished her no good, Lady Ch'i was extremely uneasy. One day when Emperor Kao-tsu[22] was ill and lay with his head in her lap, Lady Ch'i began to weep, saying, "After you have fulfilled your ten thousand years, on whom shall my son and I be able to rely?"

"That shouldn't be a problem," the emperor said. "When I hold court tomorrow I'll depose the heir apparent and set up your son in his stead. How would that be?"

Lady Ch'i dried her tears and thanked him for his favour. When Empress Lü heard about this she summoned her husband's chief adviser, Chang Liang,[23] for a secret consultation. Chang Liang recommended that the Four Graybeards of Mount Shang be induced to come out of retirement and lend their support to the heir apparent. One day the Four Greybeards appeared in court with the heir apparent. When Emperor Kao-tsu saw these four men with their snow-white hair and beards and imposing caps and gowns, he asked them who they were. They identified themselves as Master Tung-yüan, Ch'i-li Chi, Master Hsia-huang, and Master Lu-li. Greatly astonished, the emperor asked, "Why did you not choose to come when We offered you employment in the past, only to appear today in the company of our son?"

"The heir apparent is destined to be the preserver of what Your Majesty has established," the 4 Greybeards replied.

Upon hearing this Emperor Kao-tsu felt dejected and upset. As the 4 Greybeards were on their way out of the palace he summoned Lady Ch'i into his presence, pointed them out to her, and said, "I'd have liked to replace the heir apparent but these four men have lent him their support. Now that his wings are full-grown his position will prove difficult to shake." Lady Ch'i wept inconsolably and the emperor extemporised a song to explain the situation:

The great swan soars aloft,
A thousand li in one flight.
Once his pinions are complete,
He can range the Four Seas.
He can range the Four Seas,
So what can we do?
Of what avail are stringed arrows,
Against a target that lies beyond their reach?[24]

The emperor finished his song and, in the end, did not make the Prince of Chao his heir apparent. After the death of Emperor Kao-tsu, to rid herself of her apprehensions, Empress Lü had Prince Ju-i of Chao put to death with poisoned wine and so mutilated Lady Ch'i as to turn her into a "human pig." [25]Poets have remarked, on reaching this point in their evaluations of these two rulers, that Liu Pang and Hsiang Yü were certainly heroes of their day and yet did not escape the fate of suffering their ambitions to be blunted by these 2 women. Although the position of wife is superior to that of concubine, the calamity that befell Lady Ch'i was even crueler than that which befell Yü-chi. Thus it is that the way of a wife or concubine who wishes to serve her husband faithfully and yet keep her head and neck intact within her own windows is hard. With regard to these two rulers, is it not true that they had only to meet with Yü-chi and Lady Ch'i, for all their valour to come to naught? There is a poem that testifies to this:

The favourites of Liu Pang and Hsiang Yü are much to be pitied;
These heroes proved powerless to protect their beauties.
Yet even the site of Lady Ch'i's burial remains unknown;
She was less fortunate than Yü-chi who has a tomb.[26]

Now why do you suppose your narrator is so preoccupied with explicating the two words passion and beauty?[27] It is because "Gentlemen who presume on their talents are lacking in virtue, and women who flaunt their beauty are dissolute. If only they were able to maintain the fullness of their gifts while taking care to avoid the overflow of excess, they could be upright men and virtuous women."[28] What need would they have then to fear the calamity of unnatural death? This has always been so, in ancient as in modern times; it is as true for the exalted as for the humble. Now this is an instance of a beautiful woman who is embodied in a tiger and engenders a tale of the passions. In it, a licentious woman commits adultery with a decadent man-about-town:

Every evening devoted to the pursuit of pleasure;
Every morning an occasion for deluded dalliance.
But in the end she does not escape the fate of:
A corpse prostrate beneath the blade,
A bloodstained carcass in the Yellow Springs;[29]
Never again to don silk or satin,
No longer able to apply rouge or powder.

If we pause to reflect on these events, from whence do they arise?[30] And moreover, what does the death of such a woman matter anyway?

He who coveted her sent to perdition his imposing six-foot body;
He who loved her squandered wealth enough to splash against the sky.[31]
The prefecture of Tung-p'ing was dumbfounded;
The district of Ch'ing-ho was greatly disturbed.

If, in fact, you don't know to whose family this woman belonged, whose wife she was, by whom she was subsequently usurped, or at whose hands she died, truly: the telling of this tale is enough to knock the peak of Mount Hua askew; its revelation is sufficient to make the Yellow River flow backward.[32]

During the years of the Cheng-ho reign period[33] of Emperor Hui-tsung[34] of the Sung dynasty,[35] the emperor bestowed his trust and favour upon the 4 wicked ministers, Kao Ch'iu,[36] Yang Chien,[37] T'ung Kuan, [38]and Ts'ai Ching[39] with the result that the empire was thrown into great disorder. The people were unable to pursue their vocations and the populace was in dire straits. On all sides bandits arose in swarms and baleful stars descended to earth to be incarnated in human form. [40] The glittering facade presented by the empire of the Great Sung dynasty was disrupted and in 4 different places, great bandit chieftains arose. Who were these 4 great bandit chieftains? In Shantung there was Sung Chiang,[41] in Huai-hsi there was Wang Ch'ing. In Hopei, there was T'ien Hu.[42]In Chiang-Nan there was Fang La.[43] All of them disrupted sub-prefectures and pillaged districts, setting fires and killing people; assuming royal titles for themselves. Among them Sung Chiang alone carried out the Way on Heaven's behalf,[44] and devoted himself to the righting of injustice; endeavouring to slay all the venal officials, corrupt functionaries, evil magnates, and delinquent commoners in the empire.

001

Zhang the Divine Teacher/Heavenly Master Prays for Cessation to Dispel Plagues; the Foolish Marshal Hong makes a Blunder & Releases Demons by Mistake

After Five Dynasties' turmoil and strife,
The clouds dispersed and revealed the sky,
Refreshing rain brought old trees new life,
Culture and learning once again were high.
Ordinary folk in the lanes wore silk,
Music drifted from mansions and towers,
Under the heavens, all was serene,
Men dozed off at noon midst happy birds and flowers.

This 8-lined poem was written during the reign of Emperor Shen Zong of the Song Dynasty[2] by a scholar named Shao Yaofu, also known as Master Kang Jie. From the end of the Tang[3] and all through the Five Dynasties, times had been troubled. One short-lived dynasty had ruled after another. How true was the verse:

Emperors Zhu, Li, Shi, Liu and Guo
Founded Liang, Tang, Jin, Han and Zhou;
Fifteen emperors fifty years in a row,
Bringing hardship, tumult and woe.

In time, the way of Heaven took a new turn. At Jiamaying, Tai Zu, the Emperor of Military Virtue, was born. A red glow suffused the sky when this sage came into the world, and fragrance still filled the air the following morning. He was in fact the God of Thunder descended to earth. Brave and magnanimous, he was superior to any emperor who had ever lived. With a staff as tall as himself he smote so hard that four hundred prefectures and districts acknowledged his sovereignty. He swept the land clean and pacified the Central Plains. Naming his empire the Great Song, he established his court at Bianliang. Tai Zu was the first of eighteen Song emperors and founder of a dynasty lasting 4 centuries. That is why Master Shao Yaofu said in his praise, " The clouds dispersed and revealed the sky."

For the people it was indeed like seeing the sun again. At that time on Huashan, the West Sacred Mountain, lived a Taoist hermit named Chen Tuan. A virtuous man, he could foretell the future by the weather. One day as he was riding his donkey down the mountain towards the county town of Huayin he heard a traveller on the path say, "Emperor Chai Shi Zong[5] has surrendered his throne to Marshal Zhao[6] in the Eastern Capital."

Chen clapped his hands to his brow and laughed so delightedly that he fell off his donkey. Asked the reason for his joy, he said: "The empire will be firmly settled from now on. For this is in accord with the will of Heaven above, the laws of Earth below, and the hearts of men between."

Marshal Zhao accepted the abdication in 960 and established his regime. He ruled for 17 years, and there was peace throughout the land. He was succeeded by his younger brother, Tai Zong, who ruled for 22 years. After Tai Zong came Zhen Zong who was succeeded by Ren Zong. Emperor Ren Zong was actually a re-incarnation of the Barefoot Immortal. When he came down and was born on earth he cried day and night without cease. The imperial court posted a proclamation, inviting any man who could cure him to come forward. Heaven was touched and sent the Great Star of White Gold in the guise of an old man. Announcing he could cure the prince's weeping, the old man took down the proclamation. The officer in charge conducted him to the palace, where the emperor directed that he be allowed to see Ren Zong in the inner apartments. The old man went in, picked up the baby, and whispered eight words into his ear. At once, the prince stopped crying. The old man disappeared in a puff of air without even revealing his name. What were the eight words? They were these: "Civil and military affairs, both have their stars."

The fact was that the Jade Emperor of Heaven had dispatched two stars from the Propitious Constellation to serve the future emperor. The civil affairs star became Bao Zheng, prefect of Kaifeng and a senior member of the Dragon Diagram Academy. The military affairs star became Di Qing, the great general who led an expedition against the Kingdom of Western Xia. With the help of these two ministers, Ren Zong ruled as emperor for forty-two years, in the course of which he gave special names to nine periods of his reign. During the first nine years, or the Tian Sheng period, all went well. Grain harvests were large; the people were happy at their work; no one kept articles lost by others on the road; doors were left unlocked at night. That was the period of the "First Abundance."

From the beginning of the Ming Dao period to the third year of Huang You another nine years of prosperity followed. That was the period of "Second Abundance."

From the fourth year of Huang You to the second year of Jia You, nine years more, the fields continued to flourish. That was the period of the "Third Abundance."

These three nine-year periods, twenty-seven years in all, were known as the Era of Three Abundances. During that time the people enjoyed great happiness. Who could have foreseen that extreme joy would give birth to sorrow?

In the third year of the Jia You period, a plague struck the land. From the south to the two capitals, not a single hamlet escaped the contagion. The imperial court was snowed under with petitions for relief from every district and prefecture. More than half the soldiers and residents in and around the Eastern Capital died. Bao Zheng, counsellor and prefect of Kaifeng, published the officially approved prescriptions and spent his own money on medicines in an attempt to save the people. But to no avail. The plague grew worse. All the high civil and military officials conferred. They gathered in the Hall of the Water Clock and waited for daybreak, when court would be held, so that they could appeal to the emperor.

That day, the third day of the third month of the third year of the Jia You period, at the third interval of the fifth watch Emperor Ren Zong mounted his throne in the imperial palace. After the officials had made their obeisance, the chief of ceremonies cried: "If anyone has a petition, let him come forward. If there are none, this court will adjourn."

Zhao Zhe, the Premier, and Wen Yanbo, his deputy, advanced and said: "The plague is raging unabated in the capital. Victims among the soldiers and the people are many. We hope Your Majesty, in a forgiving and benevolent spirit, will reduce prison sentences and cut taxes, and pray to Heaven that the people be relived of this affliction."

The emperor at once ordered the Hanlin Academy to draw an edict proclaiming a general amnesty for all prisoners and cancelling all taxes. He also directed that every temple and monastery in the capital offer prayers for a termination of the disaster.

But the plague only became worse. The emperor was very disturbed and summoned his officials for a conference. A prominent minister stepped forth and asked to be heard ahead of turn. The emperor saw that it was Fan Zhongyan, his Deputy Premier.

Fan kowtowed, then rose and said: "The plague is decimating our soldiers and citizenry. No one is safe. In my humble opinion, if this pestilence is to be ended Your Majesty should summon the Divine Teacher of the Taoists, who comes from a papal line dating back to Han times. Let him travel day and night and rush here to the capital and conduct a great prayer service in the imperial park. In this way the people will be saved."

Emperor Ren Zong approved Fan's proposal. He directed the scholars of the Hanlin Academy to draw up an edict that he signed personally, and issued a bunch of royal incense sticks. He ordered that Marshal Hong Xin go as his emissary to the Dragon and Tiger Mountain in Xinzhou Prefecture of Jiangxi Province and fetch Zhang the Divine Teacher. While incense burned in the imperial hall, the emperor himself placed the edict in Marshal Hong's hands and told him to set out immediately.

Hong accepted the royal edict and took leave of the emperor. With the edict in a bag on his back and the incense sticks in a golden box, he mounted his horse and left the Eastern Capital, leading a column of several score men. They headed directly for Guixi, a county town in Xinzhou Prefecture.

After a number of days they arrived. Officials, high and low, greeted Marshal Hong. They sent word to the abbot and other Taoists in the Temple of Supreme Purity on the Dragon and Tiger Mountain to get ready to receive the imperial edict.

The next day the officials accompanied Marshal Hong to the foot of the mountain. A procession of Taoists, beating drums and bells, playing saintly music, bearing incense and candles, banners and canopies, came down to receive the imperial envoy. They escorted him to the temple, where he dismounted. All of the Taoists, from the abbot to the lowliest novice, gathered round and led him to the Hall of Three Purities. They asked him to place the royal edict on an altar.

"Where is the Divine Teacher?" Marshal Hong inquired of the abbot.

"You must understand, Marshal," replied the abbot, "our Teacher is known as 'Pure Serenity.' He is of a very exalted nature and cannot be bothered with such mundane matters as welcoming and seeing off visitors. He has built a thatched hut on the top of the mountain, and there he meditates and cultivates his spirit."

"But I have an imperial edict. How can I find him?"

"Leave the edict here in this hall. None of us will dare to unroll it. Please come into the abbey for some tea. We can talk things over there."

Marshal Hong did as the abbot suggested. When he had seated himself amid his hosts in the abbey, tea and meatless dishes of many varieties were served. After the meal, the marshal said to the abbot: "You say the Divine Teacher is in a thatched hut on the mountain top. Why not ask him to come down and receive the royal edict?"

"He's up there, all right, keeping himself aloof from the world. But our Divine Teacher has an unusual knowledge of the Way. He can ride the clouds and mists. Nobody knows exactly where he is. We ordinary Taoists are rarely able to see him. How can we ask him to come down?"

"I must meet him. A plague is raging in the capital and the emperor has sent me with an imperial edict and royal incense to invite him to conduct a great prayer service that will dispel the pestilence and save the people. What can I do?"

"You must first prove your piety. Eat no meat, bathe and change into simple cotton garments. With the edict on your back, carry burning incense and travel on foot alone to the summit. There, kowtow, and cry your invitation aloud. Then perhaps you'll be able to meet the Divine Teacher. But if you're not sincere your trip will be in vain. You'll never see him."

"I've eaten nothing but vegetables since I left the capital. Doesn't that show I'm sincere? I shall do as you say. I'll start up the mountain the first thing in the morning."

Everyone retired for the night. At the fifth watch the following morning the Taoists prepared scented water and a vegetarian meal for the marshal. After bathing in the scented water he dressed in new cotton garments and straw sandals, ate the meatless breakfast, wrapped the imperial edict in a piece of yellow silk and tied it on his back. In a silver censer he carried the smoking incense. Many Taoists escorted him to the mountain behind the temple and pointed out the path.

"You must never retreat, if you are to save the people, Marshal," said the abbot. "Just push on piously."

Bidding the Taoists farewell and calling on the Highest Deity for aid, Marshal Hong started up the mountain, alone. He climbed the twisting overgrown path for two or three li," crossing a number of peaks. Soon his feet ached and his legs grew weary. He felt he couldn't move another step. Though he didn't say it aloud, he grumbled to himself: "An important government official like me. When I'm in the capital I lie on double mattresses and dine on banquet dishes. Even then I don't have much energy. What am I doing here in straw sandals, climbing this mountain path? Who knows where that Divine Teacher is anyhow? Why should I have to endure these torments?"

He was panting hard, his shoulders heaving, before he had gone another fifty paces. A strong wind blew through the hollow. When it had passed, a roar thundered from behind the pines and out leaped a huge tiger, with bulging eyes, a white forehead and striped fur.

"Aiya!" cried the marshal, toppling over backwards in terror.

The tiger, its eyes fixed upon him, circled left and right. Then it roared again and bounded off down the rear slope. Marshal Hong lay beneath a tree, his teeth chattering, his heart clanging like fifteen buckets in a single well. Paralyzed as if suffering a stroke, his legs limper than a defeated cock's, he could only moan.

Not until the tiger had been gone the time it takes to drink a cup of tea was the marshal able to crawl to his feet. He picked up the censer, re-lit the royal incense and continued up the mountain in search of the Divine Teacher.

The marshal climbed another forty or fifty paces. He sighed. "If the emperor hadn't set a time limit on my mission, I wouldn't have had to suffer such a fright."

Before he finished speaking a strong wind blasted him with foul air. Marshal Hong heard a loud hissing. A big snake, thick as a bucket and dappled with snow-white spots, wriggled out of a grove of bamboo and vines on the mountainside.

"I'm dead man!" exclaimed the marshal. He fell on his back beside a spiral-shaped rock, dropping his censer.

The great snake moved rapidly towards the rock, then twisted itself into coils, its eyes shooting golden sparks. It opened its large mouth, flickering its tongue, and breathed poisonous fumes in the marshal's face.

So horrified was Marshal Hong that his three souls drifted and his seven spirits departed. The serpent looked at him, then slithered down the mountain and was quickly lost to sight. Only then was the marshal able to haul himself erect.

"Lucky," he muttered. "That snake nearly scared me to death!" There were goose pimples all over his body. He cursed the abbot: "What rudeness, playing tricks on me and frightening me so. If I don't find the Divine Teacher on the summit I'll settle with that abbot when I get down!"

Again, he picked up the silver incense burner, straightened his clothes, settled the edict on his back, and adjusted his hat. About to go on, he heard the notes of a flute coming softly from behind the pines. Gradually, the melody drew nearer. A yellow ox plodded over the rise. A boy novice, seated on its back, was smiling as he played a metal flute.

"Where are you from?" called the marshal. "Do you know who I am?"

The boy merely continued playing. Marshal Hong shouted the question several times. The boy laughed and pointed at him with his flute.

"You've come looking for the Divine Teacher, haven't you?" he said.

The marshal was astounded. "You're just a cowherd. How do you know?"

Smiling, the boy replied: "When I was serving the Divine Teacher in his thatched hut this morning he said: 'The emperor has sent a Marshal Hong here with royal incense and an imperial edict for me to go to the Eastern Capital and conduct a great prayer service that will drive away the plague. I'll mount a crane, ride the clouds, and go there today. He must have left by now. He's not in the hut. There's no point in your climbing any higher. The mountain is full of venomous snakes and savage beasts. They're liable to kill you."

"Are you telling me the truth?" the marshal demanded.

The novice only laughed but didn't reply. He resumed playing his flute and rode off around the bend. "How could that child know so much?" the marshal wondered. "The Divine Teacher must have told him. That's it." He hesitated. "I've had those terrible frights and nearly lost my life. Maybe I'd better go back."

Carrying the censer, he returned hastily down the same path he had come. The Taoists received him and invited him to be seated in the abbey. "Did you meet the Divine Teacher?" the abbot asked.

"I'm a high official of the imperial court. How could you send me up a mountain path and make me suffer such torments? I was nearly killed. First, halfway up, a big tiger with bulging eyes and a white forehead jumped out and scared the wits out of me. Then, before I had passed another gap, a great snake with snow-white spots wriggled from a thicket of bamboo and vines, wrapped itself in coils, and blocked my path. If I weren't lucky, I'd never get back to the capital alive. It's all the fault of you Taoists. Making sport of me!"

"Would we humble Taoists dare show disrespect to a high minister?" said the abbot. "The Divine Teacher was testing your piety. Although there are snakes and tigers on our mountain, they don't hurt people."

"By then I could hardly walk. Just as I was about to continue up the slope, a novice, sitting on a yellow ox and playing a metal flute, came riding over the rise. I asked him: 'Where are you from? Do you know me?' He answered: 'I know all about you.' He said the Divine Teacher told him he would mount a crane and ride the clouds to the Eastern Capital this morning. That's why I've returned."

"Too bad," cried the abbot. "Marshal, you missed your chance. That boy was the Divine Teacher."

"A rustic-looking fellow like that?"

"The Divine Teacher of this generation is very unusual. Although young in years, he has a remarkable command of the Way. He's not an ordinary mortal. He can appear in any guise he wishes. People call him the Master of the Way."

"I saw him and didn't recognize him! What a shame."

"Never mind, Marshal. Since the Divine Teacher said he was going, by the time you return to the capital, the great prayer service will be successfully finished."

On hearing this, the marshal felt better. The abbot ordered that a banquet be prepared for him. At the abbot's suggestion, the imperial edict was placed in a casket for royal documents, to be retained permanently in the temple; the royal incense was burned in the Hall of Three Purities. A big feast of meatless dishes was spread in the abbey. The diners ate and drank until dark. Then all retired.

After breakfast the next morning, the abbot, priests and abbey superintendents invited the marshal out for a sight-seeing stroll. He accepted with pleasure. Led by two novices they left the abbey, followed by a large entourage. They walked around the temple grounds, enjoying the beautiful scenery.

In the Hall of Three Purities the marshal was shown objects precious beyond words. He visited also the Nine Heavens Hall, the Propitious Star Hall, and the North Pole Hall, beside a covered walk on the left side of the grounds. Along another such walk on the right he inspected the Great Monad Hall, the Three Officials Hall and the Hall for Dispelling Evil.

He was then escorted to the grounds in the rear of the right walk. There he observed a building with walls as red as peppers, and vermilion-coloured lattice-work on its two front windows. A lock as thick as a man's arm clamped together its double doors. A dozen strips of paper, pasted across the crack where the doors met, were stamped with innumerable red seals. Beneath the front eaves was a red plaque inscribed with letters of gold, reading: "Suppression of Demons Hall."

"What is this place?" asked the marshal.

"A hall where an earlier Divine Teacher imprisoned some demons," replied the abbot.

"Why are there so many seals on the doors?"

"A Divine Teacher known as the Royal Master of the Way locked the demons in there in Tang times. Each subsequent Divine Teacher added his own seal, prohibiting any successor from opening the doors. If those demons escaped, it would be awful. Nine generations of Divine Teachers have ruled since then, and they all vowed to keep the hall closed. The lock has been filled with melted bronze. Who knows what's in there? I've been in charge of this temple for thirty years but I only know what I've been told."

Marshal Hong was surprised. "I certainly would like to see a demon," he thought. To the abbot he said: "Open the doors. I want to see what a demon looks like."

"I cannot, Marshal," the abbot replied. "The early generation Divine Teacher has forbidden it. No one today would dare."

The marshal laughed. "Nonsense. The story is an invention to delude people. You've deliberately prepared this place so that you can say you've got demons imprisoned as proof of the power of your Taoist magic. I've read many books but none of them says anything about how to lock up demons. Spirits inhabit only the Nether Regions. I don't believe you've got any demons in there. Open up and let me have a look."

"This hall mustn't be opened," the abbot pleaded. "It would mean disaster." Marshal Hong grew angry. He pointed his finger at the Taoists and roared: "If you don't do as I say I'll report to the court that you prevented me from delivering the imperial edict and refused to let me see the Divine Teacher. I'll tell how you rigged up this hall and invented the story that you've got demons inside in order to fool the public. I'll have your religious orders cancelled and have you all tattooed with the mark of the criminal and exiled to a wild and distant region!"

The abbot feared the influence of Marshal Hong. He had no choice but to order some blacksmith priests to remove the scales and break the lock. Then the doors were pushed open and everyone entered the hall. It was pitch dark. The marshal called for a dozen torches. When these were brought he saw that the hall was empty except for a stone tablet in the centre. About six feet high, it was based on a stone tortoise which was sunk halfway into the damp earthen floor. Hong moved the torches closer to the tablet. The front was inscribed with dragon and phoenix scripts and mystic signs and symbols which no one could understand. Then he looked at the back. There, written large, were four words: "Open when Hong comes."

The marshal was delighted. "You tried to stop me," he said to the abbot. "Yet my name was written here hundreds of years ago. 'Open when Hong comes.' It's perfectly plain. What's wrong if I have a look? I believe the demons are right here beneath this stone. Get a few more men with mattocks and shovels and dig it out."

The abbot was horrified. "We can't do that, Marshal. Something terrible may happen. It's not safe!"

"What do you know, anyway?" the marshal shouted angrily. "It says clearly on the tablet it can be removed when I come. How dare you stop me? Get me those men."

Four or five times the abbot pleaded: "No good will come of it." But the marshal wouldn't listen. The workmen were summoned. After long and strenuous effort they pushed over the tablet and pried the stone tortoise out of the ground.

Then they started shovelling. At four feet they came upon a big stone slab some ten feet square. Marshal Hong directed them to dig it out. "You mustn't," begged the abbot but the marshal ignored him. When the men had removed the slab, a pit one hundred thousand feet deep was revealed. A great ripping sound was heard, and a black cloud shot out of the pit. It tore through half a corner of the roof and zoomed into the sky, where it split into more than a hundred golden rays which shimmered in every direction.

Everyone shouted in fright and threw down their tools. They dashed out of the hall, bowling people over left and right. Marshal Hong goggled and gaped helplessly. His face was the colour of earth. He hurried out to the porch, where the abbot was lamenting.

"Who are those demons who escaped?" Hong asked.

"Oh, Marshal, you didn't know," groaned the abbot. "In this hall the Master of the Way left a written warning. It said: 'Thirty-six stars of Heavenly spirits and seventy-two stars of Earthly Fiends, a total of one hundred and eight demons, are imprisoned here, held down by a stone tablet inscribed with their names, written in a mystic script that resembles dragons and phoenixes. If they are released on earth they will cause no end of trouble.' Now you've let them out. What are we going to do?"

The marshal trembled and broke into a cold sweat. He hastily collected his luggage, marched down the mountain with his men and headed for the capital. The abbot and the Taoists saw them off, and then returned to the temple where they repaired the roof and re-erected the stone tablet.

*

During the return trip, afraid that the emperor would reproach him, the marshal instructed his men to say nothing about the escape of the demons. The march was uneventful. Travelling day and night, they soon reached Bianliang, the Eastern Capital. On entering the city, they were told: "The Divine Teacher held a great prayer service in the Imperial Park for seven days and seven nights and distributed many charms. Now the sick are cured and the plague is completely gone. The Divine Teacher has taken leave of the emperor and returned to the Dragon and Tiger Mountain, astride a crane and riding the clouds."

At early court the following morning, Marshal Hong reported to the emperor. "The Divine Teacher mounted a crane and rode the clouds, so he arrived first," said Hong. "We'd to march every stage of the road. That's why we didn't get here till now." The emperor approved of his report. He rewarded the marshal and ordered him to resume his post. Emperor Ren Zong ruled for 42 years and died without leaving a son. The throne passed to the son of Prince Yun Rang of Puan. A grandson of Tai Zong, he is known by his posthumous title of Ying Zong. After 4 years of rule, he abdicated in favour of his son, Shen Zong who reigned for 18 years and then gave the throne to his son Zhe Zong. During this entire period, there was peace throughout the land and no disturbances. But not so fast. If it was true that nothing happened, what'd we have to tell in this novel? Readers, don't be alarmed for in what follows 36 stars of Heavenly Spirits come to earth and 72 stars of Earthly Fiends appear among men. Valiant hide in strongholds, heroes gather in the marshes.

In the days when the Great Song Emperor Ren Zong reigned. It was in the 3rd drumbeat of the 5th watch — dawn, in other words — of the 3rd day of the 3rd lunar month of the 3rd year of Jia You, and His Majesty had just proceeded to the Purple Imperial Palace to receive the obeisance of all the mandarins of the court. Here's how it was:

Auspicious clouds engulf the Phoenix Hall,
A precious air invests the Dragon Tower;
Mist-veiled palace willows flirt with flags,
And dew-starred royal blossoms welcome swords.
'Mid smoke of incense, jade pins and scarlet shoes
Invade the vermilion courts;
To heavenly harmonies, rich gowns and flowery robes
Escort the royal sedan.
Respectful screens of jade deploy
When the sacred chaise attains the golden palace;
Peacock feather fans unfold,
As the precious carriage halts by the white jade steps.

3 times the crack of a distant whip resounds;
In serried ranks, the imperial court attends.

Then the master of ceremonies shouted: "If there are matters to report stand forth and declare them; if not, take leave and depart."

Accordingly the Prime Minister, Zhao Zhe, and the Chief Counsellor, Wen Yanbo stepped forward and said: "Your Imperial Majesty, a fearful plague is raging in the capital at the present time. There have been many losses among your subjects, both civil and military. We beseech Your Majesty, of your graciousness, to vouchsafe pardon to transgressors, to relax punishments and reduce taxes, and to offer up prayers and sacrifices for the avoidance of heaven-sent disasters and the delivery of all your people."

The Son of Heaven, on hearing this petition, instructed the Imperial Academy to prepare forthwith an edict proclaiming the remission of prison sentences throughout the empire and the total abolition of general taxes and levies, and at the same time ordering all Buddhist temples and Taoist monasteries in the capital to perform the appropriate rites for the prevention of natural disasters. To everyone's confusion, the troubles merely intensified. When the Emperor was informed of this, he was greatly perturbed and summoned his ministers to council. From amongst the group of counsellors, one stepped forward to request a hearing. It was Fan Zhongyan, the Deputy Chief Minister, who, after prostrating himself, rose and said: "A great ill afflicts the land; the whole population, civil and military, suffers extremely; day and night the people struggle in vain to secure their lives. I therefore venture to offer this humble proposal: to save us from this affliction, let a message be sent, if it please Your Majesty, to the Heavenly Master, bidding him travel with all speed to the court and offer here in the Forbidden City the three thousand six hundred libations to the heavenly constellations, requesting the Lord of Heaven to lift this burden of suffering from your people." The Emperor gave his consent, and told the Imperial Academy to draft a proclamation immediately. This the Emperor then graciously copied in his own hand, deigning also to add some sticks of incense. Marshal Hong Xin, the palace superintendent, was appointed imperial envoy, with instructions to proceed to the Dragon-Tiger Mountain[1] in Xinzhou district, in the Province of Jiangxi, and invite the Heavenly Master, Zhang the Pure, to hasten to the capital to perform the propitiatory rites. Incense was burnt in the Golden Palace, while the Emperor personally placed the imperial order in the Marshal's hands, urging him to set out at the earliest opportunity. In accordance with the royal wish Hong Xin took leave of the Son of Heaven, took up the imperial edict and casket containing the incense, collected a number of men, mounted a relay horse, and followed by his escort left the Eastern Capital, taking the most direct route to Guixi, a county town in Xinzhou district. Here's how it was:

The far hills are folds of blue,
The distant waters a clear green;
Rare flowers deck the woods with rich embroidery,
Fresh willows strew the floor with golden thread.
Soft are the winds and warm the sun.
Past country inns and mountain villages
The way first lies.
Now the road is straight and the land flat:
They lodge at night in hostels on the route.
Gorgeous robes swirl over the red dust.
Thoroughbreds gallop across the purple steppe.

And so Marshal Hong Xin and his retinue set out with the sacred edict; and they came, not losing a day, to Guixi, where all the officials turned out to meet them, outside the city walls. A messenger was sent ahead to tell the Superior and the monks at the Temple of Holy Purity on Dragon-Tiger Mountain to prepare to receive the imperial edict. Next day the officials escorted Hong Xin to the foot of the Dragon-Tiger Mountain. Here a crowd of Taoists from the Temple of Holy Purity came trooping down the hillside, striking gongs and beating drums; they came with incense, flowers, lamps and candles, carrying a precious reliquary adorned with silken streamers and playing music of the Immortals, to receive the solemn edict.

The imperial envoy did not dismount till he was right in front of the temple. And what a place it was, that Temple of Holy Purity! Here's what met their eyes:

Grey-green the pines, gnarled and twisted; bright bluish green the cypress, leafy and luxuriant. Over the door, an imperial inscription, copied in characters of gold; framing the doorway, the sacred signs and symbols. On the verge of the sanctuary, a willow dimly droops its celebrated flowers; next to the purificational crucible, ancient pine and imperial juniper block out the sun. On the wall to the left the Celestial Guards accompany the Sovereign Lord; on the right-hand wall, Jade Maidens and Golden Boys attend the Purple Emperor. With flying hair and brandished sword, the Perfect Warrior, Master of the North, bestrides the turtle and the snake; in his down-trodden shoes and square hat the Old Man of the South straddles dragon and tiger. Aligned in front, the twenty-eight Lords of the Heavenly Mansions; at the back, the thirty-two Heavenly Princes. Below the steps, running water murmurs gently; behind the garden wall friendly slopes give shelter. There are red-headed cranes and green-haired turtles, offerings of fruit laid on the branches of trees for the green apes, fragrant white deer squatting in the sedge. A golden bell is struck in the Hall of the Three Pure Ones and the Taoists process, chanting their litanies; jade clappers are sounded in front of the Chapel of the Four Holy Ones and the votaries pay homage to the Dipper. On the incense-burning platform coloured clouds irradiate the deep-blue tiles. On the precious altar of supplication, the sun's red is reflected by crimson agate. An auspicious cloud hovers at the gates: the Heavenly Master, as it might be, bidding farewell to Lao-Tze.

At once all the Taoists, from the saintly Superior down to the meanest acolyte, pressed forward to meet the Marshal and escort him to the Hall of the Three Pure Ones. They requested him to present the imperial proclamation to the gods then and there in the hall.

"But where is the Heavenly Master?" the Marshal inquired.

It was the Superior who came forward and answered. "Your Excellency should please be informed that the Heavenly Master of this generation, whose title is 'Heavenly Master of the Tranquil Vacuity,' has achieved great sanctity, and weary of the world's incessant coming and going, has retired to the top of the Dragon-Tiger Mountain, where he has built himself a thatched cabin and devotes himself to developing virtue and cultivating his spirit. For this reason he is not in residence here."

The Marshal said: "I have to give him the Son of Heaven's message, how can I see him?"

The Superior replied: "If it please Your Excellency, let the imperial edict be placed temporarily in this hall; we humble Taoists will not dare to meddle with it. Then do me the honour of accompanying me to my quarters to take tea, while we consider how to proceed."

Accordingly the edict was placed, with all due care, in the Hall of the Three Pure Ones, and the entire company removed to the Superior's private quarters. The Marshal seated himself in the centre of the room, and several lay brothers brought in tea. A lavish vegetarian meal was also served. When this was ended, the Marshal said: "If the Heavenly Master is in his cabin on the peak, might not someone be sent to request him to come down and meet me here, so that I may deliver the Emperor's message?"

"The Heavenly Master of this generation may be on the mountain," the Superior replied, "but he has achieved such a degree of perfection that he can ride the mists and mount the clouds, and his footsteps are not fixed. We poor Taoists can rarely catch a glimpse of him; how then can we send someone to ask him to descend?"

"In that case, how am I ever to see him?" the Marshal exclaimed. "This very moment a plague is ravaging the capital, and the Emperor entrusted his edict to me, and the imperial incense, with instructions to bring it personally to the Dragon-Tiger Mountain and request the Heavenly Master to perform the three thousand six hundred libations to avert disaster and save the people. So what am I to do?"

"If the Son of Heaven wishes to save the people," the Superior proposed, "the only way is this: You must free your heart, Your Excellency, from all insincerity, fast and bathe yourself and don simple attire, dismiss your suite, and take the imperial tablets on your own back. Then, lighting the imperial incense, you must ascend the mountain on foot to pay your respects and make your request to the Heavenly Master. In this way perhaps you may be granted an interview. But if your heart is not pure, the journey will be in vain, for then it is unlikely you will have sight of the Heavenly Master."

The Marshal replied: "On my journey from the capital I have eaten frugally that surely is proof enough of my sincerity. But if that is how it is, I will do as you say. I will climb the mountain tomorrow at break of day."

Everyone went to bed early that night. Next morning before dawn the Taoists rose and prepared scented bath-water for the Marshal to bathe himself. He put on a clean robe of plain cotton and a pair of hemp sandals, ate a light vegetarian meal, and took up the imperial edict that he wrapped in yellow silk and tied on between his shoulder-blades. He carried also a silver censer in which he carefully burnt the imperial incense. A group of Taoists accompanied him to the foot of the mountain at the back of the temple, to show him the way.

"If Your Excellency wishes to save the people," the Superior reminded him, "you must put aside all retrospective thoughts and proceed with a pure intention."

The Marshal bade the monks farewell, and reciting the name of the Lord of Heaven began the steep ascent. About half way, he paused to look up: the peak seemed to invade heaven's vault, what a mountain it was! Hear what he saw:

Its roots are twined in the crannies of the earth, its summit brushes the zenith. From afar it seems to pierce and wound the clouds; near to, it swallows the bright moon's soul. Such broken heights and depths — truly this can be called a mountain! Such a way through overhanging rocks — a veritable tunnel! The only road a track winding over lonely ridges to the flattened summit set about with what a fantastic assembly of spurs! There are caverns where tigers and wild-cats lurk, secret grottoes that are home to the winds and clouds. What a cave, the one where the holy man lives concealed! A whole region this, with its own frontiers. If the woodcutter can get through, you can say there's a path, if a horse and cart can pass, call it a highway; the sound of rushing water signals a gorge, the old ford introduces you to a brook, water dripping from the rock reveals a spring. The cliff on the left is a blank wall, the cliff on the right reflects the sun. On the outside, nothing but cloud; inside you're in the mist. The path climbs pinnacles that are sharpened to a point, ascends prodigious cliffs, perilously skirts the void, traverses flattened terraces. A thousand peaks vie in splendour, a million torrents rush headlong. Waterfalls trail their slanting sheets in the air, creepers dangle topsy-turvy. The tiger roars and the wind rises in the valley mouth; the gibbon howls and moonlight floods the slopes. The picture is painted in different greens, like a jade mosaic; the whole scene is clothed in tatters of mist like finest silk.

Thus the Marshal ascended for a while, following the twists and turns of the path, sometimes having to hold onto vines and creepers to pull himself up. After passing several crests and covering almost a mile, his feet were aching and his legs seemed to have turned to jelly and were refusing to carry him further. Too tired to speak and all his resolve failing, he began to complain to himself: "I am a man of some standing at the court; in the capital I sleep on mats of double thickness and they serve me from many dishes, and I am exempt from all that is wearisome; when have I ever worn hemp sandals, or been obliged to climb such a mountain path as this? The Devil knows where this Heavenly Master has got to! Why am I subjected to this torture?"

He went on, notwithstanding, and had not taken a dozen or so paces more when, as he straightened his back to draw breath, he felt a sudden gust of wind rush out from a hollow in the mountainside. When this gust passed, a thunderous roar burst from behind a pine tree, and out sprang a savage-eyed, white-browed tiger with a brilliantly-patterned coat. The Marshal was terrified. "Ai-ya!" he cried, recoiling aghast. Here's what his horrified eyes beheld:

The coat a mat of shining gold,
Eighteen claws like silver hooks,
Eyes like lightning, tail a whip,
Mouth a bloodpit, teeth like knives.
The back arches with hideous strength,
The tail lashes with a sound like thunder;
Hares on the mountainside bolt for cover,
Deer in the valley make themselves scarce.

Fixing its eyes on Hong Xin, the great beast wove to the left and circled to the right, gave a mighty roar, then bounded off down the slope and disappeared. Hong Xin had fallen at the foot of a tree, all his thirty-six teeth chattering against each other and his heart knocking like fifteen buckets in a well, clashing as they pass up and down; his whole body was numb with shock and his legs limp as the defeated contestant's in a cock-fight. Continuous lamentations issued from his mouth.

When the tiger disappeared, it took him the time in which one would drink a cup of tea to haul himself to his feet. He collected the incense and the censer that had fallen to the ground, and relit it. Then he set off again up the mountain, determined once more to search out the Heavenly Master.

After another thirty or forty paces, he sighed a few times and said bitterly to himself: "I come here in obedience to the Emperor's wishes but what frights I must pass through!" Before he had even completed the sentence he felt another gust of wind, this time laden with noxious fumes, blowing directly towards him as before. He stared at the thick undergrowth from which a slithering sound was issuing. Out shot an immense snake, big as a barrel and spotted with white. Terrified again, the Marshal threw down the censer and gasping, "Now I'm really finished!", fell back against a rugged boulder. He watched the creature, out of the corner of his eye. Imagine it:

As it lifts its head, the earth convulses;
Lightning strikes if it blinks its eye.
When the great beast stirs
The valleys split and the hilltops tumble;
It breathes out clouds and spits forth mists.
Its scales are a kaleidoscope of jade,
Its tail a slanting pile of silver.

The great snake slithered towards the boulder and fixing its eye on Hong Xin coiled itself in front of him. A dazzling golden light poured from its eyes, and opening wide an enormous mouth it protruded its tongue and breathed its noxious vapours right in Hong Xin's face. The Marshal almost fainted in terror; his three spirits scattered and his seven senses dispersed. After regarding the Marshal for a moment, the snake slid away down the mountain and was seen no more.

"Merciful Heavens! I almost died of fright!" the Marshal exclaimed when he had picked himself up again. He examined himself and found he had come out in goose-flesh with bumps the size of buns. He cursed the Taoists: "What insufferable lack of manners! To make sport of a court official, treating me to all these shocks! If I don't find the Heavenly Master when I get to the top, I shall have a thing or two to say to that lot when I get down again!" He picked up the silver censer, rearranged the imperial edict on his back and, after adjusting his clothing and his cap, was ready to continue the ascent. He was just about to take the first step when he heard from behind a group of pine trees the sweet sound of a flute softly played. It was gradually approaching. He watched closely while from a hollow on the mountainside there came a young Taoist acolyte, riding backwards on a cow and playing an iron flute. See him here:

His hair was coiled into twin peaks, and he was apparelled all in blue; about his waist was a belt of plaited straw and hemp shoes with rope soles were on his feet. His eyes were piercing and his smile dazzling as he glided along, stirring no dust. The rich profusion of his hair and his rosy cheeks gave him a brilliant appearance but nothing coarse or common was there in his bearing.

It was just like it says in Lü Dongbin's? Famous cowherd songs:

The grassy plain extends for several miles;
The sound of a flute carries on the evening wind.
After nightfall, he reaches home and eats.
Still in his raincoat of bark, he slumbers in the moonlight.

So there was this lad, smiling to himself and blowing on an iron flute as he rode along on his cow, crossing the mountainside in front of Hong Xin. "Where have you come from?" Hong Xin called out, and "Do you know who I am?"

The boy paid no attention but simply went on playing his flute. The Marshal had repeated his question a number of times, before the boy suddenly laughed out loud and, pointing his flute at Hong Xin, said: "You come here to see the Heavenly Master, am I right?"

Hong Xin was taken aback. "You're just a cowherd, how do you know this?"

The boy answered: "When I was serving the Master this morning in his thatched cabin, I heard him say: 'Today the Emperor has sent an envoy to me here on the mountain bearing His Majesty's edict, with the imperial incense; my presence is requested in the Eastern Capital to offer the three thousand six hundred libations and pray for the world's delivery from the plague. I shall go today, mounted on a crane and riding the clouds.' I believe the Master must have left already, he is not in his hut. You should climb no higher. There are many poisonous reptiles and dangerous beasts on the mountain, I fear your life will be in danger. You had better go back."

"You're not deceiving me, are you?" the Marshal asked.

Instead of replying, the boy burst out laughing. He began to play his flute again, and moved off across the mountainside.

"How does the boy know so much?" the Marshal was thinking. "He must be following the Heavenly Master's instructions, so it must be true." He thought about renewing the ascent but then he thought of the terrifying experiences he had just undergone and how they might have cost him his life, and it seemed better to go back down.

He took up the censer once more, searched out his former route and hurriedly descended. All the Taoists came out to meet him and entreated him to rest in the Superior's private quarters.

"Did you see the Heavenly Master?" the Superior inquired.

"I am an important officer of the imperial court," the Marshal said. "Why did you tell me to climb the mountain and suffer all these appalling dangers that nearly cost me my life? First, when I was halfway up a huge tiger with ferocious eyes and a white forehead sprang out; the shock almost finished me. Then, after I had passed another ravine, an enormous white-spotted snake shot out of the undergrowth and coiled itself in front of me, barring the way. If I hadn't some credit stored up with fate, I could never return to the capital alive. I believe you Taoists wanted to play a trick on me."

"How could we show such disrespect to an important officer of the court?" said the Superior. "It must be that the Heavenly Master was testing your resolve. Although there are snakes and tigers on the mountain, they do no harm to men."

"When I was about to start climbing again," the Marshal continued, "before I had even moved, an acolyte came out from among some pine trees, riding on a cow and playing an iron flute. As he was crossing the mountain in front of me, I asked him where he came from and whether he knew me. He replied 'I know everything.' He said the Heavenly Master had given instructions and left early in the morning for the capital, mounted on a crane and riding the clouds. That is why I have returned."

"Unfortunately, Your Excellency," the Superior said, "you failed to observe an important point. That cowherd was the Heavenly Master himself."

"If it was the Heavenly Master," the Marshal said, "why should he take such a humble form?"

"The Heavenly Master of this generation," said the Superior, "is absolutely out of the ordinary. Though only young, he has reached an extraordinary degree of perfection. He is far above ordinary standards: he is a master of metamorphosis and adept in many arts. People call him the Teacher who has found the Way."

"Then I had no eyes to recognize the true Master," the Marshal said. "I have let him pass me by!"

"Set your mind at rest, Your Excellency," the Superior said. "Since the Master said he was going, the whole business will have been concluded before you get back to the capital."

The Marshal took comfort at this. The Superior meanwhile ordered a banquet in the Marshal's honour, and requested that the imperial edict in its official box be left in the Hall of Higher Purity and that the imperial incense be burnt in the Hall of the Three Pure Ones. A great vegetarian feast was served that day. The eating and drinking lasted till evening and then they slept till dawn.

The next day, after the morning collation, the Superior and monks, with the guestmaster and others, proposed a tour of the monastery. The Marshal was pleased. With several of his suite he left the Superior's quarters, and guided by two acolytes, they visited every part of the monastery. In the course of this tour Hong Xin was able to enjoy many grand sights. The Hall of the Three Pure Ones was rich beyond words; under the left-hand gallery were the Hall of the Nine Heavens, the Hall of the Purple Mysteries, the Hall of the Northern Star; under the right-hand gallery the Hall of the Supreme Unity, the Hall of the Three Powers, the Hall of Exorcism of Perversities. Having admired each of these, they proceeded to an area behind the right-hand gallery. Here the Marshal saw another complete temple. Its surrounding wall was red, the colour of pounded peppers; in front there was a great vermilion door with two leaves. These doors were secured by a bolt the size of a man's arm, and their surface was criss-crossed by a dozen overlapping paper seals on which were affixed all manner of red stamps; above the door was a red lacquer tablet with an inscription in gold characters which read: "Hall of the Vanquished Demons." "What place is this?" the Marshal asked, pointing to the door.

"That is the hall where the Heavenly Masters of preceding generations have confined the Demon Princes," the Superior replied.

"Why is there such a quantity of seals on the door?" the Marshal wanted to know.

"It was our venerable ancestor, the Tang Master of the Mystic Cavern, who sealed the Demon Princes in here," the Superior said. "The masters of ensuing generations each added a seal, so that none of our descendants or descendants' descendants would be so rash as to open the door. Should the Demon Princes escape, the most terrible disasters would ensue. All the Heavenly Masters of the eight or nine generations that have passed till now have renewed the pledge not to open it. The locks are cast from molten bronze. It is impossible to imagine what is within. I myself, who came to this temple thirty years ago, know all this only from hearsay."

It sounded a strange business to the Marshal, and he thought: "I wouldn't mind having a look at these Demon Princes." He said to the Superior: "Open up the door, I'm going to see what these Demon Princes look like."

"Your Excellency!" the Superior cried. "Whatever you do, don't open that door! The masters of preceding generations left the strictest instructions: 'No one henceforth shall dare to open this door!'."

"Poppycock!" the Marshal said. "All you people do is invent mysteries and monsters to dupe the people; it's just a trick to set up a place like this and pretend you've got the Demon Princes locked up in there, in order to show off your magic powers. I've read many books but I don't know where it says how you can lock up demons! The spirits stay in their own world, I refuse to believe there are any Demon Princes in there. Open it up for me at once. I'm going to take a look at these Demon Princes!"

The Superior pleaded with him, repeating over and over: "This hall must not be opened. If it is, woes will follow which the whole of humanity will rue."

Then the Marshal, in a fury, pointed his finger at the monks and said: "If you don't open that door for me, on my return to the court I shall report that you Taoists are guilty, in the first instance, of hindering the proclamation of the imperial edict, failing to respect His Majesty's commands, and preventing me from speaking with the Heavenly Master; and that, secondly, you have built these halls without official authorization, made false claims about holding the Princes of Demons under lock and key here, and sought to subvert the minds of the people. I shall get your certificates withdrawn, and have you branded and sent to languish on a distant frontier!"

Since they were very much afraid of the Marshal's power, the Superior and monks summoned brothers skilled in metalwork, who tore off the seals and smashed the great lock with hammers. Everyone pushed at the door, and it opened. Inside it was pitch black. Just imagine it!

Murk, mist, and inky gloom,
Smelling of damp and hellish black;
Sealed from the sun a hundred years,
A thousand years without the moon:
Here you can't tell north from south,
Here there is no east and west.
Swirling vapours freeze your bones,
The dark sends shivers down your spine.
Here no human trace is seen,
Demon spirits only haunt.
Open both your eyes, you're blind!
Stretch out your hands and nothing find!
Like at month's end with the moon newborn
When dark is deepest close to dawn.

They all poured into the hall. It was so dark they could see nothing. The Marshal ordered his people to fetch a dozen torches and illuminate the interior, when it was seen that the hall was entirely empty except for a stone tablet in the centre, about six or seven feet high. The base of this tablet rested on a carved tortoise half buried in the ground. When light was shone on it, the front of the tablet turned out to be covered in dragon script and phoenix characters, magic signs and ciphers which no one could understand. On the back of it, however, they found four proper words, engraved in bold characters: "For Hong to open." Now was this not a sign first of all that the conjunction of the stars was right for the birth of something? And secondly that the Song Dynasty was to see the appearance of men of honour? And thirdly that Hong Xin's presence was preordained, that it was all drawn up in heaven? Hong Xin was jubilant when he saw these four words.

"You all wanted to stop me," he said to the Superior, "but why do you think my name is here, written so many hundreds of years ago? 'For Hong to open' — it obviously means I am meant to open it and look inside, how can it be wrong to do so? No doubt these Demon Princes are under the stone! Just go and get me some workers with mattocks and crow-bars, and we'll start digging."

The Superior remonstrated with him in dismay: "We can't do that, Your Excellency. There could be dire consequences, fatal to humankind. It would be a disaster!"

This enraged the Marshal. "What do you Taoists know about it?" he bellowed. "What's written on the tablet is perfectly clear, it's for me to open it. How can you object? Call the workers immediately and open it up."

Again and again the Superior warned: "No good will come of this," while the Marshal continued to turn a deaf ear. Workers and monks were summoned. They threw down the tablet and then together they struggled to excavate the stone tortoise. After working half the day, they succeeded in lifting it. Digging deeper still, some three or four feet down, they came upon a slab of green stone, about ten feet square. The Marshal ordered the digging to continue, while the Superior went on protesting. "Don't move it!" The Marshal took no notice. Finally, working all together they managed to lift the stone. Under it they discovered a vast bottomless pit, from the depths of which arose a deafening howl. It was no joke, that sound. Listen:

Heaven splits, earth totters, peaks tremble, mountains fall.
The tidal wave on the river Qian Tang
Rushes for the gates of the sea.
On Mounts Tai and Hua
A mighty force splits the peaks
Like the monster, Gong Gong, moved by ancient wrath
Battering the pillars of the sky,
Or the famed assassin's awesome strength
Smashing the First Emperor's chariot.
The wind snaps a thousand bamboos:
Among a million soldiers the drums beat all night long.[3]

When that piercing shriek passed, behold a black cloud came billowing out of the hole and carried away part of the corner of the temple roof. The black cloud rose till it was half-way up the vault of heaven, then burst in an explosion of gold rays that shot off in all directions and disappeared. There was general panic. Shouting and screaming, they fled from the hall, throwing away their mattocks and crowbars as they went. Many were knocked down and trampled. The Marshal stood aghast, not knowing where to turn. Ashen-faced, he took shelter in the gallery. The Superior joined him, ceaselessly bewailing the calamity.

*

"What kind of spirits are they, that passed?" the Marshal stammered. The holy man needed but few words to explain everything, as you shall hear. You will also hear how a certain emperor could not sleep at night and by day forgot to eat. And how tigers and leopards gathered in the Place of Many Meanderings, and dragons came to rest in Duckweed Marsh.

Behold the reclusive scholar, where so many elegant and refined men of letters dwell. Unconcerned with empty fame and meagre fortune, they sculpt ice and trim snow, laughing and chatting as if they were adrift on a tangled river. They critique former kings and subsequent emperors, distinguishing truth from falsehood as they vie for control of the Central Plains, the seven warring states stirring up the Spring and Autumn Annals. Rise and fall are as fragile as willow branches, life as fleeting as a drifting boat. Countless have achieved fame, countless have sought it, and even more have fled from it. In an instant, a new moon shines over the long river, the vast sea transforms into ancient fields. Surprised that fish cling to trees, like a poor monkey choosing its own wood, yet fearing it might be a broken bow or bent wood. Better to overturn the cup in one's palm and listen to a new melody.

Amid chaos of Dynasties 5,
Peaceful days at last revive;
Mountains and rivers are of yore,
Benevolence of a century and more.
Orioles sang in forest trees,
Entrancing music filled the air;
The people dressed in gorgeous silks,
Contentment reigned everywhere.

This poetry was written in the reign of Emperor Shenzong of the Song Dynasty by a famous scholar named Shao Yaofu. At the close of the Tang Dynasty, and during the succeeding Five Dynasties there was continual civil warfare. In the morning, one General would be supreme but by evening, another General would be in power. Generals Zhu Quanzhong, Li Cunxu, Shi Jingtang, Liu Zhiyuan, and Guo Wei established respectively the Five Dynasties of the Later Liang, Later Tang, Later Jin, Later Han, and Later Zhou (907–60CE). There were fifteen Emperors within fifty years. These frequent changes followed one after another until Zhao Kuangyin founded the Song Dynasty, and ascended the throne as Emperor Taizu. When this great man was born the sky was all red, and in the bedroom there was a fragrant smell. This was because the God of Thunder descended among the mortals.

Taizu was a brave hero, and very intelligent. No Emperor from ancient times to the present can be compared to him. He was a well-made man, and conquered four hundred prefectures and regions. He swept the floor of the whole empire, and left it clean. He established his capital at Bianliang in modern Kaifeng, and laid the foundations for the succeeding eighteen Emperors of the Song Dynasty which lasted for three hundred years. Because of this illustrious feat of arms the scholar states that "the clouds were dispersed, and heaven seen again."

At that time there was a very virtuous and learned man named Chen Tuan living on the Western Sacred Mountain, Mount Hua, and he could foreknow the weather. One day as he was riding on his donkey down the mountain he heard a rumour that Chai Shizong [41] had withdrawn in favour of Marshal Zhao Kuangyin who had ascended the throne. When he heard this he laughed so much that he rolled off the donkey. When his informer asked for an explanation he replied, "The Empire will now be settled, and heaven, earth, and mankind will all be in harmony."

The Emperor Taizu ascended the throne 960 CE, and for the following seventeen years there was general peace. He was succeeded by his descendant Emperors Taizong, Zhenzong, and Renzong. Now Renzong was the incarnation of the Barefoot Immortal, [42] and when he was born he cried continuously, day and night. His father, Emperor Zhenzong issued an edict offering a reward to anyone who could cure the crying infant. When this became known in Heaven, the Great White Gold Star was sent down to earth, and metamorphosed into an old man. He tore down the Imperial edict, and said that he could effect a cure. An official took him to the court, where the Emperor gave him permission to see the sick baby. Upon entering the palace he picked up the royal infant in his arms, and whispered eight words into his ear. Immediately the royal infant stopped crying and the old man vanished in a gust of wind. The words he whispered were:

For civil affairs, there is a civil star,
For military affairs a military star.

As a matter of fact the Jade Emperor of Heaven, the great Taoist god had already sent two stars to assist this newborn infant in those affairs when he became Emperor. The Civil Star was incarnated in Bao Zheng who later became a scholar of the Longtu Academy, and also Prefect of Kaifeng. The Military Star was incarnated in Di Qing who became commander-in-chief of the expedition to the Western Xia Kingdom in modern Gansu. These two worthy ministers assisted the Emperor Renzong for forty-two years. During the first twenty-seven years the crops were abundant, and there was general peace and prosperity. Robbery was rare, and the people could always leave their doors open even at night. In fact the people enjoyed abundant happiness in those years. But who could know that great happiness would be culminated in sorrow? In the 28th year a grave pestilence afflicted the Empire, and a flood of petitions inundated the capital like a heavy snowstorm.

In the Eastern Capital half of the people died. The Grand Secretary Bao Zheng offered a special medicine free but with no effect. The pestilence spread, and increased its virility. The officials discussed the situation in the Council Chamber and when the Emperor gave audience they all entered the Grand Audience Hall where they all kowtowed together. The appointed minister asked what business there was to bring before the Emperor, and the Prime Minister Zhao Zhe, and the official Wen Yanbo stepped forward. The former spoke, "Just now there is a serious pestilence in this Capital, and a great many people have died. I request that in your benevolence an edict be issued pardoning all criminals, reducing all sentences for future crimes, and lessening all taxes. We also beg Your Majesty to offer prayers to Heaven to save the lives of your people."

The Emperor at once agreed to this, and added to the edict that in all temples there should be special prayers to Heaven to stop this great calamity. Although this was done the pestilence still increased its ravages. When the Emperor was informed of this he summoned all ministers to discuss the matter, and during the meeting of the Grand Council Fan Zhongyan spoke, "This great calamity is inflicting the people who are on the verge of despair. I suggest that we send for the Taoist, Heavenly Teacher Zhang at Mount Longhu, Jiangxi province, to offer special prayers here for the cessation of the pestilence."

The Emperor Renzong agreed, and ordered a Hanlin scholar to write the edict. He signed it with the vermilion brush, and handed it to Marshal Hong Xin to deliver it as the Imperial Envoy. Hong Xin fastened the edict on his back, held the Imperial incense in his hand, took about ten assistants, travelled by relays of horses, and soon reached Guixi County in Jiangxi province. He was met and welcomed outside the various towns he passed through by the local officials. A messenger had been sent in advance to advise Heavenly Teacher Zhang of the approaching envoy.

Upon reaching Mount Longhu he was received by a big crowd of Taoist priests, with much beating of drums and gongs, much burning of incense, fluttering banners, and music. The temple abbot conducted the envoy into the Hall of Three Purities where the Imperial edict was respectfully received. When the envoy, Marshal Hong Xin, asked for Heavenly Teacher Zhang the superintendent replied, "The Heavenly Teacher is known as "Xu Jing" who has a pure and lofty nature. He is averse to soliciting favour, and has retired to a straw hut on the summit of the mountain where he cultivates his spirit."

"Then how can I see him about this important matter?" asked Hong Xin.

"We can leave the Imperial edict here unopened while we discuss that matter in another room," replied the superintendent.

This was done, and the envoy took the seat of honour while attendants brought in tea and vegetarian food for all. After the meal the superintendent explained that the Heavenly Teacher had acquired the Tao and since he travelled on clouds, they never knew where he might be. [43] They very seldom saw him at the temple so they thought it hardly worth while to advise him of the approach of the Imperial Envoy.

Hong Xin explained what the edict was about, and asked how he could meet the Heavenly Teacher.

The superintendent replied, "As the Emperor wishes to save the people you must carry out his orders. You must therefore purify yourself by fasting, dress in plain rough clothes, then go by yourself with the Imperial edict on your back, step by step up the mountain, and then you may have the chance of seeing the Heavenly Teacher. But if your heart is not truly sincere, that may spoil your chance of meeting him."

"Since I left the capital," said Hong Xin, "I have been a strict vegetarian so how could my intentions be other than absolutely sincere? Such being the case I will follow your advice and go up the mountain tomorrow."

The following morning about 4 A.M. the priests prepared the fragrant water and invited the envoy to bathe. After bathing he put on new rough clothes and straw sandals; wrapped the Imperial edict in yellow silk and fastened it on his back; took a silver bowl with burning incense in his hands. He took leave of the priests and set off saying prayers as he walked. After some time the path became steeper, and he had to take hold of bushes and trees to pull himself up. He had traversed several summits, and began to feel extremely fatigued. It was now very hard walking, and he became hesitant as to whether to go forward or not. He thought of the pleasant, easy times he used to have in the Capital with rich varied food and comfortable beds. There he never wore rough clothes, and straw sandals, and was never tired like this. Why did they send him to experience such bitterness of soul? How could he find the Heavenly Teacher?

He struggled on for about fifty paces more but was now panting for breath. A strong gust of wind blew down the ravine, and roared through the pines. Just then he saw a tiger rush out from the trees, and was so afraid and startled that he fell down. The tiger examined the envoy, walked round him but after roaring returned to the forest. Hong Xin lay there, his teeth grinding and his heart beating like "a chain of buckets raising water from a well." His sensation became numb, and he seemed paralyzed. His legs could not move, and seemed like a defeated cock after a fight. He began to whine about his fate.

But after a short time his spirits gradually revived, and he continued his walk. He was, however, still short of breath, and began again to complain of the hardness of the way. He muttered, "The Emperor gave me a very hard task," but before he had finished this a very noxious wind burst forth. He stared round, and saw an enormous speckled snake rattling among some bamboos. He was startled and throwing away his bowl, fell down near a large stone, exclaiming, "I shall certainly die this time!" The snake glided towards him, and coiled up at his side. It showed a yellow light in its eyes, opened wide its mouth, and blew a poisonous vapor in his face. This so frightened him that he fainted but the snake soon left him.

When he regained consciousness he saw that his body was as chilly as having been thrown into an icy river. He soliloquized, "I was almost frightened to death! I never suspected that priest of deceiving me. What a shock I had! If I don't find the Heavenly Teacher, I shall have something to say to that priest when I get back." He, however, picked up his incense bowl, put on his headdress, straightened his garments, and prepared to try again. He had taken only a few steps when he heard the sound of a flute which was being played somewhere among the trees. Looking round he saw an acolyte riding on a yellow ox playing a flute, with a smiling countenance.

Hong spoke to him, "Where do you come from? Do you recognize me?"

The boy did not reply but continued playing the flute.

Hong asked the same questions several times, and at last the boy laughed and pointing his flute at him replied, "Have you come here to see the Heavenly Teacher?"

"As you are only a cowherd how is it that you know my affairs?"

"Early this morning I waited upon the Heavenly Teacher, and he told me that you had been commissioned by the Emperor to bring an edict here inviting him to go to the Capital to offer prayers to Heaven to stop the pestilence. He said that he was going to mount his stork, and fly off to the Capital at once. So I think he may have gone, and may not be at the temple. You need not go up the mountain as there are many poisonous snakes and fierce beasts on this mountain that might endanger your life."
"You cannot lie to me," said Hong but the acolyte did not reply to this, and went on his way playing his flute.
The envoy thought, "How can the boy know as much as he says, it may be that the Heavenly Teacher has told him to say this so as to test my perseverance. But as I have already met so many frightful things perhaps it would be better if I now get back." So he retraced his steps.
Upon reaching the temple at the foot of the mountain he was asked by the priests whether he had seen the Heavenly Teacher. He told them what frightful experiences he had had, and said he suspected them of merely trifling with an Imperial Envoy.
"How dare we poor Taoists treat you disrespectfully?" replied the abbot. "These trials might have been arranged by the Heavenly Teacher to test your perseverance. The snakes and tigers on this mountain do not injure people."
"As I was going to struggle up the mountain, I saw a cowherd coming out of a pine forest on a yellow cow, playing a flute who told me that the Heavenly Teacher had flown away on a crane this morning to the Eastern Capital, and so I returned."
"What a pity that you missed such a fine opportunity! That cowherd was the Heavenly Teacher himself!"
"In that case why did he appear in such a strange way?"
"Because he is not an ordinary man. He is only young but his supernatural power is unbounded. He is not a common person. His power is omnipotent. The people all praise him as the Master of the Tao."
"I am so ignorant that I have failed to deliver the edict."
"Never mind! As the Heavenly Teacher meant to go, I think the prayers may have been over and the pestilence already vanished when you get back to the Eastern Capital."
The Imperial edict was replaced in the cover, and put in the Hall of Three Purities. A feast was then prepared for the envoy.
After breakfast the following morning the abbot suggested that they should stroll round the monastery for a sight-seeing. They did so, and spent some time going round all the temple buildings. One of these attracted Marshal Hong Xin's attention. It was surrounded by a red mud wall; the entrance had a large red door with two leaves which were fastened by a very big lock. There were about ten strips of paper sealing the door, and these were all stamped with red seals; above the door was a board with four gilt characters, "The Subdued Demons Hall." The envoy asked what the Hall was used for, and was informed that a previous Heavenly Teacher had subdued many demons, and imprisoned them there.
"But why are there so many seals on the door?"
"During the Tang dynasty the Heavenly Teacher Dong Xuan subdued the king of the demons, and locked him up inside this Hall. The succeeding generations have each added another seal so that is may never be opened. If those devils ever got out there would be a great calamity. Now about nine generations have passed, and no one ever attempted to tamper with this arrangement. Molten copper has been poured into the lock so that it is impossible to unlock the door. I have lived here for thirty years, and this is all that I have heard of but nobody knows what is inside.
Marshal Hong Xin felt very curious at this, and had a desire to investigate so he said to the superintendent, "Please open the door, and I will see what this king of the demons is like."
"We dare not do that. Our former masters enjoined us not to open it and we cannot presume to disobey the order."
The Imperial Envoy laughed, and said, "Nonsense! You only falsely declare there is something strange, in order to deceive the innocent people. You purposedly arrange such places and tell people that demons are locked up inside so as to show off your spiritual powers. I have read hundreds of volumes of books, and yet have never read of the king of the demons being imprisoned here. There is no way by which man can know about the supernatural. I do not believe that the king of the demons is inside here. Quickly open the door, and I want see what this demon is."
The abbot still declined to do this, as he was afraid that somebody would be injured.
Marshal Hong became angry, and pointing at the Taoists, said, "As you will not open the door I shall first report that you refused to obey the Imperial orders, and not allow me to see the Heavenly Teacher. Also I will say that you are falsely declaring that the king of the demons is imprisoned here, in order to deceive decent people. Your license will be canceled, and you will all be banished to some distant places."
The priests were all afraid of his great influence, and therefore they summoned servants to tear off the seals, and break the big lock. This was done, and when the door was opened they all went inside but could not see anything because it was pitch dark there. So Marshal Hong ordered the servants to light about ten torches, and with these he made a close examination. There was not a single thing except a stone tablet in the centre of the hall. It was about six feet in height, and was resting on a stone tortoise which was almost half in the soil. On the tablet were characters of the very ancient style, and they could not make out any of them. But upon examining the other side of the tablet they found four characters which read, "Open when Hong comes." The Imperial Envoy Marshal Hong Xin was much pleased at this, and turning to the Taoists said, "You tried to obstruct me but many hundred years ago they wrote my name here, and predicted that I would come here, and open the door. The fiends, I see, are imprisoned under this tortoise. Dig out the stone tortoise for me!"
The Taoists were terrified at the order, and said that it was not safe to do such a thing.
Marshal Hong was angry at this continuous obstruction, and abused them as ignorant. He insisted upon the excavation being begun immediately. As on the stone tablet it was stated that he would open the place so although the Taoists still objected they at last gave way, and told the workmen to dig. The men removed the soil and the tortoise. After digging about three feet down they unearthed a square slab of stone. Marshal Hong told them to lift it out, and in spite of objections from the Taoists, the stone was raised, and carried out of the hole.
It was evident that the slab was the cover of a very deep well. Now that the cover was removed a loud strange noise was heard far down in the cavity, and instantly a black cloud shot out from below, breaking a corner of the roof of the hall, and escaped through the aperture. The cloud ascended very high in the sky, and then burst forth into more than a hundred rays of light and disappeared in all directions.
All the spectators were astounded and rushed away from the hall. Even Marshal Hong was thunderstruck, and his countenance changed to a pale yellow colour. He went out to the veranda where he met the abbot who lamented the result. Upon his asking what the demon was which had escaped the superintendent replied, "You do not understand. The fact is that our former Master Dong Xuan imprisoned here the thirty-six heavenly spirits, and seventy-two baneful stars which make a total of 108 fiends. The names of these fiends are inscribed on the stone in ancient writing. As they have now all been released they will bring calamity to the people. What are you going to do in the matter?"
Upon hearing this Marshal Hong was covered with cold perspiration and trembled with fear. Without saying a word he went to pack his baggage and calling together his retinue he quickly departed down the mountain on his way back to the Capital.
On the way Marshal Hong told his suite that they must not mention to anybody what had happened as he was afraid that if the Emperor heard of it he would be punished. They travelled both night and day, and soon reached the Capital, Bianliang, in modern Kaifeng. There he found that the Taoist Heavenly Teacher had arrived, and had held seven days' service against the pestilence and had written magical spells for the sick people and as the pestilence had abated the Heavenly Teacher had flown back on his stork to the mountain.
The following morning Marshal Hong attended the early audience, and addressed the Emperor, "The Heavenly Teacher travelled by crane, and as I could only travel by horse relays he had been here and returned before I could arrive."
The Emperor did not reply but rewarded him for his work. After this, the Emperor reigned for 42 years and upon his death, as he had no children the son of an illustrious Prince succeeded to the throne with the title Yingzong. This Emperor reigned for 4 years, and was followed by his son who reigned as Emperor Shenzong for 18 years. Then after this, Emperor Zhezong reigned and during his reign, there was peace in the empire. But if there had been nothing but peace.

002

Drill Instructor Wang Secretly to Yanan Prefecture Escapes; 9 Dragons Shi Jin Wreaks Havoc in the Shi Family Village & gets his Defences into Shape

During the reign of Emperor Zhe Zong, who ruled a long time after Ren Zong, in Bianliang the Eastern Capital, in Kaifeng Prefecture previously called Xuanwu District, there lived a young scamp named Gao. A second son, he was quite useless. He cared only for jousting with spear and staff, and was an excellent football player. People in the capital were fond of making quips. They dubbed him Gao Qiu, or "Gao the Ball." Later, when he prospered, he changed "Qiu" to another character with the same sound but with a less inelegant meaning.
In addition to his skill with weapons, Gao Qiu could play musical instruments and sing and dance. He also learned a bit about poetry and versifying. But when it came to virtue and proper behavior, he didn't know a thing. He spent his time gadding about the city and its environs. Thanks to him, the son of Master Wang, an iron-shop owner, dissipated a considerable sum of money in theatres, gambling dens, and brothels.
For this reason the father made a written complaint against Gao to Kaifeng Prefecture. The prefect gave Gao 20 strokes, banished him from the city, and forbade the people of the Eastern Capital from either feeding him or giving him shelter. Gao Qiu's solution was to proffer his services to one Liu Shiquan, known as Liu the Eldest, who ran a gambling house in Linhuai Prefecture, west of the Huaihe River. Liu surrounded himself with idlers and riffraff from all over.
Gao Qiu remained with Liu for three years. Then Emperor Zhe Zong prayed to Heaven south of the city, and this caused the winds and rains to become very propitious. The emperor was moved to benevolence, and he declared a general amnesty. Gao Qiu was able to return to the capital. Liu the Eldest wrote a letter of introduction to Dong Jiangshi, a relative of his who ran a medicinal herb shop near the Bridge of Golden Girders, gave Gao some travelling money, and told him Dong would take care of him.
Gao said goodbye, shouldered his pack and returned to the city, where he delivered the letter to Dong. The druggist took one look at Gao, then read the letter.
"How can I put this man up in my home?" he mused. "It would be different if he were straight and honest. The children could learn from him. But he's just a loafer, an untrustworthy fellow who's been exiled for breaking the law, and not the kind likely to reform. If I keep him here he's liable to teach the children bad ways. Yet if I don't I'll be offending Liu the Eldest."
He had no choice but to receive Gao into his home with pretended delight. Dong feasted him everyday for ten days, then he got an idea. He presented Gao with a suit of clothes and handed him a letter of introduction.
"The light of my household is too feeble," he said. "It would only be holding you back to keep you here. I'm turning you over to Su Junior, the Court Scholar. With him you'll be able to make a start. How does that sound?"
Gao thanked him gratefully. Dong had a servant take the letter and escort Gao to the Court Scholar's residence. There, a gateman reported Gao's arrival. The Scholar came out and greeted him. He saw from the letter of introduction that Gao was a scamp.
"I can't take this man in," thought the Scholar. "As a favour to Dong I'll send him to Wang Jinqing, the Young Prince Consort, to serve as a retainer. The Young Prince likes that sort of fellow."
He wrote Dong a reply and let Gao stay the night. The next day he wrote another letter and dispatched it with a steward who took Gao Qiu to the residence of the Young Prince.
Wang had married a younger sister of Emperor Zhe Zong before he took the throne and while Emperor Shen Zong still reigned. The Young Prince was partial to adventurous men, and he staffed his retinue with them. He liked Gao the moment he saw him with the Scholar's letter-bearing servant. He wrote an immediate reply, accepting him as a retainer. From then on Gao remained with the prince, coming and going like one of the family.
As the old saying has it: "Distant friends grow ever distant, friends at hand grow closer still." To celebrate his birthday, the Young Prince ordered that a feast be laid, and invited Prince Duan, his wife's younger brother. Duan had been the eleventh child of Emperor Shen Zong and was a brother of the reigning emperor Zhe Zong. In charge of the imperial equipage, the Ninth Royal Prince, as he was called, was an intelligent, handsome young man, and a skilled dilettante in all forms of amusement. His accomplishments included the lute, chess, calligraphy, painting and football. He was also a good musician, singer and dancer.
That day, Wang the Young Prince spread a banquet of the finest delicacies of land and sea. He seated Duan the Ninth Royal Prince in the central chair or honour and sat down opposite. After several cups of wine and two courses, Prince Duan went out to relieve himself. He stopped by in the library on his return, where the Young Prince joined him. Duan was attracted by a pair of paper-weight lions carved of mutton-fat jade. They were extremely well made, in exquisite detail.
Prince Duan picked them up and couldn't set them down. "Beautiful," he murmured.
"The same artisan also made a jade rack carved like a dragon for writing brushes," said the Young Prince. "I don't have it handy but I'll find it tomorrow and sent it to you together with these paper-weights."
"That's awfully kind of you. I'm sure the dragon is carved even more finely than the lions."
"I'll send it to the palace tomorrow. You'll be able to see for yourself."
Prince Duan thanked him and they went back to the banquet table where they dined until dusk. Both were drunk when they parted. Prince Duan bade the prince consort farewell and returned to his palace.
The next day the Young Prince found the writing-brush rack carved like a dragon. He placed it in a small gold box together with the pair of jade paper-weight lions, wrapped the box in golden silk, wrote a covering letter, and told Gao to deliver the gifts. Gao proceeded directly to Prince Duan's palace. The gate-keeper reported his arrival to the steward, who came out.
"From which official residence are you?"
Gao Qiu bowed. "Prince Consort Wang has directed me to deliver these jade objects to the Royal Prince."
"His Highness is in the middle court playing football with some young eunuchs. You may go in."
"Could I trouble you to show me the way?"
The steward led Gao to the gate of the inner court. Four or five young eunuchs were kicking a ball with Prince Duan. He was wearing a soft Tang style silk hat and a purple robe embroidered with an imperial dragon. The robe was tucked up in front under the prince's official waist sash. Flying phoenixes embroidered in gold thread decorated his boots.
Gao dared not interrupt. He stood behind some servants and waited. Fortune favoured him. The ball sailed past Prince Duan, who couldn't stop it, and rolled through the crowd to Gao Qiu. In a momentary seizure of boldness, he kicked it back to the prince with a "mandarin duck and drake twist."
Duan was delighted. "Who are you?" he asked.
Gao fell on his knees, "A retainer of Prince Consort Wang. At my master's orders I bring Your Highness two jade gifts. I have a letter that goes with them."
The royal prince smiled. "Brother-in-law is always considerate."
Gao Qiu produced the letter. Prince Duan opened the box and looked at the jade pieces, the turned them over to his major-domo.
"So you know how to kick a ball," he said to Gao. "What's your name?"
Gao crossed his arms before his chest respectfully and dropped again to his knees. "Your servant is called Gao Qiu. I've spent a little time with a ball on the field."
"Good," said the prince. "Come and join the game."
"A man of my rank! I wouldn't dare play with your Highness."
"Why not? This is the Clouds-High League, known as the All-Round Circle. It's open to anyone."
Gao Qiu continued to refuse. But when the royal prince insisted, he kowtowed, begged forgiveness for his presumption, and trotted onto the field. He made a few passes with the ball and the prince shouted approval. Gao Qiu was inspired to show everything he had. His movements, his style, were a pleasure to behold. He stayed so close to the ball it seemed glued to his feet.
Prince Duan was enchanted. He wouldn't let Gao leave, and kept him overnight in the palace. The next day he ordered a feast and sent an invitation to the Young Prince.
When Gao failed to return the night before, the Young Prince began to wonder whether he could be trusted. Now, his gate-keeper announced: "A messenger from the Ninth Royal Prince is here with an invitation for Your Excellency to attend a banquet in the place." The Young Prince went out and received the messenger and read the invitation. The he got on his horse and rode to the palace. Dismounting, he proceeded directly to Prince Duan.
The Ninth Royal Prince thanked him for the two jade gifts. Together, they entered the dining-room.
"That Gao Qiu of yours plays a good game of football," said Prince Duan. "I'd like to have him as a retainer. How about it?"
"If he's of any use to Your Highness, let him serve in the palace, by all means."
Prince Duan raised his wine cup and thanked the Young Prince. The two chatted and dined until evening. Then the Young Prince returned to his residence. Of him we'll say no more.
Let us talk rather of Gao Qiu. After he went into the service of Prince Duan he lived and dined in the palace and accompanied the prince everyday, never taking so much as a step from his side. Before two months had elapsed, Emperor Zhe Zong died without leaving an heir. All the high civil and military officials conferred and made Prince Duan the emperor. He was known as Emperor Hui Zong and bore the title of High Priest of Jade Purity and Taoist Sovereign of Provident Truth.
Hui Zong assumed the throne and all went well. One day he said to Gao Qiu: "I'd like to raise you in rank but you'll have to perform some meritorious deed on the border first. I'll have the Council of Military Affairs put you down as available for imperial appointment." Less than half a year later, he was able to make Gao Qiu a marshal commanding the Imperial Guards.
Gao Qiu selected an auspicious day and hour to assume office. All the officers of the Mighty Imperial Guards, both infantry and cavalry, who would be serving under him came to pay their respects. Each showed his identification document and registered. Gao Qiu examined the roster name by name. Only Wang Jin, a drill instructor in the Mighty Imperial Guards, had failed to appear. Half a month previous he had reported ill. Because he had not yet recovered, he hadn't returned to duty.
Marshal Gao was furious. "Nonsense," he shouted. "Sheer insubordination! He sent in his identification document, didn't he? The oaf is just pretending to be sick. Bring him here at once!" Gao dispatched an officer to Wang Jin's house to arrest him.
Now this Wang Jin had no wife or children, only an aged mother in her sixties. The officer said to him: "Marshal Gao has taken office today. When he checked the roster, you weren't there. The chief of staff explained that you were sick at home, and that your excuse was properly registered. But Marshal Gao is very impatient. He wouldn't believe it. He insists that you're faking and wants you arrested. Please come along with me, Drill Instructor. Otherwise. I'll be in trouble."
Wang Jin had no choice but to go to headquarters, sick as he was, and report to the marshal. He kowtowed four times, hailing Gao respectfully, then rose and stood to one side.
"Are you the churl whose father was Wang Sheng, a drill instructor in the district garrison?" Kao demanded.
"I am that humble person," replied Wang Jin.
"Rogue," cried Gao. "Your father was only a medicine pedlar who twirled a staff to attract to crowd. What do you know about military arts? The previous commander must have been blind to appoint you drill instructor. How dare you snub me and fail to report for roll call? Whose backing have you got that you can feign illness and loll around at home?"
"Your humble servant would never dare! I really haven't fully recovered."
"Criminal! If you're sick, how could you come?"
"When the marshal summons me, I must obey."
Gao was enraged. "Guards," he roared, "seize this fellow and give him a good beating."
Many of the junior officers were friends of Wang Jin. Together with the chief of staff they pleaded: "Today is the lucky day the marshal is assuming office. Please let the drill instructor off."

"As a favour to these officers I'll excuse you today, criminal," shouted Gao. "I'll settle with you tomorrow."
Wang Jin thanked him. Only then did he raise his head and get a good look at Gao Qiu. As he left the gate of the headquarters' compound, Wang Jin sighed.
"My life is in danger. So that's our fine Marshal Gao. Loafer and football player, Gao the Second! When he was learning to joust with staves, my father gave him such a drubbing he couldn't get out of bed for three months. He's hated us ever since. Now that he's come up in the world and been appointed commander of the Imperial Guards he's sure to want revenge. Who would have thought that I'd be under him? As the old saying goes: 'Fear not the authorities—except those that have authority over you.' How can I stand up against him? What am I going to do?"
He returned home very depressed and told his mother about it. The two held their heads and wept.
"My son," said the mother, " 'Of all the thirty-six ways to get out of trouble, the best way is—leave.' Only I'm afraid you have no place to go."
"You're right, mother," said Wang Jin. "I've thought it over, and that's how I feel too. The border garrison of Yanan Prefecture is governed by Old General Zhong. Many of his officers who've visited the capital have admired my skill with arms. Why shouldn't I cast my lot in with them? Yanan's a place where men are needed. I'd be safe there."
After talking it over, mother and son agreed.
"We must go secretly, my son," said the mother. "But what about those two corporals at the door—the orderlies who were sent by headquarters? If they find out, we won't be able to get away."
"Don't worry, mother," said Wang Jin. "I know how to get rid of them."
At dusk, he called Corporal Zhang in and said: "First have your dinner. Then I want you to go out and do something for me."
"Where do you want your humble servant to go, Drill Instructor?"
"Because I was ill a few days ago, I vowed I would burn incense in the Temple of the Sacred Mountain outside Sour Date Gate if I got better. I want to do that first thing tomorrow morning. Tonight you tell the priest in charge of sacrifices to open the temple gate a little earlier tomorrow. I'll be the first worshipper. I want you to buy me three kinds of sacrificial meat. You can spend the night in the temple and wait for me there."
Corporal Zhang promised to do as he was bid. He had his dinner, got things ready, and left for the temple.
That night mother and son packed their bedding and clothing, their silks and silver, and placed them in containers to be carried on a shoulder-pole. They also filled two saddle-bags with fodder for the horse.
At the fifth watch before dawn Wang Jin summoned Corporal Li and said: "Take these silver coins to the temple. You and Corporal Zhang buy and cook the three kinds of sacrificial meat, and wait for me. I'll join you just as soon as I've bought some sacrificial paper ingots and candles."
Corporal Li took the silver and departed for the temple. Wang Jin got the horse ready, loaded on the saddle-bags, tied them firmly in place, led the animal outside the rear gate and helped his mother mount. All the heavier household belongings they left behind. Wang Jin locked the front and rear gates, raised the carrying-pole to his shoulder and walked behind the horse.
It was the fifth watch.[1] Taking advantage of the darkness before dawn, they left the city by the West Gate and set out along the road towards the prefecture of Yanan.
To get back to the two orderlies. They bought the sacrificial meats, had them cooked, and waited in the temple until late morning. But Wang Jin failed to appear. Corporal Li became worried. He returned to the house and found the gates locked. He couldn't get in, either front or back. Li inquired among the neighbours for several hours but no one had seen the drill instructor. It was getting late. Corporal Zhang in the temple grew suspicious and also hurried to Wang Jin's home. The two soldiers searched until dusk. But even after dark neither Wang Jin nor his mother returned.
The following day the two corporals inquired about Wang Jin in the homes of his relatives but could not discover any trace of him. Afraid of being implicated, they reported to the Imperial Guards headquarters: "Drill Instructor Wang Jin and his mother have fled. Their destination is unknown."
Gao Qiu cried angrily: "So the criminal has escaped. We'll see how far he can get!" He notified every prefecture and district to arrest Wang Jin on sight as a deserter. Since the two corporals had reported the matter voluntarily, they were not charged. Of them we shall say no more.

Let us speak rather of Drill Instructor Wang Jin and his mother. They ate and drank only when hunger and thirst compelled them, stopping at night and travelling on again at dawn. One day towards evening, after more than a month on the road, Wang Jin, who was carrying a laden shoulder-pole behind the horse his mother was riding, said: "Heaven has been merciful. We've escaped the danger that was spread like a net over earth and sky. We're not far from Yanan Prefecture, Even if Marshal Gao sent men to arrest me, they couldn't catch us now."
Mother and son, rejoicing, passed an inn without noticing it. There was no village in sight now. Although it was late, they didn't know where they could spend the night. Just then, they observed a lamp gleaming in a distant grove.
"There's the answer," said Wang Jin. "We'll go there. We can apologize for disturbing them, ask for a place to spend the night, and go on again in the morning."
Entering the grove, they found a large manor enclosed by an earthen wall. Around the outside of the wall were two or three hundred big willows. Wang Jin knocked on the gate a long time. Finally, a vassal came out. The drill instructor set down his load and greeted him.
"What do you want?" the man asked.
"To tell you the truth," said Wang Jin, "my mother and I tried to cover too much ground and we passed an inn. There doesn't seem to be any inns or villages around here. We hope you can put us up for the night. We'll leave tomorrow morning. We'd be glad to pay whatever is customary for lodgings. Please let us impose on your kindness."
"Wait a bit," said the vassal. "I'll ask the squire. If he agrees, you can come in."
"Sorry to trouble you, brother."
Before long the man returned and said: "My master bids you both to enter."
Wang Jin helped his mother dismount. Carrying his shoulder-pole and leading the horse, he followed the vassal to a threshing-ground. There he set down his burden and tied the horse to a willow tree. Mother and son went to a hall roofed with thatch. The squire was waiting for them.
He was a man over sixty. His hair and beard were white. He wore a hood and a straight-cut loose-fitting gown, tied at the waist by a black silk sash. His feet were shod in tanned leather boots.
Wang Jin kowtowed respectfully.
"That's not necessary," the old man said hastily. "You're travellers who've been exposed to the elements. Please be seated."
Mother and son completed their ceremonial greetings and sat down.
"Where are you from?" asked the squire. "Why have you come here so late in the day?"
"Your humble servant is called Zhang," said Wang Jin. "We live in the capital. Because we've used up our money and cannot carry on our business, we're going to Yanan Prefecture to join some relatives. On the road today we were too eager to press on, and passed an inn without noticing it. If you'll permit us to spend the night here we'll leave in the morning and pay whatever is customary for accommodations."
"Certainly. Who carries his lodgings with him when he travels? I don't suppose you and your mother have eaten?" The squire told his vassal to bring food.
Soon a table was set up in the hall and the vassal came in with a tray bearing four vegetable dishes and one of beef. He set these on the table and heated some wine which he served first.
"Our fare is crude here in the country," said the squire. "I hope you'll forgive us."
Wang Jin rose and thanked him. "We're putting you to too much trouble. We don't know how to repay you."
"No need to talk like that," said the squire. "Let us drink."
In response to his urging Wang Jin and his mother downed six or seven cups of wine. Then the food was served and they ate. After the bowls and dishes had been cleared away the squire rose and led them to a guest-room.
"Could I trouble you to see to it that the horse my mother rode is stabled and fed?" said Wang Jin. "Of course we'll pay."
"That's easy," the squire replied. "We have horses and mules here. I'll tell a vassal to put your horse in our stable and feed it with the other animals."
Wang Jin thanked him, raised his shoulder-pole and carried his belongings into the guest-room. A vassal lit a lamp and brought in hot water so that the travellers could wash their feet. The squire returned to his own quarters. Wang Jin and his mother thanked the servant, closed the door and retired.
They slept all night. By dawn the following day they still hadn't emerged from their room, and the squire approached their door. He heard Wang Jin's mother groaning.
"It's already dawn, guest," called the old man. "You'd better rise."
Wang Jin hurried outside and greeted his host. "I've been up for some time," he said. "We put you to a lot of trouble last night. It really wasn't right."
"Who was groaning just now?"
"To tell you the truth, my mother is exhausted from riding. Last night her heart began paining her again."
"In that case why not stay on here a few more days? Don't worry. I know a good prescription for pains of the heart. I'll send a servant to the county town and get some medicine for your mother. Tell her to set her mind at ease and just rest."
Wang Jin thanked him.
But enough of petty details. Wang Jin and his mother remained at the manor, and the old lady took the medicine. After six or seven days she felt that her illness was cured. Wang Jin packed their belongings and prepared to continue their journey. On his way to the stable to look at his horse he observed in a clearing a young man stripped to the waist with blue dragons tattooed all over his body. His face was as round as a silver platter. About nineteen, he was practising with a staff.
Wang Jin watched for a while, then said without thinking: "Not a bad style but it has weaknesses. It wouldn't stop anyone who was really good."
The young man overheard him. "Who are you to laugh at my skill?" he demanded angrily. "I've had eight of the best teachers. Don't think I can't knock you down! Do you dare have a go with me?"
As he was speaking, the squire came along. "None of your insolence," shouted the old man.
"What right has this fellow to laugh at my technique?" the boy asked.
"Do you know how to wield a staff, guest?" queried the squire.
"A little," replied Wang Jin. "May I presume to ask, sir, what this young man's relationship is to you?"
"He is my son."
"Since he is the young master, if he wishes to learn, your humble servant can give him a few pointers. Is that agreeable?"
"Excellent," said the squire. And he directed the young man: "Kowtow to your teacher."
But the boy would have none of it. "Don't be taken in by this varlet's talk, pa," he said hotly. "I'll kowtow to him as my teacher only if he can beat me at staves!"
"If the young master won't take it seriously," said Wang Jin, "we can have a bout, just for fun."
Standing in the centre of the clearing the boy whirled his staff over his head like a windmill. "Come on, then," he exclaimed. "Come at me, if you have the nerve!"
Wang Jin smiled but he made no move.
"Since you're willing to teach the boy, guest," said the squire, "why not joust with him?"
"I'm afraid I'll hurt the young master," Wang Jin laughed. "It wouldn't look nice."
"That's all right. If you break his hand or foot he'll have brought it on himself."
"Forgive me, then." Wang Jin selected a staff from a weapons rack, walked into the clearing and struck a stance.
The young man looked him over, then raised his staff and charged. Wang Jin quickly withdrew, trailing his weapon. The boy flourished his staff and gave chase. Suddenly Wang Jin turned and lifted his weapon as if to hack down. His opponent raised his own staff to parry. But Wang Jin swiftly retracted his weapon, then thrust it against his adversary's chest. The boy fell flat on his back, his staff flying off to the side.
Wang Jin cast his weapon away and hurried to help the young man. "I'm terribly sorry," he said.
The boy crawled to his feet. He brought over a stool, seated Wang Jin upon it and kowtowed respectfully. "I've studied with many instructors," he said, "but they've taught me practically nothing. Teacher, all I can do is beg for your guidance."
"My mother and I have imposed on your household for several days with no way to show our gratitude. It's only right that I should do my best."
The squire was very pleased. He told his son to dress, and all went to a rear hall and sat down. The old man ordered a vassal to slaughter a sheep and prepare wine and food and fruit. Then he invited Wang Jin and his mother to join him in a feast.
When the four were seated at the table the old man poured out the wine. Rising, he toasted Wang Jin. "With your remarkable skill, you must be a drill instructor," he said. "My son 'has eyes but failed to recognize Mount Taishan.' "
Wang Jin laughed. " 'To a true man, one tells the truth.' Your servant's name isn't Zhang, it's Wang Jin. I'm a drill instructor in the Eastern Capital's Mighty Imperial Guards. I play with spears and staves everyday. Gao Qiu, who has just been appointed commander of the Imperial Guards, was once beaten by my father. He's been longing for revenge and wants to take it out on me. Being under his command, I can't stand up against him. So I've run off with my mother. We're heading for Yanan Prefecture to join the border garrison commanded by Old General Zhong. We never expected that we would come here and be so well treated by you, sir, and your son. You've cured my mother's illness and entertained us for days. We've really imposed too much. If your son wants to learn, your servant will gladly teach him with all his heart. What he's learned so far are a lot of flashy manoeuvres. They look good but they're of no use in combat. I'll teach him from the beginning."
"My son," said the squire, "admit your defeat. Kowtow to your teacher once again." The young man did so.
"Let me tell you, honoured teacher," the old man continued. "My clan has always lived here in Huayin County. There before us is Mount Shaohua. The village is called Shi Family Village. All of the three or four hundred families in it are named Shi. My son, since childhood, has had no interest in farming. He cares only for play with weapons. His mother tried in vain to talk him out of it. She finally died of worry. I had to let him have his way. I don't know how much money I've spent on weapons teachers. I also paid a skilled tattooist to decorate his arms and chest with dragons—nine in all. For that reason he's known throughout the county as Nine Dragons Shi Jin. It's good that you've come, Instructor, and can complete his training. I'll reward you handsomely."
Wang Jin was delighted. "Rest assured, old squire," he said. "If that is your wish, your servant will teach him well."
They drank and feasted. From that day on, Wang Jin and his mother remained in the manor. Wang Jin instructed the young man everyday, teaching him the use of the eighteen weapons: lance, mallet, long bow, crossbow, jingal, jointed bludgeon, truncheon, sword, chain, hooks, hatchet, axe, trident, halberd, shield, staff, spear and rake. Squire Shi went to the county town of Huayin to serve as a ward chief. Of that we'll say no more.
The days slipped by. Soon half a year had passed. Shi Jin became adapt at the eighteen weapons. Wang Jin put his heart into teaching, explaining the fine points of each. When the young man had mastered the weapons, Wang Jin thought to himself: "Although it's very pleasant here, I'm not getting anywhere." He wanted to continue on to Yanan but Shi Jin wouldn't hear of him leaving.
"Stay, teacher," the young man pleaded. "I'll support you and your mother the rest of your lives. Won't that do?"
"Thank you for your good intentions, young brother," said Wang Jin. "It's fine here. But I'm afraid Marshal Gao will send men after me, and you'll become implicated. That wouldn't be right. We'd both be in trouble. I'm determined to go on to Yanan and join the garrison under Old General Zhong. It's a border post and they need men. I can make a fresh start there."
Since they couldn't persuade Wang Jin to stay, Shi Jin and his father gave him a farewell banquet. They presented him with two bolts of satin and a hundred ounces of silver, brought in on a platter.
The next day Wang Jin tied his luggage to his shoulder-pole and got the horse ready. He and his mother took their leave of the old squire, then Wang Jin helped his mother into the saddle and they set out for Yanan. Shi Jin had a vassal carry the shoulder-pole. He himself, hating to part, escorted his guests for ten //:
Finally Shi Jin bowed to his teacher and said good-bye with tears in his eyes. He returned with the vassal to the manor. Wang Jin shouldered the carrying-pole and followed behind the horse. Mother and son proceeded westward along the road.
We'll talk not of Wang Jin, who went to join the garrison but rather of Shi Jin. Everyday, he steeled himself vigorously. Young, unmarried, he often got up in the middle of the night to drill with weapons. During the day he practised archery and rode horseback behind the manor.
Before half a year had gone by, his father fell ill and could not leave his bed. Shi Jin brought doctors from near and far but none of them could save him. To the sorrow of all, the old man died. Shi Jin prepared a coffin and outer casket, in which his father was laid, richly dressed, and he hired Buddhist monks to conduct seven services, one every seven days, to pray for the departed squire. He also paid Taoist priests to chant prayers ensuring the passage of his father's soul straight to heaven. There were more than ten of these services. He then selected an auspicious day for the funeral. All of the three or four hundred families in the village attended, dressed in mourning. Squire Shi was buried in the ancestral cemetery on a hillside west of the village.
Now there was no one to look after Shi Jin's household affairs. The young man cared nothing for farming. His only interest was in finding people with whom he could match skill at arms.
Three or four months passed. It was the middle of the sixth lunar month, and very hot. Shi Jin sat on a folding-chair beneath a willow on the edge of the threshing-ground outside the manor, seeking a breath of cool air. He had nothing to do. A breeze wafted in from the pine grove opposite. "How refreshing," thought Shi Jin.
Suddenly he saw a man poke his head out of the grove and peer around. "Who's that over there," Shi Jin shouted, "looking at our manor?" He leaped to his feet and ran to the trees. There, behind a pine, he discovered Li Ji, the rabbit hunter.
"Why are you watching the manor?" Shi Jin demanded. "Are you spying on me?"
Li Ji came forward and greeted him respectfully. "Your humble servant was looking for Shorty Qiu. I wanted him to have a bowl of wine with me. When I saw the Young Master sitting there, enjoying the breeze, I didn't dare intrude."
"Let me ask you. You used to come often and sell us game. I never underpaid you. Why have you stopped? Do you think I have no money?"
"Would I dare think that? There just hasn't been any game lately. That's why I haven't come."
"Piffle! A mountain as big and wide as Shaohua? Do you expect me to believe there are no deer, no rabbits?"

"So you haven't heard, Young Master? Bandits have built a fort on the mountain. They've six or seven hundred men and over a hundred good horses. Their leader is called Miraculous Strategist Zhu Wu. The second in command is called Gorge-Leaping Tiger Chen Da. The third is called White-Spotted Snake Yang Chun. These three raid and pillage at will. The Huayin County authorities can do nothing about them. They've offered a reward of three thousand strings of cash for their capture. But who dares to try? Your servant is afraid to go hunting on the mountain. That's why I can't offer you any game."
"I've heard there were bandits up there," said Shi Jin. "I didn't know the scoundrels were so active. They're bound to make trouble for me. But I still would like some game if you can catch any."
Li Ji bowed and departed.
Shi Jin returned to the manor. "Those rogues are going at it in a big way," he thought. "They'll probably attack our village. In that case ..."
He ordered his vassals to slaughter two fat water buffaloes and bring out some good home-made wine. First he burned paper replicas of gold and silver ingots as an offering to Heaven and prayed for good luck. Then he invited the three or four hundred local peasants to the hall in the manor. After all were seated according to age, he had the vassals pour them wine.
"I hear that three robber chieftains have formed a gang of six or seven hundred bandits on Mount Shaohua who raid and pillage," he said. "Since they're operating in a big way, sooner or later they're going to attack our village. I've invited you here for a conference. When those rascals come, every family must be ready. If our manor sounds the alarm, all of you come running with your weapons. We'll do the same if any of you are attacked. We'll help each other and defend our village. If the chieftains come, I'll deal with them personally."
"You make the decisions, Young Master," said the peasants. "We depend on you. When the alarm sounds none of us will stay away." At evening they drank a final cup in thanks and returned to their homes to prepare their weapons.
Shi Jin strengthened the gates and walls of the manor and put everything in order. He issued suits of armor, and had swords and horses kept in readiness. Of this we'll say no more.

We'll speak instead of the three bandit chieftains on Mount Shaohua. They sat down, one day, and conferred. Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist, their leader, was from Dingyuan. His weapons were two swords. Although not an especially good fighter, he was skilled in battle tactics and was a clever strategist. The second in command, Chen Da was from the city of Yecheng. He wielded a steel-tipped spear. Yang Chun, number three, was from Xieliang County in Puzhou. He used a halberd.
"I hear that Huayin County is offering a reward of three thousand strings of cash and is mustering men to arrest us," said Zhu Wu. "We'll give them a bloody battle when they come. The trouble is we're short of money and grain. We'd better go out and rob some. We'll need a grain reserve to see us through if troops besiege us."
"That's right," said Chen Da the Gorge-Leaping Tiger. "Let's demand grain from Huayin County, and see what they do about it."
"Don't go to Huayin," Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake advised. "Pucheng would be better. It's a sure thing."
"There aren't many people in Pucheng," said Chen Da, "and they don't have much money or grain. I'm for raiding Huayin. The people are prosperous there. They've money and grain aplenty."
"You don't understand, brother," said Yang Chun. "To get to Huayin, we have to pass Shi Family Village. That Nine Dragons Shi Jin is very tough. It's not wise to stir him up. He'd never let us by."
"Weak talk, brother," said Chen Da. "If we can't get past a mere village, how are we going to stand up against government troops?"
"You shouldn't underestimate Shi Jin, brother," Yang Chun replied. "He's really fierce."
"I too have heard that he's very brave," said Zhu Wu. "They say his skill with weapons is first rate. Let's not go, brothers."
"Shut your craven mouths," Chen Da cried. "Praising other people's courage pulls down your own. After all he's only human. Does he have three heads and six arms? I don't believe it!" And he shouted to his cohorts: "Get my horse. I'm going to attack Shi Family Village, then I'm going to take Huayin."
Zhu Wu and Yang Chun tried to dissuade him but he wouldn't listen. He donned armor and mounted his horse, picked a hundred and fifty men and, drums beating and gongs crashing, started down the mountain towards Shi Family Village.
Shi Jin, who was in front of the manor checking his men's arms and equipment, was informed of this by one of his vassals. He promptly had the alarm beat out on a bamboo segment. From all sides men of the four hundred village families came running to the manor, carrying their weapons. They found Shi Jin wearing a ridged turban, a vermilion coat of mail, iron breastplate and backpiece, an embroidered black robe, green boots and a leather belt. He had a bow and a quiver of arrows, and he grasped a three-pointed double-edged sword with four holes and eight rings.
A vassal led forward his fiery red horse. Shi Jin mounted. He raised his sword. Preceded by forty strong vassals and followed by ninety villagers and peasants, Shi Jin set forth. Shouting and cheering, the rest of the villagers brought up the rear and followed them to the road north of the village.
Chen Da led his men swiftly down the mountain and told them to spread out. Shi Jin saw that he was wearing a red concave hat, a golden suit of mail, a red robe and thick-soled boots. Around his waist was a long plaited girdle. He rode a high white horse and carried level a steel-tipped lance eighteen feet long. The men on both sides set up a fierce cry.
From their mounts, the two leaders looked at each other. Chen Da bowed in his saddle.
"You murder and burn, rob and plunder, your terrible crimes are all punishable by death," Shi Jin shouted. "Haven't you heard of me? Where do you get the gall to come and tweak the tiger's whiskers?"
"We're short of grain in our mountain fortress," Chen Da replied. "We hope to borrow some in Huayin. The road brings us by your honourable manor but of course we wouldn't dare touch a blade of grass here. Let us pass. We'll thank you properly on our return."
"Nonsense. I'm a ward chief. I've been meaning to go out after you bandits but now you've come to me. If I let you go and the magistrate hears about it, I'll be implicated."
" 'Within the four seas, all men are brothers.' We'll trouble you to let us by."
"Enough of idle chatter. Even if I were willing, there's another who won't agree. You'll have to ask him."
"And who is that, good valiant?"
"This sword in my hand!"
Chen Da grew angry. "Don't push me too far. You'll force me to retaliate!"
Shi Jin, also angry, flourished his sword, spurred his horse and charged. Chen Da struck his own mount and galloped forward with levelled lance. The two men clashed and fought. After several rounds, Shi Jin feinted, pretending to leave his chest exposed, and Chen Da lunged. The young squire dodged the streaking lance. Their bodies met. Shi Jin threw an agile arm around Chen Da's waist, seized him by his plaited girdle and, with a quick twist, lifted him from his decorated saddle and flung him to the ground. The bandit leader's horse dashed away like the wind. Shi Jin shouted for his men to tie Chen Da up. The rest of the bandits were driven off.
Shi Jin returned to the manor and had Chen Da bound to a pillar in the courtyard. He decided that when he captured the other two bandit chieftains as well he would turn all three over to the authorities and claim the reward. He dispensed wine to his men and told them they could go. They drank, praising his courage.
Back in the mountain fortress, Zhu Wu and Yang Chun were wondering why there was still no news. They sent out a scout. Soon the other bandits returned, leading a riderless horse. As they climbed, they shouted to the chieftains: "Bitterness and woe! Chen Da wouldn't listen to you two older brothers, and now he's as good as dead."
Zhu Wu asked what had gone wrong. The bandits told him about the battle, adding: "That Shi Jin is a mighty warrior."
"Chen Da wouldn't listen to me," said Zhu Wu, "and sure enough he's met with disaster."
"Let's go down in full force and fight it out," suggested Yang Chun.
"Impossible," said Zhu Wu. "If Chen Da couldn't beat him, how can you? I have an idea. It's risky but it may save Chen Da. If it doesn't you and I are finished, too."
"What is it?"
Zhu Wu whispered the plan in his ear.
"Excellent," said Yang Chun. "Let's go, then. We've no time to lose."
Shi Jin, in the manor, was still in a temper when a vassal rushed in and reported: "Zhu Wu and Yang Chun are on their way from the mountain fortress."
"Those scoundrels. I'll turn them both in. Bring my horse, quickly."
The alarm was sounded and the villagers gathered. He mounted and was riding through the manor gate when he saw Zhu Wu and Yang Chun approaching on foot. They knelt and gazed at him with tears streaming down their cheeks. Shi Jin reined his animal and shouted: "What are you kneeling there for?"
Weeping, Zhu Wu replied: "We three small men were harried so by the officials that we were forced to go into the hills and become outlaws. We swore that 'although not born on the same day we would on the same day die.' Perhaps ours cannot be compared to the brotherhood between Guan Gong, Zhang Fei and Liu Bei of antiquity but our hearts are equally sincere. Today our younger brother Chen Da went against our advice. He offended Your Excellency and has been locked up in your honourable manor. Since we have no way to save him, we've come to die with him. Please turn the three of us over to the officials and collect the reward. We won't even frown. We gladly ask you to send us to our deaths."
Shi Jin thought to himself: "What loyalty! If I turn them in and claim the reward every stout-hearted fellow in the land will scorn me. 'A tiger doesn't pounce on supine prey,' as the old saying goes." To the kneeling bandit chiefs he said: "Come with me."
The two, without fear, followed him to the rear hall. Again they knelt and asked him to tie them up. Shi Jin repeatedly urged them to rise but they wouldn't hear of it. "The astute spare the astute, and the brave know the brave."
Sure enough, the young squire said: "Since you two are so loyal, I'd be no true man if I handed you over to the authorities. Suppose I gave Chen Da back to you, how would that be?"
"You'd only become implicated," said Zhu Wu. "That would never do. We'd much rather you turned us in and claimed the reward."
"Impossible," retorted Shi Jin. "Will you share my food and drink?"
"Death doesn't scare us," said Zhu Wu. "Why should your meat and wine?"
The young squire was very pleased. He untied Chen Da and spread a feast for the three bandit chiefs in the rear hall. Zhu Wu, Yang Chun and Chen Da thanked him for his kindness. After several drinks, they all looked more cheerful. When the wine was finished, the three chieftains again thanked Shi Jin and went back to their mountain. Shi Jin saw them off as far as the manor gate.
After returning to the fortress, Zhu Wu sat down with the other two. "If it weren't for our plan, would any of us be alive now?" he said. "Not only did we save Chen Da but Shi Jin, with rare gallantry, released us all: In a few days we must send him some gifts to show our gratitude."
Let's skip the petty details. Ten or so days later, the three bandit chiefs, on a moonless night, dispatched two of their men with thirty gold bars. The men knocked at the manor gate and a vassal reported their arrival. Shi Jin quickly donned his clothes and went out to meet them.
"Do you have a message for me?"
"Our three chieftains offer their respects. We are instructed to deliver this paltry gift in thanks to Your Excellency for sparing their lives. Please don't reject it but keep it with a smile." They handed Shi Jin the gold.
At first he was going to refuse but then he thought: "Since they were good enough to send it, I ought to accept." He directed his vassal to give the messengers wine. They drank until after midnight. Then Shi Jin tipped them with silver and told them to return.
Less than half a month later the bandit chiefs again conferred, and once more sent messengers at night to the manor, this time with a string of large precious pearls they had obtained in a robbery. Shi Jin accepted it. Of this we'll say no more.
After another half month Shi Jin thought to himself: "Those three show so much respect, I really ought to send them some gifts in return." The next day he instructed a vassal to buy three bolts of red brocade in the county town and have a tailor make three gowns for the bandit chiefs. He also had three fat sheep slaughtered and cooked. These and the clothes he had two men deliver in a large box.
Shi Jin's steward was a man named Wang the Fourth. This fellow's tongue was so nimble he could converse with officials. The other servants called him "Bodang's [2] Equal." Wang was one of the two messengers. When they arrived with the box at the foot of the mountain, bandit sentries questioned them, then led them to the fortress. The bandit chiefs were delighted with the brocaded silk gowns and the delicious mutton and wine. They tipped the messengers ten ounces of silver and poured them more than a dozen bowls of wine. Shi Jin's men then returned to the manor.
"The mountain chiefs are very grateful," they told the young squire.
Thereafter Shi Jin had considerable dealings with the bandit leaders. Wang the Fourth went to the mountain lair a number of times with gifts. On several occasions the chiefs sent gold and silver to Shi Jin.
The days sped by. Soon it was the eighth lunar month, the time of the Mid-Autumn Festival. Shi Jin decided to ask the three bandit chieftains to enjoy the full moon and drink wine at the manor on the night of the fifteenth. He sent Wang the Fourth to the stronghold with a written invitation. The three leaders accepted with pleasure. They wrote out a reply, tipped Wang five ounces of silver and gave him more than ten bowls of wine.
On the way home Wang ran into two bandits who frequently came to the manor with gifts. They embraced him and dragged him off to a grog shop in a mountain hamlet by the side of the road, where he downed another ten bowls. Finally they parted and Wang resumed his homeward journey. A strong wind buffeted him and brought all the wine to his head. Wang staggered along for about ten //until he came to a grove. He plunged in and threw himself down on a grassy sward.
It so happened that Li Ji the hunter was out after rabbits on the mountainside. He knew Wang and, seeing him lying there, went to help him up but the steward was much too heavy. The hunter's sharp eye noticed the bulge of silver in Wang's belt sash.
"The knave is drunk," he thought. "Where did he get so much money? Why don't I help myself?" Li Ji took off the sash and shook it. The pieces of silver and the brigands' reply fell to the ground. He picked up the letter and opened it. He was barely literate, and could recognize only the names Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun. The flowery language of the rest he was unable to read.
"It's not easy for a poor hunter like me to come up in the world," he said to himself. "Yet the fortune-teller said this year I would get rich. This must be my chance! In Huayin Town I saw a proclamation offering a reward of three thousand strings of cash for the capture of those three bandits. No wonder the other day, when I was looking for Shorty Qiu, that rogue of a Shi Jin was afraid I was spying on him. He's been in league with those brigands right along!"
Li Ji took the pieces of silver and the letter and headed for Huayin to report to the authorities.
When Wang the Fourth awakened it was already the second watch. He was startled to find himself bathed in pale moonlight. He leaped to his feet and looked around. On all sides were pine trees. He felt his waist.
His sash and letter were gone. Wang searched everywhere. He found only the empty sash, lying on the grass.
Wang the Fourth groaned. "It doesn't matter about the silver," he thought. "But it's terrible to lose that letter. Who could have taken it?" He frowned. "If I say I've lost it, the master will be furious. He'll throw me out. I'd better say there wasn't any written reply. He'll never know the difference."
The steward flew back to the manor. It was well into the fifth watch when he arrived.
"What took you so long?" Shi Jin demanded.
"Out of courtesy to you, master, the three chiefs wouldn't let me go. They plied me with drink till after midnight. That's why I'm late."
"Did they send any reply?"
"They were going to write one but I said: 'Since you're definitely coming, why bother with a written reply? Your servant has been drinking. What if I lost it on the way home? That wouldn't be any joke.' "
"No wonder everybody calls you 'Bodang's Equal,' " Shi Jin commended him smilingly. "You're really clever."
"Your servant didn't dare delay. I hurried back without stopping once."
"Well then, send someone to the county town for tidbits to go with the wine we'll serve our guests."
Soon it was Mid-Autumn Festival Day. The weather was bright and clear. Shi Jin instructed his servants to slaughter a big sheep and kill over a hundred chickens and geese and prepare a feast.
Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun directed their minions to guard the stronghold. Towards evening they came down the mountain with an escort of five men. They each carried a halberd and a sword. All were walking, having left their horses in the fortress. They headed straight for the manor.
Shi Jin received them and they exchanged courtesies. The young squire invited them to the rear garden, where a banquet had been spread. He asked them to take the seats of honour. He sat down opposite, and told his vassals to bolt the front and rear gates of the manor. As host and guests drank, attendants kept refilling their cups and carving the sheep. By the time several cups were drained, a full moon was rising in the east.
They drank and enjoyed the Mid-Autumn Festival, and chatted about old things and new. Suddenly, they heard a clamour outside the manor and saw the glow of torches. Shi Jin, startled, rose quickly.
"Please remain seated, friends. I'll go and see what the matter is," he said. Shouting to his vassals: "Don't open the gate."
He climbed a ladder to the top of the wall and looked over. The sheriff of Huayin County, 2 constables and 300 or 400 soldiers had surrounded the manor. Shi Jin and the bandit leaders groaned. In the light of the torches, the young squire could see a veritable forest of pronged spears, halberds, 5-tined forks and barbed spears. The constables were shouting: "Don't let the robbers escape!" If this detachment had not come to arrest Shi Jin and the 3 chiefs, would Shi have killed several men and joined with a dozen or more gallants? As a result, warriors gathered deep amid the reeds, and in the shade of lotus-leaves rode craft of war.

Then the Superior said to Marshal Hong — the story goes on — "Your Excellency still does not understand. This is the very hall referred to in the sacred injunctions handed down by the Master of the Mystic Cavern. His warning was as follows: 'In this hall are incarcerated the thirty-six celestial powers and the seventy-two terrestrial powers; altogether one hundred and eight demon princes are located here, subjugated by the magic formulas engraved in dragon script and phoenix characters upon this stone. If ever they are released into the world, the realm of man must suffer perforce the gravest disturbances.' Now Your Excellency has let them go. What can we do?" Listen to this poem about it:

When of a sudden doors dark and ancient gape,
Powers of sky and earth from prison escape.
Evils awake that until now were sleeping.
And he who came to save gives cause for weeping.
Now cosmic powers in turmoil swirl like mist
And clashing spears on all sides know no pause.
While Gao Qiu's villainy is rightly hissed,
Hong Xin must rank as calamity's prime cause.

When Hong Xin heard the words of the Superior, he broke out in a cold sweat and began to shake uncontrollably. Hurriedly he gathered together his things, summoned his followers and departed from the mountain to return to the capital. The Superior and monks saw him off, as courtesy demands, and then went back to the temple to repair the damaged building and re-erect the tablet. We say no more of them. As for Marshal Hong, on the return journey he gave strict orders to his followers to say no word to anyone about the release of the demons. He feared that if the Emperor heard of it he would be blamed. They made an uneventful journey, riding night and day to reach the capital. On their arrival in Bianliang they heard people say: "The Heavenly Master was seven days and nights in the Forbidden City of the Eastern Capital performing holy rites, distributing amulets and praying for disaster to be averted. Now the plague is eradicated and peace and prosperity have returned to the land. The Heavenly Master left the court, mounted on a crane and riding the clouds, and has returned to the Dragon-Tiger Mountain."

The following day Hong Xin attended court in the morning and made his report to the Emperor. "The Heavenly Master, mounted on a crane and riding the clouds, reached the capital before your servant and his retinue," he explained, "who travelling by stages arrived later."

The Emperor accepted this report and rewarded Hong Xin, who returned to his old duties. We shall say no more of him.

Emperor Ren Zong remained on the throne for forty-two years, until his death. There being no heir, the throne then passed to the son of Yunrang, Prince of Pu'an who was a grandson of Emperor Tai Zong. Under the name Ying Zong he reigned for four years. He was succeeded by his son, Shen Zong whose reign lasted 18 years and was followed by that of Zhe Zong. This was a time of universal peace. There was no trouble of any kind anywhere.

Now there was in those days in the Xuanwu district of the Eastern Capital, Bianliang, or Kaifeng as it is now called, a certain profligate son of a ruined family named Gao. He was the second son, and since his youth he had neglected family affairs and devoted himself entirely to the manipulation of sword or staff, and to football, at which he was very skilled. The people of the capital therefore referred to him not in the customary way as Second Brother Gao but as Gao Qiu or Gao-the-Ball. Later, when he began to get on in the world, he transformed this nickname into Gao-le-Bel. [1] He could play various instruments, wind and string, danced well, and had a good voice. He was an adept at martial arts, with spear or staff, and wrestling. He had some idea of rhyming and calligraphy, and could turn out a song or an ode. But of generosity, virtue, the rites, wisdom, trustworthiness, reliability, loyalty, or excellence he knew absolutely nothing. He spent his days within and without the walls of the capital, pandering to the rich and famous. He had abetted the son of a wealthy man, Mr. Wang, in squandering a fortune: the two of them used to haunt the pleasure gardens, where they were forever in and out of those Houses of the Wind, the Flowers, the Snow or the Moonlight. After this the father took out a writ against Gao, and the district court sentenced him to twenty lashes and banishment, forbidding any inhabitant of the capital to give him food or shelter. Thus beleaguered, Gao-the-Ball betook himself to Linhuaizhou, west of the River Huai, where he found refuge with the owner of a gaming parlour, one Gentleman Liu, or Liu Shiquan, to give him his proper name. The latter had devoted his life to harbouring and supporting riff-raff, and it was his pleasure to shelter miscreants from the four corners of the empire. Gao-the-Ball came to rest in Gentleman Liu's abode and lived there three years.

Later, Emperor Zhe Zong, having gone to offer sacrifices in the southern suburbs and procured propitious winds and timely rains, graciously proclaimed an amnesty throughout the empire. Accordingly in Linhuaizhou Gao-the-Ball received a remission of his sentence and began to plan his return to the capital. Liu Shiquan happened to have a relation in the capital, a certain Dong, who had a medicinal herbs shop under the Golden-Beam Bridge. Liu wrote him a letter which he gave to Gao, together with supplies and money for travel expenses, so that the latter on his return to the capital could lodge with the herbalist.

Gao-the-Ball bade farewell to Liu Shiquan, shouldered his bags, and departed from Linhuaizhou. He made his way to the Eastern Capital, where he went straight to the herbalist's shop under the Golden-Beam Bridge and presented his letter. After observing Gao-the-Ball and reading the letter from Liu Shiquan, Dong said to himself: "How can I take this Gao into my home? If he were an honest man it might be all right to let him have the run of the house. The children could learn something from him. But he's an idler and a vagabond, and simply not to be trusted. What's more, he's a convicted criminal. Such as he don't change their ways. If I let him live with us it will disturb the children and set a bad example to them. On the other hand, if I don't receive him it will be an offence to Liu Shiquan." So for the time being he saw no alternative but to feign a warm welcome. He took Gao in and invited him to dine and drink each day. After ten days or so, Dong worked out a tactic. He bought a new set of clothes and he wrote a letter. These two things he offered to Gao, saying: "My humble establishment fails to do you justice; I fear you will be held back. I in turn, therefore, would like to recommend you, to the young academician, Mr. Su. Sooner or later you are sure to make your name. How does this proposal strike you?"

Gao-the-Ball thanked him profusely. Dong detailed someone to deliver the letter and show Gao the way to the academician's. The doorman announced him. The moment the academician saw Gao and read the letter he recognized him for the dissolute good-for-nothing he was, and said to himself: "How can I take this one into my house? The best solution is to do him a favour, and recommend him to Wang Jinqing, the Emperor's son-in-law, as a personal aide. People have a name for Wang, they call him 'Marshal Wang, the Princeling,' and this is just the type of person he likes." He wrote a reply to Dong, the herbalist, and invited Gao to stay the night. The next day he composed a deferential letter and dispatched it with a servant, who was to take Gao to the Princeling's house.

This Princeling Wang was in fact the husband of Emperor Zhe Zong's younger sister and was the son-in-law of the late Emperor Shen Zong. He liked men of the world: such were the people to whom he gave employment. When academician Su's messenger brought him the letter and presented Gao, Princeling Wang was greatly taken with him, and immediately penned a reply to the academician, informing him that he would take Gao into his household as a personal aide. Gao's fortunes had turned, for from now on he came and went in Marshal Wang's house like one of the family. And, as the old saying goes, "Separate lives make separate thoughts; close living makes for close relations."

One day — it was his birthday — the Princeling ordered his household to prepare a banquet, at which the guest of honour was to be his brother-in-law, Prince Duan. This Prince Duan was the eleventh son of the late Emperor Shen Zong, younger brother to the Emperor Zhe Zong. He had been appointed superintendent of the Eastern Stables, and had the title of Ninth Royal Prince. This was a man of some intelligence and he cut a dashing figure. Of the various pastimes of the rich, the idle, and the dissolute there was none he did not know, none he was not skilled in, and none he did not love. Master of the lute, chess, calligraphy and painting, it goes without saying that he was as good at kicking a ball and throwing bowls as at playing the flute, strumming a guitar, singing or dancing.

The feast that was prepared at Marshal Wang's house that day was furnished with the choicest fare from sea or land. It was an occasion when:

Incense burns in precious vessels, flowers are arranged in golden vases; brilliant musicians compete to produce the most striking harmonies, and everywhere the masterpieces of famous artisans are on show. There are crystal decanters overflowing with ambrosia, amber cups brimming with transparent distillations; there are tortoiseshell plates piled with luscious peaches and rare fruits, glass bowls heaped with bears' paws and camel's hooves; there is meat of delicate fish parted in silver strands, and perfumed tea brewed from the herb's choicest tips. The dancing girl in the red skirt matches her steps to the ivory clappers and the trilling flute; the blue-sleeved singer pours out her rich notes in harmony with the orchestra and the pipes. 2 rows of beauties are drawn up before the steps, and the orchestra sits close below the dais.

When Prince Duan arrived for the banquet, Marshal Wang ushered him to the place of honour, and himself sat down opposite. After a good many cups, and after 2 complete menus had been served, Prince Duan got up to wash his hands. Happening to enter the library to rest for a while, he noticed on the table a pair of paperweights made of mutton-fat jade and carved in the form of lions. They were of especially fine workmanship, and the detail was exquisite. Prince Duan picked the lions up and after holding them in his hands and gazing at them a long while, exclaimed, "Magnificent!" Marshal Wang, seeing Prince Duan so taken with them, said: "There is also a jade brush-holder, in the shape of a dragon, from the hand of the same craftsman. I don't have it here at the moment but I will get it tomorrow and send the complete set to you."

Prince Duan was delighted. "That is truly generous," he said. "I am most grateful. I imagine the brush-holder must be even more beautiful."

"Tomorrow I will send for it and have it delivered to your palace," Wang said, "and then you can judge."

Prince Duan thanked him again, and the two of them returned to the banquet, where they feasted on till dusk. They were quite drunk when the party broke up and Prince Duan returned to his palace.

The next morning Wang sent for the jade dragon brush-holder, and together with the two jade lion paperweights had it put in a little gold box that was wrapped in yellow silk. He also wrote a respectful letter, and told Gao-le-Bel — as he now called himself — to deliver it.

In obedience to Marshal Wang's wishes, Gao-le-Bel took up the precious jade knick-knacks, slipped the letter into his breastpocket, and took himself off to Prince Duan's palace. Here the doorman announced him to the chamberlain, who in a little while appeared and asked: "Whose household are you from?"

Gao-le-Bel bowed and said: "I am from Marshal Wang's household. I am sent especially to present these jade ornaments to the Prince."

"His Highness is in the main central court," the Chamberlain said, "playing ball with some of the young palace attendants. You'd better go there and see him yourself."

"Be so good as to conduct me," Gao-le-Bel said. The Chamberlain escorted him to the gates of the court where Gao saw the Prince, wearing a turban of soft gauze in the Tang style, and a long purple tunic embroidered with dragons, fastened at the waist by a double silk belt, signifying military and civil rank; the tunic was hitched up and tucked into the belt in front. On his feet he wore gold slippers embroidered with a flying phoenix. Several young palace attendants were kicking the ball with him.

Not wishing to interrupt, Gao-le-Bel remained standing behind some servants awaiting his opportunity. It must have been Gao-le-Bel's destiny to make his fortune, for luck was with him that day: the ball sailed through the air, while Prince Duan tried in vain to reach it, and came down among the group of servants, where it rolled right to Gao's feet. Gao saw the ball coming, and plucking up his courage, gave it the special kick known as "a duck and drake" or a "double bend," which delivered it straight back to the Prince.

Prince Duan was enormously impressed. "Who are you, then?" he asked.

Gao-le-Bel took a step forward and knelt. "Your Highness, I am in the service of Marshal Wang," he said. "I come, on my master's instructions, to bring you two jade ornaments that he begs you to accept. There is also a letter that I venture humbly to present to you."

The Prince smiled and said: "How gracious of my brother-in-law."

Gao-le-Bel took out the letter and presented it. Prince Duan opened the box, and looked at the jade objects, then gave them to a servant to take away. He paid no further attention to the knick-knacks or where they went but said to Gao: "So you can play football! What's your name?"

Gao bowed again and said: "My name is Gao-le-Bel. I play just a little."

"Good!" said the Prince. "You can come and play with us now."

"But Your Highness, I am no one," Gao protested, prostrating himself. "How can I play with Your Highness?"

"This is the Clouds Company, a club for players," the Prince said. "We call ourselves 'Kickers United.' What possible harm can there be in your playing with us?"

"How could I presume?" Gao said, prostrating himself again.

He refused five or six times but the Prince was adamant, so Gao had no alternative but to knock his head on the ground in acknowledgement of the honour, remove his leggings and enter the field. To begin with he simply performed a few kicks that the Prince applauded. Finally, in deference to the Prince, he was obliged to display the full range of his skill and talent. He played so brilliantly that the ball seemed literally glued to his body, and Prince Duan was so pleased with him he would not hear of Gao's returning home but insisted he stay the night.

The next day the Prince organized a banquet for Marshal Wang and invited him to the palace. Marshal Wang, by the way, had been full of suspicions, when Gao did not return the night before but now his doorman appeared and announced: "The Ninth Royal Prince's servant has arrived with a message for Your Grace: he wants to invite you to a banquet at his palace." After receiving the messenger and reading the invitation, Marshal Wang immediately mounted his horse and rode over to the palace. Arriving there he dismounted and entered. Prince Duan expressed great pleasure at his coming, and thanked him for the jade objects.

During dinner, Prince Duan said: "That Gao-le-Bel is truly an extraordinary ball player, what would you say if I asked you to let me keep him in my service?"

"If you find this person useful to you, then by all means let him stay here in the palace to serve you," the Marshal replied.

Prince Duan was delighted and expressed his gratitude in a toast. After that the two friends chatted for a while, and when the dinner party broke up that evening, Marshal Wang returned to his residence. We say no more of him.

As for Prince Duan, having taken Gao-le-Bel into his service he kept him in the palace, where he was lodged and fed. Gao, for his part, after being so fortunate as to be noticed by Prince Duan, followed his master all the time, never departing from his footsteps.

Less than two months later, Emperor Zhe Zong departed this world. There was no direct heir, and the civil and military authorities, after holding a council, declared Prince Duan emperor. He reigned as Emperor Hui Zong, and was also a Taoist grand master — founder of the Clear Jade School and master of the Way of the Subtle Mystery. His reign was unremarkable. One day, however, he said to Gao-le-Bel: "It is our desire to advance you. But for a promotion to be possible, you really need some frontier service behind you. First we will have you listed at the War Ministry. Then you will be transferred to our personal guard."

Less than six months later the Emperor promoted Gao-le-Bel to the rank of Grand Marshal of the Palace. It was like this:

Clouds Company pays degree no heed;
"Kickers United" knows not higher and lower;
Gao booted himself upwards with an agile kick,
And landed in the corridors of power.

After receiving this rank, Gao-le-Bel chose a suitable day and an auspicious morning, and went to assume his duties at the Palace. All the members of staff and officers of the guard under his orders, the staff officers, the Imperial Guard, the Emperor's personal guard, infantry and cavalry, came to pay him their respects, each holding out a card showing his name and duties. When Grand Marshal Gao had ticked the names off on his list only one was missing: Wang Jin, instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards, who already a fortnight earlier had reported sick, and had not returned to his post because he was not yet recovered from his illness. Marshal Gao flew into a great rage. "Bollocks!" he shouted. "I've got his card here. If the bastard refuses to put in an appearance, it's because he's a shirker! He's malingering! Fetch him here at once!"

They went at once to Wang Jin's home to get him. Wang Jin was not married and lived with his old mother, who was over sixty. "Today Marshal Gao came to the office for the first time," the commander of the local police explained to Wang Jin. "He couldn't tick your name on his list. The quartermaster explained you were staying home because you were sick and there was a certificate to prove it. But Marshal Gao's a difficult man. He refused to accept this. He said you must be fetched, because you were at home faking an illness. So, Instructor Wang, please come with us. If you don't, we will all get into trouble."

Hearing this, Wang Jin had to disregard his illness and go with them. When he came into the presence of Marshal Gao, he kowtowed four times, and, still inclining respectfully, sang out "Beg to report, Sir!"; then he went and stood to one side.

"Listen, you! Are you the son of Wang Sheng, former instructor of the guards of the capital?"

"Yes sir," Wang Jin replied.

"Well, you scum, your father was a mountebank who gave staff-play exhibitions with a painted stick and sold patent medicines in the market, what do you know of the military arts? My predecessor must have had no eyes, if he asked you to be an instructor! How dare you insult me by not turning up to my roll-call! What makes you think you can stay home pretending to be ill, as if you were on holiday?"

"I would not do that, sir. Truly I had not recovered from my illness."

"You felon! If you're ill, how did you get here now?"

"If Your Excellency commands my presence, naturally I must come."

The Marshal's fury was unabated. "Take the bastard away and thrash him for me," he yelled to the guards. The guards, however, were all on good terms with Wang Jin, and they joined with the quartermaster in saying: "Today is the day of the Marshal's first taking office. On such an auspicious day, is it not possible for Your Excellency to pardon him this once?"

"All right, you gaolbird, for the sake of these officers I shall let you off for the time being. But you'd better watch out tomorrow!"

When Wang Jin had prostrated himself in gratitude, he stood up and raising his eyes for the first time saw that it was Gao-le-Bel. As he left the yamen, he sighed deeply and said to himself: "I'll be lucky to get out of this now with my life. I was wondering who this 'Marshal Gao' could be, and it turns out that it's none other than that infamous wastrel, Second Brother Gao, the ball-player. He has harboured this hatred ever since he was learning the art of the staff and my father flattened him with a blow he was three or four months recovering from. Now he's struck lucky, and got this position of Grand Marshal to the court, so he wants his revenge. I never foresaw I might have to serve under him. As the proverb says: 'Fear not the law but the one who wields the law.' How can I oppose him? What can I do, in my situation?"

It was in a desperate frame of mind that he returned home. He told his mother everything, and the two of them wept together. Then his mother said: "My son, if there are thirty-six possibilities, the best one is always flight. The trouble is, I fear there's nowhere to go."

"You are right, Mother," Wang Jin said. "It's what I had decided myself. And I've thought of a way. Field-Marshal Zhong, the Old Field-Marshal, is in command of the frontier garrison in Yanan. Under his command there are a good many officers from the capital who used to enjoy my martial art demonstrations. Why not seek refuge with them? I'm sure I can find some employment there which will enable us to live comfortably." This was a case of:

If the master knows how to use the servant,
The servant will be of use;
When the master's unjust, though, the service
Accrues to somebody else.
It's ever the case that this place's gain
Arises from that place's loss;
Whom some will drive out, others call in:
Then shame on the wasteful boss!

When the two of them had discussed it together, the mother said: "My son, if we are going to leave secretly, we must beware of those two guards outside the door. They were sent by the Marshal to watch you; if they begin to suspect our intention, I'm afraid we shall be prevented."

"Don't worry Mother, that's no problem," Wang Jin said. "I've a way to deal with them."

That same evening, before dark, Wang Jin called in one of the guards, Zhang by name, and told him: "When you've had your dinner, I want you to go somewhere and do something for me."

"What do you want me to do, sir?" Zhang asked.

"A few days ago, when I was ill, I made a vow to offer incense at the Temple of the Sacred Mountain outside the Gate of Wild Jujubes. I intend to go there tomorrow and burn some sticks of incense. I want you to go tonight and find the monk who looks after the temple and tell him to open the door a bit earlier tomorrow, so that I can burn the incense and then make the three offerings to the Lords Liu and Li.[2] You can sleep there at the temple, until I come."

Zhang followed these instructions; first he had his dinner and then he said goodnight and went off to the temple.

That evening mother and son packed their bags, taking clothes, a few valuables and some silver that they made into bundles that could be carried. They also filled two saddle-bags with provisions that their horse would bear. In the fifth watch, just before dawn, Wang Jin roused the other guard, whose name was Li, and told him: "Take this silver and go to the Temple of the Sacred Mountain; there I want you and Zhang to buy me all that is needed for the three offerings of meat; you can cook it while you're waiting for me. I shall join you when I've bought candles and some paper-money."

Li took the silver and went off to the temple. Wang Jin then went and saddled the horse. He brought it out of the stable and loaded it with the saddle-bags, checked the harness, and led it out by the back door, where he helped his mother to mount. All the heavier household goods they left behind. He locked the front and back doors and shouldered the carrying-pole, and they set off, with Wang Jin walking behind the horse. Taking advantage of the pre-dawn darkness, they quietly slipped out of the Gate of Western Splendour and took the road to Yanan.

The two guards bought the meat for the offerings and cooked it, and waited in the temple till halfway through the morning. No one came. Li got impatient and went back to the house to see what was going on but he drew a complete blank: the door was shut, and he searched half a day without finding anyone. By evening Zhang, who had remained at the Temple of the Sacred Mountain, also grew suspicious and rushed back to the house, where he joined Li in his searches until darkness fell. Obviously Wang Jin was not returning that night, and there was no sign of the mother either. Next morning the two guards inquired at Wang Jin's relatives' house but didn't find him. Fearing that they would be implicated, they had no alternative but to report the matter to the Marshal's office: "Instructor Wang has abandoned his home and fled with his mother, no one knows where they have gone."

When he heard this, Marshal Gao flew into a great passion. "The crook has fled, has he?" he shouted. "Well find out where the bastard has gone." He issued a writ to every province and district, ordering the arrest of the deserter Wang Jin. The two guards were exonerated because they had reported the matter. We say no more of them.

Instructor Wang and his mother, after leaving the capital, had to keep going, eating and drinking only to appease hunger and thirst, not resting till night and departing at dawn. They were on the road more than a month. One day, as it was getting dark and Wang Jin, with his bundles on a carrying-pole, was following the horse on which his mother sat, he said to his mother: "Heaven is merciful! We have escaped the snares and pitfalls that were set for us. It is no great distance now to Yanan. Marshal Gao can send his men after me if he likes, he won't catch me now."

They were both so pleased with this thought that they travelled on without noticing they had missed the inn where they might have lodged that night. They continued all evening without coming to a single village; where could they put up? Just as they were almost despairing, they saw in the distance a lamp glimmering among the trees. "Well," said Wang Jin, "suppose we go there and explain politely that we want shelter for one night, and will leave tomorrow morning?"

When they reached the wood, what they found was a big old manor, surrounded by a mud wall. Outside the wall were some two or three hundred willow trees. Here's what they saw:

The highway runs in front; stream and hill protect the rear. A mist of greenery wraps it round, and there are deep pools of shade on every side. Turn the corner and you'll find cows and sheep everywhere, while flocks of ducks and geese wander over the threshing-floor. The meadows and orchards provide ample pasture and are filled with over a thousand workers; countless women and children throng the imposing farm buildings. There's more than enough feed for chickens and dogs. There's a fine library, and plenty of promising sons and heirs.

Wang Jin went up to the door and knocked several times. When a servant appeared, Wang Jin put down his carrying-pole and exchanged greetings with him. "What brings you to our house?" the man asked.

"To tell the truth," Wang Jin said, "I and my mother have travelled too long and too late and find ourselves without lodging for the night. Here we are, with no village in front and no inn behind; we would like to prevail on your hospitality for one night; we promise to be gone early tomorrow morning. Naturally we will pay for our lodging. I hope you can help us."

"Just wait here, then," the servant said. "I'll go and ask the master. Provided he agrees you'll be welcome to stay."

"Thank you," Wang Jin said. "Don't hurry on our account."

The servant disappeared inside for a good while, before returning and saying: "The squire asks you to come in."

Wang Jin helped his mother to dismount. Then he picked up his carrying-pole and took the horse by the bridle, and they followed the servant inside. Wang Jin put down his burden on the threshing-floor and tied the horse to a tree. He and his mother were taken to a thatched room where the master received them.

The master of the house was a man of some sixty years or more, and his hair was completely white. He wore a hood, for warmth and protection from the dust, and a loose robe cut with the opening on the right, with a sash of black silk, and leather boots. Wang Jin immediately prostrated himself but the squire stopped him: "Please, no ceremony. You are travellers, you have suffered the trials of the road; you must sit down."

These polite rituals completed, mother and son seated them-selves. "Where are you from?" the squire asked them. "How is it that you arrive like this, after dark?"

"My name is Zhang," Wang Jin replied. "I am from the capital. Lately I have exhausted my resources and I have no means of support, so I am going to Yanan, to seek help from some relatives. Today without thinking we pushed on too far, and passed the inn where we might have stayed. We seek your hospitality, just for one night — we shall be gone tomorrow. Of course we would pay you."

"There's no need for that," the squire said. "In these times, who can carry his house with him? Now, I'll wager you and your mother have not eaten. Let me tell the servants to prepare some food."

In a little while a table had been set up in the hall, and servants brought a tray with four different kinds of vegetables and a dish of beef. They put these things down and went to warm wine and pour it.

"In a poor village like this we have little to offer," the squire said. "Please forgive us."

Wang Jin stood up to express his thanks. "We are only sorry to give you the trouble," he said. "I don't know what we can do to show our gratitude."

"Think no more of it," the squire answered. "And drink some wine, I beg you!" He made them drink six or seven cups while the food was served. When they had eaten, the dishes were cleared away and the old man stood up and showed them to the guest-room where they were to sleep.

Wang Jin said: "My mother is travelling on horseback, and if it is not troubling you too much, I would like the horse to be put in the stable and fed. I will pay for that with the rest."

"It is no trouble," the squire said. "We have mules and horses here ourselves. I'll tell one of my people to bring your horse in and feed him."

Wang Jin thanked him and took his bundles into the guest-room. A servant lit the lamp and brought warm water for them to wash their feet. The old man returned to his quarters, and the travellers both thanked the servant, closed the door and settled down to sleep.

Next morning, there being no sign of the visitors well after the day had dawned, the old man and his servants went to listen outside their door; they heard Wang Jin's old mother groaning. The squire called out: "Guests, it's morning, time to get up!" Wang Jin appeared immediately and greeted the old man. "I have long been up," he said. "I fear we gave you too much trouble yesterday, we are at fault."

"But who is it groaning like this?" the old man asked.

"I shall not conceal it from you," Wang Jin replied. "My mother is worn out after so many days in the saddle. Last night she began to suffer heart pains."

"In that case," the old man said, "be at ease. Let your mother stay and rest in my house a few days more. I know a remedy for heart pains, I will send a servant to town to get medicine for her to take. Tell her to rest and not to worry."

Wang Jin thanked him, and to cut a long story short, Wang Jin and his mother stayed at the manor and she took the medicine, until in a little less than a week she seemed almost recovered, and Wang Jin packed their bags, ready for departure.

That day as he was going to the stable to attend to the horse, Wang Jin noticed in a courtyard a young man practising with a staff. He was stripped to the waist, and his body was tattooed all over with blue dragons; he had a round face like a silver plate, and was about eighteen or nineteen years old. Wang Jin watched him for a good while, and then without thinking said, "You use the stick well; only there are some gaps in your technique, you couldn't defeat a real fighter." The youth was furious when he heard this. "Who are you?" he said. "And how dare you mock my art? I have had seven or eight famous teachers, and I certainly don't suppose you can do better. I dare you to try."

Almost before he'd finished speaking the old squire appeared. "Watch your manners," he shouted to the young man.

"I don't like the way this fellow made fun of my fighting," the young man said.

"Do you happen to know anything about fighting with the staff?" the old man asked his guest.

"I know quite a bit," Wang Jin replied. "May I ask who this young man is?"

"He is my son," the squire answered.

"Since he is the young master of the manor," Wang Jin said, "I could correct his technique, if he likes. What do you think?"

"That would be splendid," the squire said. He commanded his son to come and prostrate himself before the teacher. But the young man refused. He was even angrier now. "Don't listen to this fellow's nonsense, Father," he said. "Until he can defeat me with the staff, I certainly won't pay him respect as a teacher."

"If it pleases the young master," Wang Jin said, "we could essay a few passes."

The youth took up a position in the middle of the courtyard and began to whirl his staff around, crying to Wang Jin: "Come on, come on, the one who's scared is no true fighter."

Wang Jin only smiled, and made no move.

"Sir," said the old squire, "if you're willing to teach this young idiot, you might as well trade a few blows."

Wang Jin still only smiled. "If the young man should take a hard knock, it would seem discourteous of me," he said.

"It is no matter. Suppose you should break one of his arms or legs, he would have only himself to thank."

"Then forgive my impoliteness," Wang Jin said. He went to the arms rack and took a staff, after which he placed himself in the middle of the yard and took up a position. The young man watched him a moment, then raised his staff and attacked. Wang Jin parried and broke off the attack. The youth whirled his staff and charged again. Wang Jin turned and raised his staff in the air as if to strike downwards. The youth, thinking the blow was coming from above used his staff to block it. But Wang Jin did not strike downwards. Instead he thrust at his opponent's chest and with one and the same blow caused the staff to fly out of his hands and knocked him over backwards.

Immediately Wang Jin threw down his staff and rushed forward to help the young man up, saying, "Forgive me, forgive me."

The youth scrambled to his feet, and after fetching a stool for Wang Jin to sit down, prostrated himself. "Everything I've studied with all those other masters was useless," he said. "I'm absolutely no good. Teacher, there's no other way. Please, you must teach me."

"My mother and I have been giving trouble here in the house for several days now," Wang Jin said. "We didn't know how we could show our gratitude. It will be a pleasure to do this for you."

The old squire was delighted. He told his son to get dressed and they all went to sit in the inner room. A sheep was killed, wine and dishes and fruit were prepared, and Wang Jin and his mother were requested to enjoy the banquet. When all four were seated, the old man raised his glass and invited them to drink saying: "This master has such skill, I am sure he must be an instructor. My son, you can't see the nose on the end of your face!"

Wang Jin smiled and said: "Good men don't cheat each other, wise men tell the truth. My name is not Zhang. I am actually Wang Jin, instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards, and fighting with the staff is something I have practised all my days. But there is a certain Marshal Gao, to whom my father once gave a beating, who has just become Grand Marshal of the Palace. He bears this old grudge and wants to destroy me. It is my misfortune to be under his command. I have no means to fight him, so the only solution is to escape with my mother to Yanan and seek refuge with Field-Marshal Zhong the Elder, to whom I shall offer my service. I had no idea that I would arrive here and find myself treated so kindly by you and your son. Moreover, my mother owes her recovery to you, and we have been here giving you trouble for days. Since your son wishes to study I will do everything in my power to help. What your son has studied is only what we call 'painted stick'; that is to say, it is only for show, and no use in real fighting. We shall need to start all over again, from the beginning."

The old squire, hearing all this, said: "My son, now we know why you were beaten. Come and prostrate yourself again." The young man did so willingly. It was a case of:

If the teacher's fame is not made plain,
Heartfelt respect is hard to gain.
Not till the master shows his art
Will the young hothead give his heart.

The father now said: "Instructor, let me tell you about myself. My family have always lived in this district of Huayin. Opposite is Little Mount Hua. This village has become the Shi village. There are three or four hundred families here, all with the name Shi. Since childhood my son showed no interest in farming and only wanted to study the practice of arms. His mother was always against it and died of grief but I have always allowed him to follow his bent. I've spent heaven knows how much on teachers for him. I even got the most skilled craftsman to do this tattoo: on his back, arms and chest there are nine dragons, all told — locally everyone calls him 'The Tattooed Dragon.' Since you are here, Instructor, it will be a fine thing if you can complete his training. You can be sure that I will show my gratitude."

"Don't worry, Squire," said Wang Jin. "If that's what you want, I shall not leave until I have taught your son thoroughly."

After this they ate and drank abundantly and Wang Jin and his mother stayed on in the manor. Each day Shi Jin asked Instructor Wang to teach him something of the management of the eighteen weapons, and one by one learnt them all from the beginning.

These are the eighteen weapons:

Pike, hammer, bow, crossbow and voulge; flail, broadsword, two-handed sword, mace and bolas; hatchet, guisarme, lance, and halberd; buckler, quarterstaff, trident and rake.

So each day as we are told, Shi Jin looked after Instructor Wang and his mother at the manor, and learnt the weapons. Squire Shi went to Huayin to perform his duties as Justice of the Peace but our story is not concerned with that. Imperceptibly the days slipped by, and soon half a year had passed:

Outside the window the sunlight is gone in a flash,
The shadows of flowers steal past the feasting guests.
There's barely time for a cup before the farewell song.
While under the palace steps, the passing hours are rung.

About six months later, then, Shi Jin had covered all the eighteen weapons, learning them all again till he knew them completely. As a result of Wang Jin's dedicated teaching, his technique in each was excellent. Seeing how well he knew it all, Wang Jin said to himself: "We are very well off here but it can't go on forever," and the day soon came when he decided he must move on to Yanan. Shi Jin was most unwilling to see him go. "If you could just stay here, Teacher," he said, "I would look after you and your mother for the rest of your days. That would be fine!"

"Young man," Wang Jin said, "I really appreciate your kindness. We are truly happy here. But I am afraid Marshal Gao may send to arrest us and then you would be implicated. That would not be right. Either way there are disadvantages. But it is my firm intention to go and offer my services to Field-Marshal Zhong in Yanan. It's a frontier zone and I can find employment there which will enable me to live in peace."

Since Shi Jin and his father could not persuade Wang Jin to stay, the best they could do was to organize a farewell dinner for him. As a mark of respect to the teacher, they also presented him with two pieces of silk and a hundred taels of silver. The next day Wang Jin packed their bags and saddled the horse, and he and his mother bade Squire Shi farewell. Wang Jin helped his mother to mount and they set off for Yanan. Shi Jin ordered one of the manor servants to carry the pole and himself accompanied them for more than three miles of the way. His heart was heavy. At the final parting, he prostrated himself, and then returned in tears to the manor. Wang Jin took up the carrying-pole as before and walking behind his mother's horse continued in the direction of Guanxi, the region beyond the western pass.

The story, however, is not concerned with Wang, as he goes off to enlist in the frontier army but with Shi Jin, who after returning home, dedicated himself thoroughly to training. As he was young and strong and had no old people or children to worry about, he thought nothing of getting up in the middle of the night, in the third watch, to practise martial arts, and in the daytime he was always at the back of the manor practising archery or riding.

Less than six months later Shi Jin's father, the old squire, became seriously ill, and took to his bed. Shi Jin sent for doctors, far and wide, to cure him but he did not recover; on the contrary, sad to relate, he passed away. Shi Jin arranged the coffin and the burial, called Buddhist monks to perform ceremonies and read prayers, fasted and observed the rites of the seven times seven days, for the repose of his father's soul. He also called some Taoist priests who performed the rituals for the dead and prayers to ensure that the soul of the dead man would go straight to heaven. They set up at least ten altars and conducted services for the deceased and for his liberation from purgatory. Then an auspicious day and time having been chosen, the coffin was taken to the tomb and interred. The entire village, three or four hundred families with the name Shi, came to escort the coffin and pay their last respects. Squire Shi was buried in the ancestral tomb on the slopes to the west of the village.

From now on there was no one to look after the affairs of the manor. Shi Jin wasn't interested in farming. All he wanted was to find people with whom to practise, measuring his skill with staff and sword.

* * *

Three or four months had passed since the old squire died. It was now the middle of June and the days were suffocatingly hot. One day, Shi Jin, having nothing better to do, took a folding chair and set it in the shade of a willow tree beside the threshing-floor, to enjoy the cool. A breeze was blowing from the direction of a group of pines opposite. "How cool the breeze is," Shi Jin said to himself.

While he was enjoying this sensation, he was surprised to notice someone craning his neck and peering around furtively. "That's odd," Shi Jin thought. "Who's this, snooping about on my land?" He jumped up and got behind the tree to observe. He recognized the man as Li Ji, generally known as "Rabbit-Catcher Li." "Hey, you, Li Ji!" he shouted. "What are you snooping around for? Are you spying out the land for someone?"

Li Ji bowed respectfully and said: "Sir, I just came to look for Young Shorty Qiu, to invite him for a cup or two but I saw Your Honour there, enjoying the breeze, and I didn't want to disturb you."

"Tell me something," Shi Jin said. "Once you used to come here with game to sell to me. I always paid you a fair price, didn't I? So why is it you don't bring me any now? Do you think I haven't got the money, is that it?"

"Oh, no Squire, how could I? There just isn't any game nowadays, that's why I didn't come."

"Balderdash! The whole of Little Mount Hua, a great wilderness like that, and you tell me you can't find a deer or a rabbit or two?"

"Then you haven't heard, sir? These days a bunch of thugs have set up shop there, built themselves a regular stronghold. They've got something like five or six hundred men up there, and a hundred horses. The leader's Zhu Wu, they call him 'The Strategist.' The second one's Chen Da, 'The River-Jumping Tiger.' And the third is Yang Chun, 'The White-Spotted Snake.' The three of them spend their time fighting and looting, and there's no one in Huayin can stop them. A reward of three thousand cash has been announced for their capture. But who'd be fool enough to stir up that lot? That's why people like me don't go hunting on Little Mount Hua any more. How can I have anything to sell you?"

"I've heard about some robbers," Shi Jin said, "but I didn't realize the blighters were such a nuisance. They're going to make trouble for us. All right, Li Ji but next time you come across some game, don't forget me, will you?"

Li Ji saluted and went away.

When Shi Jin went back inside, he said to himself: "These scum are a menace. They'll certainly come here some day, to stir things up. Well, since that's the way it is..."

What he did was order his people to kill two fine fat water- buffalo. There was plenty of good wine in the house, made on the estate. He had them first burn an appropriate amount of paper money and then bade them invite the three or four hundred families in the village. Everyone sat down in the big thatched hall, ranged according to rank and age, and when the wine was served and the first toast drunk, Shi Jin addressed the assembly as follows:

"It has come to my attention that three robbers have established themselves on Little Mount Hua, with something in the order of five or six hundred followers, and that they are attacking and pillaging houses and homes. Since this rabble are getting away with it undisturbed, sooner or later we can expect them to pay us a visit here in our village. That means trouble. And it's why I've called you all here today, to decide what to do about it. If they come, we'd better all be prepared. We here in the house will sound an alarm, and then every one of you must come and lend a hand, with stick or with sword. If any one of you has trouble it will be the same procedure. Provided we all help each other, the village will be secure. Rest assured, if these brigands come, I shall know what to do."

"Yes," they all said, "we shall rely on you, sir, and follow your instructions. If the alarm sounds, everyone will come, never fear."

That evening, after thanking Shi Jin for the wine, the villagers went home and got their weapons out. From now on, Shi Jin busied himself repairing gates and restoring walls, putting things in order about the house and estate, hanging up alarm rattles in various places, mending his armour, polishing his sabre and inspecting his horse, making sure everything needed to repel the bandits was to hand. Enough of this.

Let us turn now to the three brigand chiefs, holding counsel in their retreat on Little Mount Hua. Chief of them was Zhu Wu, "The Strategist," native of Dingyuan and an expert in the use of the two swords. Although not an absolute master, he was a skilled tactician and an excellent leader. Here's a little poem to tell you of his qualities:

Palm leaves cut for his attire,
Deer-skin stitched to make a hat:
The face ablaze with eyes of fire,
The chin adorned with curls of hair.
He takes his tactics from Zhuge;[3]

He's got more tricks than old Fan Li;
On Little Mount Hua, who is the first?
Zhu Wu, the subtle strategist.

The second of these heroes was Chen Da, from Yecheng, also known as "The River-Jumping Tiger." His favourite weapon was a staff of flashing steel. Here's a poem for him:

He's strong and he's bold and his name has spread far,
He scatters down blows from his staff in a rain,
He's the man from Yezhong, he's the scourge of Huayin,
River-Jumper they call him, the tiger Chen Da.

The third was Yang Chun, from Xieliang in Puzhou, also known as "The White-Spotted Snake." He favoured the fauchard. Here's his poem:

Long is his reach and wiry his arm,
His prowess is patent and fit for acclaim;
The blade of his weapon spills sparks in the sun.
This hero is worthy indeed to make one,
Of the trio who lord it on Little Mount Hua.
Among all the brothers of rivers and lakes,[4]
He goes by the name of White-Spotted Snake.

Well, Zhu Wu now said to the others: "I heard recently that in Huayin district they've put a price of three thousand on our heads, and said we must be captured. I'm afraid that if they come for us, it's going to be a big fight. Now one problem is that we're not very well provisioned. What do you say to making a little raid? We can lay in supplies — stock up with food and provisions; then if the government troops come we'll be ready to last out any attack."

"Good idea," said Chen Da, the River-Jumping Tiger. "Why not go right away to Huayin and ask them to be so good as to lend us some provisions? Let's see what they say to that."

"No," said Yang Chun, the White-Spotted Snake, "not to Huayin. Pucheng would be far less risky."

"Pucheng is only a small place," Chen Da objected. "Not so much food and resources. Much better attack Huayin. It's crammed with wealth, there's piles of money and supplies."

"But Elder Brother, don't you see?" Yang Chun said. "If we go to attack Huayin, we'll have to pass through the Shi estate. That Shi Jin, the Tattooed Dragon as they call him, is a real tiger, we don't want to provoke him. And he's never going to give us permission to cross his land."

"That's feeble, Little Brother! If you're afraid of passing through one tiny village, how are you going to stand up to the government forces?"

"Elder Brother, we mustn't underestimate him. That's a really brave man."

Zhu Wu, the Strategist, agreed. "I have heard so too, they say he's quite fearless and truly able. Friends, let us not take that road."

But Chen Da began to shout, "Shut your traps, both of you! If you keep singing someone else's praises, all you do is destroy your own confidence. He's only a man, isn't he? I don't reckon he's got three heads and six arms!"

Thereupon he called to his followers: "Quick, saddle my horse. We're going to attack Shi Jin's place at once, and afterwards we'll take Huayin."

Zhu Wu and Yang Chun tried over and over again to dissuade him. But was it likely that Chen Da would ever listen? He strapped on his armour forthwith, leapt on his horse, picked a hundred and fifty men, and then, in a tumult of gongs and drums, descended the mountain towards the Shi village.

Now Shi Jin happened to be right outside his house, inspecting his arms and his horse, when one of his people ran up with the news. Shi Jin heard him out, then went back into the house and sounded the alarm. At this signal, in front and behind, east and west, three or four hundred Shi family dependents ran to fetch their spears or staves and gathered, all three or four hundred of them, in front of the house. There they found Shi Jin, with a flat turban on his head and cased in vermilion armour, wearing a blue brocade and dark green boots, a huntsman's leather belt about his waist, and iron talismans protecting his chest and back. He was armed with a bow and a sheaf of arrows, and in his hand was a three-pointed double-edged guisarme with four holes and eight rings. A retainer was leading his flame-red steed. Shi Jin mounted, brandished his weapon, and thirty or forty solidly-built retainers took station in front of him, while eighty or ninety awkward villagers, together with all the other Shi dependents, formed up behind. With a good deal of shouting they marched to the road which entered the village from the north.

Meanwhile Chen Da, the brigand from Little Mount Hua, was charging down the mountain with his troops. On reaching the valley they deployed. Shi Jin saw Chen Da, his head adorned with a concave red turban, encased in a corselet of polished iron with gold inlay, wearing a red plaided doublet, boots with turned-up toes, and about his waist a seven-foot cord hung with bags. He rode a white charger which held its head proudly, and he carried at a slant an eighteen-foot steel lance. The troops on both sides raised a shout as the two leaders suddenly came face to face.

From his tall mount, Chen Da inspected Shi Jin, then bowed in polite greeting. But Shi Jin began to shout: "You bunch of murderers and incendiaries, looters and pillagers! Felons like you deserve nothing but death! You've heard who I am, haven't you? Yet you've the nerve to come here. You're really asking for trouble!"

Chen Da, who had not dismounted, said: "Our mountain retreat is a little short of provisions. All we want is to go to Huayin in search of supplies. If you'll grant us passage through your land, I promise you we won't touch a single blade of grass. And if you let us pass, of course we'll show our gratitude when we return."

"Balls!" replied Shi Jin. "I'm in authority here, and I was just coming to get you, you bunch of brigands! Do you imagine you can come here today, asking to pass through my village, and I won't arrest you, I'll just give you leave to go? If the district magistrate heard that, I'm the one who'd be on the carpet!"

Chen Da merely said: "All are brothers, within the four seas! I request passage."

"You're wasting your breath," said Shi Jin. "Even if I consented, there's one who wouldn't. Ask him — you can pass if you get his permission."

"Be so kind, sir, as to tell me who that is."

"This good halberd in my hand. If this lets you, you can go."

Then Chen Da shouted in a great rage: "You push a man too far! I've had enough of your bragging!"

Shi Jin, equally furious, began to whirl his blade about, settled himself firmly in the saddle, and charged at Chen Da. The latter struck his horse, took a firm grip of his lance, and galloped towards Shi Jin. The two horses clashed. Then it was:

To and fro and back and forth: to and fro, two deep-sea dragons fighting for the pearl; back and forth, a tiger roaming the valley for his prey. Enraged, the Tattooed Dragon hurls his guisarme straight at the target; in a fury the River-Jumper aims his lance right at the centre. Skill vies with skill, courage emulates courage.

The two fought for several hours. Finally Shi Jin sold some damaged goods! He allowed Chen Da to aim a blow directly at the pit of his stomach, and with a sudden bend of the waist caused Chen Da to fall against him. Thus the Tattooed Dragon, whose arms were long and agile as a monkey's, whose waist was supple as a wolf's, was easily able to grasp Chen Da and pull him neatly from the saddle. He seized him by the belt and with a twist sent him sprawling on the ground. The victim's horse bolted, swift as the wind. Shi Jin called his men to tie Chen Da up, and when everyone turned on the brigand troops they ran away. Shi Jin returned to the house, where he tied the River-Jumping Tiger to a pillar of the great hall, purposing by this means to trap the other two chiefs, and hand them all over to the authorities for the reward. He ordered wine for all his men, and then dismissed them. Everyone was full of praise for Shi Jin: "No wonder the master has such a reputation for bravery," they said.

Let us leave this crowd to their rejoicing and their wine, and return to the mountain hideout, where Zhu Wu and Yang Chun were sorely perplexed, being quite unable to guess what had happened. When scouts were sent to hunt for news, they met their companions streaming back up the mountain, leading a riderless horse and crying: "Bad news. Big Brother Chen wouldn't listen to his elders, and it's cost him his life!"

When Zhu Wu asked what this meant, they described the encounter, and added: "How could anyone stand up to a hero like Shi Jin?"

"He wouldn't listen to me," Zhu Wu said. "And this is the result!"

"Then shall we all go," Yang Chun asked, "and offer Shi Jin a fight to the death?"

"That wouldn't help," said Zhu Wu. "If Chen Da was defeated, what hope have you got? No, I have an emergency plan. If we can't save Chen Da with it, then there's nothing left for all of us."

"An emergency plan? What does that mean?"

"The only possible way is this..." Zhu Wu bent and whispered in his ear.

"Brilliant," said Yang Chun. "Let's go, there's no time to lose."

And now we return to Shi Jin. He was hardly back in his house, his fury still unabated, when one of the villagers came flying in and announced: "Zhu Wu and Yang Chun are coming down the mountain!"

"These scum will all die together," Shi Jin roared. "I'll catch these other two and hand them over to the authorities as well. Quick, bring me my horse."

He ordered the alarm to be sounded at once, and the people quickly re-assembled. Shi Jin leapt onto his horse, and just as he was going out of the gate, he saw the two bandits approaching the house. They were on foot! They both threw themselves on their knees before him, tears streaming down their faces.

Shi Jin dismounted and shouted to them: "You two, kneeling there, what have you got to say for yourselves?"

Zhu Wu replied with great emotion, "We three, wretched beings that we are, fled to the mountains and became bandits because we could no longer stand the persecution we suffered from the authorities. From the beginning we made a vow: 'We couldn't ask to be born on the same day but at least we will die on the same day.' We may not have the qualities of Guan Yu, Zhang Fei and Liu Bei,[5] but our feelings are like theirs. Today Younger Brother Chen refused to listen to our advice and fool-ishly insulted Your Honour's tiger spirit. Now he is a prisoner in your manor, after suffering defeat at your noble hand. We know there's no way to save him, so here we are, ready to die also. We trust in your nobility to hand us over to justice together, and we will utter no complaint. Indeed, if you permit us all to die by your hand, we will count it a favour."

Hearing this, Shi Jin reflected: "Such brotherly feeling! If I hand them over and claim the reward, everyone will laugh at me and question my honour. As the old saying has it: 'The tiger doesn't eat carrion'." So he said: "Come inside with me please, both of you."

Zhu Wu and Yang Chun obeyed. Fearlessly they followed him to the door of the inner hall, where they knelt again and asked him to tie them up.

Many times Shi Jin asked them to get up but would they listen? As the saying is, "The wise man understands wisdom, the brave recognize the brave."

"Since you feel so deeply for each other," he said at length, "how would I look if I handed you over? It will be better to release Chen Da and return him to you, don't you think so?"

"Shun all involvement with us, sir," Zhu Wu said. "Brave though you are, it could make things very difficult for you. You had much better turn us in and get the reward."

"I can't do it," Shi Jin said. "Will you accept an invitation to drink and dine with me?"

"If we weren't afraid to die, how could food and wine frighten us?" Zhu Wu declared.

Here's a poem for all this:

Born apart, they swear they'll die together;
'Tis oft the mark but not so often hit.
Look not for courage in the courtier's finery,
See these poor outlaws demonstrate true grit.

Delighted with this outcome, the Tattooed Dragon released Chen Da, and they went to sit in the inner hall where he regaled all three with wine and meat. The three guests prostrated them-selves in acknowledgement of their host's generosity. Then, after several cups, spring colours began to light all faces. When the wine was gone, the three thanked Shi Jin once more and returned to the mountain. Shi Jin accompanied them as far as the gate, before going back in.

We follow the three brigands back to their mountain hideout. Here they sat down, and the Strategist began: "If it hadn't been for the emergency plan, how would we still be here among the living? But although the rescue worked, there aren't many people like Shi Jin, whose sense of honour prompted him to release us. We must prepare a few gifts during the next few days, to show our gratitude for his sparing our lives."

But enough of these tedious details. A short while later, Zhu Wu and his friends had amassed thirty or so taels of gold, in the form of ingots, the kind known as garlic stalks. These they told two of their men to carry after dark, profiting by the moonlight, to Shi Jin's.

Early that night there was a knock on Shi Jin's door, and a servant came to find him. Shi Jin dressed hurriedly, and went to the door. "What do you want with me?" he asked the bandits.

The ruffians said: "The three chiefs humbly salute you; they have sent us to offer you this poor present, sir, to thank you for sparing their lives. They hope you will not refuse it, or laugh at its inadequacy."

They took out the gold and gave it to Shi Jin, who at first wanted to refuse but then reflected: "Since they sent the gift in good faith, it is really only polite to accept it."

He ordered wine to be brought for the messengers, and entertained them half the night. They were also given some silver in small change, in recompense for their pains. After this they returned to the mountain.

Another two weeks or more passed. Zhu Wu and his companions had got hold of some fine pearls and decided after some discussion to make a gift of them to Shi Jin. Nocturnal messengers were sent again, and he accepted the gift. We say no more of this.

Two weeks or so later, Shi Jin said to himself, "The kindness those three have shown me is really quite out of the ordinary. I'd better prepare some gifts too, to repay them."

The next day he sent some of his people to find a tailor and himself went to town to buy three pieces of red patterned silk, from which he had three double tunics made; he also selected three fat sheep that were cooked and placed in large wooden boxes. He looked for two peasants to carry all this.

At the manor there was a certain chief peasant known as Fourth Brother Wang, a man who was expert at dealing with the authorities. Wang had a glib tongue and a ready wit, so that the whole village called him "a second Wang Bodang."[6] It was to him and to a sturdy peasant from the village that Shi Jin gave the job of carrying the gifts up the mountain.

After questioning them closely, the sentries admitted them to the mountain retreat. The three chiefs received the clothes, the sheep and the wine gladly, and rewarded the messengers with ten taels of silver. They all drank a dozen or so cups, and then the messengers went down the mountain again and back to the house. When they reported to Shi Jin they announced: "The chiefs of the mountain send you many thanks."

After this, Shi Jin's relations with the three chiefs were cordial in the extreme, and Wang was up and down the mountain all the time, bearing gifts. For their part, the three chiefs were always sending their people down with gifts for Shi Jin.

Time passed and suddenly it was the eighth month, and the Mid-Autumn Festival was at hand. Shi Jin felt a desire to talk with the three brigands and decided to invite them to the house on the eve of the fifteenth day, to drink a few cups while admiring the moon. First he sent his man, Wang, to Little Mount Hua with a letter of invitation, to ask them to join him in a banquet. Wang took the letter to the mountain retreat immediately and handed it over. When he saw what it was, Zhu Wu was delighted. The three chiefs accepted and penned a reply. Wang was given four taels of silver and treated to at least ten cups of wine.

As he descended again, Wang fell in with the ruffians who were accustomed to carry gifts in the opposite direction. After embracing him, they weren't going to just let him go, oh no! They dragged him off to a village inn beside the mountain road, where he downed another ten cups of wine or so. After this he left them, and continued on his way back to the house. But as he went, a little mountain breeze got up, and it seemed to send all the wine rushing to his head, so that he began to stagger and stumble as he pursued his way. He had not gone more than a mile or two before he sighted a shady thicket, and plunged into it. Seeing a patch of soft green sedge, he collapsed there, dead to the world.

Now at this moment Li Ji, the trapper, was roaming the mountain in search of rabbits. He recognized Fourth Brother Wang from the Shi estate and went towards him with the idea of helping him up. But could he shift him? However, he noticed some silver that had slipped out of Wang's belt.

"The bastard's drunk," Li Ji said to himself. "Where did he get all this? Why don't I just relieve him of some of it?"

It was really a case of grasping the opportunity fate presents, of chances that arise by themselves. He undid the belt and shook it. Onto the ground fell not only the silver but also the letter. Li Ji picked it up. He knew how to read a few words, so he opened it out and saw on the top "From Zhu Wu, Chen Da and Yang Chun, of Little Mount Hua." This was followed by a good deal of literary or official stuff which was beyond him but those three names he knew all right. "I'm never going to make anything out of my hunting," Li Ji thought to himself. "But the fortune-teller said I'm going to have a big windfall this year, and here it is. There's a reward of three thousand in Huayin for the capture of those three brigands. To think that only the other day that bastard Shi Jin, when I went to his house to look for Shorty Qiu, bawled me out for spying! And all the time he's the one who's in league with the robbers!"

He took the silver and the letter and hurried off to Huayin to make his report.

As for Wang, he slept right through till the second watch. When he woke to find the soft light of the moon falling on him, he had a big shock. He leapt to his feet. All around him was nothing but pines. He felt for his belt but it was gone, and the letter too. Searching all about, he found only the empty belt lying in the grass. Wang could only curse his fate. "The silver doesn't matter," he said to himself, "but what am I going to do about the letter? How can I know who's taken it?"

Suddenly his brow cleared, as an idea began to take shape. "If I go back and say the letter was taken, the master's going to let me have it, that's for sure. Probably he'll throw me out as well. So the best thing is to say there wasn't any letter. He'll never find out."

Having made this plan, he sped back to the house, arriving in the fifth watch. When Shi Jin saw him, he said, "What kept you so long?"

"Your name was my gain, sir," Wang replied. "Those three on the mountain wouldn't let me go. They kept me there half the night filling me up with wine, that's why I'm late."

"Isn't there a reply?" Shi Jin asked.

"They were going to write a letter but your servant said, 'Your Honours are coming to the party, so where's the need? Besides, I've had a lot of wine, and it would be no joke if something happened to me on the way back'."

Shi Jin was very pleased with this. "No wonder people call you a second Bodang," he said. "You really use your brain."

"Of course I wouldn't dream of wasting time," Wang said, "it was straight back home and no dawdling on the way."

"In that case," Shi Jin said, "tell someone to go to town now and get something to eat with the wine."

The eve of the Mid-Autumn Festival soon came. It was a fine, clear day. Shi Jin ordered his people to kill a big fat sheep and over a hundred chickens and geese, and to make everything ready for the banquet.

Colour faded slowly from the sky and it looked like being a good Mid-Autumn:

Night approaches, twilight is fading already; a moon like a silver piece hangs in the sky. It looks like a painted thing, this disk of ice; good men all enjoy it. The shadows on its surface are round and full, the cassia and the white hare are in harmony. They roll back screens and curtains. They raise their gold cups in toasts over and over again. Everyone smiles as peace and plenty are pledged. Every year this festival returns. All the revellers are drunk as lords, no one can refuse a toast all night. The Milky Way rains down freshness.

The three brigands gave orders for a careful watch to be set. They took only three or four men as escort. Providing themselves with a small dagger each, and a sabre in the belt, they set off down the mountain on foot, leaving their horses behind. Presently they arrived at the Shi village. Shi Jin welcomed them ceremoniously, and asked them to come through into the garden at the back, where the banquet was laid. He made them sit in the place of honour, and himself sat down opposite. Then he ordered his retainers to bar the gates, front and back, and the drinking began, with the household servants and retainers raising their cups in turn, while the sheep was carved and toasts proposed. Countless cups were drunk, until in the east the bright face of the moon appeared. Here's the beauty of it in a poem:

The pale flower parts from the sea cliffs
Clouds scatter from Heaven's road;
Sunset fades a thousand leagues to silver,
Moonshine makes a thousand hills like water.
Shadows slant across the moor,
Startling the lone raven.
Brightness floods the lake's surface,
revealing the paired geese.
The ice-disk puts a thousand leagues on show,
The white hare swallows four hundred lands.

Now as Shi Jin was thus employed drinking with his guests in the garden and enjoying the Mid-Autumn Festival moon, discoursing of things past and present, there suddenly arose a clamour outside the walls, and a flickering of torches. Shi Jin was startled. He jumped to his feet, saying to his guests: "My friends, I beg you to remain seated, while I go and see what is happening." Shouting to his people, "Don't open the gates!" he got a ladder and climbed up to look over the wall. What should he see but the sheriff of Huayin, on horseback, with two officers and three or four hundred militia-men surrounding the house!

It was a bad moment for Shi Jin and his three friends! Outside the light of the torches shone on steel forks, sabres, five-pointed halberds and spiked pikes, as thick as trees in a forest, while the two officers shouted, "Don't let the bandits escape!"

If these intruders hadn't come to seize Shi Jin and the brigand chiefs, how would it ever have come about that Shi Jin killed a couple of men and got to know a dozen heroes? Without the influence of baleful fate, would one ever have seen:

Many soldiers hiding in the thick of the reeds;
Concealed among the lotus, the boats of the attackers?

DURING the reign of the Emperor Zhezong of the Song Dynasty there lived at the Eastern Capital Bianliang, in Kaifeng Prefecture, a loose profligate, named Gao. [44] He could handle well either spear or cudgel, and was an extremely good player at football. He was the second son of a Gao family but instead of calling him Gao the Second,[45] people gave him the nickname of Gao Qiu meaning Gao "the Ball." Later on, however, he adopted another character, also pronounced Qiu.

He could play well on wood or string instruments but was no good at poetry or literature. If there was a discussion of benevolence, justice, propriety, wisdom, or virtue he was unable to take part. He wasted his time in the company of the son of a wealthy man, and everyday these two spent their time in pleasure resorts. His conduct became so bad that at last the wealthy man lodged a complaint before the Prefect who had him arrested, punished with twenty blows of the bamboo, and then banished from the capital.

Gao Qiu went to Huaixi in Linhuai Prefecture where he found refuge in a gambling den that afforded shelter to all the lazy rascals from all places. Three years after this, however, the Emperor granted an amnesty so as to show his benevolence. Upon hearing of this, Gao Qiu decided to return to the capital, and got an introduction to a man named Dong Jiangshi who kept a drug store at the Jinliang Bridge. Upon reading the letter, this man remembered the bad reputation of Gao Qiu, and was afraid that if he lived at his house he might have an evil influence on his children. So after about ten days Dong spoke to Gao Qiu, "Here we can offer you little help. I will however recommend you to a certain Su the Younger, a scholar, who may assist you in cutting a fine career. What do you think of that?"

Gao Qiu was much pleased at this and thanked Dong Jiangshi. Dong wrote a note and sent this with Gao Qiu to the residence of the high official. The doorkeeper announced the arrival, and the scholar Su came out to see Gao Qiu. He also remembered that Gao Qiu was a profligate and decided to get rid of him by recommending him to the Emperor's son-in-law, the Prince Consort Wang Jinqing as a steward.

The following day Su sent Gao Qiu with a servant to Prince Consort Wang Jinqing. This Prince Wang was the husband of the younger sister of the Emperor Zhezong, and son-in-law of the Emperor Shenzong. He took pleasure in meeting flaboyant, stylish men, and when he received the introduction he was glad, and he made Gao Qiu his personal attendant.

An ancient saying is: "Remoteness begets neglect; nearness brings about intimacy." It happened that on his birthday Prince Wang suddenly gave orders to prepare a feast, and specially invited his maternal uncle Prince Duan who was the eleventh son of the late Emperor Shenzong, and the younger brother of the Emperor Zhezong. He controlled the affairs of the Emperor's eastern palaces where he was known as the Ninth Prince. He was intelligent and handsome—but his taste was not so—he preferring profligacy. However, he was a good performer on the lute, he could play chess, paint pictures, and was an excellent footballer. On the day mentioned Prince Duan took the seat of honour at the feast prepared. When the wine was brought in they drank several cups, and after the second course Prince Duan took leave for the toilet. He then retired to the library for a rest and there he happened to see on the reading table a pair of lions made of white jade used as paperweights. They were of elegant workmanship, and he admired them very much. Prince Wang saw that Prince Duan was fond of them so he said, "There is also a jade brush rack with a dragon design made by the same hand but it is not here now. I will get it tomorrow and send both of them to you." Prince Duan was much pleased and said, "I am much obliged for your generosity. I think the brush rack must be very fine." The two men then returned to the banquet and feasted until the evening—when they were very intoxicated they separated, and Prince Duan returned to the palace.

The following day Prince Wang packed the two jade-lion paperweights and the jade brush rack in a golden box, wrote a letter, and sent Gao Qiu off with them. Upon reaching Prince Duan's palace the doorkeeper reported his arrival to the courtyard attendant who inquired his business and then said, "My master is playing football with the eunuchs in the courtyard. You may go in by yourself." The courtyard attendant accompanied him to the gate, and there Gao Qiu saw Prince Duan wearing as a cap, a soft gauze towel of the Tang Dynasty style, and arrayed in a purple gown embroidered with a dragon and a waistbelt with two tassels. The gown was folded up and tucked in the belt. His boots were inlaid with golden thread in the design of a phoenix. There were three or five eunuchs playing football with him.

Gao Qiu dared not to intrude—so he took up his position behind the servants. Now good luck had come to Gao Qiu. The ball rebounded from the ground and Prince Duan failed to kick it—it bounced into the crowd of spectators and landed at the side of Gao Qiu. He saw the ball and instantly had courage. He used the mandarin-duck twist (one leg behind the other) and kicked the ball back to Prince Duan. Prince Duan saw this and being pleased with the exhibition, asked who he was.

Gao Qiu knelt down and said, "I am a confidential servant of Prince Consort Wang and by his orders, I have brought two jade curios to present to Your Highness," so saying, he offered the letter with both hands.

Prince Duan hearing this, laughed and said that Prince Wang was very obliging. He opened the box and after examining the curios handed them to an attendant. He then asked Gao Qiu, "Can you play football? Who are you?" Gao Qiu clasping his hands and kneeling down said, "I am called Gao Qiu. I was punishable for kicking that football." Prince Duan said, "Good! come into the playground and again try." Gao Qiu saluted with folded arms, and said, "What kind of man I am to dare play with Your Highness?" Prince Duan replied, "This is the Society of Gathering of Clouds," also known as the "World's Horizon" (meaning, there is plenty of room for you). It does not matter if you play." Gao Qiu again saluted; saying, "I cannot do it." He begged leave to depart time and again but as Prince Duan insisted upon his playing, Gao Qiu had no escape—so he kowtowed, and confessed his inability, he then untied the garters round his knees and moved towards the centre of the ground. Gao Qiu kicked a few times, and Prince Duan applauded. Gao Qiu had to use all his skill to please the Prince. He played the ball as though it stuck to his body like glue or paste. He never missed it. Prince Duan was highly amused and was unwilling to let Gao Qiu return, so he kept him there for the night. Next day Prince Duan ordered a banquet and sent a special invitation to Prince Consort Wang. The latter had become anxious at the absence of Gao Qiu but upon receipt of this invitation he mounted a horse and went to Prince Duan's palace. Upon entering the banquet hall Duan expressed his gratitude for the curios and then said, "This man Gao Qiu kicks equally well with both feet. I should like to have him for my personal attendant—what do you say?" Prince Wang answered, "If you have any use for him, you may keep him." Prince Duan was pleased and offering a cup of wine thanked him. The two men chatted until evening.

From that time Prince Duan had Gao Qiu as a special servant and the latter did his work well. Everyday he accompanied Prince Duan and was always close at his hand. In less than two months the Emperor Zhezong died without an heir. A large number of civil and military officials petitioned Prince Duan to become Emperor. He ascended the throne with the reign title of Huizong, and known with the Taoist titles of High Priest of Jade Purity and the Emperor of Subtle Truth.

Upon ascending the throne he did nothing remarkable. One day he said to Gao Qiu, "I want to make you an official. But I cannot promote you unless you have shown your merit. Now I will first tell the Grand Council to record your name as an imperial attendant." Within six months Gao Qiu was raised to Marshal of the Imperial Guard.

Before proceeding to his new post he selected a fortunate hour and a lucky day to begin his duties. All the lower officers of various military ranks—both cavalry and infantry—visited him to pay their respects—present their credentials with details of their records. Gao Qiu, the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, examined these reports one by one and noticed one was missing, that is of Wang Jin, the Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guard. About two weeks before Wang Jin had been sick and had not been able to attend business at his yamen.[46] Gao Qiu was very angry at this and shouted, "What nonsense! His credentials are here but he himself has not come. This is disobedience, yet he pretends to be sick at home. Men, have him brought here at once." He forthwith sent men to arrest Wang Jin.

Now this Wang Jin had no wife and lived with his mother who was over sixty years of age. The sergeant spoke to Wang Jin, "Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard has assumed his post but has not yet seen you. The Adjutant reported that you were sick at home but Marshal Gao Qiu did not believe this and has sent me to arrest you—you had better go and see him. If you do not go, I shall be implicated." Wang Jin hearing this saw no alternative but to go, in spite of his sickness.

Upon entering the door of the headquarters he saw the Marshal at the other end of the hall and kowtowed four times, then bowing he called "nuo" (a sound to attract attention almost equivalent to saying "waiting your order"), then lifting his head he stood at one side.

Marshal Gao Qiu asked, "Are you not the son of Wang Sheng who used to be a Drill Instructor of the whole army?" Wang Jin admitted this.

Marshal Gao Qiu then shouted at him, "So it is you—your father used to sell medicine and exercise the fencing stick to attract a crowd on the street. What military skill have you? But don't be supercilious because I can court-martial you—you must not dare to presume on your rank and differ from my point of view. On whose influence are you depending? What excuse have you for resting at home?" Wang Jin answered, "I speak the truth. I am certainly sick and have not yet recovered." Marshal Gao Qiu used abusive language and said, "You banished thief! If you were sick how could you come here?" Then Wang Jin said, "You summoned me here so I had to come." Marshal Gao Qiu was very angry and shouted an order to the attendants to seize Wang Jin and beat him severely. Among the junior officers there were many who were friendly with Wang Jin, they therefore joined to plead to Marshal Gao Qiu, "Today is your inauguration day it is a lucky day, please forgive this man, this time."

Marshal Gao Qiu spoke in a loud voice, "You banished thief! These junior officers want me to forgive you. I will speak to you again tomorrow." Wang Jin confessed his guilt. Holding up his head he recognized that he was Gao Qiu. He left the headquarters and heaving a sigh said, "Just now my life is insecure; this Gao Qiu was previously at the capital known as Gao the Second—head of a gang of lazy men. At that time he was learning to use the cudgels, and my father hit him, and for three or four months he could not get up from a sick bed. Now he has fortunately become Marshal of the Imperial Guard, and is eager for revenge. I did not know that he was my superior officer. From ancient times it has been said: "Fear not the authorities, except those that have authority over you." There is no help for me. He returned home in a very melancholy mood.

He told his mother about the affair, and they held together and cried: "My son, of thirty-six ways of doing a thing going is the only one that is the best. I am afraid there is no safe place for us." Wang Jin said, "What you say, mother, is true. Your son has also thought of this plan. There is at Yanan Prefecture a General who guards the frontier and controls many military officers, who used to come to the capital to see me fence. Why should we not now fly to him for refuge? At that place I could get employment and settle down to a quiet life."

Mother and son discussed this matter and after deciding, she said, "My son, I must go with you secretly: but I am afraid of the sentries who are stationed outside the door by the headquarters, and we certainly will not be able to get away if they hear of our plans." Wang Jin said, "Never mind, don't worry, mother, I will arrange matters satisfactorily with them." Before the sun set Wang Jin called the sentry Zhang to come inside. He gave him an order—"After you have had your supper I want you to go to a place to do something for me." The sentry inquired where he was to go. Wang Jin said, "Because of my sickness I once took a vow to offer sacrifice at the Yue Temple outside the Suanzao Gate—I wish to be there tomorrow morning and be the first person to burn incense—I want you to go this evening and inform the head priest of this matter. Tell him to have the doors open early tomorrow morning and wait until I come to burn the first incense. There I shall present three sacrifical meats to the gods Liu, Li, and Wang. You must stay at the temple till I come."

Zhang, the sentry replied, "I have already had my supper and will now go to the temple to arrange matters."

That night the mother and son packed their baggage—making two loads for carrying on a pole. They filled two bags with fodder to be tied on the horse, and waited until nearly dawn. Then Wang Jin awakened Li, the other sentry, and giving him silver told him to go to the temple and buy the three meats for the sacrifices, as he himself would buy some yellow candles and would arrive later. Li, the sentry, took the money and departed. Wang Jin saddled the horse and led it out of the stable, fastening the fodder on with ropes and making all tight, he assisted his mother to mount. The furniture, etc., was abandoned. Locking the door he shouldered his load and followed the horse. It was the fifth watch about 4 A.M. and was still dark—so availing themselves of this, they left by the Xihua Gate—and travelled quickly toward Yanan Prefecture, Shaanxi province.

The two sentries at the temple bought the meats for the sacrifices, cooked them, and then waited until about II A.M. without seeing Wang Jin. Sentry Li became anxious and returned to the house to look for Wang Jin. He found that the doors were locked, and he could not enter. After half a day he saw nobody come. Sentry Zhang stayed at the temple until evening and then returned to the house. They both watched the house during the night without seeing Wang Jin or his mother. The following day they inquired of Wang's relatives but no one could be found. They did not wish to be implicated, and therefore reported the matter to the headquarters.

Marshal Gao Qiu upon hearing the report was very angry and wrote a dispatch instructing the officials in every prefecture and district to arrest Wang Jin. The two sentries were free from all blame.

Wang Jin and his mother travelled a good distance from the capital taking their meals on the way as chance permitted. They had been on the way over a month, when one evening Wang Jin remarked to his mother who was riding the horse in front, "May Heaven have pity on us and we are now beyond the reach of legal punishment, as although Marshal Gao Qiu has ordered my arrest, Yanan Prefecture is not far away." They both felt contented but they were not aware that they had passed the only available inn. As it grew dusk, however, they saw the glimmer of a light in a forest a good distance away. Wang Jin decided to investigate as to whether they could stay there for the night. He went into the forest, and saw a farmyard which was surrounded by a mud wall, with about three hundred willow trees outside. He knocked at the gate, and when a servant came he saluted with folded hands. He explained the situation, and asked for a night's lodging for his mother and himself for which they would pay.

The servant went inside to report the matter, and upon his return said the farmer wished to see them. Wang Jin requested his mother to dismount and tied the horse to a tree. He put his load on the threshing floor, and then they followed the servant into the house.

The farmer was over sixty years of age, and his hair was all white. He was wearing a warm cap to protect his head from the dust; a loose fitting gown with a black sash round the waist, and dressed leather boots. Wang Jin saluted but the farmer said, "Friend, don't stand on ceremony. You are travellers in distress. Please be seated."

Wang Jin and his mother, observing the rules of propriety, sat down, and in answer to the farmer's questions Wang Jin explained, "My name is Zhang, and I lived in the capital. Business was bad so I sold all my things, and am now on my way to Yanan Prefecture where I hope to stay with my relatives. Today we have travelled a good distance but have unfortunately missed the inn. We now wish to stay for the night at your honourable house."

The farmer said, "Never mind! No men of this world carry houses about with them. Have you dined?" He then ordered a servant to bring food. The servants soon arranged a table, and carried in trays with four dishes of vegetables, and dishes of beef. They placed these on the table, and then poured out wine. After exchanging complimentary phrases they sat down, and after several cups of wine, rice was brought in. When they had finished the meal, the farmer conducted them to the guest chamber. Wang Jin said, "My mother has ridden the horse a long way, and I suppose that it will be well fed."

"That does not matter," said the farmer. "Here we have many animals, horses and mules, and I have already instructed the servants to look after your horse and feed it well."

Wang Jin thanked him, and then brought his bundles into the chamber. The servants lit a lamp and brought in a tub of hot water for the guests to wash their feet. When the farmer and servants had withdrawn Wang Jin and his mother retired to rest. They slept till well after daybreak the next day. The farmer came to the door of their room to make inquiries, and heard Wang Jin's mother groaning so he asked what was the matter. Wang Jin told him, "I certainly will not deceive you. My mother was very tired last night, and she became sick."

"This being the case, you must not worry," said the farmer. "Tell your mother that she can rest here for a few days. I have a prescription for her sickness, and will send a servant into the town for the medicine. Tell her that she will soon be well again." Wang Jin expressed his thanks. His mother took the medicine and in about five days she was quite well again.

On that day Wang Jin wished to leave and went to the stables to look at the horse. In the yard he saw a young man with naked body, tattooed all over with nine dragons and with sleeves turned up. His face was as white as a silver plate. He was about eighteen years old and was exercising with a cudgel. Wang Jin watched him for some time and then soliloquized, "You use your cudgels very well but I think it could be improved, as there are better men than you."

The young man was angry upon hearing this and said in a loud voice, "Who are you? How dare you sneer at my display—I have been trained by about eight well-known teachers, and I do not think you are their equal. Would you care to fence with me?" While he was speaking the farmer came on the scene and said, "Young man, you are ill-mannered." He replied, "He should not have laughed at my display."

"Can our guest use the cudgel?" asked the farmer. "I know a little about it. May I ask who is this young man?" The farmer replied. "He is my son." "As he is a young man of this house I will give him a few lessons if he likes." "That's very good," said the farmer. He then summoned his son to come and pay respects to the guest but he was unwilling to do this and instead he became very angry—He said, "Father, do not listen to his stupid talk—If he beats me with the cudgel, then I will pay respects to him as a teacher."

"If you do not believe that I can do this, let us have a contest with the cudgels." The young man walked to the middle of the yard and picking up a cudgel whirled it round. He addressed Wang Jin, "Come on! If afraid, you will be a coward." Wang Jin only laughed, and was unwilling to move. "If you are willing to instruct my son, what objection have you to using the cudgel?" said the farmer. Wang Jin laughed, "I am afraid that I may hurt your son, and that will not do." "That does not matter. Even if you break his arm or leg, that will be his own fault," said the farmer. Wang Jin said, "Forgive me if I make a mistake." He then went to the arms rack, and taking a cudgel, went to the centre of the yard and stood on guard. The young man seeing this, seized his cudgel and went to strike at him. Wang Jin retreated, trailing his cudgel on the ground. The farmer's son flourished his weapon and pursued him. Wang Jin suddenly turned round and delivered a downward blow. Seeing the blow descending, the farmer's son met it with an upward thrust. Wang Jin stayed his blow, drew his cudgel away, and then with a sudden thrust, struck the young man on the breast and with a twist, knocked the young man's cudgel out of his hand. He fell down on his back, and Wang Jin immediately advanced to lift him, saying; "Do not blame me! Do not get offended!" The farmer's son scrambled up, brought a stool and requested Wang Jin to be seated. He saluted Wang Jin, saying: "I have wasted my time with other teachers; but they prove to be unworthy half a cash. [47] Now I have to ask you to be my teacher."

"My mother and I have given much trouble to your house for many days," said Wang Jin. I have no favours to give you but I can compensate by teaching you." The farmer was much pleased and told the servants to kill a sheep—prepare a feast with wine and fruit. He also invited Wang Jin's mother to attend the banquet. All four sat down and drank wine together. The farmer stood up with a cup of wine and addressing Wang Jin, said, "Teacher, you are so skillful; you must be an instructor. My son, you have eyes but have failed to see this eminent person." Wang Jin laughed, "I will not deceive you. I am not Zhang; I am Wang Jin, Drill Inspector of the Imperial Guard at Kaifeng. Just now a new commander has arrived—Marshal Gao Qiu—and because my father once knocked him down with a cudgel he still harbours resentment, against me. As I am his subordinate I cannot dispute with him, so I take my mother to Yanan Prefecture. It was by chance that I came here and met you. You have treated me well—cured my mother, entertained us, so I felt uneasy of your generosity. If your son is willing to learn I can teach him. At present, his fencing is only showy and spectacular but in a real contest it would be of no use. I will instruct him properly from the beginning."

The farmer insisted upon his son paying respects to his new teacher, and said, "You are a first-class instructor. My ancestors lived in this district of Huayin County, close to Mount Shaohua. This is the Shi family village, and contains about four hundred families of the surname Shi. My son takes interest in playing with lances and cudgels instead of doing farm work. When his mother remonstrated with him, he paid no heed and she became angry and died. I am unable to control him and do not know how much money he has spent. He engaged a man to teach him and also employed a workman to tattoo nine dragons on his body, so that the people about here call him "Shi Jin with nine dragons." Drill Instructor, you have come here today and completed his training very well. I will amply reward you."

Wang Jin began his lessons from that day and Shi Jin asked to be taught the eighteen subjects of athletics in detail. In a little over half a year he had mastered the use of the: (1) lance; (2) long-handled mallet; (3) bow; (4) crossbow; (5) jingal; (6) iron whip; (7) iron truncheon; (8) double-edged sword; (9) chain; (10) hooks; (11) axe; (12) battle-axe; (13) 3-pronged spear; (14) halberd; (15) shield; (16) cudgel; (17) spear; and (18) rake.

He learned these one by one and became proficient. Wang Jin thought that he could not stay there any longer although the conditions were suitable. One day he told them that he wished to leave. Shi Jin replied, "Master, you must not think of leaving; I will keep both you and your mother here till your dying days; will that not be better?" "Worthy sir, I have received many favours from you but I am afraid that Marshal Gao Qiu's men may arrive and you will be implicated. I must go to Yanan Prefecture, where men are needed: there I can rest and settle." Shi Jin spoke to his father and it was agreed that Wang Jin must stay until they had prepared a farewell feast. They presented him two rolls of silk and one hundred taels of silver.[48] When he left, Shi Jin told one of his men to carry Wang Jin's baggage and accompany him for ten li;[49] where they parted with tears.

Drill Instructor Wang again shouldered up his load and mother and son travelled along the road to the western pass.

We will now leave Wang Jin and return with Shi Jin to his home. There he continued his drill. In the middle of the night he would practice for two hours, and during the day, ride his horse outside the village. In less than six months Shi Jin's father died. He prepared a coffin and engaged Buddhist monks to conduct the usual memorial services for seven days. He also asked a Taoist priest to erect an altar; repeat the funeral services; pray for the safe passage of the soul to heaven; attend at the altar for ten days and select a lucky and fortunate time for the funeral and burial.

About four hundred members of the Shi clan came to the funeral in white mourning clothes and they buried the dead in the ancestral graveyard in the hills to the west of the village. After this there was no one at home to manage the property as Shi Jin only wanted to practice fencing.

Three or four months after the death of the farmer on a hot day in the sixth month Shi Jin was idling away his time. He placed a bedstead outside on the threshing floor, in the shadow of a willow tree, and took rest. A breeze came from the fir trees just opposite. He was enjoying the cool breeze, when all at once he saw a man stealthily spying. He shouted, "What are you doing, and who is there looking round this place?" As he said he rose and went to behind a tree to get a better view. He recognized that that man was Li Ji, the rabbit hunter. Shi Jin called, "Li Ji, what are you looking for in my village? Have you come as a spy?"

Li Ji stepped forward and said "Yes, sir, I want to find a man named Qiu Yilang to drink wine with him but seeing you taking a siesta I dared not intrude."

"Did you not previously come here selling game—and did I not pay you liberally? So why have you not been here lately with your game. You might think that I had no money." Li Ji replied, "That's not the case. Just now there is no game and therefore I did not come."

"Stupid talk," said Shi Jin. "Shaohua is a mountain of vast expanse and I do not believe that neither deer nor hare can be found there." Li Ji answered, "You do not know that there is a band of robbers on the mountain, where they have erected a stronghold. They have collected about seven hundred armed men and over a hundred horses. The chief is a man named Zhu Wu, nicknamed "Intuitve Strategist," and the second in command is Chen Da, nicknamed "Leaping Tiger," the third in command is Yang Chun, nicknamed "White-speckled Snake." These three leaders take to robbing houses; they have been officially denounced in Huayin County, and a reward of three thousand strings of cash has been offered for their capture. But who dare go to arrest them? Even we hunters dare not go to the mountain to shoot game, so how could I come here to sell it."

"I have heard of those robbers," said Shi Jin, "but did not know that they have made so much trouble. This being the case the people certainly dislike them. Li Ji, if you have any game in the future bring it here."

Shi Jin thought this matter over. "These men will certainly come here to plunder." He then told the farm labourers to select two fat buffaloes and kill them; and bring the best brew of the village. He sent invitations to all the Shi clan and upon arrival they seated themselves in order of seniority. Wine was served and Shi Jin then spoke to the audience, saying, "I have heard there are three robbers on Mount Shaohua, who have altogether about seven hundred followers, and they rob the people with violence. Sooner or later they will come and pillage our village. I now invite you here to discuss this matter—so that we may be prepared when they come. I will have a rattle sounded at my house when they arrive; and upon hearing this you must bring your arms to defend the village. If your families are attacked we will defend you." All of them are agreed to what Shi Jin said. They then returned home and prepared their weapons. Shi Jin repaired the defences of the village.

At Mount Shaohua, the three bandit chiefs were now holding a conference. The leader, Zhu Wu, the "Intuitve Strategist," was a Dingyuan County man and could fight with a sword in each hand. He was clever in arranging plans for an attack. The second chief Chen Da was a Yecheng County man, and was skillful in the use of a steel lance while the third Yang Chun was a Xieliang County man and used a long sword.

When they were discussing, Zhu Wu said, "I have heard that there is a reward offered for anyone who can capture us, and I am really afraid that when the soldiers come we shall have a severe strugge with them; but we are short of food so we must take some for use here. We must collect a large stock of food on the mountain ready for the time when the soldiers attack us."

Chen Da the "Leaping Tiger" agreed. "Let us go to Huayin County, and ask the people there to lend us some grain and we can see what they say."

Yang Chun the "White-speckled Snake" remarked, "There is no need to go there; it would be better to go to Pucheng County. The chances are ten thousand to one, we shall not fail there." Chen Da said, "There are very few people in Pucheng and very little money or grain there. It will be better to attack Huayin County. The folk there are wealthy and have abundance of grain."

Yang Chun replied, "Elder brother, you do not know that if we attack Huayin County we must pass the village of the Shi clan where that dangerous fellow Shi Jin with nine dragons lives, and we must not provoke him. He will not let us pass."

Chen Da said, "Younger brother, what a coward you are, you are even afraid to pass a village, so what can you do when you are opposed by soldiers?"

"Elder brother, you should not despise Shi Jin. He is hard to deal with."

"I have already heard that he is very brave and is extremely capable," said Zhu Wu. "Younger brother, do not go."

Chen Da would not change his mind, and said, "You two, shut up! Do not increase the other man's determination and reduce our own courage. He is only one man and has not three heads or six arms." He then called to his armed followers, "Get my horse ready! I will attack the Shi clan village, and afterwards seize Huayin County."

Zhu Wu remonstrated with him but Chen Da did not listen. He put on his armor and mounted his horse: he then mustered about one hundred fifty armed brigands down the mountain and went with gongs and drums sounding.

The brigands' approach was duly reported to Shi Jin, who instantly had the rattles sounded and quickly all the men assembled in arms. Shi Jin wore a towel round his head and was equipped with red mail over an embroidered black wadded coat. On his feet were embroidered green boots and round his waist a leather belt. In front and behind were round metal plates. He carried a bow with quiver full of arrows. In his hand he held a double-edged sword with three sharp spikes at the end and four holes with eight rings attached. He was mounted on a roan horse. Before him were forty of his retainers while behind were ninety of the farm labourers. With a combined shout they all moved toward the north of the village. The brigands halted. Shi Jin saw that Chen Da was in front of his men, wearing a red cap with a concave top, and with iron-armor covered with gilt, wadded red clothing, thick army boots and a plaited waistbelt. He rode a white horse and carried a three-pronged halberd which was about ten feet long. As the two leaders met, the men raised a loud shout. Chen Da paid his respect to Shi Jin by rising in his stirrups.

Shi Jin spoke in a loud voice, "You kill people, set places on fire, rob with violence; your crimes fill the heavens, and you are all deserving of death. You ought to have ears; how dare you come to pouch the tiger's litter!"

Chen Da replied from his horse, "We are short of grain at our mountain fortress and are going to borrow some grain at Huayin County. We have taken a short cut by passing your honourable village—but we will not disturb even a blade of grass here. Let us pass and on our return we will thank you." "Nonsense," replied Shi Jin, "I am the head of this village and I must arrest you. If I don't do so, I shall be implicated and the magistrate will blame me." "Within the four seas all men are brothers, so let us use your road," said Chen Da.

"What meaningless talk!" said Shi Jin. "Even if I am willing but there is one who is not, so you must have his consent before you pass."

"You are a hero. Tell me whom I must ask?" replied Chen Da.

"You can ask the sword in my hand and if it is willing then you can pass," said Shi Jin.

Chen Da spoke angrily, "You are trying to deceive me but you should not be presumptuous." Shi Jin was also angry, and brandishing his sword, he rode forward to fight.

Chen Da whipped his horse, thrust forward his three-pronged halberd, and advanced to meet Shi Jin. They fought for some time. Then Shi Jin thought of a plan, and purposely allowed Chen Da to thrust in his halberd, he parried the blow by moving to one side, as Chen Da lunged forward. With a dexterous turn of the arm he caught Chen Da and pulled him out of his saddle, then he took hold of his plaited waistbelt and threw him to the ground. The horse galloped away like a gust of wind. Shi Jin told his servants to bind Chen Da, and the band of robbers scattered. Shi Jin returned to his house and bound Chen Da to a pillar in the hall to wait until he captured the other robber chiefs so as to send them together to the magistrate's yamen to be dealt with. He gave wine to all the villagers and then dismissed them. Everyone applauded him and said, "You, sir, are a hero."

We will not say anything more about the feast at the Shi clan village but let us consider the anxiety of Zhu Wu and Yang Chun in their mountain stronghold. They had sent many soldiers to make inquiries, and on the way they met the men returning with the riderless horse. The defeated men said, "Bad luck! Our elder brother's life is in danger."

Upon reaching the stronghold they gave details of the fight, saying, "Shi Jin was a great hero."

"Shall we risk our lives in rescuing him?" asked Yang Chun.

"We cannot do that," replied Zhu Wu. "The disaster is of his own making. How can we defeat Shi Jin? I have a desperate plan but if we fail to rescue Chen Da, that will be the end of all of us." Zhu Wu whispered his plan. Yang Chun said, "Good! Let us go without delay."

Now in the village Shi Jin's anger had not abated when a labourer rushed in and reported that the other robber chiefs had come. Shi Jin said, "I will send them both to the magistrate. Bring me my horse."

The rattle was sounded and the same crowd of armed men assembled. He was just on the point of leaving when he saw the two robber chiefs walking to the gate. They both knelt down and cried. Shi Jin dismounted and shouted, "What have you to say?" Zhu Wu crying, answered, "We shall be arrested and tried, and cannot live as bandits on the mountains. Once we took a vow that we would die on the same day. Although we have not the heroism of Guan Gong, Zhang Fei, and Liu Bei, yet we have the same objects in mind. [50] Today our brother Chen Da did not listen to our advice but he unintentionally offended your dignity. You, hero, have already arrested him at your noble village. As we have no alternative we come only to beseech you to put us to death together. We hope that you, hero, will send us three men to the magistrate, and ask for a reward. We swear that we shall not feel sorrow at that; we are entirely in your hands and wish to die."

Shi Jin heard this, and thought that they were brave. If he sent them to the magistrate and requested a reward, then all heroes would be ashamed of him for not being a brave man. The ancients said, "The tiger does not eat the flesh of a tiger." So he said to these men, "Come inside." They were not afraid and followed Shi Jin into the hall, where they knelt and asked him to bind them. Shi Jin told them several times to rise but they declined to do so. He thought, "Intelligent people like intelligence in others, and so good folk recognize the good in others." He said, "As your bravery is so great, I cannot send you to the magistrate. How will it be if I release Chen Da?"

"We do not wish to implicate you," said Zhu Wu. "It will be better for you to ask for the reward." "How can I do that?" said Shi Jin. "Are you willing to eat my food and drink wine?"

"We are not even afraid of death so how can we be afraid of meat and drink?"

Shi Jin was much pleased at this, and released Chen Da. He invited all three to dine with him, and they expressed their thanks for his great benevolence. After drinking several cups of wine they departed. As a token of thankfulness the three brigand chiefs got together thirty taels of gold in ingots that was sent in a dark moonless night by two of their men, to Shi Jin. When the bandits arrived at the farm Shi Jin came to the gate to inquire what they wanted, and they presented the gold and asked him to accept the same. At first Shi Jin refused to accept the gift but he saw that the intention was good so he accepted the gold, and then ordered a servant to give the men refreshments. When they departed he gave them some small pieces of silver for themselves. A fortnight afterwards the bandit leaders took a big jewel which they had looted sometime before, and sent it to Shi Jin who accepted it. He saw that they were grateful for his mercy so he had three gowns made with red embroidered silk and sent these with some wine and three fat roasted sheep to the brigands, and his steward Wang the Fourth was put in charge of this matter. Shi Jin and the brigands became very friendly, and were frequently giving each other presents.

On the fifteenth day of the eighth month, Shi Jin sent Wang the Fourth with an invitation for a banquet and the bandit chiefs wrote a reply, accepting the invitation. [51] After a few cups of wine Wang the Fourth left but on his way down the mountain he met some brigands who took him to an inn where he drank more wine. When he left, he was slightly drunk, and staggered along. After going about three //e came to a forest which he entered and lay down in the long grass to sleep. The hunter, Li Ji came to that spot to look for hares, and recognizing Wang the Fourth he attempted to raise him up but he could not do so. In doing this some silver fell out from Wang the Fourth's girdle which made Li Ji meditate, "This man is drunk but where did the money come from? Why should I not take some?" It was now the opportunity for the baneful forces to come together, so unexpected events ensued naturally. He unloosened Wang the Fourth's girdle, and upon shaking it, the sealed reply from the bandits fell out. He opened that, and recognized the names of the brigand chiefs. "Here is my luck. A fortune teller told me that I should have great fortune and here it is. A reward is offered for their arrest, and perhaps I can get something for this letter also." So he took the silver, and the letter, and went to report the matter to the officials at Huayin County.

When Wang the Fourth awoke that evening, the moon was shining through the trees. He found his girdle in the grass but the silver and the letter were missing. He felt greatly annoyed and thought the matter over. He thought if he said that he had lost the letter Shi Jin would probably dismiss him, so at last he decided to say that the invitation had been accepted but there was no written reply. He told this to Shi Jin who asked why he had been so long in returning, and he explained that the bandits had pressed him to stay, drinking wine for half the night.

On the day appointed Shi Jin had a banquet prepared, and the three bandit leaders duly arrived with about five armed men. They took their seats. But when they had drunk much wine there was a loud noise and much torchlight outside the gate. Shi Jin was startled, and jumping up told the brigands to keep their seats while he went to see what had happened. He told the servants not to open the gate, and putting a ladder against the wall he looked over. He saw that the county police inspector was on a horse, two constables and about four hundred soldiers surrounded the farm. He returned and told the bandits that the soldiers had come evidently to arrest them.

Men concealed in the deep of reeds,
Prepared their boats among the lotus leaves.
Soldiers sent to capture them,
Did only make them intimate.

The brigands made their escape.

003
Master/Squire Shi Leaves Huayin County at Night; Major Lu Da Assaults & Pummels the Lord Butcher Zheng of the West & have a Fight

"What'll I do?" Shi Jin exclaimed.

Zhu Wu and the other 2 bandit chieftains knelt before him and said, "Your hands are clean, brother. Don't get involved because of us. It's better to tie us up and claim the reward than have your own good name besmirched."

"Impossible," retorted Shi Jin. "If I did such a thing it would look as if I inveigled you here so that I could get the money. Everyone would laugh at me. We'll live or die together. Stand up and don't worry. There's no need to sacrifice yourselves on my account. Let me see what this is all about."

He mounted the ladder and called: "What do you mean by coming here in the middle of the night and raiding my manor?"

"Don't pretend, Young Master," the constables replied. "Li Ji who made the accusation is right here with us."

"Li Ji," Shi Jin shouted, "how could you slander an honest man?"

"I didn't know, at first," the hunter responded. "I picked up a letter Wang the Fourth was carrying in the woods and took it to the county seat to have it read. This is the result."

Shi Jin summoned Wang. "You said there was no reply. Where did that letter come from?"

"I was drunk. I forgot about it."

"Wretch," shouted Shi Jin. "You've got us in a pretty fix."

Afraid of Shi Jin's fighting prowess, the constables didn't dare force their way into the manor. "Better give them an answer," the bandit leaders advised. Shi Jin understood.

"Don't start anything, you constables," he called from the top of the ladder. "Move back from my walls. I'm going to tie the bandits up and turn them over to the officials for the reward."

The constables had no desire to clash with Shi Jin. "We don't want any trouble," they said. "Bring them out and we'll go with you to the magistrate, together."

Shi Jin came down from the ladder and went to the front of the hall. He had Wang the Fourth taken to the rear garden and killed him with one blow of the sword. Next he ordered his vassals to pack all his portable valuables and light thirty or forty torches. He and the bandit chiefs put on their armor and took halberds and swords from the weapons rack. Then they set fire to the thatched buildings in the back of the manor house. Meanwhile, the vassals also packed their own belongings.

When the soldiers outside saw the flames, they rushed around to the rear. Shi Jin set the central hall to the torch, threw open the front gate and charged out with a mighty yell. Followed by Zhu Wu, Yang Chun and Chen Da and their guards, Shi Jin and his men plunged into the fray. The young squire was a formidable warrior. Who could withstand him?

As wild flames enkindled the sky, Shi Jin and his men cut a path through the soldiers. He soon found himself face to face with the two constables and Li Ji. Shi Jin flew into a rage. "When enemies meet, their eyes blaze." The constables could see that things were going badly. They turned and ran. Li Ji also tried to escape but Shi Jin was quickly upon him. With one sweep of his blade, he cleaved Li Ji in twain. Chen Da and Yang Chun dispatched the constables with one thrust of their halberds each. The county sheriff, terrified, galloped off as fast as his horse would take him. Of course the soldiers dared not advance. They ran for their lives in all directions.

Killing as they went, Shi Jin and his cohorts proceeded directly to the bandits' stronghold on Mount Shaohua. Only then did they sit down and catch their breaths. Zhu Wu and other leaders ordered their men to slaughter steers and horses and prepare a celebration feast. Of this we'll say no more. Shi Jin remained for several days. He thought to himself: "To save three people, I burned down my manor. Although I managed to keep a few small valuables, my larger property is gone completely." He felt uneasy. How could he stay in a place like this? He said to the brigand chief. "Instructor Wang, my arms teacher, is attached to a border garrison west of the Pass. I've been intending to seek him out but because my father died I was unable to leave. Now that the manor is ruined, there's nothing to keep me here."

"Don't go, brother," the bandit leaders urged. "Stay on a while, and we'll talk it over again. If you don't want to join us, when things have quieted down a bit we'll rebuild your manor and you can become a respectable citizen again."

"Your intentions are good but I don't wish to remain. If I can find my teacher and get some sort of job I can distinguish myself in, I'll be happy the rest of my life."

"Why not stay on and be our chief? Wouldn't that make you happy?" queried Zhu Wu. "Of course our mountain stronghold is too small for a man like you."

"My reputation is spotless. How can I sully the body my parents have given me? There's no use your trying to persuade me to become a bandit."

A few days later, Shi Jin decided to depart. The exhortations of the three chieftains were in vain. He left his servants and most of his money in the fortress and took only some small pieces of silver which he wrapped in a bundle.

A broad-brimmed felt hat topped by a red tassel covered the soft black bandanna which bound his head. Around his neck was a kerchief of bright yellow. He wore a white silk military gown tied at the waist by a plum-coloured sash five fingers wide. His legs were wrapped with alternate strips of blue and white. On his feet were looped hemp sandals, good for mountain climbing. A sword hung from his waist.

Shi Jin tied his bundle to his back, took up his halberd and bid farewell to the three chieftains. They and the other bandits saw him to the foot of the mountain. Weeping, they parted from Shi Jin and returned to their stronghold.

Shi Jin followed the road leading to Yanan Prefecture. He ate and drank when hungry and thirsty, he stopped only at night and set out again the next day at dawn. He travelled in this manner, alone, for more than half a month until he arrived in Weizhou.

"This is also a border garrison," he said to himself. "Maybe my teacher, Instructor Wang, is here."

He entered the town. It was a bustling place, with several streets and market-places. On a street corner he saw a small tea-house. He went in and sat down.

A waiter approached him. "What kind of tea would you like, sir?"

"I'll have a cup of steeped."

The waiter brought his order and placed it on the table before him. "Where is the town's garrison command?" asked Shi Jin.

"It's that place just up ahead."

"Do you know whether they have a drill instructor from the Eastern Capital, a man called Wang Jin?"

"The garrison has many drill instructors. There are three or four named Wang. But I don't know whether any of them is Wang Jin."

While the waiter was talking, a big fellow who looked like an army officer strode in. His head was bound in a bandanna with figured swastikas, buckled in the back with twisted gold rings from Taiyuan. A raven-black plaited sash bound his parrot-green warrior's gown at the waist. On his feet were yellow boots embossed with four welts of brown leather in hawk talon design. He had large ears, a straight nose and a broad mouth. A full beard framed his round face. He was six feet tall and had a girth of ten spans.
When the new-comer had taken a seat, the waiter said to Shi Jin: "That's the major. You can ask him about Wang Jin. He knows all the drill instructors."
Shi Jin rose quickly and bowed. "May I invite you to some tea, sir? Please join me."
The officer saw that Shi Jin was a big stalwart fellow who seemed a man of valor. He walked over and returned his greeting. Then the two sat down together.
"May I be so bold as to ask your name, sir?" Shi Jin queried.
"I'm called Lu Da. I'm a major in this garrison. And who are you, brother?"
"My name is Shi Jin. I'm from Huayin County in Huazhou Prefecture. My teacher, Wang Jin, used to be a drill instructor in the Mighty Imperial Guards in the Eastern Capital. Could you tell me, sir, whether he's here in this garrison?"
"Say, aren't you Young Master Shi from Shi Family Village, the fellow they call Nine Dragons?"
Shi Jin bowed. "I am that humble person."
Lu Da returned his courtesy. " 'Meeting a man of fame is better than just hearing his name.' Is your teacher the Wang Jin who got in wrong with Marshal Gao in the Eastern Capital?"
"The same."
"I've heard of him but he's not here. They say he's with Old General Zhong in the Yanan garrison. Weizhou is a small post. Young General Zhong is our commander. Brother Wang is not with us. So you're Young Master Shi. I've heard a lot of good things about you. Come out and have a few drinks with me."
He took Shi Jin by the hand. As they were leaving the teahouse, Lu Da called over his shoulder: "Charge the tea to me."
"It doesn't matter, Major," replied the waiter. "Just go along."
Lu Da and Shi Jin strolled down the street arm in arm. Before they had gone fifty paces they saw many people gathered around an open plot of ground.
"Let's take a look," Shi Jin suggested.
They pushed through the crowd. There in the centre was a man holding a dozen or so staves. Various packets of salves and ointments, with prices marked, were arrayed on a platter on the ground. The man was a medicine pedlar who attracted customers by putting on a show with weapons.
Shi Jin recognized him. It was his first arms instructor, Li Zhong, nicknamed the Tiger-Fighting General.
"Teacher," called Shi Jin. "I haven't seen you in ages."
"What are you doing here, young brother?" Li Zhong cried.
"Since you're Young Master Shi's teacher," said Lu Da, "come and have a few cups with us."
"Gladly, just as soon as I've sold some of these medicines and earned some money."
"Who's got time to wait? Come on, if you're coming."
"Mince is a hand-to-mouth existence, Major. Go ahead. I'll catch up with you later ... Young brother, you go on first with the major."
Lu Da was very irritated. He roughly shoved the spectators aside. "Haul your assholes out of here or I'll beat you to a pulp," he bellowed.
The crowd, recognizing him, hastily scattered. Li Zhong was angry but he dared not protest. Lu Da was obviously much too fierce. "How impatient you are," Li said with a placating smile. He gathered up his arms and medicines, gave them to a friend for safe-keeping, and set off with Shi Jin and the major.
They turned this way and that through the streets until they came to a famous tavern run by a family named Pan at the foot of a bridge. From a pole sticking out over the tavern door a pennant fluttered in the breeze indicating that liquor was sold on the premises. They went upstairs and selected a clean room. Lu Da took the host's seat, Lin Zhong sat opposite, while Shi Jin seated himself at the side.
The waiter, who knew Lu Da, greeted them respectfully. "How much wine do you want, Major?" he asked.
"We'll start with four measures."
The waiter laid out dishes to go with the wine. "What would you like to eat, sir?"
"Questions, questions," Lu Da exploded. "Bring whatever you've got, add up the bill and I'll pay! Must you gab so?"
That waiter went downstairs. Soon he returned and heated the wine. He covered the table with platters of meat and other food.
Each of the three men downed several cups. They talked of this and that, comparing methods in feats at arms. Just as their conversation was at its liveliest, they heard the sound of sobbing in the next room. The irascible Lu Da immediately became enraged. He snatched plates and dishes and smashed them on the floor.
The waiter, alarmed, rushed up the stairs. He found Lu Da fuming.
"If there's anything you want, sir, just give the order and I'll bring it," he said, with a bow.
"Who wants anything? I think you know who I am. Yet you have the brass to allow people to bawl in the next room and disturb us while we dine. I haven't underpaid you, have I?"
"Don't be angry, sir. I would never permit anyone to disturb you. The people weeping are a man and his daughter who sing in the taverns. They didn't know you and your friends were drinking here. They can't help lamenting their bitter fate."
"There's something peculiar going on. Bring them here to me."
In a few minutes the waiter returned with a girl of about eighteen, followed by a man in his late fifties. Both carried wooden clappers. Though not very pretty, the girl was rather appealing. Wiping her eyes, she made three curtsies. The old man also greeted the diners.
"Where are you from?" asked Lu Da. "Why do you weep?"
"I will tell you our story, sir," the girl replied. "We are from the Eastern Capital. My parents and I came to visit a relative but when we arrived, we learned he had left Weizhou for the Southern Capital (Shangqiu in Henan Province). My mother fell ill in the inn and died. My father and I were having a hard time. Master Zheng, who is called the Lord of the West, saw me and wanted me for a concubine. He sent people to wheedle and threaten, and finally signed a contract promising my father three thousand strings of cash for me.
"The contract was real but the promise was false. In less than three months his wife, a hard woman, drove me out of the house. What's more, Master Zheng ordered the innkeeper to demand that we 'return' his three thousand strings of cash. We never received a penny of his money. How could we repay him? My father is weak. He couldn't argue with a rich and powerful man like Zheng. We didn't know what to do. My father taught me many ballads when I was a child and we began making rounds of the taverns, singing. We give Zheng most of what little we earned each day, saving a little for our travelling expenses so that we can go home.
"But the last few days the taverns haven't had much business, so we couldn't pay. We're afraid Zheng will come asking for it and abuse us. Ours is a hard lot, and we've no place to seek redress. That's why we've been weeping. We hadn't meant to disturb you, sir. Please forgive us."
"What's your family name?" asked Lu Da. "Which inn are you staying at? Where does Master Zheng, that Lord of the West, live?"
The old man replied: "Our name is Jin. I am the second among my brothers. My daughter is called Jade Lotus. Master Zheng is the butcher who sells meat at the foot of Zhuangyuan Bridge. My daughter and I live in the Lu Family Inn just up ahead inside the town's East Gate."
"Bah," said Lu Da contemptuously. "So Master Zheng is only Zheng the pig-sticker, the dirty rogue who runs a butcher shop under the patronage of Young General Zhong, our garrison commander. And he cheats and bullies too, does he?"
He turned to Li Zhong and Shi Jin. "You two wait here while I beat the varlet to death. I'll be right back."
They grabbed him. "Calm yourself, brother," they pleaded. "Let's talk this over again later." They finally managed to restrain him.
"Come here, old man," Lu Da said to the father. "I'll give you some money. Tomorrow you can go back to the Eastern Capital. How about it?"
"If you can help us return home you'll be giving us a new lease on life," said father and daughter. "But we're afraid the innkeeper won't let us go. Master Zheng has ordered him to collect our payments."
"Don't worry about that," said Lu Da. "I'll take care of the innkeeper." He pulled out five ounces of silver and placed them on the table. To Shi Jin he said: "This is all I've brought today. If you have any silver, lend it to me. I'll give it back tomorrow."
"It doesn't matter, brother. No need to repay." Shi Jin extracted a silver bar weighing ten ounces from his bundle and put it down beside Lu Da's money.
The major looked at Li Zhong. "You lend me some too."
Li Zhong produced two ounces of silver.
Lu Da was annoyed at the smallness of the offering. "Big-hearted, aren't you?" he snorted. He handed the fifteen ounces of silver to the old man. "This will cover your travelling expenses for you and your daughter. Go to the inn and pack your things," he directed. "Tomorrow at dawn I'll come and see you off. Just let that innkeeper try and stop you!"
Old Jin and his daughter thanked him and departed. Lu Da returned the two ounces to Li Zhong.
After the three men finished two more measures of wine they went down the stairs. "I'll pay you tomorrow, host," called Lu Da.
"Just go along," the owner of the tavern said. "You can drink here on credit any time, sir. Our only fear is you won't come."
The three left the Pan Family Tavern. On the street they separated. Shi Jin and Li Zhong went to their respective inns.
Lu Da returned to his quarters near the garrison and angrily went to bed without any supper. His landlord didn't dare ask what was wrong.
Old Jin returned to his inn with the fifteen ounces of silver. He settled his daughter down, went to a place far outside the town and hired a cart. Then he returned to the inn, packed their belongings and paid their rent, fuel and rice bills. After that they could only wait for the morrow.
The night passed without incident. Father and daughter rose at dawn, lit a fire and cooked breakfast. When they finished eating, they collected their utensils. The sky was just turning light. Lu Da strode into the inn.
"Boy," he called, "which room is Old Jin's?"
"Uncle Jin," the attendant shouted, "Major Lu Da is here to see you." The old man opened his door. "Ah, Major, please come in and sit a while."
"Sit, nothing," retorted Lu Da. "If you're going, go. What are you waiting for?"
Old Jin summoned his daughter and raised his carrying-pole to his shoulder. He thanked Lu Da and started for the inn gate. The attendant stopped him.
"Where are you going, Uncle Jin?"
"Does he owe you any rent?" Lu Da demanded.
"He paid up last night. But Master Zheng has ordered me to collect the money he laid out for Jin's daughter."
"I'll return the butcher's money in person. Let the old man go."
The attendant refused. Lu Da slapped him across the face with such force that blood gushed from his mouth. The punch that followed knocked out two of his front teeth. Crawling to his feet, the attendant scuttled to the interior of the inn and hid himself.
Of course, the innkeeper dared not intervene. Jin and his daughter quickly departed from the inn, then left the town to get the cart the old man had hired the day before.
Lu Da, afraid the attendant might still try to stop them, sat himself down on a stool in the inn and remained there for four hours. Only when he was confident that the old man was far away did he leave the inn. He went directly to the Zhuangyuan Bridge. There Zheng had a two-room butcher shop with two chopping blocks. Four or five sides of pork were hanging on display. Zheng sat behind a counter by the door, keeping an eye on his ten or so assistants as they cut and sold meat. Lu Da came to the door. "Butcher Zheng," he shouted.
Zheng recognized him. He came out rapidly from behind the counter and greeted him with respect. "Major, a pleasure." He directed an assistant to bring a bench. "Please be seated, sir."
Lu Da sat down. "The garrison commander has ordered me to buy ten catties of lean meat, chopped fine, to be used for filling. There mustn't be a speck of fat in it."
"Right," said Zheng. He turned to his assistants. "Pick out a good cut and chop up ten catties."
"I don't want those dirty oafs touching it," said Lu Da. "You do it yourself."
"Certainly," said Zheng. "Glad to." He selected a cut of ten catties of lean meat and started mincing.
The attendant from the inn, his head bound in a white handkerchief, arrived to tell Zheng about Old Jin. But when he saw Lu Da seated at the door, he was afraid to come any closer. He stood under the eaves of a house, observing the proceedings cautiously from a distance.
After chopping for an hour, Zheng wrapped the minced meat in a lotus leaf. "Shall I have it delivered, sir?" he asked.
"Delivered, nothing. What's your hurry? Now cut up ten catties of fat meat. There mustn't be a speck of lean in it. This is also for filling."
"The lean can be put in dumplings but what good is the fat?"
Lu Da glared. "When the commander gives an order, who dares question him?"
"As long as you can use it I'll chop it for you." Zheng selected a cut of ten catties of fat meat and began mincing. By the time he wrapped it in a lotus leaf the morning had gone and it was the hour for lunch.
The inn attendant dared not approach. Even other customers were afraid to draw near.
"Shall I have this delivered to the garrison command for you, sir?" asked Zheng.
"Now I want ten catties of gristle, chopped fine, also to be used for filling, and I don't want to see any meat in it."
Zheng laughed awkwardly. "Are you making fun of me?"
Lu Da leaped up, one package of chopped meat in each hand, and scowled at the butcher. "That's exactly what I'm doing—making fun of you." He flung the contents of the packages full in Zheng's face.
The shower of meat stung the butcher into a rage. From the soles of his feet, fury surged into his forehead. An irrepressible flame blazed in his heart. He grabbed a paring knife from the butcher's block and jumped down from the shop steps. Lu Da was waiting for him in the middle of the street.
None of the dozen or so clerks from the neighbouring shops dared to mediate. Passers-by stood frozen in their tracks on both sides of the street. The attendant from the inn was struck dumb.
The knife in his right hand, Zheng reached for Lu Da with his left. Lu Da seized the outstretched hand, closed in and sent the butcher sprawling with a swift kick in the groin. Another step forward and he put his foot on Zheng's chest. Raising a fist like a vinegar keg, Lu Da thundered: "I was roving inspector of five western military districts under Old General Zhong. People might very well call me Lord of the West. But you're just a meat slicing butcher, a low cur. Where do you come off giving yourself such a title? And who gave you the right to force and cheat Jin's daughter Jade Lotus?"
He landed a punch on Zheng's nose that flattened it to one side and brought the blood flowing like the sauces in a condiments shop—salty, sour and spicy. Zheng struggled vainly to rise. The knife fell from his hand. "A good blow," he cried.
"Mother-raping thief," said the major. "How dare you talk back?" He punched the butcher on the eyebrow, splitting the lid so that the eyeball protruded. Red, black and purple gore flowed like swatches of cloth in a draper's shop.
The spectators were all afraid of Lu Da. None of them ventured to intervene.
Vanquished, Zheng begged to be spared.
"You scurvy knave," the major exclaimed scornfully. "If you had shown any guts I might have let you off. But since you're so lily-livered, I won't." He struck the butcher a heavy blow on the temple. Zheng's head rang like the clanging of gongs, bells and cymbals in a big memorial service. The butcher lay stretched on the ground. Breath was coming out of his mouth but none was going in. He didn't move.
Lu Da pretended to be incensed. "Playing dead, eh? I'll hit you a few more!" He had observed that Zheng's face was changing colour. "I only wanted to give the varlet a beating," he said to himself. "Who would have thought that three blows would kill him? They're sure to hold me for trial, and I've nobody to bring me food in prison. I'd better get out of here."
He rose and strode away, pausing briefly to look back, shake his finger at Zheng's corpse and shout: "Go on playing dead. I'll settle with you later."
Neither the butcher's assistants nor the clerks in the neighbouring shops had the courage to stop him.
Lu Da returned to his quarters and hastily packed. He took only some travelling clothes and a bit of silver. His old garments and heavier things he left behind. Carrying a staff as a weapon, he sped out of the South Gate like a wisp of smoke.
Although Zheng's family and the inn attendant worked on the butcher a long time, they couldn't bring him back to life. He was quite dead. His wife and neighbours went to the prefecture and filed a charge of murder. Court was called into session, and the prefect took his place and read the document of accusation.
"That Lu Da is a major of the garrison," thought the prefect. Instead of issuing an order for his arrest forthwith, he mounted his sedan-chair and went to the headquarters of the garrison commander. He stepped down from his chair and had the soldier at the gate announce him. He was ushered into the main hall where he was received by the commander. The two men exchanged courtesies.
"What brings you here?" asked the commander.
"I've come to inform Your Excellency that Major Lu Da has, without cause, beaten to death on the street a butcher named Zheng. I wouldn't presume to arrest him without reporting to Your Excellency first."
The commander was startled. "That Lu Da is a skilled military man," he thought, "but he's rough and crude. Today he's committed a murder. How can I cover up for him? I must let him be taken and questioned." To the prefect he said: "Lu Da originally was an officer of my father, the Old General. I had no proper aide, and he was sent here as a major. Since he's committed a capital offence you may arrest and interrogate him according to law. If you get a confession and the crime is proved, you must inform my father before passing sentence. Otherwise it might be very embarrassing if, at some future date, my father should ask for him back."
"I'll get to the bottom of this and send a formal report to the Old General before any sentence is passed," the prefect promised.

He said farewell to the commander, left the garrison headquarters, got into his sedan-chair and returned to the prefecture. There he resumed court and issued an order to the police inspector on duty for Lu Da's arrest. The officer, with twenty men, set out immediately for Lu Da's lodging.
"He left only a little while ago with a few bundles and a staff," the landlord told them. "I assumed the major was going on official business, so I didn't dare ask."
The police inspector directed that Lu Da's room be opened and searched. All that could be found was some old clothes and bedding. Taking the landlord with them, the officer and his men searched the town from south to north. There was no trace of Lu Da. The police inspector returned to the prefect with the landlord and two neighbours in custody, and reported.
"Major Lu Da has fled to escape punishment, no one knows where. I've arrested these neighbours and his landlord."
The prefect ordered that they be held and that Zheng's family and close neighbours be summoned. Along with forensic experts, local officials and the ward chief, he made a careful examination of the victim. The butcher's family encoffined the body and stored it temporarily in a monastery.
Appropriate documents were filed, and the prefect ordered his police to apprehend Lu Da within a specified time, on pain of being beaten. The complainant was allowed to go home, after filing a surety bond. The close neighbours who had witnessed the crime were beaten for failing to rescue Zheng. Lu Da's landlord and neighbours were not charged. An urgent proclamation, offering a thousand strings of cash for Lu Da's capture and giving his age, birthplace and description, was posted everywhere. All concerned were then released and told to await further notice. Zheng's family went into mourning. Of this we'll say no more.

*

To return to Lu Da: after leaving Weizhou, he hurried pell-mell east and west, passing through several prefectural towns. With him it was a case of:

Any food when you're hungry,
When you're cold rags save life;
Any road when you're frightened,
When you're poor any wife.

He dashed about in a panic, with no idea where to go. After many days of wandering, he arrived in Yanmen, a county seat in the prefecture of Daizhou. It was a bustling town with many people and thriving markets. Carts and horses filled the streets that were lined by shops conducting trade and commerce of every type. Although only a county seat, it was more prosperous than a prefectural capital. On a street corner, he saw a crowd gathered in front of a proclamation. Someone was reading it aloud. Illiterate himself, he pushed forward to listen. This is what he heard:

By order of the military commander of Taiyuan, this county hereby publishes the following notice from Weizhou: Wanted—the killer of Butcher Zheng. Name—Lu Da, former major in the Weizhou garrison command. Any man who conceals him or gives him food and shelter shall be deemed equally guilty. Whoever arrests and brings him forward, or offers information leading to his arrest, shall receive a reward of one thousand strings of cash…

As Lu Da stood listening, someone threw his arms around him from behind and cried, "What're you doing here, brother Zhang?" He pulled Lu Da away from the street corner. If this man hadn't seen him and dragged him away, Lu Da would never have shaved off his hair and beard, changed the name that identified him as a murderer, and wrecked the idols in the temple. And as a result: His Buddhist staff smashed open a dangerous road; his monk's knife slaughtered unjust men.

Then, so the story tells, Shi Jin exclaimed, "What's to be done?" while Zhu Wu and the other brigand chiefs knelt and said: "Elder Brother, your reputation is unsullied. You must not be implicated on our account. You should take a rope and bind all three of us, and then go to seek the reward. That will spare us the shame of having brought about your ruin."
"How could I do that?" Shi Jin cried. "It would look as if I enticed you here for the sake of the money. I'd be a laughing-stock. No, if it's time for me to die I'll die with you; if I'm to live, we'll all live. Come, get up. Take courage, don't despair, because I've a better idea. But first wait while I try to find out the reason for all this."
Shi Jin climbed the ladder and shouted to the officers: "You two, what the devil are you doing trespassing on my property in the middle of the night?"
The two officers replied: "Indeed, sir, you put a bold face on it! Can't you see we have Li Ji here, your accuser?"
Shi Jin roared: "Li Ji, how dare you slander people!"
Li Ji replied, "I didn't know anything, I just picked up a letter Fourth Brother Wang dropped in the woods and showed it to the magistrate, that's how it happened."
"Wang!" Shi Jin roared. "You said there was no reply. What's all this about a letter?"
"Your Honour, it must have been the drink," Wang said. "I must have forgotten the letter."
Shi Jin let out a great cry: "You moron! Now what's to be done?"
Outside the officers and their men were waiting, too afraid of Shi Jin to break in and seize their quarry. The three brigand chiefs made Shi a sign that signified "pretend to accept their demands." Shi Jin understood, and shouted down to the officers, "All right, then but don't imagine you'll get in here by force. Pull your men back a little. I intend to tie the brigands up myself, and deliver them to the magistrate for the reward."
Those two officers had a healthy respect for Shi Jin. They answered, meekly: "That's all right with us, we'll wait for you to tie them up and bring them out, then we'll go for the reward together."
Shi Jin descended from his ladder. He went to the hall and called for Wang. He dragged Wang into the inner court, where he dispatched him with a single cut. Then he called on some of the servants to collect up everything worthwhile that could be carried, and pack it neatly. He ordered thirty or forty torches to be lit along one wall. He and the brigands now armed themselves from head to foot, each taking from the rack a dagger that he passed through his belt, and a sabre that he brandished in his hand; then, after tucking the flaps of their robes into their belts, they went to set light to the barns at the back of the house. The retainers likewise tied their bundles. The besiegers, seeing flames within, rushed to the back of the house to find out what was going on. But Shi Jin had already returned to the hall. This he also set alight. Then, flinging open the main gates, he charged out, sabre in hand, uttering the most blood-curdling war cries.
With Shi Jin at their head, Zhu Wu and Yang Chun in the middle, and Chen Da bringing up the rear, followed by a crowd of servants and dependants, they forced their way forward, feinting to the west and striking to the east. Shi Jin was a real tiger, how could anyone bar his way?
As the flames spread everywhere in his rear, he cut out a path with his sabre. His devastating onslaught soon brought him face to face with the two officers and Li Ji. The sight of them enraged him. As the saying goes, "When enemies come face to face, savagely their eyes gleam!" The two officers, perceiving the situation was out of hand, turned to leave. Li Ji was all for leaving too but Shi Jin was already upon him. He raised his sabre and at one blow cut off Li Ji's head. As for the two decamping officers, Chen Da and Yang Chun were onto them straight away, dealing each a sabre cut which settled his account for good. The horrified sheriff set spurs to his horse and galloped off. As for the militia, how would they have found the courage to attack? They fled in all directions, heaven knows where to!
Shi Jin and his party pressed forward, killing as they went. The governor's troops had no stomach for the engagement and simply melted away. Shi Jin, Zhu Wu, Chen Da, and Yang Chun, with the retainers and the rest, pushed on without pausing for breath till they reached the stronghold on Little Mount Hua. Once he and his friends were inside, Zhu Wu ordered cattle to be killed at once, and horses sacrificed, for a grand celebration. We say no more of this.
A few days passed, and Shi Jin began to think, "Just because I once decided to save three lives, I have had to burn my house and estate. Although I rescued a few valuables, the stuff that can be carried, everything more substantial is gone."
He wondered what to do: he couldn't stay there. Eventually he announced to Zhu Wu and the others, "Instructor Wang, my old teacher, has a post at Guanxi in a frontier garrison. I always meant to go and find him but my father's death prevented me. Now that my house and estate are gone, I shall set off at once in search of my master."
The three brigand chiefs replied: "Elder Brother, do not go. Stay here in the stronghold a few days and we'll consider later what to do. If you don't want to be an outlaw, just wait, when things have quietened down we'll rebuild the manor for you, and you can go back to being a gentleman."
Shi Jin said, "Despite your generous sentiments, my mind is made up, I can't stay. If I can find where my master is, that's where I'll settle and build a new life and live out my days in peace."
"If you'd stay and be our leader here," Zhu Wu said, "it would rejoice our hearts! But I fear this place is just too small to house you."
"I am a gentleman," Shi Jin said. "How could I so dishonour this life my parents left me? Become an outlaw? Don't speak to me of this again!"
Shi Jin stayed a few more days but then he decided it was time to go. Zhu Wu and his companions could not persuade him otherwise. All the retainers Shi Jin had brought with him remained in the stronghold. He took just some small things and a sum of silver and tied them in a bundle; everything else he entrusted to the lords of the mountain retreat.
Then, wearing a broad-brimmed white hat in the Fanyang style, decorated with a little red tassel, and under it a soft turban with pleated corners, of a muddy green colour, with a bright yellow gauze scarf, clad in a white silk shirt and warrior's doublet, about his waist a braided money-belt of plum-coloured silk, broad as a man's hand, blue and white striped gaiters and open-laced mountain sandals of hemp on his feet, and in his belt a sword with round guard and curved blade in the shape of a wild-goose's feather, Shi Jin threw his bundle on his back, gripped his sabre, and prepared to leave Zhu Wu and the others.
A crowd of brigands accompanied Shi Jin down the mountain. After bidding him a sad farewell, Zhu Wu and his friends returned to the stronghold.
Thus Shi Jin departed, sabre in hand, from Little Mount Hua, and took the Guanxi road, in the direction of Yanan. Then it was:

A country of rugged mountain peaks,
A land of silent lonely villages;
Night-lodging with the clouds and mist
In desolate woods,
At daybreak mounting the perilous way
With the morning moon;
Hastening one's steps at nightfall
To the barking of many dogs,
Pressing on early in the fierce cold
To the sound of crowing cocks.

Shi Jin travelled alone for two weeks, eating only when hungry, drinking only when thirsty, stopping at nightfall and off again at daybreak, until he reached Weizhou.
"This is a frontier-zone," he said to himself. "Why shouldn't the master, Instructor Wang, be here?"
He entered the town. He noted that it contained, like any proper town, six streets and three markets. Right on the corner of one of the streets, he saw a tiny teahouse. He went in, found a place and sat down.
"How would you like your tea?" the owner asked.
"An infusion," Shi Jin replied.
The owner made the tea and placed it before him.
"Where is the local frontier garrison?" Shi Jin asked.
"Right across the road," the teahouse owner replied.
"Can you tell me if there's an instructor from the Eastern Capital called Wang Jin in the garrison?"
"There are many instructors in the garrison here and three or four of them are called Wang. Whether or not one of them is called Wang Jin I can't say."
Hardly had he finished speaking when a tall, well-built man strode into the teahouse. He had very much the look of an army officer, Shi Jin decided. He wore a sesamum-coloured gauze turban, folded in the shape of a swastika and fastened at the back of the head by two braids with gold rings, in the Taiyuan fashion; his parrot-green surcoat was bound at the waist by a double cord, civil and military, the colour of a crow's wing; high leather boots with double stitching, made from the leather known as "eagle's wings," completed this outfit. His face was round and heavy, with big ears, a straight nose, and square jaw, the cheeks adorned with side-whiskers. He was well over six feet tall and broad to match!
Such was the personage who entered the teahouse and seated himself.
The teahouse owner said to Shi Jin: "If you want to find Instructor Wang, the Commandant there is the man to ask, he knows everyone."
Shi Jin quickly rose to his feet and bowed: "Will you do me the favour sir, of joining me for some tea?"
The newcomer, observing that Shi Jin was of strong build and manly aspect, came over and returned a courteous greeting. They both sat down.
"May I venture, sir, to ask your name?" Shi Jin said.
The other replied, somewhat affectedly, "I am the commandant of the garrison here, Lu is the name, Lu Da. And who might you be?"
Shi Jin replied, "I am from Huayin district, in Huazhou county, my name is Shi, Shi Jin. Please excuse me if I ask you a question. I was tutored in the military arts by an instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards in the Eastern Capital, whose name is Wang Jin. I am wondering if he might be here in this garrison?"
"I say, are you by any chance the gentleman from Shi village known as 'The Tattooed Dragon' or something of the sort?"
Shi Jin bowed and said: "At your service."
"Face and name are not the same, reality surpasses fame," Major Lu said, bowing courteously. "You say you're looking for Instructor Wang. Would that be the Wang who got on the wrong side of Grand Marshal Gao in the Eastern Capital?"
Shi Jin replied, "The very same."
"One has heard the name, certainly. But the gentleman's not here with us. He's said to be in the service of His Excellency Field-Marshal Zhong at the Yanan fort. Here at Weizhou we are under the command of Field-Marshal Zhong the Younger, the man you want is not here. But since you're Squire Shi, about whom one has heard so many good things, you must come out and drink a cup or two with me."
Major Lu took Shi Jin by the arm, and as they left the teahouse together he turned and shouted, "Put the tea down to my account!"
The owner replied, "It's nothing, sir, think no more of it."
Arm in arm the two men left the teahouse. About forty paces along the road they found a crowd of idlers standing in a circle round an empty space.
"Let's have a look, Elder Brother," Shi Jin said.
Forcing a passage through the crowd, they found in the midst of it a man wielding ten sticks. A dozen or so salves and patent medicines were displayed on the ground beside him, spread out on a tray and labelled for sale. The man was obviously one of the "rivers and lakes" fraternity, a boatman and pedlar of patent medicines. Shi Jin knew him at once; it was his earliest instructor in the martial arts, Li Zhong, also known as "The Tiger-Killer."
"Master!" Shi Jin shouted through the hubbub. "It's a long time since we last met!"
"What brings you here, my disciple?" Li Zhong replied.
"If you're Squire Shi's teacher," Major Lu interrupted, "you'd better join us for a cup or two."
"I shall be happy to, if you'll wait till your humble servant has sold a few potions and collected some money," Li Zhong said.
"Who wants to wait for you," Major Lu said. "If you're coming, come now."
"I've got to make my living," Li Zhong objected. "The Commandant can go first, I'll follow later." He said to Shi Jin, "You go now with the Commandant." But Lu Da was incensed. He kept pushing and shoving the onlookers, cursing them all the time: "What are you gaping at, you bunch of morons? Fart off or you'll get a taste of my fists!"
The crowd knew Lu Da and they dispersed at once.
Li Zhong, seeing the violence of Lu Da's behaviour, stifled the indignation it naturally aroused in him, and said with a forced laugh, "Such impetuosity!" Then he bent and gathered up his effects, his salves and potions, and put away his sticks, and the three of them went off together. After several twists and turns, they came to a famous establishment known as Pan's, next to the bridge by the town hall; it was advertised by a pole before the door bearing a banner which fluttered in the breeze and had the look of a really good wineshop, like in the poem:

Seen through the mist the inn flag flutters,
The peace of morning fills the air;
Here is a boost for the strong man's courage,
Here is relief for the woman's care.
Beyond where the willow trails its branches,
Beside an apricot the flag-pole slants.
When ambition fails, what signal pleasure
To enter this realm of the tipsy trance!

Entering Pan's wineshop the three men went upstairs and found a clean alcove where they sat down, Major Lu in the place of honour, Li Zhong opposite him, and Shi Jin in the last place.
The proprietor came to greet them respectfully. He recognized Lu Da: "How much wine should I serve you, Commandant?"

"Four pints to begin with. And you can give us some small dishes to go with it."
"What about main dishes?"
"Why so many questions?" Lu Da exclaimed. "Just bring everything you've got, we'll pay for it all in one go. This bugger won't give us any peace, damn it!"
The innkeeper went down to warm the wine. He returned to serve them, bringing also all the food he had that he spread on the table. The three emptied quite a few cups, talking amicably of this and that, and discussing swordsmanship. They were getting along famously, when suddenly the sound of bitter sobbing arose from the adjoining room. This so enraged Lu Da that he swept all the dishes and plates onto the floor. Hearing the noise, the landlord rushed in to see what was going on. When he saw Lu Da fretting and fuming, he raised his joined hands in supplication: "Is there something you wish for, sir? Please, just say the word and it shall be provided."
"You ask if I want something?" Lu Da bellowed. "You know who I am, don't you? Yet you have the cheek to tell some one to snivel and moan in the next room, just to ruin our mood while we're drinking! Are you trying to tell me I haven't paid you properly for the wine on other occasions?"
"I beg you to moderate your anger, sir," the innkeeper said. "I wouldn't dream of encouraging anyone to disturb you while you are drinking. That weeping is two cabaret singers, a father and daughter. They had no idea the Commandant was drinking here, they are crying because of their own misfortunes."
"Sounds a rum tale," Lu Da said. "Call 'em in so I can see them."
The innkeeper did as bidden, and in a moment the two entered: first a young woman of eighteen or nineteen, and after her a fifty- or sixty-year-old man. They presented themselves to Lu Da. Both carried bamboo clappers in their hands. The young woman was not an outright beauty, yet there was that in her looks which could move the observer. Picture her:
In the loose coils of her hair a fine jade pin reposed; she was slender and elegant, and she wore a red silk skirt. A plain old-fashioned blouse encased her snow-white breast, and soft stockings of pale yellow lined her tiny shoes. Tight-knitted were the moth-pale brows, the eyes brimming with crystal tears and the head lowered — sweet beauty fragile as jade snow. Grief did not flood over her, she held it in bitter store.
The young woman wiped away her tears and came forward to wish them ten thousand happinesses.
"Where are you from?" Lu Da asked. "And why all these tears?"
The girl replied: "You do not know our story, sir; pardon me then if I recount it. My family is from the Eastern Capital. I came here to Weizhou with my father and mother seeking a home with some relatives, unaware that they had moved to Nanjing. My mother fell sick at the inn and died. We two remained here all alone. I had the misfortune to attract the notice of a rich man of the district, Mr. Zheng, whom they also call 'Master of Guanxi'; he arranged a forced marriage and made me his concubine. Who could have known that, after signing a contract for three thousand strings of cash, he would insist on our side of the bargain and not keep his? For he still demanded my person! And then, before three months were out, his first wife, in a fury, beat me and threw me out of the house, saying she couldn't stand me. She also charged our landlord with recovering the three thousand strings of cash mentioned in the contract. My father is weak and helpless, he had no way to fight that man, rich and powerful as he is. From the very beginning we had not had a penny from him, now where would we get this money to give him? There was only one way: from my infancy, Father had taught me a few simple airs. We would have to come here to this inn and go round the tables. Thus we can earn a pittance but the greater part of what we get each day goes to Mr. Zheng, leaving the two of us next to nothing to live on. And for the last few days there have been so few customers we cannot meet the payment, and I fear he intends to heap further shame upon us. Dwelling on the wretchedness of our condition, with no one in the world to turn to, we began to weep. We didn't dream we might be disturbing Your Worship. We beg you to forgive us and withhold the hand of punishment."
"What's your name and where do you lodge?" Lu Da asked. "And where does he live, this Mr. Zheng, so-called Master of Guanxi?"
The old man answered: "Jin is my name, Your Honour, and I am the second in my family. My daughter's name is Lotus. Mr. Zheng is the butcher who has a shop near the Academy Bridge. 'Master of Guanxi' is just a nickname. My daughter and I lodge at Lu's Hostel, opposite the East Gate."
"Ha!" snorted Lu Da, on hearing this. "I was wondering who this Master of Guanxi could be, and it turns out he's nothing but Butcher Zheng, killer of pigs, a stinking tradesman who set up his shop through the graces of Field-Marshal Zhong the Younger. And now he thinks he can bully people in this fashion!"
Turning to Li Zhong and Shi Jin, he said: "You two wait here. I'll just go and deal with the bastard, and then I'll be back."
But Li Zhong and Shi Jin held him and said, "Elder Brother, calm down first. Tomorrow will do to settle the matter." They exhorted him thus repeatedly.
Lu Da said to Jin, "Come here, old fellow. Suppose one were to give you your travelling expenses, so tomorrow you can return to the Eastern Capital, how about that?"
Father and daughter both exclaimed, "To go back home! It would be like a new life, a rebirth! But how will the landlord ever let us go? Mr. Zheng has told him he's got to get the money."
Lu Da interrupted: "That's no problem. I'll take care of that." He felt in his pocket and brought out five taels of silver that he placed on the table. Turning to Shi Jin, he said; "I don't happen to have much with me. If you have any silver, lend me some. I'll pay you back tomorrow."
"There's no need, for a trifle like this," Shi Jin said, reaching into his purse and taking out ten taels of silver that he placed on the table.
Looking now at Li Zhong, Lu Da said: "You lend me some too."
Li Zhong fished around and brought out two taels.
Lu Da didn't hide his contempt. "You're not much use, are you," he said. He picked up just the fifteen taels and gave them to the old man, saying, "Take this for your expenses and pack your belongings, I'll come at dawn tomorrow to help you leave. We'll see if that innkeeper dares to detain you."
Jin and his daughter gave profuse thanks, then left.
Lu Da tossed Li Zhong his two taels of silver. The three men had another three pints of wine before leaving. As they went down the stairs, Lu Da shouted: "Landlord, I shall pay you for the wine tomorrow."
The proprietor replied smoothly, "No matter, Commandant. Please drink as much as you like. My only concern is not to lose the Commandant's patronage."
Leaving Pan's, they went out into the street, and there they parted. Shi Jin and Li Zhong returning to their respective hostels. We shall stay with Lu Da, who went to his lodgings near the headquarters of the frontier garrison. He returned to his room without eating any supper and went to bed still consumed with rage. His landlord didn't even dare ask him what was the matter.
Let us see how Jin and his daughter fared.
With the fifteen taels of silver, they first went to their inn. Old Jin settled his daughter there, while he went to a place quite far removed outside the city walls, to order a small cart. Returning thence, he packed his bags, and paid the landlord the rent, including the cost of food and firewood. Then they waited for morning to come. The night passed uneventfully.
Rising early, before dawn, they lit a fire and cooked some food; after eating, they collected their bags. Just as day was breaking, Major Lu strode into the inn, shouting at the top of his voice, "Potboy, where is Old Jin's room?"
"Mr. Jin," the waiter called, "Commandant Lu is here looking for you."
Old Jin opened the door and said, "Please come in, Commandant, and take a seat."
"What's the good of sitting down? You'd better go, if you're going. What are you waiting for?"
Old Jin fetched his daughter, shouldered the bags, thanked the Commandant, and was about to walk out when the waiter stood in his way: "Where are you going, Mr. Jin?"
"Hasn't he paid you for the room?" Lu Da interrupted.
"That was all settled yesterday," the waiter said. "It's just a question of the money owed to Mr. Zheng, for releasing his daughter. I was told I had to watch him because of that."
"Butcher Zheng's money I shall be returning to him myself," Lu Da said. "Let the old man go home."
But the waiter just wouldn't.
Thereupon anger took possession of Lu Da. He planted his separated five fingers in the flunkey's face, dealing him a blow which left him spitting blood. He followed this up with another that knocked out two of his front teeth. The fellow struggled to his feet and fled into the depths of the inn. Don't suppose that after this the landlord was going to stand in the way!
Jin and his daughter left the premises as fast as their feet would carry them, and hurried to the place outside the walls where the cart had been ordered the previous day.
Lu Da considered the situation. He was afraid that the waiter might follow and stop them, so he returned to the inn, found himself a stool, and stayed put for a couple of hours. Not until Jin and his daughter must be far away did he get up and betake himself to the Academy Bridge.
Now Zheng the butcher had just opened the two shutters of his shop. He had set up the two counters, and hung up a number of pieces of pork. He was at present seated behind the counter, watching ten or so assistants chopping and selling meat. Lu Da walked right up to the counter and bawled, "Butcher Zheng!" When Zheng saw it was Major Lu, he bustled out from behind the counter, bowed and said, "My excuses, Commandant!" He ordered his assistants to bring a stool at once, and said, "Please take a seat, Commandant!"
Lu Da sat down and said: "Orders of the Marshal, we require ten pounds of lean meat, chopped up fine, and I don't want to see an ounce of fat in it."
"Very good, sir," said the butcher. "Find a good piece," he told his assistants, "and cut up ten pounds."
"I don't want that lot to put their dirty hands on it," Lu Da said. "Cut it yourself."
"Anything you say," said the butcher. "I'll cut it myself, of course." He went to the meat counter, took down ten pounds of lean, and carefully minced it.
At this moment the waiter from the inn appeared, with his head wrapped in a towel. He had come to tell Zheng the business about Old Jin but when he saw Lu Da sitting beside the counter he dared not approach. He waited some way off under a porch and watched. The butcher spent a whole hour cutting up the meat. He wrapped it in lotus leaves and asked, "Shall I have it sent, Commandant?"
"What are you talking about? You haven't finished yet. I need another ten pounds of fat only, there mustn't be a speck of lean in it; also cut it up fine."
"I suppose they want the lean to make dumplings. But what's the point of mincing the fat?"
Lu Da glared at him and said: "The Marshal's orders, delivered to me personally, who dares to question them?"
"If it's really wanted, then of course I will do it," the butcher said. He selected ten pounds of clear fat, carefully cut it up, and wrapped it in lotus leaves. It had taken him the whole morning, and now it was already lunch-time. The waiter from the inn still didn't dare approach of course, and even ordinary customers wouldn't venture into the shop.
"Now, sir," said the butcher, "shall I have someone deliver it for you to the Garrison headquarters?"
"I still want ten pounds of gristle, also cut up fine and without a trace of meat in it," Lu Da said.
The butcher started to laugh. "I believe this is some kind of joke you're playing on me," he said. At this point, Lu Da jumped to his feet, picked up the two packets of finely chopped meat, and glaring at the butcher with bulging eyes, said: "Some kind of joke, exactly!" And with that he hurled the two packets of meat in the butcher's face. There was a veritable rain of meat.
Zheng, the butcher, swelled with a great rage, the choler seemed to mount from the soles of his feet to the top of his head. This fury swept irresistibly through him like a forest fire. Seizing the sharp boning knife on the meat counter, he gathered himself and sprang at Lu Da. But the latter, with a single bound, was already in the street. None of the neighbours or the dozen or so shop assistants dared to intervene. Passers-by became rooted to the spot, and the waiter from the inn also watched, in fear and trembling.
With the knife in his right hand, Zheng tried to grapple Lu Da with the left. But Lu Da was able to block Zheng's left hand, and moved in to deliver a single kick to the solar plexus which sent Zheng crashing to the ground. He followed up, planting a foot on Zheng's chest and again raising that fist with the dimensions of a vinegar barrel. Looking Zheng in the eye, he said, "When I came here to serve under old General Zhong, I was made frontier commander of the five circuits of Guanxi, so it's not unreasonable to call me 'Master of Guanxi.' You're just a butcher, a hacker of pig's flesh, no better than a dog, and you call yourself 'Master of Guanxi'! Why did you force Jin's daughter, Lotus?" He struck him another blow, right on the nose, so that the blood came flooding out and the nose was knocked sideways. For the butcher it was as if he'd opened a sauce and vinegar shop: salty, sour and hot all mixed up together! The butcher could not go on. "You win," he groaned, letting the knife drop to one side.
"You dare answer back, you whoremonger?" Lu Da yelled, raising his fist again and crashing it down on the corner of the butcher's eye. This one blow was enough to burst the eyeball and scatter the pupil. It was as if the butcher had opened a brocade shop, scarlet and black and crimson stuff all spilling out! The spectators were terrified of Lu Da, who dared to interfere? The butcher's only idea was to cry for mercy.
Lu Da snorted in disgust. "What a broken, beggarly thing you are! If you'd fought to the end I'd have spared you but if you cry for mercy like that I won't." Another blow fell on the butcher's temple. It was as if the butcher was enjoying a full Taoist ritual for the dead: gongs and bells and cymbals all sounded together in his ears!
Lu Da examined the butcher. He lay there on the ground, the breath but none going in. He didn't stir. Lu Da made as if to strike him again. "Don't pretend you're dead, you animal, or I'll give you another!" But the butcher's colour was gradually changing.
"I only wanted to give the blighter a good drubbing, I didn't think three blows would kill him. I'm going to have to answer for this; they'll put me away where there's no one to serve me meals. I'd best get out of here right away."
He got moving at once but before leaving he turned to shout at the corpse, "If you're shamming, I'll be back to deal with you properly!"
Cursing to himself, he strode off. Which of the neighbours or the butcher's assistants dared stand in the way? He returned home hastily, made a bundle of some clothes, light valuables and silver, abandoning everything else, picked up a staff of eyebrow height, and left town by the South Gate without delay.
Meanwhile Zheng's family and friends, after trying in vain to revive him for half the day, were raising an outcry. With all the neighbours, old and young, they hurried to Government House to bring charges. The Civil Governor went into session and heard their complaint. After considering it, he said: "Lu Da is garrison Commandant, it is not within my authority to lay hands on the murderer." He then got into his sedan chair and went straight to garrison headquarters, where he stated his business to the duty officer. When the General heard that the Governor wanted to see him, he invited him in and after the usual exchange of greetings, asked why he had come.
"I have something important to tell Your Excellency," the Governor reported. "Your garrison commandant, Lu Da, in an unprovoked assault, has killed Zheng, the butcher down in the market. Without Your Excellency's consent, it is not within my authority to apprehend the murderer."
This news startled the General. "Lu Da is a brave soldier," he thought to himself, "but he's a rough diamond. Now he's responsible for a death. How can I hush this up? He'll have to be questioned."
To the Governor, he said: "This Lu Da was on the establishment of my father, the Old Field-Marshal. Because I was short of personnel here, he was transferred as commandant. Since he has committed a murder, you can detain him and question him according to the law. But if you get a full confession and sentence is passed, we'd better inform my father before carrying it out, because Lu Da might be wanted some time in my father's frontier command, and then it would look bad."
"Then I will ascertain all the circumstances," the Governor said, "and submit a full report to the Old Field-Marshal. Having done which, I will proceed according to his instructions."
The Governor took leave of the General, and returning by sedan chair to Government House went straight to his office, where he summoned the bailiffs and delivered to them a signed order for the apprehension of the criminal, Lu Da.
Superintendent Wang, carrying the warrant, took an escort of twenty men to Lu Da's place of abode. Here they found only the landlord, who told them, "The gentleman returned just now and collected a bundle of things and his short staff and left. I thought he must be going on a mission, so I didn't dare ask anything."
Superintendent Wang ordered the door of Lu Da's room to be broken down. All they found inside was some old clothes and bedding. Taking the landlord with him, Wang searched east and west. North and south of the government offices he looked but found no trace of the fugitive. Ordering two neighbours and the landlord to accompany him, he returned to the office to report.
"Major Lu has fled, to escape punishment. Being unable to ascertain his whereabouts, I have brought his landlord in and some neighbours."
The Governor ordered them to be locked up at once. He also had all Zheng's family, neighbours and assistants detained, appointed coroners, told the local police and ward chiefs to keep a lookout in the district, and ordered a third inquest. Meanwhile Zheng's family sent the coffin to the temple. A dossier was compiled and a time limit set after which failure to capture the murderer would incur penalties. The plaintiffs were released on bail; the neighbours and assistants received no more than a beating for failing to come to the victim's assistance; the landlord and his neighbours got a reprimand. Since Lu Da was on the run, a general proclamation was sent to every quarter announcing a reward of one thousand strings of cash for his capture, and details of his age, his appearance and his ancestry were posted everywhere. Everyone else was released provisionally.
Zheng's family started their mourning ceremony, and we shall leave them to it, in order to take up Lu Da's story again. After fleeing from Weizhou he wandered all over the place, in fear and trepidation:

Separated from the flock, the lone goose
Glides through the sky by the light of the moon;
The fish escaped from the net
Leaps and tumbles through the waves.
He goes without seeing, no eyes for the road,
Full of his thoughts, shouldering others aside;
On restless feet, unquiet as a horse before battle.

Thus Lu Da traversed several regions and districts, "When you run for your life the road's your lot, wherever you land that's your home," or — how does the old jingle go?

Famine doesn't chose its food,
Cold weather doesn't care about fashion,
Panic doesn't pick a road,
Penury has no time for passion.

He wandered aimlessly like this for more than half a month, until he came to the district of Daizhou.
When he entered the town, he found it was a bustling sort of place, crowded with people and with carriages rushing two abreast. The hundred and twenty different livelihoods and trades were all represented, all kinds of materials and goods were available, and the whole was so well laid out that this small provincial town was by no means inferior to a district capital.
As Lu Da proceeded on his way, he happened to observe a knot of people gathered at a crossroads examining a wall-poster. Here's how it was:
They stand shoulder to shoulder, and press on each other's backs. Heads clash as they crane their necks to see. Wisdom and Folly here are mingled, the good man mixing with the base. Third Brother Zhang, the fat oaf, stands and nods — he can't read. Fourth Brother Li's a midget, all he can do is shuffle his feet. Old Greybeard there leans his chin upon his stick; the young swot copies down sentences. The document's indited in classic style, each word redolent of the law.

Observing this crowd at the crossroads, Lu Da wormed his way into the middle of it to find out what was going on. He couldn't read the notice but he heard what people were reading out: "Yanmen Government Office, in the district of Daizhou, on the authority of the military commissariat at Taiyuan, and in accordance with a warrant issued in Weizhou, orders the arrest of Lu Da, formerly commandant of the garrison of the above post, for the murder of Zheng the butcher. Anyone sheltering him in their house, giving him a bed, and board will be accounted an accomplice and merit the same punishment. Whoever captures him or offers information leading to his arrest will receive in reward a thousand strings of cash."

Lu Da had heard thus far, when a voice right behind him said: "Elder Brother Zhang! What are you doing here?" and at the same time he was grasped round the waist and dragged away from the crossroads. Now if someone had not seen him and dragged him away like this, how would it ever have come about that Lu Da shaved his head, removed his beard and moustache, and changed his name? How would a murderer such as he have become the terror of the Buddhas and the Lohans? How would he have wielded the staff of Zen to clear a dangerous road, or used a monk's sword to rid the world of troublemakers?

The bandit chiefs knelt down, saying. "Elder brother, you're guiltless and we do not wish to involve you. You can take a rope and bind us, and ask for the reward."

"That will not do," said Shi Jin. "I invited you to come here, and if I seize you for the reward everybody will jeer at me. If this is your time for death, I will die with you; if to live, then I will live with you. Please get up, be at your ease, and let us think of another plan. Wait until I have asked the soldiers why they come here."

Shi Jin climbed the ladder and called out "Why do you men come here in the third watch of the night?" The inspector replied, "Sir, you need not say that you are not guilty as we have the accuser Li Ji here." Shi Jin shouted, "Li Ji! Why do you falsely accuse an innocent person?"

"I really do not know," replied Li Ji. "In a forest I got a letter from Wang the Fourth, and the same day I read it before the yamen, and this is the result."

Shi Jin addressed Wang the Fourth, "You said there was no reply, so how is this?" "I forgot the letter because I was drunk," answered Wang the Fourth. Shi Jin shouted, "You brute."

The inspector outside was afraid of Shi Jin, and dared not enter the farm to arrest the men. The three bandit chiefs pointed their fingers and said to Shi Jin. "Speak only to those outside." Shi Jin understood and said, "You two constables need not use force. I will give them over and you can escort them to the yamen where you can ask for the reward." The two constables replied, "We have no business here. We are waiting for you to come out, and go with us to get the reward." Shi Jin descended the ladder, and catching Wang the Fourth took him into the garden and killed him with a sword. He then ordered the servants to pack up all the valuables, and light about forty torches: he and the three bandit chiefs armed themselves—one sword in the hand and a smaller one in their waist. They set fire to the huts at the back of the farmstead and the soldiers immediately rushed there. Shi Jin set fire to the building in the centre of the enclosure. He opened the gates and called to his men to kill any one they met. He was in the front, Zhu Wu and Yang Chun were in the middle, and Chen Da was at the rear. They went out, killing men on both sides. Shi Jin was like a tiger, and nobody could stop him. They hacked their way through the cordon of soldiers. Afterwards they came across the two constables and Li Ji. When enemies meet they recognize each other clearly. The inspector seeing that Shi Jin was angry ran away. Li Ji also turned to ran but Shi Jin caught him, and with a slash, he cut him in half with his sword. The bandit chiefs pursued the constables and dispatched them. The troops scattered in every direction. Shi Jin led his men straight to Mount Shaohua where there was a feast to celebrate the occasion.

After staying a few days Shi Jin considered the position. He had saved the lives of three men, and some valuables; but his homestead and his property had all been destroyed. Evidently, he could not stay there, so he told the bandit chiefs that he wished to go to find his old drill instructor Wang Jin. The bandits urged him to stay and promised to erect new buildings for him but Shi Jin would not agree to this. Then Zhu Wu said they would make him their chief and quite happy.

"I am an innocent man—so how could I defile this body bequeathed to me by my parents? You need not persuade me to become a bandit."

After a few days Shi Jin still wanted to go but the bandit chiefs were equally determined to keep him. Nothing could stop Shi Jin, and he prepared to depart. He put on a broad brimmed hat with a big red tassel, under it a black cloth with the corners hanging down—and a bright yellow ribbon outside: he also wore a military overcoat arranged on two sides: around his waist was a girdle of plaited bands of red plum colour: black and white puttees wound tightly round his legs; his shoes were made of hemp specially suitable for hilly roads. He carried a "swan feather" sword with a round copper knob on the shaft, and a bundle on his back. He took leave of the three bandit chiefs, and descended the mountain accompanied by a large number of the bandits. The bandit chiefs shed tears when he left them. Shi Jin took the direct road to Yanan Prefecture; he took his meals when convenient and travelled during the day and slept at night. Traveling alone, he reached Weizhou in a little over a fortnight. He thought that as this place was a military station he would inquire about his teacher, Drill Instructor Wang Jin. Upon entering the town, he saw there were many roads and much business. He found a tea shop on the roadside where he stopped and ordered tea. He asked the waiter where the military yamen was. While they were talking, a big man came in with big strides. This man wore military dress; on his head was a piece of silk with a character Wan, and attached at the back were two golden rings inscribed, "Taiyuan Prefecture."[52] He wore a large military coat of parrot green colour with a military belt in black. His boots were made of yellow leather with four seams. He had a round face, big ears, a prominent nose, a big mouth and a bushy beard. He was quite eight feet high and a girth of fifty inches. As he sat down, the waiter said that Shi Jin might ask this officer about the drill instructor. Shi Jin stood up and said, "Will you please drink tea with me?" The man also saluted; and when they both sat down Shi Jin asked for his name.

"I am Major Lu Da. May I ask your name?" "I am from Huayin County, and my name is Shi Jin. I wish to ask whether you know a Drill Instructor called Wang Jin." Lu Da said, "Brother, are you not the 'tattooed dragons' Shi Jin of the Shi village?" Shi Jin admitted this, and the officer again saluted and said he had heard of him but to meet him was much better than hearing. He then said that Drill Instructor Wang Jin held office under Old Zhong, the frontier General at Yanan Prefecture. As he was the Shi Jin of whom he had heard so much he invited him to have a drink with him. The two men left the tea-house hand in hand, and after turning several corners they went into a well-known wine shop of the Pan family. Finding a cozy room upstairs they sat down; Major Lu Da ordered four pots of wine with dishes of eatables and fruit; and they chatted about the various forms of using the lance. While they were talking, they heard someone sobbing and crying in an adjoining room. This disturbed Major Lu Da, who took a cup and saucer and threw them on the floor. The waiter heard the noise and saw that the Major was angry. The Major inquired who it was that was crying and disturbing them. The waiter said, "There is a singsong girl with her father, and they are crying because there is no guest to engage them, and they do not know you are here." "But why do they make this noise?" said the Major, "Tell them to come here." The waiter left, and in a short time a woman entered, of about nineteen years of age, and behind her there was an old man of sixty years with castanets in his hand. The woman was not beautiful yet there was something attractive about her. Wiping away her tears she came forward, and gave a woman's salutation (one hand placed on top of the other). The major asked why they cried, and she replied, "I am from Kaifeng, and I came to this place with my parents to find some relatives; but upon arrival we found they had removed to Nanjing. My mother was taken ill in an inn and died. My father and myself stayed here in distress. There is a wealthy man here nicknamed "The Bully of the Western Pass." When he saw me he sent a matchmaker to demand me to be his concubine. A bond was drawn up that he would give me three thousand strings of cash for my body that I accepted as I thought he would keep his word. In less than three months his legal wife treated me very badly and turned me out of doors. Besides, they demanded me to return the three thousand strings of cash which I had never received but which they said I had received when I pawned my body. My father was timid and dared not dispute with the Bully, who was so influential. But as he has not paid me a single cash how can we return him the money? Now as when I was a small girl my father taught me to use the castanets, so we came to this wine shop to entertain the customers. Everyday the money we got was paid more than half to the Bully and we had only a little for ourselves. For the last two days there were very few guests and we have passed the time limit he allowed us. When we thought of our trouble, we were distressed. We had no thought of intruding upon your attention and hope you will overlook our offence."

Major Lu Da asked for their names and where this Bully lived. The old man replied, "My name is Jin, and the baby name of my daughter is 'Cuilian.' The Bully keeps a butcher's shop near the Zhuangyuan Bridge. We two live at the Lu Family Inn near the East Gate."

Upon hearing this Major Lu Da expressed his disgust, "Bah! I know that fellow, he was previously a butcher and is a filthy rascal. Sometime ago he asked my help in getting the garrison commander here to permit him to open his shop and this is how he cheats people—I will go and kill him." Shi Jin exhorted him repeatedly to wait till the morrow. But there was no alteration.

Major Lu Da said, "Old man, come here! If we give you your traveling expenses, will you return to Kaifeng tomorrow?"

The father and daughter replied, "If we could return to our native village, we should look upon you as our parent for this new life. But will the proprietor of our inn let us go? If we go, the Bully will certainly demand the money from the inn proprietor." Major Lu Da said that was not important as he had a plan. He took five taels of silver from his pocket and put them on the table and then asked Shi Jin if he could lend him some money till the following day. Shi Jin did not want repayment and placed an ingot of ten taels of silver on the table. Major Lu Da gave this money to the old man Jin and told him to make his arrangements at the inn, and he would come early the following morning to send them off. They gave their thanks and departed. Old Jin went outside the town and hired a cart for the following day; they paid the inn for the lodging; they packed their baggage, and waited for daybreak. About four o'clock he lit a fire and cooked some food for breakfast. Shortly after daybreak Major Lu Da arrived and told them to go quickly. As they moved toward the door the waiter stopped them and explained to the Major that the money for the pawning of the body was still unpaid, and the Bully had ordered him to watch them. Major Lu Da said that he himself would pay that to the butcher: but as the waiter was unwilling to let them go, the Major slapped his face so that blood flowed from his mouth: he knocked his two teeth out with his fist. The waiter rushed out of the inn, and the old man Jin with his daughter quickly left. Major Lu Da thought the waiter might intercept them, so he sat down on a stool and waited there for two hours. When he thought Jin had gone some distance he got up and walked to the Zhuangyuan Bridge.

The butcher had a double frontage shop, two butchers' blocks, and about five sides of pork hanging. The butcher was behind the counter watching his ten assistants selling the meat. When Major Lu Da arrived, he stood outside the door, and called to the butcher, who came and saluted with folded hands. He said, "Excuse me" and then told an assistant to bring a stool for the Major, who sat down, saying, "I have an order from the garrison commander for thirteen jin[53] of lean minced pork; he does not want the least fat in it." The butcher told his assistants to get it ready but the Major objected. "Do not let those dirty men handle the meat. You cut it yourself." "Very well," said the butcher, "I will cut it myself." He then got to the block, selected ten jin of lean pork, and cut it into small pieces. The waiter of the inn just then arrived with a towel wrapped round his head; when he saw Major Lu Da, he dare not come nearer, so he stood under the eaves of a house some distance away. It took the butcher quite half an hour to cut the meat, he then wrapped it in lotus leaves, and asked if he should send it.

"Send what?" asked Major Lu Da. "Wait! I want another thirteen jin and it must all be fat. There must not be any lean flesh with it. It must also be minced."

"But it is now all lean pork," said the butcher; "I am afraid that the commander wants to make pork pies. What use is there for minced fat?" Major Lu Da stared at the butcher, and said, "The commander gave me the order, so who dare ask questions?"

"No matter what purpose it is intended for, I will cut it up." He then selected ten jin of the finest fat pork, minced it, and placed it in a lotus leaf. He had been cutting the pork almost all the morning and it was now near the dinner hour. The butcher said, "Shall I tell someone to go with you to carry this to the magistrate?" Major Lu Da replied, "I also want ten jin of gristle to be chopped fine, there must be no flesh attached to it."

The butcher laughed and said, "It appears as though you had specially come to waste my time."

Major Lu Da upon hearing this, got up and staring at the butcher said, "I certainly came to waste your time." He then picked up the two parcels of pork and threw them into the butcher's face—the minced pork falling like a shower of rain. The butcher was very angry and his passion pervaded his body from his feet to the crown of his head. His heart became a burning mass of passions which could not be extinguished. He seized a sharp pointed knife and jumped out of the shop. Major Lu Da had got into the street before him. There was a crowd of neighbours but nobody dared intervene. The passers-by and the waiter from the inn were frightened out of their wits. The butcher had the knife in his right hand, and with his left he tried to seize Lu Da: but the Major caught his left arm and kicked him in the groin; so that he fell in the street. The Major took a step forward, and placed his foot on the butcher's breast: he raised his fist (which was as large as a monk's alms bowl) and said, "Now you are a butcher, and are like a dog. Why did you swindle the Jin's girl, Cuilian?" He struck a blow on the butcher's nose which was broken and twisted to one side, the blood was gushing forth like the breaking of a sauce bottle. The butcher could not rise and throwing aside his knife said, "Enough."

Major Lu Da abused him, saying, "You thieving bastard! How dare you reply!" Then lifting his fist he struck the butcher in the corner of his eye such a blow that the eyeball fell out with a display of red, black, and purple colours on his cheeks. The butcher asked to be pardoned but Major Lu Da shouted, "You are a bad lot. If you were sincere I would forgive you; but I cannot do so." He thereupon hit him on the temple and it seemed to the butcher as though a whole temple of priests were chanting their prayers, ringing bells, and clapping cymbals. The Major saw that the butcher was exhaling without any intake, so he falsely spoke to him, "You are pretending to die." But he saw that his skin was gradually becoming pale. And he could hardly believe that three blows of his fist could have killed the man. He knew that he would be prosecuted, so he decided to go away. As he left, he saw the butcher was dead. As he went along, he turned round and abused the butcher: but the onlookers dared not interfere. Returning to his lodging the Major packed a few things and silver and taking a cudgel he quickly left the town by the South Gate.

The people tried to revive the body for half a day without success—for alas, he was quite dead. The members of the family went to the yamen and, when the magistrate came, made their accusation. The magistrate thought that as Major Lu Da was a military officer he had better report to the garrison commander; so at once he got in a sedan chair and went to the headquarters. When they met, the magistrate saluted, then he stated that Major Lu Da had killed a man but he dared not arrest him without the General's consent. The General was startled at the news, and after some thought he asked the magistrate to arrest and try him according to the law. As Major Lu Da was still on the staff of the Old General Zhong of the frontier the sentence should be submitted to the latter for confirmation. The magistrate agreed to do this, and upon returning to his yamen he took his seat on the bench, and issued a warrant for the arrest of Major Lu Da. The inspector who received the warrant proceeded to the lodgings of the Major but he found no clue there. Moreover as he did not know where he had gone he arrested the landlord and two of the neighbours. The magistrate sent these men temporarily to the detention house, and ordered the coroner to make a careful postmortem examination of the corpse, then have the body placed in a coffin, and deposited it in the courtyard of a temple awaiting further developments. He then issued a proclamation giving details of the murder, a full description of the major, with a reward of a thousand strings of cash for his arrest. This was printed and posted in public places in every district.

Lu Da travelled hastily without any definite object in view. When hungry, he took any food that was ready; when cold, any clothing available; hurrying, he did not choose road; and being poor he would have taken any woman as his wife. In just more than a fortnight he reached Yanmen County in the Daizhou Prefecture, and entering the town on a market day he found that the streets were crowded and noisy. Horses and carts were passing along side by side. There were all kinds of traders selling and buying goods from all parts. Although it was only a county town yet it was better than many a prefectural capital for business. Arriving at the crossroads he saw a crowd looking at a proclamation. He forced his way through the crowd, and as he could not read he listened to one man who was reading it aloud. It was the proclamation about himself, warning the people not to harbour him, and offering a reward for his arrest. When he had listened to this he heard a voice behind him say, "Elder brother Zhang, what are you doing here?" He was then pulled away from the crossroads. Lu Da had his head shaved, and his moustache cut, changed his name, and destroyed a Buddhist disciple.

His staff cleared the roads from danger,
His sword killed the vicious people.

004

The New Monk, Lu Da Zhishen puts Mount Wutai in an Uproar & sets a Bad Example; Squire Zhao Yuanwai Repairs & Rebuilds Wenshu Monastery Manjusri Temple

Lu Da turned to see who was hustling him away. It was none other than Old Jin from the Weizhou tavern, the man he had rescued. The old fellow didn't stop pulling till they reached an isolated spot. Then he said: "You're too rash, benefactor. That notice offers a thousand strings of cash for your capture. How could you stand there looking at it? If I hadn't spotted you, you might have been nabbed by the police. Your age, description and place of origin are all there."

"To tell you the truth, when I went to the foot of the Zhuangyuan Bridge that day to see Zheng the butcher about your affair, I killed the churl with three blows of the fist and had to flee. I've been knocking about for forty or fifty days now and just happened to wander into this town. I thought you were returning to the Eastern Capital. What are you doing here?"

"After you saved me, benefactor, I found a cart. Originally, I intended to go back to the Eastern Capital but I was afraid that rogue would catch up and you wouldn't be around to rescue us. So I changed my mind and headed north. On the road I met an old neighbour from the capital who was coming here on business. He took me and my daughter along. He was good enough to find her a match. She's now the mistress of a wealthy man, Squire Zhao. The squire has provided her with a house. Thanks to you, benefactor, we now have plenty to eat and wear. My daughter has often spoken to the squire of your kindness. He is also fond of jousting. He's said many times he'd like to meet you but that was never possible before. You must come and stay with us a few days. We can talk about what you should do next."

Lu Da and Old Jin walked less than half a //when they came to the door of a house. The old man pushed aside the bamboo curtain and called: "Daughter, our benefactor is here."

The girl emerged, neatly made up and attractively dressed. She begged Lu Da to be seated in the centre of the room. Then, as if offering votive candles, she kowtowed before him six times. "If you hadn't rescued us, benefactor," she said, "we'd never possess what we have today." She invited him upstairs to the parlour.

"Don't bother," said Lu Da. "I must be going."

"Now that you're here, benefactor, of course we can't let you leave," said the old man. He took Lu Da's staff and bundles and ushered him up the stairs. To his daughter he said: "Keep our benefactor company. I'll arrange about dinner."

"Don't go to a lot of trouble," said Lu Da. "Anything will do."

"Even if I gave my life I could never repay your benevolence," said Old Jin. "A little simple food—it's not worth mentioning."

The daughter sat with Lu Da while the old man went downstairs and directed the boy they had recently hired to tell the servant girl to get the kitchen fire started. Then Old Jin and the boy went out and bought fresh fish, a tender chicken, a goose, pickled fish and fresh fruit. He took these home, opened a jug of wine, prepared a few dishes, and carried them upstairs. There wine cups were placed on a table, and three sets of chopsticks. When the food and fruit were served, the servant girl came in with a silver wine kettle and heated the wine.

Father and daughter each filled Lu Da's cup in turn. Then Old Jin dropped to his knees and kowtowed.

"Please, dear elder, don't do that," said Lu Da. "You embarrass me terribly."

"When we first came here, not long ago," said the old man, "I wrote your name on a strip of red paper and pasted it on a wooden tablet. We burn a stick of incense before it every morning and evening, and my daughter and I kowtow before it. Now that you're here, why shouldn't we kowtow to you in person?"

"I'm touched by your devotion," said Lu Da.

The three drank till almost nightfall. Suddenly they heard a commotion outside. Lu Da opened the window and looked. Some twenty to thirty men, all armed with staves, were gathered in front of the house. "Bring him down," they were shouting. A gentleman on a horse cried: "Don't let the rascal get away!"

Lu Da realized that he was in danger. He snatched up a stool and started down the stairs. Old Jin, waving his hands, rushed down ahead of him, exclaiming: "Nobody move!" He ran over to the man on horseback and said a few words. The mounted gentleman laughed. He ordered his band to disperse.

When the men had gone, the gentleman got off his horse and entered the house. Old Jin asked Lu Da to come down. The gentleman bowed as Lu Da descended the stairs.

" 'Meeting a man of fame is better than just hearing his name.' Please accept my homage, righteous Major."

"Who is this gentleman?" Lu Da asked Old Jin. "We don't know each other. Why should he be so respectful?"

"This is Squire Zhao, my daughter's lord. Someone told him that a young man I had brought to his house was upstairs, drinking. So he got some of his vassals and came to fight. When I explained, he sent them away."

"So that was it," said Lu Da. "You could hardly blame him."

Squire Zhao invited Lu Da to the upper chamber. Old Jin reset the table, and once more prepared food and drink. Zhao ushered the major to the seat of honour. Lu Da refused.

"How could I presume?"

"A small mark of my respect. I have heard much of the major's heroism. What great good fortune that I could meet you today."

"Though I'm just a crude fellow who's committed a capital offence, the squire doesn't scorn my lowliness and is willing to make my acquaintance. If there's any way I can be of service, you have only to speak."

Squire Zhao was very pleased. He asked all about the fight with Zheng the butcher. They talked of this and that, discussed jousting with arms, and drank far into the night. Then every one retired.

The following morning Zhao said: "I'm afraid this place isn't very safe. Why not come and stay at my manor a while?"

"Where is it?" asked Lu Da.

"A little over ten //from here, near a village called Seven Treasures."

"All right."

The squire sent a vassal to the manor to get a horse for Lu Da. The man returned with the beast before noon. Squire Zhao told the vassals to bring Lu Da's luggage and asked the major to mount. Lu Da said goodbye to Old Jin and his daughter, and set out with the squire.

The two rode side by side, chatting idly, until they came to Seven Treasures. Not long after, they reached the manor and dismounted. Squire Zhao led Lu Da by the hand into a hall, where they seated themselves as host and guest. The squire ordered that a sheep be slaughtered and wine be served.

That night, Lu Da slept in a guest-room. The next day he was again wined and dined.

"You're much too good to me, Squire," said the major. "How can I repay you?"

" 'Within the four seas, all men are brothers,' " quoted the squire. "Why mention repayment?"
But enough of minor matters. Lu Da stayed at the manor for six or seven days. He and the squire were chatting in the study one day when Old Jin hastily entered. He looked to see that no one else was around, then said to Lu Da: "You mustn't think me overly cautious, benefactor. But ever since the night the squire and his vassals raised such a row in the street because you were drinking upstairs, people have been suspicious. Word has spread that you were there. Yesterday three or four policemen were questioning the neighbours. I'm worried that they'll come here and arrest you. It would be awful if anything should happen to you, benefactor."
"In that case," said Lu Da, "I'd better be on my way."
"Things might turn out badly if I kept you here, Major," the squire admitted. "Yet if I don't I'll lose a lot of face. I have another idea. It's foolproof and will give you complete protection. But maybe you won't be willing."
"I'm a man with a death penalty waiting for him. I'll do anything to find refuge."
"That's fine. Where the Wenshu Buddha used to meditate on Mount Wutai, some thirty-odd li from here, a monastery was erected. They have nearly seven hundred monks. The abbot is my friend. My ancestors were patrons of the monastery and contributed to its upkeep. I have promised to sponsor a novice, and have bought a blank certificate but have not yet found a suitable man, If you agree to join the Buddhist order, Major, I'll pay all expenses. Would you be willing to shave off your hair and become a monk?"
Lu Da thought to himself. "Who could I go to for protection if I were to leave here today? I'd better accept his offer." Aloud he said: "I'll become a monk if you sponsor me, Squire. I rely entirely on your kindness."
And so it was decided. That night, clothing, expense money and silks were prepared. Everyone rose early the next morning. Lu Da and the squire set out for Mount Wutai, accompanied by vassals carrying the gifts and luggage. They reached the foot of the mountain before mid-morning. Squire Zhao and Lu Da went up in sedan-chairs, sending a vassal on ahead to announce them.
At the monastery gate, they found the deacon and supervisor waiting to welcome them. They got out of their sedan-chairs and rested in a small pavilion while the abbot was notified. He soon emerged with his assistant and the elder. Squire Zhao and Lu Da hurried forward and bowed. The abbot placed the palms of his hands together before his chest in Buddhist greeting.
"It's good of you to travel this long distance, patron," he said.
"There is a small matter I'd like to trouble you about," said the squire.
"Please come into the abbey and have some tea."
Lu Da followed Squire Zhao to the hall. The abbot invited the squire to take the seat for guests. Lu Da sat down on a couch facing the abbot. The squire leaned over and whispered to him: "You're here to become a monk. How can you sit opposite the abbot?"
"I didn't know," said Lu Da. He rose and stood beside Squire Zhao.
The elder, the prior, the abbot's assistant, the supervisor, the deacon, the reception monk, and the scribe arranged themselves in two rows, according to rank, on the east and west sides of the hall.
Zhao's vassals left the sedan-chairs in a suitable place and carried into the hall several boxes which they laid before the abbot.
"Why have you brought gifts again?" asked the abbot. "You've already made so many donations."
"Only a few small things," replied Squire Zhao. "They don't merit any thanks."
Some lay brothers and novices took them away.
Squire Zhao stood up. "I have something to ask of you, Great Abbot. It has long been my desire to sponsor a new member for this monastery. Although I have had the certificate ready for some time, until today I have not been able to do so. This cousin here is named Lu. He formerly was a military officer but because of many difficulties he wants to have done with mundane affairs and become a monk. I earnestly hope Your Eminence will exercise mercy and compassion and, as a favour to me, accept this man into your order. I will pay all expenses. I shall be very happy if you consent."
"Gladly," said the abbot. "This will add lustre to our monastery. Please have some tea."
A novice served tea. After all had drunk, he removed the cups. The abbot consulted with the elder and the prior on the ceremony for receiving Lu Da into the order, then instructed the supervisor and deacon to prepare a vegetarian meal.
"That man hasn't the makings of a monk," the elder said to the other monks, privately. "See what fierce eyes he has!"
"Get them out of here a while," they requested the Receiver of Guests. "We want to talk to the abbot."
The reception monk invited Squire Zhao and Lu Da to rest in the visitors' hostel. They departed, and the elder and the others approached the abbot.
"That new applicant is a savage-looking brute," they said. "If we accept him, he's sure to cause trouble."
"He's cousin of Squire Zhao, our patron. How can we refuse? Hold your doubts while I look into the matter." The abbot lit a stick of incense and sat cross-legged on a couch. Muttering an incantation, he went into a trance. By the time the incense was consumed, he returned.
"You can go ahead with the ordination," said the abbot. "This man represents a star in Heaven. His heart is honest. Even though his appearance is savage and his life has been troubled, he will eventually become purified and attain sainthood. None of you is his equal. Mark my words. Let no one dissent."
"The abbot is only covering up his faults," the elder said to the others. "But we'll have to do as he says. We can only advise. If he won't listen, that's up to him."
Squire Zhao and the others were invited to dine in the abbey. When they had finished, the supervisor presented a list of what Lu Da would need as a monk—special shoes, clothing, hat, cape and kneeling cushion. The squire gave some silver and asked that the monastery buy the necessary materials and make them up.
A day or two later all was ready. The abbot selected a propitious day and hour, and ordered that the bells be rung and the drums beaten. Everyone assembled in the preaching hall. Draped in their capes, nearly six hundred monks placed the palms of their hands together in an obeisance to the abbot sitting on his dais, then separated into two groups. Squire Zhao, bearing gifts of silver ingots and fine cloth and carrying a stick of incense, approached the dais and bowed.
The purpose of the ceremony was announced. A novice led Lu Da to the abbot's dais. The prior told him to remove his hat, divided his hair into nine parts and knotted them. The barber shaved them all off. He reached with his razor for Lu Da's beard.
"Leave me that, at least," the major exclaimed.
The monks couldn't repress their laughter.
"Hear me," the abbot said sternly from his dais. "Leave not a single blade of grass, let the six roots of desire be torn out. All must be shaven clean away, lest they manifest themselves again," he intoned. "Shave it all off!" he exclaimed loudly.
The barber quickly finished the job. Presenting the certificate to the abbot, the elder requested him to select a name by which Lu Da should be known in the Buddhist order.
"A spark from the soul is worth more than a thousand pieces of gold," the abbot chanted. "Our Buddhist Way is great and wide. Let him be called Zhishen—Sagacious."
The scribe filled out the certificate and handed it to Lu Zhishen. At the abbot's direction he was given his monk's garments and told to put them on. Then he was led to the dais. The abbot placed his hand on Lu's head and instructed him in the rules of conduct.
"Take refuge in Buddha, the Law and the Monastic Order. These are the three refuges. Do not kill, steal, fornicate, drink or lie. These are the five precepts."
Lu Da didn't know he was supposed to answer "I shall" to each of the first three and "I shall not" to each of the last five.
"I'll remember," he said.
Everyone laughed.
Squire Zhao invited all present into the assembly hall where he burned incense and offered a vegetarian feast to the Buddhist gods. He gave gifts to every member of the monastery staff, high or low. The deacon introduced Zhishen to various members of the monastery, then conducted him to the rear building where the monks meditated. Nothing further happened that night.
The next day, Squire Zhao decided to leave. He said goodbye to the abbot, who tried in vain to keep him. After breakfast, all the monks went with him as far as the monastery gate. Squire Zhao placed his palms together and said, "Abbot, teachers, be compassionate. My young cousin Lu is a crude, direct fellow. If he forgets his manners or says anything offensive or breaks any rules, please forgive him, as a favour to me."
"Don't worry, Squire," said the abbot. "I shall teach him gradually to recite the prayers and scriptures, perform services, and practise meditation."
"In the days to come I will show my gratitude," promised the squire. He called Lu over to a pine tree and spoke to him in a low voice: "Your life must be different from now on, brother. Be restrained in all things, under no circumstances be proud. Otherwise, it will be hard for us to see each other again. Take good care of yourself. I'll send you warm clothing from time to time."
"No need to tell me, brother," said Lu. "I'll behave."
The squire took his leave of the abbot and the monks, got into his sedan-chair and set off down the mountain for home. His vassals followed, carrying the other, now empty, sedan-chair and boxes. The abbot and the monks returned to the monastery.
When Lu got back to the meditation room, he threw himself down on his bed and went to sleep. The monks meditating on either side shook him into wakefulness.
"You can't do that," they said. "Now that you're a monk, you're supposed to learn how to sit and meditate."
"If I want to sleep, what's it to you?" Lu demanded.
"Evil!" exclaimed the monks.
"What's this talk about eels? It's turtles I like to eat."
"Oh, bitter!"
"There's nothing bitter about them Turtle belly is fat and sweet. They make very good eating."
The monks gave up. They let him sleep.
The next day they wanted to complain to the abbot. But the elder advised against it. He said: "The abbot is only covering up his faults when he says he will attain sainthood and that none of us is his equal. But there's nothing we can do about it. Just don't bother with him."
The monks went back. Since no one reprimanded him, Zhishen sprawled out on his bed every night and slept snoring thunderously. When he had to relieve himself he made a terrible racket getting up. He pissed and crapped behind one of the halls. His filth was all over the place.
The abbot's assistant reported the matter. "That Lu has no manners. He's not in the least like a man who's left the material world. How can we keep a fellow like that in the monastery?"
"Nonsense," retorted the abbot. "Don't forget our donor's request. Zhishen will change later on."
No one dared argue.
And so, Lu Zhishen remained in the monastery on Mount Wutai. Before he knew it, four or five months had passed. It was early winter and Lu's mind that had been quiescent for a long time, began to stir. One clear day he put on his black cloth cassock, fastened his raven-dark girdle, changed into monk's shoes, and strode from the monastery.
Halfway down the mountain he halted to rest in a pavilion. He sat down on a low "goose neck" bench and said to himself with a curse: "In the old days I had good meat and drink everyday. But now that I'm a monk I'm shrivelling up from starvation. Squire Zhao hasn't sent me anything to eat for a long time. My mouth is absolutely tasteless. If only I could get some wine."
He saw in the distance a man carrying two covered buckets on a shoulder-pole. A ladle in his hand, the man trudged up the slope reciting this poem:

Before Mount 9 Li an old battlefield lies,
There cowherds find ancient spears and knives,
As a breeze stirs the waters of the Wu River broad,
We recall Lady Yu's farewell to her lord.

Lu watched him approach. The man entered the pavilion and put down his load. "Hey, fellow, what have you got in those buckets?" Lu asked.
"Good wine."
"How much a bucket?"
"Are you serious, monk, or are you just kidding?"
"Why should I kid you?"
"This wine is for the monastery's cooks, janitors, sedan-chair carriers, caretakers, and field labourers—no one else. The abbot has warned me that if I sell to a monk he'll take back the money and house the monastery loaned me for my winery. I don't dare sell you any of this."
"You really won't?"
"Not if you kill me!"
"I won't kill you but I will buy some of your wine."
The man didn't like the look of things. He picked up his carrying-pole and started to walk away. Lu dashed out of the pavilion after him, seized the pole with both hands, and kicked the fellow in the groin. The man clapped both hands to his injured parts and dropped to a squatting position. He couldn't straighten up for some time.
Lu Zhishen carried both buckets to the pavilion. He picked the ladle off the ground, removed the covers, and began drinking. Before long, one of the buckets was empty.
"Come around to the monastery tomorrow and I'll pay you," he said.
The man had just recovered from his pain. If the abbot found out, it would mean an end to his livelihood. How could he seek payment from Lu at the monastery? Swallowing his anger, he separated the remaining wine into two half-buckets. Then he shouldered the load, took the ladle and flew down the mountain.
Lu sat in the pavilion a long time. The wine had gone to his head. He left the pavilion, sat down beneath a pine tree and again rested for quite a spell. The wine was taking increasing effect. He pulled his arms out of his cassock and tied the empty sleeves around his waist. His tattooed back bare, he strode up the mountain, swinging his arms.
The monastery gate-keepers had been watching him from afar. They came forward when he approached and barred his way with their split bamboo staves.
"You're supposed to be a disciple of Buddha," they barked. "How dare you come here in this besotted condition? You must be blind. Haven't you seen the notice? Any monk who breaks the rules and drinks gets forty blows of the split bamboo and is expelled from the monastery. Any gate-keeper who lets a drunken man enter gets ten blows. Go back down the mountain, quickly, if you want to save yourself a beating."
In the first place, Lu was a new monk, in the second, his temper hadn't changed. Glaring, he shouted: "Mother-screwing thieves! So you want to beat me? I'll smash you!"
The situation looked bad. One of the gate-keepers sped back inside and reported to the supervisor, while the other tried to keep Zhishen out with his staff. Lu flipped it aside and gave him a staggering slap in the face. As the man struggled to recover, Lu followed with a punch that knocked him groaning to the ground.
"I'll let you off this time, varlet," said Zhishen. He walked unsteadily into the monastery.
The supervisor had summoned the caretakers, cooks, janitors and sedan-chair carriers—nearly thirty men. Now, armed with staves, they poured out of the western cloister and rushed to meet Lu. The ex-major strode towards them with a thunderous roar. They didn't know he had been an army officer. He sprang at them so fiercely they fled in confusion into the sutra hall and closed the latticed door. Zhishen charged up the steps. With one punch and one kick he smashed the door open. The trapped men raised their staves and came out fighting.
The abbot, who had been notified by the supervisor, hurried to the scene with four or five attendants.
"Zhishen," he shouted, "I forbid you to misbehave."
Lu was drunk but he recognized the abbot. He cast aside his staff, advanced and greeted him.
"I had a couple of bowls of wine but I did nothing to provoke these fellows," said Zhishen. "They came with a gang and attacked me."
"If you have any respect for me," said the abbot, "you'll go to your quarters at once and sleep it off. We'll talk about this tomorrow."
"It's only my respect for you that stops me from lambasting those scabby donkeys!"
The abbot told his assistant to help Lu to the monks' hall. He collapsed on his bed and slept, snoring loudly.
A crowd of monks surrounded the abbot. "We told you so," they said. "Now you see what's happened? How can we keep a wildcat like that in our monastery? He upsets our pure way of life."
"It's true he's a bit unruly," the abbot admitted, "but he'll become a saint later on. At present, we can do nothing. We must forgive him, for the sake of our donor, Squire Zhao. I'll give him good lecture tomorrow, and that will be the end of it."
The monks laughed coldly. "Our abbot isn't very bright," they said among themselves. All retired to their respective abodes.
The next morning the abbot sent his assistant to the monks' quarters to summon Lu Zhishen. He was still asleep. The assistant waited while he got up and put on his cassock. Suddenly, Lu dashed out, barefoot. The surprised assistant followed. He found Lu pissing behind the temple. The assistant couldn't help laughing. He waited till Lu had finished, then said: "The abbot wants to see you."
Lu went with him to the cleric's room.
"Although you originally were a military man," said the abbot, "I ordained you because of Squire Zhao's sponsorship. I instructed you: Do not kill, steal, fornicate, drink or lie. These are the five precepts by which all monks are bound. First of all, no monk is allowed to drink. But yesterday evening you came back drunk and beat up the gate-keepers, broke the vermilion latticed door of the surra hall and drove out the cooks and janitors, shouting and yelling all the while. How could you behave so disgracefully?"
Lu knelt before him. "I'll never do such things again."

"You're a monk now," the abbot continued. "How could you violate our rule against drinking and upset our pure way of life? If it weren't for the sake of your sponsor Squire Zhao I'd expel you from the monastery. Don't you ever act like that again."
Lu placed his palms together. "I wouldn't dare," he asserted fervently.
The abbot ordered breakfast for him and, with many kindly words, exhorted him to reform. He gave Lu a cassock of fine cloth and a pair of monk's shoes, and told him to return to his quarters.
Topers should never drink their fill. "Wine can spur action, or ruin everything," as the old saying goes. If drinking makes the timid brave, what does it do to the bold and impetuous?
For three or four months after his drunken riot Lu didn't venture to leave the monastery. Then one day the weather suddenly turned warm. It was the second lunar month. Lu came out of his quarters, strolled through the monastery gate and stood gazing in admiration at the beauty of Mount Wutai. From the foot of the mountain the breeze brought the sound of the clanging of metal. Zhishen returned to his quarters, got some silver and put it inside his cassock near his chest. Then he ambled down the slope.
He passed through an archway inscribed with the words: "Wutai, a Blessed Place." Before him he saw a market town of six or seven hundred families. Meat, vegetables, wine and flour were on sale.
"What am I waiting for?" Lu said to himself. "If I had known there was a place like this, instead of snatching that fellow's bucket I would have come down and bought my own wine. I've been holding back so long that it hurts. Let's see what sort of food they have on sale here."
Again he heard the clang of metal.
Next to a building with the sign "Father and Son Inn" was an ironsmith's shop. The sound was coming from there. Lu walked over. There men were beating iron.
"Got any good steel, master smith?" he asked the eldest of them.
The man was a little frightened at the sight of Lu's face, with newly sprouted bristles sticking out wildly all over. He ceased his hammering and said: "Please have a seat, Reverend. What kind of work do you want done?"
"I need a Buddhist staff and a monk's knife. Do you have any first-rate metal?"
"I do indeed. How heavy a staff and knife do you want? We'll make them according to your requirements."
"The staff should be a hundred catties."
"Much too heavy," the smith laughed. "I could make it for you but you'd never be able to wield it. Even Guan Gong's halberd wasn't more than eighty-one catties!"
"I'm every bit as good as Guan Gong," Zhishen burst out impatiently. "He was only a man, too."
"I mean well, Reverend. Even forty-five catties would be very heavy."
"You say Guan Gong's halberd was eighty-one catties? Make me a staff of that weight, then."
"Too thick, Reverend. It would look ugly, and be clumsy to use. Take my advice, let me make you a sixty-two catties Buddhist staff of burnished metal. Of course, if it's too heavy, don't blame me. For the knife, as I said, we don't need any specifications. I'll use the best steel."
"How much for the two?"
"We don't bargain. You can have them at rock-bottom—five ounces of silver for both."
"It's a deal. If you do a good job, I'll give you more."
The smith accepted the silver. "We'll start right away."
"I have some small change here. Come out and have a bowl of wine with me."
"Excuse me, Reverend. I must get on with my work. I can't keep you company."
Lu Zhishen left the ironsmith's. Before he had gone thirty paces, he saw a wine shop banner sticking out from the eaves of a house. He raised the hanging door screen, entered the shop, sat down, and pounded on the table.
"Bring wine," he shouted.
The proprietor came up to him. "Forgive me, Reverend. My shop and investment money all are borrowed from the monastery. The abbot has a rule for us tavern keepers. If any of us sells wine to a monk, he takes back the money and drives us out of our premises. Don't hold it against me.
"All I want is a little wine. I won't say I bought it here."
"Impossible. Please try some place else. I'm sorry."
Lu rose to his feet. "If another place serves me, I'll have something to say to you later!"
He left the wine shop and walked on. Soon he saw another wine flag suspended over a doorway. He went in, sat down and called: "Wine, host. Be quick."
"How can you be so ignorant, Reverend?" the tavern keeper demanded. "You must know the abbot's rules. Do you want to ruin me?"
Zhishen insisted on being served but the tavern keeper was adamant. Lu had no choice but to leave. He went to four or five more wine shops. All refused to serve him.
"If I don't think of something, I'll never get any wine," he said to himself. At the far end of the market-place he saw amid blossoming apricot trees a small house from which a bundle of broom straw was hanging. He came closer and found it was a little wine shop. Lu went in and sat down by the window.
"Host," he called, "bring wine for a wandering monk."
The rustic owner came over and scrutinized him. "Where are you from, Reverend?"
"I'm a travelling monk who's just passing through. I want some wine."
"If you're from the Mount Wutai monastery, I'm not allowed to sell you any."
"I'm not. Now bring on the wine."
Lu's appearance and manner of speaking struck the rustic owner as odd. "How much do you want?"
"Never mind about that. Just keep bringing it by the bowlful."
Lu consumed ten big bowls of wine. "Have you any meat?" he asked. "I want a platter."
"I had some beef earlier in the day," said the proprietor, "but it's all sold out."
Zhishen caught a whiff of the fragrance of cooking meat. He went into the yard and found a dog boiling in an earthenware pot by the compound wall.
"You've got dog meat," he said. "Why won't you sell me any?"
"I thought as a monk you wouldn't eat it, so I didn't ask."
"I've plenty of money here." Lu pulled out some silver and handed it over. "Bring me half."
The proprietor cut off half the dog carcass and placed it on the table with a small dish of garlic sauce. Lu tore into it delightedly with both hands. At the same time he consumed another ten bowls of wine. He found the wine very agreeable and kept calling for more. The shop owner was dumbfounded.
"That's enough, monk," he urged.
Lu glared at him. "I'm paying for what I drink. Who's asking you to interfere?"
"How much more do you want?"
"Bring me another bucketful."
The host had no choice but to comply. Before long, Zhishen had downed this, too. A dog's leg that he hadn't finished he put inside his cassock.
"Hold on to the extra silver," he said as he was leaving. "I'll be back for more tomorrow."
The frightened proprietor could only helplessly gape. He watched as Lu headed towards Mount Wutai.
Halfway up the slope, Lu sat down in the pavilion and rested. The wine began to take effect. Leaping up, he cried: "I haven't had a good workout in a long time, I'm getting stiff and creaky in the joints. What I need is a little exercise."
Lu came out of the pavilion. He gripped the end of each sleeve in the opposite hand and swung his arms vigorously up and down, left and right, with increasing force. One arm accidentally struck against a post of the pavilion. There was loud crack as the post snapped. Half the pavilion collapsed.
Two gate-keepers heard the noise and climbed to a high vantage point for a look. They saw Lu staggering up the slope.
"Woe," they exclaimed. "That brute is soused again!"
They closed the gate and barred it. Peering through a crack, they watched Lu advance. When he found the gate locked, he drummed on it with his fists. But the gate-keepers didn't dare let him in.
Lu pounded a while, in vain. Suddenly he noticed a Buddhist guardian idol on the left side of the gate.
"Hey, you big worthless fellow," Lu shouted. "Instead of helping me knock on the gate, you raise your fist and try to scare me! I'm not afraid of you!"
He jumped on the pedestal and ripped up the railing as easily as pulling scallions. Grabbing a broken post, he flailed it against the idol's leg, bringing down a shower of gilt and plaster.
"Woe," cried the gate-keepers. They ran to inform the abbot.
Lu paused, then turned and observed the guardian idol on the right.
"How dare you open your big mouth and laugh at me?" he yelled. He leaped on the pedestal and struck the idol's leg two hard blows. The figure toppled to the ground with a thunderous crash.
Lu laughed uproariously, holding the broken post in his hand.
When the gate-keepers notified the abbot he merely said: "Don't provoke him. Go back to your gate."
At that moment, the elder, the supervisor, the deacon, and other responsible monks entered the hall. "That wildcat is very drunk," they said. "He's wrecked the mid-slope pavilion and the guardian idols at the gate. How can we put up with this?"
"Since ancient times it's been known that 'Even a king shuns a drunkard.' All the more necessary for me to avoid them," replied the abbot. "If he's broken idols, we'll ask his sponsor Squire Zhao to make us new ones. Zhao can repair the pavilion too. Let Zhishen do as he wishes."
"Those guardian idols are the lords of the gate," the monks protested. "You can't change them around just like that."
"Never mind the gate idols," retorted the abbot. "Even if they were the idols of the leading Buddhas themselves that were destroyed, there'd be nothing we could do about it. Stay out of his way. Didn't you see how savage he was the other day?"
"What a muddle-headed abbot," the monks muttered as they left the hall. "Don't open that gate," they instructed the gate-keepers. "Just stand inside and listen."
"If you mother-screwing scabby donkeys don't let me in," bellowed Zhishen, "I'll set fire to this stinking monastery and burn it down!"
"Remove the bar and let the beast in," the monks hastily called to the gate-keepers. "If we don't, he's really liable to do it!"
The gate-keepers tiptoed up to the gate, pulled the bolt, then flew back and hid themselves. The other monks scattered.
Lu pushed hard against the gate with both hands. Unexpectedly, it gave way, and he stumbled in and fell flat on his face. He crawled to his feet, rubbed his head, and hurried to his quarters.
He pushed aside the door curtain and plunged into the meditation room. The monks, who were sitting cross-legged on their pallets, looked up, startled. They immediately lowered their heads. On reaching his own pallet, Zhishen noisily vomited. The stench was frightful. "Virtue be praised," cried the monks, holding their noses.
Lu clambered onto his pallet and opened his cassock and girdle, ripping them in the process. The dog's leg dropped to the floor. "Good," said Zhishen. "I was just getting hungry." He picked it up and began to eat.
The monks hid their faces behind their sleeves. Those nearest him stayed as far out of his way as possible. Lu tore off a piece of dog meat and offered it to the monk on his left.
"Try it," he recommended.
The man pressed his sleeve ends tightly against his lips.
"Don't you want any?" asked Lu. He shoved the meat at the man on his right. The fellow tried to slip off his pallet and escape but Zhishen seized him by the ear and crammed the meat into his mouth.
Four or five monks on the opposite side of the room jumped up and hurried over. They pleaded with Lu to desist. He flung aside his dog's haunch and drummed his knuckles on their shaven pates. The whole meditation room was thrown into an uproar. Monks got their cassocks and bowls from the closets and quickly left. There was a general exodus. The elder couldn't stop them.
Cheerfully, Zhishen fought his way out. Most of the monks fled to the cloisters. This time the supervisor and deacon didn't notify the abbot but summoned all the monks on duty, including every caretaker, cook, janitor and sedan-chair carrier they could muster—nearly two hundred men in all. These bound their heads with bandannas, armed themselves with clubs and staves, and marched on the monks' hall.
Lu let out a roar when he saw them. Not having any weapon he ran into the meditation room, knocked over the altar table in the front of the idol of Buddha, tore off two of the table legs, and charged out again.
He came at the attackers so fiercely that they hastily retreated to the cloisters. Zhishen advanced, flourishing his table legs. His adversaries closed in on him from both sides. Lu was furious. He feinted east and struck west, he feinted south and thumped north. Only those furthest away escaped his cudgels.
Right to the door of the preaching hall the battle raged. Then the voice of the abbot rang out: "Zhishen, stop that fighting! You, too, you monks!"
The attackers had suffered, several dozen injured. They were glad to fall back when the abbot appeared. Lu threw down his table legs. "Abbot, help me," he cried. By now he was eight-tenths sober.

"Zhishen, you're giving me too much trouble," said the cleric. "The last time you got drunk and raised a rumpus I wrote your sponsor Squire Zhao about it and he sent a letter of apology. Now you've disgraced yourself again, upset our pure way of life, wrecked the pavilion and damaged two idols. All this we can overlook. But you drove the monks from the meditation room, and that's a major crime. Wenshu Buddha meditated where out monastery stands today. For centuries these hallowed grounds have known only tranquillity and the fragrance of incense. It's no place for a dirty fellow like you. The next few days, you stay with me in the abbot's hall. I'll arrange for you to be transferred elsewhere."
The former major went with the abbot to his residence. The cleric told the supervisor to send the monks back to their meditations. Those who had been injured were to go and rest. Zhishen spent the night in the abbot's hall.
The next morning the abbot consulted with the elder. They decided to give Lu some money and send him on. But first it was necessary to notify Squire Zhao. The abbot wrote a letter and dispatched it to his manor with two messengers, who were instructed to wait for his reply.
Zhao was quite upset by the abbot's missive. In his answer he hailed the cleric respectfully and said: "I will pay for the repair of the broken gate guardians and the pavilion, Lu must go wherever the abbot sends him."
The abbot then directed his assistant to prepare a black cloth cassock, a pair of monk's shoes, and ten ounces of silver, and to summon Lu.
"Zhishen," said the abbot, "the last time you got drunk and made a disturbance in the monks' hall, you didn't know any better. This time you got drunk again, broke the guardian idols, wrecked the pavilion, and caused a riot in the hall of meditation. That's a serious crime. You've also injured many of our monks. Our monastery is a peaceful place. Your conduct is very bad. As a courtesy to Squire Zhao, I'm giving you a letter of introduction to another place where you can stay. It's impossible for us to keep you here. Last night I had a vision and composed a four-phrase prophecy to guide your destiny."
"Where do you want me to go, teacher?" asked Lu. "Please tell me the prophecy." The abbot pointed at Lu Zhishen and spoke. He told him where to go, with this result: Laughing and wielding his staff, Lu fought scores of heroes. Angrily stabbing with his sword, he struck down un-filial sons and treacherous officials.

Now when Lu Da turned round to see who was pulling him, he found it was none other than Old Jin, the person whom he had rescued in the Weizhou wineshop. The old man dragged Lu Da into a quiet lane and said: "My benefactor, you take such risks — standing there in front of that poster, when it says as clear as can be that they're offering a thousand strings of cash for your capture! Why did you go and look? If I hadn't happened to see you, the police would have got you, for sure. The poster gives a full description: your age, your appearance, and your place of birth."
Lu Da said: "Well, let me tell you what happened. Really, it was all on your account. I went to the Academy Bridge that day, and found that scoundrel of a butcher, gave him three blows and he died, so I'm on the run. I've been moving about for a month and a half. I had no particular plan in coming here. But what are you doing here? Why didn't you go back to the Eastern Capital?"
"My saviour and my master," the old man said, "the day you rescued me I went to find a cart, because I did indeed intend to return to the Eastern Capital. But then it occurred to me that villain might follow us and this time we'd be without the great benefit of your protection. So I didn't go to the Eastern Capital, I travelled north instead, and chanced upon an old neighbour from the capital who was proceeding to this place on business. He took us with him, my daughter and myself. It was our great good fortune that he kindly introduced my daughter to a suitor, Mr. Zhao, a man of substance, who has made her his minor wife, and now pays for her food and clothes. But it all stems from your generosity. My daughter speaks to him often of your kindness, with tears in her eyes. Mr. Zhao, moreover, loves all kinds of martial arts and often says how much he wishes he could meet you, and asks if there isn't some way of bringing it about. So I beg you now to come home with me and stay for a few days, while you consider what to do next."
So Lu Da went with Old Jin. A few hundred yards on, they came to the door, and Old Jin, drawing back the curtain, cried: "Daughter, our benefactor is here!" The girl came out, richly dressed and adorned, invited Lu Da to enter and sit down, and prostrated herself before him six times, bending and rising like someone setting out candles. "If you had not come to our rescue," she said, "how could we be here today?"
When Lu Da looked at the girl, he found there was a new air about her, she seemed different:

A gold pin slantwise set enhances raven tresses,
Green sleeves of artful cut conceal the snow-white arms;
A mouth round as a cherry, with lips of tender pink,

White hands half revealed, like bamboo shoots in spring:
Below the green silk skirt a glimpse of tiny feet.
The red embroidered coat eclipses costly jewels,
The face is a bouquet of fresh April flowers,
The brows a graceful sweep, like willow boughs in spring.
The delicate colour tinting those perfumed cheeks
Recalls how moonlight floods a marble terrace;
A mass of hair overflows the turquoise band
Like clouds that part to show resplendent peaks.

After prostrating herself before Lu Da the girl said: "I beg you, our benefactor, do come upstairs."
"No need to trouble yourselves," Lu Da said. "I have to move on."
But Old Jin said, "Now that you are here, how can you expect us to let you go like that?" and taking Lu Da's staff and bundle, he ushered him upstairs to rest. To his daughter he said, "Sit here with our benefactor while I go to order food."
"Don't order too much," Lu Da said. "Something simple will be quite all right."
The old man said, "We could hardly pay you back if we gave our lives, there's no cause to argue over a few plain little dishes."
So while the daughter kept Lu Da company upstairs, the old man went down and called a boy he had recently taken into his service. After telling the maid to get the fire burning nicely, he took the boy shopping with him. They returned with fresh fish, tender chicken, salted goose, fat prawns and fruit of the season. A bottle of wine was broached and the dishes were prepared and arranged on trays, then carried upstairs. Three cups were set out on the kind of low table they call a spring table, together with three pairs of chopsticks and the various dishes and fruit, whilst the servant warmed the wine in a silver jug.
Then father and daughter each raised their cups in turn. But when Old Jin bowed right down to the ground before Lu Da, the latter felt embarrassed and said: "If you persist, sir, in these excessive courtesies you will shorten my life."
Old Jin said, "My benefactor, hear me. When we first arrived here, I wrote your name on red paper, and morning and evening my daughter and I burnt a stick of incense and prayed. Now that we have you here in person, how can we fail to honour you?"
"Such gratitude is something rare indeed," said Lu Da.
The three of them continued to enjoy themselves, slowly sipping their wine, till evening, when unexpectedly a great com- motion arose below. Lu Da opened the window to look, and saw thirty or forty men down there, all armed with white staves and crying: "Seize him and bring him down!" And in their midst a figure on horseback was shouting: "Don't let the villain get away!"
Lu Da, assuming the worst, grasped a stool and was about to hurl himself downstairs and put up a good fight. But Old Jin stopped him quickly with a gesture. "Stay where you are," he said, and rushed downstairs himself. He went straight to the man on horseback and spoke a few words to him quietly. The rider suddenly began to smile, and gave an order, whereupon the men dispersed.
The rider dismounted and entered the house. Old Jin asked Lu Da to come down. The newcomer prostrated himself before Lu Da, and said, "Face and name are not the same, reality surpasses fame! What a pleasure to honour such a worthy commander!"
"Who is this?" Lu Da asked the old man. "I can't remember seeing him before, why does he flatter me?"
The old man said, "Why, it's my daughter's protector, Mr. Zhao. Just now he was imagining I had let some shady character get upstairs and start a drunken orgy, and he brought a posse of retainers along to deal with the intruder. As soon as I told him how it was, he sent them away."
"In that case, then," said Lu Da, "one cannot blame him."
Mr. Zhao invited Lu Da upstairs again, and Old Jin prepared more food and wine. Zhao wanted Lu Da to take the place of honour but the latter refused, saying it was too much. "It is but a small token of my respect," Zhao said. "I have heard so much of your brave deeds, and now heaven has been kind enough to allow this meeting — I count it a thousand blessings."
"I am just a rough soldier," Lu Da said, "and a criminal, to boot, with the sentence of death hanging over me. But if you don't feel it's beneath you, sir, to associate with such as me, then I'm at your service: just say the word."
Zhao was delighted. He had to know the full story of the killing of Butcher Zheng, and they talked of many things besides. They sat up till midnight, comparing notes on combat strategy, and drinking, and then betook themselves to bed. When the next day dawned, Zhao said, "I fear you are not safe here, may I invite you to come and stay at my place for a while?"
"Where is your house?" Lu Da asked.
"About three miles from here," was the reply, "at a village called Sevenstones."
"Perhaps it would be good to send some one to the village first to have them saddle two horses and bring them," Lu Da suggested.
The horses arrived before noon. Zhao asked Lu Da to mount, and told the servants to carry Lu's baggage. Lu Da bade Old Jin and his daughter farewell, and rode off with Mr. Zhao. Discoursing of many things, they proceeded to Sevenstones. Soon they were at Zhao's door. They dismounted and Zhao, taking Lu Da's arm, led him into the hall, receiving him as honoured guest. He gave orders for a sheep to be killed and wine got ready. A guest room was prepared for the night's rest, and once again wine and food were served.
"You do me too much honour," Lu Da said, "how am I ever to repay you?"
"Within the four seas all men are brothers," Zhao replied. "Why talk of repayment?"
But enough of this. Lu Da had been staying in Zhao's manor for five or six days when suddenly one day, as Zhao and Lu Da were chatting in the library, Old Jin burst into the house. He ran straight to the library to find them. Making sure there was no one to hear, he said to Lu Da: "Benefactor, I don't wish to alarm you but ever since that day when I invited you in to drink wine upstairs, and Mr. Zhao was misinformed about it, remember, and came with a crowd of his men, and there was a commotion in the street before they dispersed, well, ever since then people have been quite suspicious and there's been talk. Yesterday three policemen came round asking the neighbours a lot of questions. I am afraid they may come here to the village to get you. Suppose someone's a little careless, what then?"
"In that case," said Lu Da, "I'd better leave at once."
Mr. Zhao said: "If you stay here, I think there's a real danger we'll face 'high mountains and deep waters,' as they say; but on the other hand, if I let you leave, it doesn't seem honourable. I do have a plan which would guarantee your safety and put you quite beyond the reach of all difficulties and dangers but I'm afraid you may not like to hear about it."
"I am a man under sentence of death," Lu Da said. "The best I can hope for is to secure my life, how could I not be willing to listen?"
"That's good, then," said Mr. Zhao. "Some ten miles from here, there is a mountain, called Mount Wu Tai, Five-Terrace Mountain. On the mountain there is a temple known as the Manjusri Temple, because it is dedicated to the Bodhisattva Manjusri. [1] There are five or six hundred monks at this temple. The Abbot, the Venerable True Knowledge, is an old friend. My family in the past made donations and rank as donors of the temple. I once made a promise to sponsor a monk, and I've even bought the requisite certificate but I have never been able to find someone really suitable, in order to fulfil this wish of mine. Now, if you were willing, I would undertake to pay all the expenses. The question is, would you really be prepared to shave your head and become a monk?"
"If I leave," Lu Da reflected, "where am I ever going to find shelter? Isn't it better to take this road?" Aloud he said, "Since you have offered to take care of everything, I am perfectly willing to become a monk, and shall accept whatever you arrange."
Having thus settled the matter, that same evening they prepared the necessary clothing and some money for expenses, some gifts of silk and other things. Next morning they rose early and with some of the retainers carrying the baggage, Mr. Zhao and Lu Da set off in the direction of Mount Wu Tai.
It was still early in the morning when they arrived at the foot of the mountain. Naturally Mount Wu Tai was an impressive sight:
Clouds swathe the summit, the sun circles its waist; its jagged outline seems to touch heaven's vault, its rugged rocks to split the constellations. Beneath the cliff, flowers and trees dance in the spring breeze, breathing out fresh scents; at the cave-mouth creepers hung with permanent raindrops drape their delicate strands. Waterfalls unfurl among flying clouds; the silver course of a stream is soaked in cold moonlight. In front of the rock-face stands a dark green pine; an iron bell tolls, swung by the dragon's tail. The mountain's base imposes on three thousand parishes; it has lifted its peak to the clouds for centuries.
Mr. Zhao and Lu Da got into sedan chairs and began the ascent. Servants were sent ahead to announce their coming. When they arrived before the monastery, the bursar and the novice-master were already there to greet them. Dismounting from the chairs, the two visitors went to sit in a little pavilion outside the main gate. Within the monastery, the Venerable True Knowledge had been informed of their arrival and now, accompanied by the prior and acolytes, appeared at the main gate to receive them. Zhao and Lu Da stepped forward and inclined themselves. The Abbot raised his joined hands in holy greeting, and said: "Our donor has made a hard journey."
"I have come expressly to discuss a certain little matter," Zhao said.
"Then I must invite you to come to my quarters and take tea with me," the Abbot said.
With Zhao leading, and Lu Da behind him, they entered the Manjusri Temple. What a sight it was!
The temple gate contends with purple peaks; the great Hall of the Buddha greets the blue sky. There are grottoes adjoining the bell-tower and the library faces a precipitous ridge. A clear spring wells up among the kitchens. These monks seem to dwell in the midst of the clouds; Sagittarius and Aries are the abbot's neighbours. Offerings of fruit are always set out for the white-faced apes; the wooden fish[2] is struck with a stone of curious shape. Stippled deer come daily to graze among the flowers; offerings are made to the golden Buddha in the Hall of Jewels. The seven-tiered pagoda meets the red dawn; holy men for a thousand years have sought out this great temple.
The Abbot led Zhao and Lu Da into his quarters and invited the former to sit in the place of honour. Lu Da placed himself only a little way off, on a meditation chair. Zhao whispered to him: "You've come here to enter the monastery, how can you sit in the presence of the Abbot?"
Lu Da got up quickly and went to stand behind Zhao, muttering "I know nothing of these things."
In front of them were ranged the prior, the deacon, acolytes, the bursar, the novice-master, the hosteller, the secretary, standing in two ranks east and west.
Zhao's servants, having set down the sedan chairs, brought in a box that they showed to the assembly.
"There was no need to bring gifts," the Abbot said, "there is so much in our monastery already that we owe to your kindness."
"Just a few trifling things," Zhao said. "Nothing worth making a fuss about."
A monk and a novice collected the gifts and bore them away.
Zhao now began: "I have a request I would like to make Your Holiness, if you will permit me. There is a project I have long cherished: to enter a monk in this monastery. I have already taken out the permit and the certificate but I have not used them yet. Now here is this cousin of mine, Lu Da, a former officer of the frontier guard, who seeing that this world of dust is nothing but hardship and bitterness, has expressed a wish to leave it and enter a monastery. It is my hope, my greatest hope, that you might be willing to take him into your community, as a favour to me greater than I deserve, to shave his head and make him a monk. I would undertake to provide for all his necessities. If Your Holiness is pleased to accept, I shall be inexpressibly happy."
The Abbot answered thus: "This desire of yours does great honour to our house. It can certainly be satisfied, certainly. But please, let us drink our tea."
Novices brought the tea and when it was drunk, cleared away the cups and saucers.
The Abbot then ordered the prior and the deacon to make arrangements for the shaving of the postulant's head in the approved fashion and told the novice-master and the bursar to order a banquet.
But the prior and others of the community began to mutter about it. "This person does not seem suited for a monk," they said. "Look what wild eyes he has!"
"Brother hosteller," the monks said, "you go and ask the guests to sit down, and we will approach Father Abbot."
So the hosteller asked Zhao and Lu Da to sit in the reception hall, while the prior and the monks said to the Abbot: "This person who has just said he wants to become a monk has a very unsavoury appearance and a most violent expression. We believe that if we shave his head and admit him it is likely to be detrimental to the good name of our temple."
"But he is the cousin of Mr. Zhao, our faithful donor," the Abbot said, "to whom we cannot be discourteous. Put away your anxieties, and let me seek guidance." The Abbot lit a stick of incense and sat on the meditation chair, with his legs crossed. Murmuring an incantation he entered into meditation. When the incense had burnt down, he returned to normal consciousness and said: "Shave him immediately. This person, to whom a heavenly star corresponds, has a sincere and upright heart. Although he is sometimes violent and his life is full of confusion, he will eventually achieve great purity of soul, and his spiritual achievement will be quite out of the ordinary. None of you will equal him. Remember my words, and place no obstacle in his way."
"If Father Abbot is determined to protect him," the prior said to the others, "we'll have to obey, that's all. It would have been wrong to say nothing but we've had our say and he won't listen, so we must just forget it."
The Abbot now ordered the vegetarian banquet to be served, and invited Mr. Zhao and the others to dine in his quarters. When they had finished, the bursar drew up a list. Mr. Zhao took out a purse and sent someone to buy all the materials, whilst they prepared a pair of monk's sandals, monk's clothing, hat, robe and the objects associated with the rite, at the temple. In a day or two all was ready.
The Abbot selected an auspicious day and a fortunate hour, and ordered bells to be rung and drums beaten, while the entire congregation of monks assembled in the Hall of the Law in orderly fashion, five or six hundred of them, all in their robes, respectfully inclining with joined palms before the Abbot's throne in two separate ranks. Zhao took a bag of silver, the set of clothes and some incense and laid them before the throne, prostrating himself. After the prescribed declarations and responses, an acolyte led Lu Da up to the Throne of the Law. The deacon made Lu Da remove his hat and divided his hair into nine strands which he bound separately. The monk charged with cutting the hair then shaved his whole skull. As he was about to start on the moustaches, Lu Da said: "I'd be rather happy if you could leave just these few hairs." The monks burst out laughing. The Abbot, from his throne, said: "Hear the verse, all of you." He intoned: "Let no blade of grass be left, that the six senses be cleansed to the roots; by the removal of all hair, shall unruliness be dispelled." Then he abruptly ordered the shaving to be completed. With one sweep of the razor the monk removed every remaining hair.
The novice-master now presented the postulant in front of the Throne of the Law and requested the Abbot to grant him a religious name. The Abbot took the certificate, without a name as yet, and proclaimed this verse: "One spark of the spirit outweighs a thousand pieces of gold, all-embracing is the Way of the Lord Buddha, I hereby confer on you the name of Zhishen, Profound Wisdom." So saying he handed over the certificate to the temple secretary, who wrote in the name and presented the certificate to Lu Zhishen, as he was to be called from now on. The Abbot also presented the clothes and robe, and told the new monk to put them on. After this the novice-master led the new monk up to the Throne of the Law again and the Abbot placed his hands upon him, saying: "First, take refuge in the Buddha, second, follow the Law, third, respect the Community; these are the three precepts. The five interdictions are: first, kill no living thing, second, do not steal, third, do not fornicate, fourth, do not drink alcohol, fifth, do not lie!" Lu Zhishen was not aware that the proper response to each injunction was, respectively "I will" and "I will not." He simply said, "I'll bear it in mind." The monks burst out laughing again.
After the induction, Zhao invited the monks to sit in the refectory, or Hall of Clouds, as they call it, where incense was lit and a vegetarian meal was offered to all. Every monk received a commemorative gift. The temple director presented Lu Zhishen to each of the monks, elders as well as peers, and then con- ducted him to the Hall of Meditation, behind the main meeting hall.
Nothing worthy of remark occurred that night. The following day Zhao decided to return home, and it was in vain that the Abbot tried to detain him when he went to take his leave. After a vegetarian breakfast, the monks accompanied Zhao to the gates, where the latter joined his palms and said: "Worthy Father Abbot, and all you good fathers, I beg you to show mercy in all things. My younger brother, Zhishen, is a simple and forth- right person; if he should fail to observe your rules, or speak unadvisedly, I sincerely hope that for my sake rather than punish him you will find it in your hearts to forgive and forget."
"Have no fear," the Abbot said. "I shall myself be responsible for his learning by easy stages how to recite the sutras and prayers, follow the rule and practise meditation."
"You will not find me ungrateful," Zhao said. He then summoned Lu Da from among the crowd of monks and spoke to him quietly under a pine tree. "Dear Brother," he said, "from now on you cannot well behave as you used to. You will have to do only what is expected and heed the rules, you must be on your guard. Otherwise it will be too embarrassing for us to meet again. Take good care of yourself. I shall send someone with clothes for you when you need them."
"Say no more, Brother," Lu Zhishen replied. "I shall be obedient in everything."
Then Mr. Zhao bade farewell to the Abbot and all the monks, climbed into his sedan chair, and followed by his retainers, who were now bearing an empty sedan and the empty coffer, headed down the mountain for home. The Abbot, with the monks behind him, returned to the temple.
As for Lu Zhishen, as soon as he sat down on the meditation couch in the meditation hall, his head sank and he fell fast asleep. But the two contemplatives who had been appointed his spiritual mentors, gave him a shake and said: "That's not allowed here! If you're going to be a monk, you've got to learn to meditate!"
"I went to sleep," Lu Zhishen replied. "What business is it of yours?"
"This is a fine kettle of fish!" one of the monks said in disgust.
"Fish, turtle, I'll eat anything," said Lu Zhishen innocently. "But where is this fish?"
"This is going to be a tough one!" the monk exclaimed.
"A nice fat turtle is very tasty," Lu Zhishen said. "It's an excellent dish! What makes you say it's tough?"
His mentors gave up and left him to sleep. Next day they wanted to go to the Abbot and complain about Lu Zhishen's disrespectful attitude but the prior dissuaded them: "Father Abbot says he will one day achieve great sanctity. Father Abbot says he's exceptional, none of us will equal him. Father Abbot says we have to overlook his shortcomings. So you see, there's nothing you can do about it. We're not to compare his behaviour with other people's, that's all." The two monks went away.
No one said anything to Lu Zhishen after this, so everyday when evening came he collapsed spread-eagled on the meditation couch and slept. At night his snoring was like thunder, and when he got up to answer a call of nature, he made the most fearful racket. It was behind the meditation hall that he went to pee or relieve his bowels, and the ground all around was covered with his shit. One day some acolytes went to the Abbot to protest: "Zhishen has no manners at all; he doesn't behave like a monk. We oughtn't to let someone like that stay in the monastery."
"Nonsense," the Abbot replied. "What would our donor, Mr. Zhao think? He'll change, eventually." After that no one dared speak out.
So Lu Zhishen remained at the monastery on Mount Wu Tai, and imperceptibly four or five months passed. It was the beginning of winter, and after being quiet so long, he was restless. The day was fine and clear, so he put on his black monk's robe, tied his crow-blue belt, changed his sandals and strode out of the temple gate. He walked at random till he came to a little pavilion, halfway down the mountain, where he sat down on a long bench that he found there, and began to consider things. "What a fucking awful life!" he said to himself. "There used to be good meat and good wine, I could have it everyday. But now they've made me a monk, and I'm so hungry I'll soon be nothing but a skeleton. And for the last few days, Mr. Zhao has sent no one with things for me to eat. This bloody horrible taste in my mouth! If only I could get hold of some wine that'd at least be something!"
He was just thinking of wine when he saw, far off in the distance, a man with 2 pails on a carrying-pole coming up the mountain towards him, singing as he came. The pails had lids on them and the man was carrying a wine-warmer. He was singing to himself:

Nine Leagues Mountain,
Site of the ancient battle,

Where rusty swords and spears
Are found by the grazing cattle;
The River Wu trembles,
Under the watching sky,
Like the fair lady Yu,
As she bade her lord goodbye.

Well, when Zhishen saw that fellow bringing the pails up the mountain, he sat in the pavilion and watched, until the man came right to the pavilion and rested his carrying-pole there. Then Zhishen said: "Hey, you! What have you got in those pails?"

"Good wine," the man replied.

"How much is it a pail?"

"Are you pulling my leg, Your Reverence?"

"Why should I pull your leg?"

"I take this wine up to the temple but I only sell it to the servants and sedan chair porters, ordinary folk who work there. Their abbot has warned us all about it: if we sell any to the monks, we'll be held responsible. We'll lose our capital and be thrown out of our houses. We get our capital from the monastery, see, and our houses are owned by the monastery too. Do you think I'd take the risk of selling wine to you?"

"I can't buy some?"

"Over my dead body!"

"I don't want to kill you. I just want to buy wine from you."

Not liking the look of things, the man picked up his carrying-pole and left. Lu Zhishen rushed out after him, seized the pole, and gave him a kick in the balls — one was enough. The man clutched himself with both hands and remained huddled on the ground for a long while, quite unable to rise. Lu Zhishen dragged the pails into the pavilion, set the warmer down on the ground, took off the lids, and began ladling out wine and drinking it just like that, unwarmed. In no time at all he had emptied one complete pail. Then he said to the villager: "Come to the temple tomorrow, my friend, and we'll settle up." The man had not yet recovered from the pain. Also he was afraid the abbot might get to know and take away his means of subsistence, so he repressed his feelings and swallowed his rage. He certainly didn't intend to come asking for the money. He divided the remaining wine between the two pails, picked up the warmer, and almost flew down the mountain, as if he had wings.

Lu Zhishen, meanwhile, remained in the pavilion half the day; the wine had gone to his head. Then he left the pavilion and went to sit among the roots of a pine tree for a while. But then his head span even more. He freed his arms and chest from the black monk's robe and knotted the sleeves about his waist. With his tattooed back and chest in full view, and swinging his arms, he marched up the mountain:

Head-heavy on floating feet, red-eyed and purple-faced, pitching and rolling, swaying and tilting this way and that, he stumbles up the mountain, like a crane driven by the wind. He weaves and twists his way towards the monastery like a swimming snake. He points skywards and curses the Marshal of Heaven; he stamps the earth as if he plans to crush the Lord of Hell. Half-naked and barefoot he goes, the drunken sot; a brazen bonze, breathing fire and destruction.

Zhishen was now approaching the monastery gate. The two monks who kept the gate had seen him from afar, and now they appeared at the gate with supple canes of split bamboo in their hands, barring his way. "You are a follower of the Lord Buddha," they shouted, "what do you mean by coming back roaring drunk? You've got eyes, haven't you? You must have seen the warning that's posted in the shops, it's plain enough: any monk who breaks the rule and drinks alcohol will receive forty strokes of the cane and be thrown out of the monastery. If the door-keepers turn a blind eye and let him in, they also receive ten. So you'd better get back down the mountain, at least you'll spare yourself the beating."

Now partly because Zhishen was but newly a monk, and partly because his old character had not yet been transformed, he stared them straight in the eye and roared: "You mother-fucking scum! So you want to fight me, do you? Come on then, it'll be a pleasure!"

The door-keepers understood the affair was turning ugly. One of them shot off to inform the director, the other brandished his bamboo cane and prepared to repel Lu Zhishen. The latter parried the cane and separating his fingers, dealt the door-keeper a single blow that sent him flying head over heels. As he was trying to rise Zhishen gave him another which left him lying by the gate in a heap, crying for mercy. Mumbling "I'll let you off, you arsehole," Zhishen staggered off into the monastery.

When the prior heard the door-keepers' report, he called out servants, workers, porters and chair-bearers, about thirty of them. They came running along the western gallery to receive Lu Zhishen, armed with white staves. When he saw them coming he let out a roar like a thunderclap and bounded towards them, taking huge strides. None of them knew that Zhishen was a former soldier but now they saw his ferociousness they hurriedly took refuge in the Hall of the Sutras, closing both doors.

Zhishen leapt up the steps, and with one blow of his fist and a single kick, broke down the doors. Twenty or thirty were caught inside. Zhishen took a stick and drove them out.

Meanwhile the novice-master had informed the Abbot, who now with several acolytes appeared in the corridor, and shouted: "Zhishen, where is your respect?"

Although he was drunk, Zhishen recognized the Abbot's voice and throwing away his stick came forward to do obeisance. Pointing in the direction of the gallery, he said: "Zhishen took a couple of cups of wine but did nothing to provoke them. They got some others and they all came to attack me."

"For my sake," the Abbot said, "go and sleep now. We'll talk about it in the morning."

"It's only out of consideration for you, Father Abbot," Zhishen said. "Otherwise I'd beat this bunch of donkeys to death."

The Abbot told some acolytes to help Zhishen to the meditation couch. There he collapsed and fell asleep, snoring noisily. A good many of the senior monks then surrounded the Abbot, and said: "We warned you before, Father Abbot. And now what about all this? How can we keep a wild animal like that in our monastery? He is such a dreadful blot on the purity of our rule."

"Although undoubtedly something a little unseemly occurred today," the Abbot said, "the spiritual achievement will come in the end. In any case — we owe it to our benefactor, Mr. Zhao — we must overlook this one little transgression. I will deliver a reprimand tomorrow, that's all that's required."

The monks said to each other, contemptuously, "What an abbot! He has no sense at all!" and dispersed to their quarters.

Next morning at breakfast the Abbot sent acolytes to the meditation hall to summon Zhishen. They found him still sleeping, and had to rouse him. It gave them a big shock when immediately he threw on his cassock and rushed barefoot out of the room. But when they chased after him, and found him behind the Hall relieving himself, they couldn't stop laughing. As soon as he had finished washing his hands, they said: "Father Abbot wants to talk to you." Zhishen went with them to the Abbot's quarters.

"I know you were once an army officer, Zhishen," the Abbot said. "But our benefactor, Mr. Zhao, arranged for your ordination, and when I placed my hands on you I read you the five injunctions, not to kill, not to steal, not to fornicate, not to drink alcohol and not to lie. This is the rule by which we monks must live. Above all a monk must not drink, so how is it you were totally inebriated last night? You attacked the door-keepers, you damaged the red lacquered doors of the Hall of the Sutras, you beat the servants and porters and chased them away, shouting in a most unseemly manner. What explanation can you give for this behaviour?"

Zhishen knelt and said: "I won't do it again."

"You are a monk now," the Abbot said. "How can you break the rule against alcohol, and sully the purity of our order? If it wasn't for Mr. Zhao, I ought to expel you. Never do it again."

Zhishen rose and placing his palms together, said: "I won't, I won't."

The Abbot didn't send him away immediately but ordered breakfast for him, and continued to exhort him with good words. Before ordering him back to his quarters, he presented him with a cassock of fine cloth, and a pair of monk's sandals.

In olden days a good man wrote something excellent on the subject of wine. Here it is:

Everything that goes amiss, is always the fault of wine,
But if you would know the truth, hear these words of mine.
A man is made of earth, water, fire, and air,
Take yeast, grain, and water, good wine to prepare.
Unless the wine is broached, it sleeps in the bottle all day,
Until a man drinks it, it hasn't a word to say.
Some say you'll find it in childhood, the cause of drunkenness,
But whoever heard of a madness that comes from consuming rice?
Why is it after three cups a man loses all inhibition?
Why, at wine's behest, will he defend any position?
There's many whose nature is such they can't take a single drop,
There's many who at one sitting can lap ten gallons up.
One man can be stone cold sober yet rage like a fiend from hell,
Another's drunk as a lord but his reason's clear as a bell.
One who loved his liquor still left a revered name,
One through intoxication encompassed his country's shame.
There is an ancient saying that truly enlightens the thinker:
Drunkenness is not in the wine but in the wine's drinker.

So there you are! If you drink wine, you'd better learn moderation! As the saying is, "Wine can make and wine can mar." The coward drinks it and his nature is reversed, he's suddenly a brave man. What will happen to a hero then?

After the day of the drunken brawl, Lu Zhishen did not dare leave the monastery gates for all of three or four months. But then suddenly one day, when the weather had become warm — it was that weather you often get in April — he left his quarters and strolled through the monastery gate, to wander about outside, admiring the beauty of Mount Wu Tai. From far down the mountain a faint sound of hammering, ding-ding, dong-dong, was wafted on the breeze. Zhishen returned to his quarters and got some silver that he thrust inside his robe. Then step by step he descended the mountain, till he passed the gate which marked the limit of the temple grounds. Just beyond it, to his surprise, he discovered a settlement of some five or six hundred souls. There were butchers, greengrocers, and even wineshops and noodle-shops. "What a fool I am!" he said to himself. "If I'd known about this place, I needn't have taken that pail of wine, I could have come down here and bought some for myself. And all this time I've been suffering such agonies of deprivation! Let's go and have a look to see what we can buy to eat and drink."

The noise he had heard was caused by a blacksmith who was hammering iron there. On the house next-door was a sign saying, "Inn of the Father and the Son." Stopping in front of the blacksmith's, Zhishen found there were three men at work. "Ho, there, master," he called. "Have you got any good steel?"

At first when the blacksmith saw Zhishen, an unattractive and disturbing sight, with the short hairs erupting all over his shaven cheeks, he was somewhat afraid of him. He laid aside his work, and said: "Take a seat, Your Reverence. What kind of implement did you have in mind?"

"I want a monk's staff and sword," Zhishen said. "But do you have any top-quality steel?"

"I happen to have some excellent steel here," the blacksmith said. "But what weight would Your Reverence want the staff and the sword to be? I will make them according to your instructions."

"I'd like a one-hundred-catty staff," Zhishen said.

The blacksmith laughed. "That's a bit on the heavy side, Your Reverence," he said. "I probably couldn't make it, and anyway, how would you ever be able to manage it? Even King Guan's mace was only eighty-one."

"Do you think I'm not the equal of King Guan?" Zhishen said. "He was only a man, after all!"

"According to what they usually say, it would be better to make one of forty or fifty catties, that would be quite heavy enough."

"I'll have what you said before, like King Guan's mace, eighty-one catties," Zhishen said.

"Too thick and clumsy, Your Reverence, and difficult to use. May I suggest a sixty-two-catty staff made of finely polished steel? But please don't blame me if you find it too heavy to manage. I think I already know enough about the sword, no need for further instructions on that. I shall use only the best steel, of course."

"How much for the two?" Zhishen asked.

"I'm not going to haggle," the man said. "I'll take just five taels of silver."

"Five taels of silver it is then," Zhishen said. "And if you make them well there'll be a little bit extra for you."

The blacksmith accepted two taels on account, and said: "I'll make them at once."

Zhishen said: "I have some loose change here. I invite you to drink a cup of wine with me."

"You go ahead, Your Reverence," the man said, "but I have important work to do, so count me out."

No more than thirty paces from the blacksmith's Zhishen found a wineshop sign hanging under the eaves of a house. Pushing aside the curtain, he entered, sat down, banged on the table and called: "Bring me wine."

The shopkeeper said: "I'm sorry, Your Reverence, my house belongs to the monastery, and so does my capital. The Abbot has given orders: if we sell wine to any monk from the temple, they'll recall their loan and kick us out of our house. So you'll have to excuse me."

"You can sell me a little bit of wine," Zhishen said. "I'm not going to tell anyone I got it from you."

"No, I can't," the man said. "You'll have to get it somewhere else, Your Reverence. I'm sorry but that's that."

Reluctantly Zhishen got up, threatening: "I'll go somewhere else then but later I'll come back and I'll have a few things to say to you."

He left the wineshop, and walking just a few paces found another, with its sign on a pole outside the door. He walked straight in, sat down and shouted: "Ho, there! Bring me some wine, quickly."

"Not a hope, Your Reverence," the man said. "The Abbot has forbidden it, you must know that. Our living depends on it."

Zhishen refused to budge, and repeated his request four or five times but nothing would persuade them to sell him any wine. In the end he had to admit defeat, and he got up and left. He went to four or five more houses, with no greater success. Finally he hit on a plan. Unless he used his brain, how was he ever going to get hold of any wine? Far off among some flowering almond trees, on the very edge of the village, there was a house with a straw sign outside. When he got nearer, he saw that it was a small inn, more or less isolated from the other houses:

On the edge of the village the inn has stood many a year, set at an angle among mulberry trees and hemp beside the old road. White plank benches are set out for the customers to sit, and there is a hedge of bamboos and a fence of plaited thorns. The yellow rice wine has been pressed in a broken jar and a blue cloth serves as a curtain across the door. It's really a place to make you laugh, with its walls of mud and cow-dung. But famous wine!

Zhishen entered and seated himself beside the window. "Ho there," he shouted. "A wandering monk wants to buy a cup of wine!" The countryman looked him up and down, and said: "Where are you from Father?"

"I'm a pilgrim," Zhishen said, "I've just arrived in these parts and I'd like some wine."

"Father," the other said, "if you're one of the community on Mount Wu Tai, I can't sell you any."

"I'm not," said Zhishen. "So bring me the wine, quickly."

Awed by Lu Zhishen's appearance and something unusual in his tone, the countryman said: "How much do you want?"

"Don't bother about how much. Just serve the wine in big bowls, that will do."

After drinking some ten bowls, Zhishen asked: "What meat have you got? Bring me a plate."

"Earlier on I had some beef," the countryman said, "but I've sold it all."

But Zhishen had detected a smell of meat cooking. He went to explore the courtyard. Close to the wall he found a pot in which a dog was being boiled. "I see you've got dog meat here. Why don't you want to sell me any?" he protested.

"I thought as a monk you wouldn't eat dog meat. So I didn't ask you."

"I've got silver to pay for it," Zhishen said. "Here!" He gave some to the countryman and said: "Bring me half that dog!"

The countryman took the silver and quickly went to get half the boiled dog meat, together with some garlic paste that he set down in front of Zhishen. The latter began eagerly tearing the dog meat with his hands, dipping it in the garlic paste before eating it. He swilled it down with another ten cups of wine. The grease was dribbling down his chin but he didn't care, he was only interested in stuffing himself, nothing would stop him. The innkeeper who had been watching open-mouthed, cried: "Father, that's enough, isn't it?" Zhishen fixed him with a stern eye and said: "I'm paying for what I eat, so what's it to do with you then?"

"Do you mean you want me to bring you more?" the man asked.

"Bring me another quart of wine."

The man had to go and ladle out more wine. Zhishen drank this at one sitting. There was one dog's leg left over that he stuffed inside his robe. Just before reaching the door, he said: "Keep the change, I'll be back again to eat tomorrow." The horrified countryman stood at the door, wide-eyed and open-mouthed, and watched helplessly as Zhishen set off in the direction of the Mount Wu Tai monastery.

When Zhishen reached the pavilion halfway up the mountain, he sat down for a little. The wine had gone to his head but he felt full of energy. "It's a long time since I gave my fists and legs any work," he said to himself. "I feel stiff all over, I'd better practise a few movements." He descended from the pavilion, rolled up his sleeves, and began lunging left and right, high and low. This brought his strength back. The impact of his shoulder against one of the pillars of the pavilion set up a rumbling and then a crash as the pillar broke and one side of the pavilion collapsed. The noise was heard by the temple door-keepers, half the mountainside away, and looking down they saw Zhishen stumbling and weaving up the mountain. "Look out!" they cried. "The animal is intoxicated again. We must shut the gates and bolt them thoroughly." Watching through a crack, they saw Zhishen stagger up to the gates and finding them shut, start drumming on them with his fists. But they had no intention of opening up!

After knocking for some while, Zhishen turned round and caught sight of the massive door-god[3] on the left-hand side. "Why don't you help me knock, you big bugger!" he roared. "It's no good waving your fist at me, I'm not scared of you." Leaping onto the platform where the statue stood, he took hold of the rail and at one go, like someone pulling chives, wrenched it out. Picking up one of the broken palings he proceeded to thump and bash the feet of the door-god till plaster and paint began to fly. "Merciful heaven!" the door-keepers exclaimed when they saw this, "we must tell Father Abbot!" After a while Zhishen turned round and saw the door-god on the right-hand side. "Why are you opening your big fat mouth like that?" he shouted. "Are you laughing at me?" Leaping onto the right-hand platform, he gave the other door-god two blows on the legs and with a sound like thunder it came crashing down from its plinth. Zhishen stood there with the broken paling in his hand, and roared with laughter.

When the two door-keepers reported what was happening, the Abbot said: "Don't provoke him! Keep well away from him!" At this point the prior, the deacon, the bursar, and other senior monks arrived in the abbot's quarters and said: "That wild beast has got himself into a shocking state of drunkenness again. He's smashed the pavilion on the mountainside and the door-gods at the main gate. What are we going to do?"

"There's a saying that the Son of Heaven himself keeps out of the way of drunks," the Abbot replied. "All the more reason for me to. If he has damaged the door-gods, we will ask his sponsor, Mr. Zhao, to come and replace them; he can pay for the broken pavilion also. It's his responsibility."

"But those door-gods are supposed to protect our monastery," the monks objected. "We can't just change them!"

"Forget about the door-gods," the Abbot said. "Even if he had destroyed the Buddha of the Three Ages in the Great Hall, there would still be no better policy than to keep away from him. Don't you remember what he was like the time before?"

"What an abbot," the monks said among themselves. "What a blockhead!" To the door-keepers they shouted: "Don't open. Just stay there and listen!"

Outside Zhishen continued to make a tremendous row: "You motherfucking bunch of bald asses! If you don't open this door to me I'll set fire to it and burn the frigging temple down!"

Hearing these threats, the monks had no alternative but to order the door-keepers to draw the bolts and let the wild beast in. If they hadn't, he might really have done something terrible. With the utmost care the door-keepers quietly slid back the bolts, and then took off, as if they had wings, flying to hide in their rooms. All the other monks also made themselves scarce.

When Lu Zhishen, summoning all his strength, thrust at the door with both hands, he flew through so suddenly that he tripped and fell. He crawled to his feet, rubbing his head, and then rushed off to the monks' quarters. When he reached the meditation hall, the contemplatives were sitting in meditation. They had a fright when they saw Zhishen push aside the screen and enter but they quickly lowered their heads again. Zhishen just made it over to the couch. But then there was a dreadful gargling sound and he began to vomit on the floor. The stench was unbearable. "Heaven help us!" the monks muttered, covering their mouths and noses with their hands. After vomiting for a while, Zhishen crawled onto the couch, loosened his belt, and pulled off his robe and other garments pell-mell. As he did so, the dog's leg fell out. "Good!" he mumbled. "After vomiting, one ought to put something back!" He began to tear off pieces of meat and eat.

When the monks saw this, they used their sleeves to hide their faces, and the two contemplatives who were supposed to be Zhishen's mentors, sought to get as far away from him as possible. But Zhishen had noticed. He tore off a piece of dog meat and offered it to the first of them saying: "Go on, try it!" The scandalized monk used both his sleeves to shut out the sight. "You don't want it?" Zhishen said, and he thrust it into the mouth of the other monk, who had no chance of escape, because Zhishen grabbed him by the ear as he was getting off the couch and stuffed the dog meat in his mouth. Four or five contemplatives who were sitting on the other side of the couch jumped up to intervene but Zhishen threw away the rest of the dog meat, raised his fist and devoted himself wholeheartedly to rapping away on their shaven skulls.

The whole hall was now in an uproar, as monks ran to the cupboards to grab their robes and begging-bowls and escape. The commotion was about to cause a general walk-out, and there seemed to be nothing the prior could do to prevent it.

As Zhishen persisted in his rampaging, most of the pilgrims had taken refuge in the galleries. The bursar and the novice-master meanwhile, without telling the Abbot, had summoned an army of lay brothers, reinforced with temple servants, porters, cleaners and sedan-chair carriers, more than a hundred strong, wielding sticks and staves and forks, with towels wound round their heads for protection, who now charged in a body into the monks' dormitory. When Zhishen saw them, he let out a great roar and counter-attacked, forcing his way without even a weapon in his hands right down the dormitory. He overturned the altar in front of the image of the Buddha, and wrenched out two table-legs. Then he attacked again.

When Zhishen charged at them waving his two table-legs, the rest of the monks, seeing the fury of his attack, threw away their weapons and fled into the galleries. But as Zhishen advanced, gripping his two table-legs, monks threatened him from the other side, in a pincer movement. A great rage entered into him. Pointing east and charging west, feinting to the south and attacking to the north, he cleared all but the two ends of the room. Suddenly, just as he had almost reached the Hall of the Law, the Abbot's voice rang out: "Zhishen, cease this disgraceful behaviour! All of you stop what you are doing at once!" The monks on each side, among whom there were more than ten wounded, withdrew the moment they heard the Abbot. Lu Zhishen, when he saw his enemies retreating, threw away his table-legs and called out: "Father Abbot, come and help me."

By this time about seventy or eighty per cent of the wine's effect had worn off.

"Zhishen," the Abbot said, "you will be the cause of my death! Last time you got drunk and stirred up trouble, I informed your relative, Mr. Zhao. He wrote a letter apologizing to the whole community. Now you have again become intoxicated and behaved disgracefully, offending against the purity of our rule, demolishing a pavilion and damaging the door-gods. All this we might perhaps overlook. But you have also upset the monks and driven them out of the meditation hall. This is a serious crime. This temple of the Bodhisattva Manjusri has been for hundreds and thousands of years a place of tranquil contemplation and respectful worship, how can it harbour such an offensive presence? You will therefore come with me to my quarters for the next few days, until I can arrange somewhere to send you."

Zhishen went with the Abbot. The Abbot told some monks to persuade the pilgrims to stay and return to the meditation hall, and went to meditate himself. The wounded monks retired to rest. Zhishen spent the night in the abbot's quarters.

The next day the Abbot deliberated with the prior. "Let us collect some taels of silver for him and send him somewhere else," they decided. But first Mr. Zhao had to be informed. The Abbot prepared a letter that two lay brothers delivered to Mr. Zhao's house. They recounted the affair and waited for the reply. After reading the letter, Mr. Zhao was very upset. In his reply, after respectful greetings to the Abbot, he said: "As far as the damaged statues and pavilion are concerned, I will make sure that you receive the money for repairs immediately. As for Lu Zhishen, he must simply go wherever Your Holiness sees fit to send him."

On receiving this the Abbot sent an acolyte to fetch a robe of plain black cloth, a pair of monk's sandals and ten taels of silver. Then he called Zhishen. "Zhishen, the first time you got drunk and upset the whole monastery, I accounted it a casual slip. But when you get drunk again, damage the door-gods, pull down the pavilion, and sow confusion in the meditation hall, it is no laughing matter. You have even wounded some of the pilgrims. Our monastery is a place for peace and quiet; these actions of yours are absolutely inadmissible. Out of consideration for Mr. Zhao, however, I am going to give you a letter that will enable you to find sanctuary. It is of course impossible for me to keep you here. But last night I meditated upon your case and I am going to give you a four-line verse which will serve you all your life."

"Please tell me where I can find this sanctuary, Father," Zhishen said. "And please let me hear the four-line verse." The Abbot told Lu Zhishen these things and that is why

Laughing as he wields his bonze's staff,
He dares confront the bravest of the brave.
Unsheathing his Buddhist blade in fearsome wrath,
He rids the world of many a treacherous knave.

WHEN Lu Da turned round he saw that it was Old Jin of the wine shop at Weizhou who was pulling him. They went to a quiet spot where the old man said, "Benefactor! You are too brave! That proclamation orders your arrest, and yet you go to look at it. If I had not seen you, you might have been recognized by a minor official."

"I will tell you the truth," said Lu Da, "because of your affair I killed the Bully, and I have been wandering about for fifty days, and did not plan to come here. Why did you not return to Kaifeng as it was arranged?"

"My superior benefactor!" said Old Jin. "On the day you saved me I hired a cart, and left with the intention of returning to Kaifeng but on the way I met an old neighbour of ours who was coming here to do business as a merchant, and he brought us here. Fortunately, he arranged a marriage for my daughter with a wealthy man, Zhao Yuanwai,[54] who kept her as a concubine. My daughter is always telling him of your benevolence, and he says that he would like to meet you. Let us go and see them now."

They went about half a li to the house of Zhao where Old Jin lifted the curtain in front of the door, and called out, "Daughter, our benefactor has arrived."

She came outside and invited Lu Da to enter and sit down. She then gave him six salutations, and asked them to go upstairs. He wished to leave but Old Jin took his staff and bundle, and said to his daughter, "Please take our benefactor upstairs, and I will go to arrange the food." He then went with a servant, and bought some fresh fish, a tender chicken, a goose cured in wine, and some pickled fish. Upon returning he had these cooked and taken upstairs. The girl servant brought the hot wine in a silver pot and father and daughter took it in turn to fill up Lu Da's cup. Old Jin knelt and made his obeisance. "Why do you pay me such respect?" exclaimed Major Lu Da, "you lessen my prospects in life." "Benefactor, please listen, I have been here a short time but I wrote your name on a piece of red paper, and every morning I burn a stick of incense and made obeisance to it. Now that you are here in person why should I not do the same to you?"

In the evening they heard a noise below. Major Lu then opened the window, and looked down; he saw about thirty men armed with wooden sticks and cudgels, who were calling out, "Bring down the man from upstairs." Among them was an official on horseback who was shouting, "I do not want this thief to escape." Upon hearing this Lu Da took a stool and was going to dash down to fight. Old Jin called, "You need not fight about this." He then descended and went to the official, and spoke to him a few words. The official laughed and dismissed the men. He dismounted and went indoors. Old Jin requested Major Lu Da to come down. The official was Zhao Yuanwai who knelt, kowtowed, saying, "To learn of your name is not so good as to see your face; to see your face is better than knowing your name. Famous Major, please receive my obeisances."

Lu Da asked Old Jin, "Who is this person? We are not acquainted, why does he make obeisance?" "This is my daughter's husband," replied Old Jin. "He suspected that I had brought an outsider here to drink wine, therefore he brought his servants to beat him. When I told him the truth he sent his men away."

Major Lu and the others went upstairs and sat down. Zhao Yuanwai said, "I wish to express my respect to you at this time. I have heard a great deal of your heroism and today Heaven has granted me this meeting."

"I am very stupid and am deserving death," said the Major. "If you do not mind my poverty and misfortune, we shall become close friends, and if you have anything to do I shall be willing to serve you."

Zhao Yuanwai was much pleased and inquired about the murder. They chatted, and compared notes about fencing with lances. They drank wine to midnight, and then went to rest.

The next day Zhao Yuanwai remarked: "I do not consider this place is safe, so I decided to take you to my native village which is three li from town." He sent a man to the village to bring a horse which Lu Da mounted, and the farm servant was asked to carry the baggage. They took leave of Old Jin and his daughter, and as they rode abreast, they chatted. The next day Lu Da said, at a feast, "You are treating me well, and I am not able to return your kindness." Zhao Yuanwai replied, "Within the four seas all men are brothers, so why mention 'returning the kindness'?"

Lu Da stayed there for a week. One day Old Jin hurriedly arrived and told Lu Da, "Benefactor, I have a suspicion, because of that affair the other day the neighbours talked about it, and yesterday four policemen came making inquiries. I am afraid that they will come here and arrest you."

Lu Da said that he had better go, and Zhao Yuanwai replied, "I have another plan, I will find a peaceful retreat for you if you would agree to go." Lu Da asked where that place was, and Zhao Yuanwai said, "About ten li from here is a mountain called Mount Wutai, and on it is a monastery called Wenshu Monastery. This was the earthly abode of the Bodhisatva Wenshu, and now there are about seven hundred monks in the monastery. The Abbot's name is Zhi Zhen, and he is a close friend of mine. An ancestor of mine endowed the monastery. I once took the vow that I would subsidize a monk there. I have purchased the certificate, monk's gown, and alms bowl. I have no trusty person who would fulfill my wish but if you would care to do so, I will arrange matters for you. Are you willing to have your hair cut off and become a monk?"

Lu Da thought the matter over, "Now I must leave here; but where can I go? I had better do as you suggest." So he said, "I accept your offer and will become a monk. I have confidence in you." During the night they arranged matters, and prepared the clothes, traveling expenses, rolls of silk, and other gifts for the temple. They rose early the next morning and called servants to carry the articles. They started at seven o'clock and reached the foot of the mountain at eleven. There they engaged two sedan chairs to take them up the mountain, and the servant was sent in advance to announce their arrival. They were met at the monastery by the manager and superintendent of that monastery, and were conducted to a pavilion outside the temple gate where the Abbot came with his attendants to welcome them.

After a little while the Abbot took them to his private room for tea. Abbot Zhi Zhen requested Zhao Yuanwai to take the seat of honour. Lu Da took a monk's seat and sat down in a lower position. Zhao leant over and whispered in Lu Da's ear, "You have come here to become a monk. How can you sit down opposite to the Abbot?"

"I do not understand their customs," said Lu Da. He then rose and took his position at the side of the Squire. In front of them stood the chief monk, the Wei Na, the abbot's assistant, the superintendent of the temple and his assistant, the guest's host, and the scribe, in order of rank. The servants brought in the box containing the gifts and placed it in front of the Abbot, who said, "Why have you brought presents again? We have plenty of your donations in this monastery." The servants and the acolytes removed the gifts, and then Zhao Yuanwai stood up and said, "Previously I wished to subsidize a monk here. I had the certificate but up to now I have not found the proper man. My cousin, Lu Da, was a military officer at Weizhou but he saw the misery of the present generation and has rejected the common lot. He begs the Abbot to have mercy and receive him as a monk. I would prepare all the articles for him. I have great hopes that the Abbot will satisfy his desire."

The Abbot upon hearing this replied, "This will bring glory to our monastery. It can be easily arranged." He then told the acolyte to serve tea that was done. After tea the Abbot discussed with the Wei Na the question of cutting off Lu Da's hair and making him a monk. He ordered the superintendent to supply the plain food for his fasting. He told all the other monks to be present to discuss the matter with their brothers. They did this, and the general opinion was that Lu Da had not the appearance of a monk, and moreover his eyes looked cruel. They asked the guest's host to request Lu Da to sit at another place, so that they could talk this matter over with the Abbot. The host invited Zhao Yuanwai and Lu Da to go with him to the guest chamber. The monks addressed the Abbot, saying, "This man who wishes to become a monk has a repulsive and cruel appearance, and we cannot shave him. We are afraid afterwards our monastery will be disgraced."

The Abbot answered, "He is a cousin of our donor Zhao Yuanwai so how dare we offend him? You should not suspect him; you can wait here and let me have a look at his features." He then burn a stick of incense, placing it in the vase for that purpose. He sat down, cross-legged, in a monk's meditation and began to chant. When the stick of incense was finished, he returned to the other room, and said to the monks, "You may now shave his head. He is a representation of a heavenly star, and he is quite upright. At present he is cruel but his future is favourable, and he will become pure. In the process of transmigration he has become uncommon, and is better than any of you. You must remember what I say and accept it."

The chief monk answered, "As you connive at his faults so we have no alternative but to obey. If we reprove him, then we are not obeying you." The Abbot ordered the common food to be prepared, and invited Zhao Yuanwai and Lu Da to dine with him. After the meal the superintendent opened the donations book, and Zhao Yuanwai gave some money, telling him to buy things necessary for a monk. In two days they were ready, and the Abbot selected a lucky time and day, and at that time the bells and drums were beaten, and the monks assembled in the Great Hall. There were altogether about six hundred, wearing their surplices, and they knelt down in an attitude of prayer, in two rows, before the Abbot's throne. Zhao Yuanwai brought silver paper money, and kowtowed before the Abbot. He stated the case clearly, and then the acolytes led in Lu Da. The Wei Na told Lu Da to remove his hat, let his hair down in nine plaits, and then fold it on the top of his head. The barber shaved the head all round including the mustache and beard. Lu Da asked, "Would it not be better if you leave me just a little?" Upon hearing this the assembled monks could not help laughing. The Abbot from his throne addressed them, "Let all listen to this

'Shave him clean of every hair,
Leave not e'en a root,
Cleanly shave the young monk's head,
So no strife may shoot.'"

The Abbot exclaimed loudly, "Shave it all off!" The barber took his knife, and shaved what was left. The abbot's assistant holding aloft the certificate brought it before the throne, and requested the Abbot to bestow a new name. The Abbot taking the certificate said,

"Priceless is the holy light,
Silver buys it not;
Buddha's laws are very broad,
Thy name is 'Wise and Deep.'"

The certificate was then handed to the recorder who completed the entries, and then gave it to Lu Da. The Abbot ordered that the priestly robes and the surplice be issued to the novitiate. The superintendent then conducted Lu Da to the throne, and the Abbot placed his hands on the new monk's head, saying: "First, you must conform to the laws of Buddhism; second, you must observe the rules of the order; third, you must be friendly to the monks. These are the three rules to obey but there are also five prohibitions as follows: You must not take life, steal, fornicate, covet wine, or speak falsely." Lu Da expressed his assent, and said he would not forget them. Upon hearing this statement, the monks laughed.

After the ceremony Zhao Yuanwai invited all the monks to accompany him to the Cloud Hall where he burnt incense, and then dined with them. He gave presents to all the officials of the monastery. Lu Da was conducted by the superintendent, and the monks all kowtowed to him.

The following day Zhao Yuanwai wished to return home, and after breakfast a large number of monks accompanied him to the main entrance where after saluting he addressed them, "Let all display mercy. Your younger brother 'Wise and Deep' (Zhishen) is very stupid and he speaks foolishly. He does not understand etiquette, and may unintentionally break your rules. I request you to forgive his faults on my account."

"Never mind," replied the Abbot. "I myself will teach him to read and chant the classics, and discuss the truth with him in the prayer hall."

Zhao promised to recompense the kind treatment. He beckoned Lu Da to a fir tree where he said, "Worthy brother, from today your life will improve but at all times you must not forget your weakness, and not be so confident of yourself. If there is any further trouble it will be difficult for us to see each other. So take care. By and by I will send a man with clothing for you." Lu Da promised to follow his advice, and then Zhao Yuanwai took leave of the Abbot and the crowd of monks. And down the mountain he departed. Lu Da went to the monks' dormitory, and lay down to sleep. On either side of him was a monk, and they both pushed him; saying, "Get up! This won't do! As you have left home, why do you not sleep in a sitting position?"

"I am going to sleep, and what is that to do with you?" answered Lu Da. A monk exclaimed, "What a calamity!"

Lu Da shouted, "Even a tortoise I shall eat; what calamity will there be?"

The monk replied, "Of course there will be a calamity." Lu Da said, "A tortoise has a big belly but the fat is sweet and nice to eat, so why should there be a calamity."

The monks took no more notice of him and let him sleep. The next day they wanted to report to the Abbot that Lu Da had been unreasonable: but the abbot's assistant advised them not to interfere as the Abbot would only protect him.

Lu Da saw that nobody spoke to him and therefore every evening he went to rest; he lay aslant across the bed. During the night he snored like thunder, and made great noises. He pissed and shit behind one of the halls. An attendant reported to the Abbot that Lu Da had bad manners and did not observe the customs of a monk. The Abbot shouted, "Nonsense! You must not forget the donor. I expect there will be an improvement later." After this no one dared speak about Lu Da.

Lu Da lived at the Mount Wutai monastery for about five months without noticing the time pass but upon winter coming he thought of leaving. At that time the weather was fine, so he wore a long black gown with a black belt, changed his monk's shoes, and walked down the hill. About halfway he sat down in an arbour and meditated, "What a glutton I am! Previously I liked good wine and meat, and never restrained my appetite. Now I have been trained as a monk, and I am hungry and thirsty. Zhao Yuanwai has not sent me any food for several days, and I feel ravenous. I should like some good wine." Just then he saw in the distance a young man carrying two buckets on a pole, and singing as he ascended the mountain path. The buckets were covered with lids. He had in his hand a bowl and sang:

On the battlefield of Mount Jiuli,
A herdboy got a sword and spear
From the days of long ago;
A fair wind ruffles the waters near
Where the River Wu sings the heroes' song
Of Xiang Yu's wife and her farewell woe.

Upon reaching the arbour the man put down his load, and Lu Da asked what the buckets held and he was told it was wine. "What is the price for one bucket?" asked Lu Da. "Reverend, are you joking?" asked the man. "Why should I joke with you?" said Lu Da. The man answered, "I am taking this wine up the mountain to sell it to the cooks, messengers, sedan-chair carriers, and other servants at the monastery. The Abbot has given an order that if we sell any wine to a monk he will punish us, take our money, and expel us from the monastery. The Abbot gave me the capital to buy the wine and I live in the monastery, so how dare I sell wine to you?"
"But why cannot you sell?" asked Lu Da.
"Kill me and still I will not sell," replied the man.
"I won't kill you," said Lu Da. "I am only asking you to sell the wine."
The man saw that trouble was brewing so he picked up his load and walked away. Lu Da quickly left the arbour, took hold of the carrying pole, and kicked the man in the groin. The fellow clasped his hand over the injured part, crouched upon the ground, and did not rise for a long time. Lu Da seized the two buckets of wine and took them into the arbour. He opened the buckets and ladling out the cold wine, drank it. In a little time he had drunk a bucketful of wine. Lu Da spoke, "You come to the monastery tomorrow and demand the money."
The man was now free from pain but was afraid that the Abbot would hear of the matter and punish him. He was angry but he suppressed his passion. He dared not ask for the money. He divided the remaining wine in the two buckets, shouldered his load, and flew down the mountain.
Lu Da sat in the arbour for half the day, and the wine mounted to his head. He took off his gown, and tied it round his waist by the sleeves, exposing his tattooed back. In this manner he went back up the hill, swinging his arms. As he neared the monastery, the gatekeepers saw him, and placed two bamboo boards across the entrance, and called out to him, "You are a disciple of Buddha, and yet you come here drunk. You are not blind; you have seen the order posted at the Treasury that monks are forbidden to drink wine, and if they disobey this they will receive forty blows with the bamboo, and be expelled from the monastery. If we allow you to enter in this state, we shall be punished with ten blows. Go away at once, and we will not say anything."
Although Lu Da was now a monk, yet he had not changed his temper. He stared at them and cursed, "You thieving bastards! If you hit me, I will fight you."
Seeing the danger of trouble, one of the gatekeepers ran to report the matter to the superintendent. Lu Da knocked the bamboo boards to one side, slapped the gatekeeper's face, and stumbled forward. The gatekeeper attempted to stop him but Lu Da knocked him down. This was certainly disgraceful but he stumbled forward into the courtyard. The superintendent had collected together about thirty servants, and armed them with white sticks. Upon meeting them, Lu Da roared like a clash of thunder, and advanced with big strides. The servants seeing his fierce appearance hurriedly retreated to the storeroom and closed the two folding doors. Lu Da struck the doors, and kicked until he forced the doors open. The men were cornered, and Lu Da seizing a stick drove them out. The superintendent had reported the trouble to the Abbot who taking his five attendants arrived on the scene and called out, "Lu Da, you are making a mistake!"
Although Lu Da was drunk, yet he recognized the Abbot. He threw away the stick, and saluted. "I have had only two cups of wine. These men came and hit me."
"Pay attention!" replied the Abbot. "Go and sleep at once, and tell me about it tomorrow."
"I would kill you bald-headed donkeys but for the Abbot," said Lu Da.
The Abbot ordered his attendants to assist Lu Da to a bed in the dormitory, and upon reaching it he fell down, and was soon fast asleep and snoring. A crowd of monks now surrounded the Abbot, saying, "We remonstrated with you before, and now this has happened. We object to this wild cat remaining here, as he will only upset our pure ways of life."
The Abbot replied, "Though there is trouble now, there will be a different state of affairs afterwards. I have no alternative but you will forgive him when you appreciate the influence of his donor. Tomorrow I will tell him that I cannot tolerate such bad conduct, and that will end the matter."
"What an injudicious Abbot!" jeered the monks. They all separated to their rest.
The next day after breakfast, the Abbot sent his attendants to summon Lu Da. He was not awake. They waited until he arose, and put on his long gown. Suddenly he dashed out to the surprise of the attendants. Following, they found Lu Da pissing behind the temple. When he had finished he went with them to the Abbot. "Lu Da," said the Abbot, "you were previously a military man and were introduced here by Zhao Yuanwai, I have given you some instructions. You must not take life, nor steal, nor fornicate, nor drink wine, nor lie. These are the usual five prohibitions for monks: but the most important is that you should not drink wine. Why did you return drunk last night; strike the gatekeepers, break open the doors of the storeroom, drive out the servants, and generally misbehave yourself? Why did you do this?"
Lu Da knelt, and replied, "I dare not do it again."
The Abbot asked, "Why did you break our rule about drinking wine, and so broke our laws of purity. I should have expelled you from the monastery if it had not been for the good character of your benefactor Zhao Yuanwai. Hereafter you must not break our rules." Lu Da arose, and clasping his hands said, "I certainly will not dare do that."
The Abbot then took him inside and ordered breakfast for them both. During the meal he gave him good advice, a monk's robe of fine cloth, and a pair of shoes, before dismissing him. "When there is wine drinking, one must not go to excess. There is a common saying, 'Matters can be settled or ruined by wine.' Cowards drink wine; they can have false courage, and muddle their affairs. But what does it do to the bold and impetuous?" After the drunken brawl Lu Da dared not venture out of the monastery for three months. One day in the second lunar month, the weather was very hot, and he strolled out of the monks' quarters standing outside the monastery gate, gazing and appreciating the beautiful view. Suddenly he heard the sound of knocks down the mountain carried upwards by the wind. He returned for some silver which he hid in his breast, and then slowly walked down the hill. At the bottom he saw a crowd of people attending a fair. There were butchers, greengrocers, wine and bread shops. He thought if he had known of this place earlier he would not have drunk the wine of the bucket but have gone there for it. These few days he had felt depressed, so he decided to ascertain what eatables were procurable. He heard again the sound of knocking and he knew that it was iron being worked. He saw on the wall between two shops the characters for "The Father and Son Inn." One of the two was a blacksmith's shop in which three men were working, and Lu Da asked them if they had good steel. The blacksmiths saw that Lu Da had a short growth of beard which gave him a disagreeable appearance, and made them half afraid of him at first sight. They ceased work and said, "Reverend, please be seated. What kind of work have you for us?"
"I want you to make an iron staff and a broad sword," said Lu Da. "I did not know you have such good steel here."
A blacksmith answered, "We have good steel here; you had better give us the order, for we do not yet know how heavy you want them."
"I need a staff weighing one hundred jin," said Lu Da.
The blacksmith laughed, saying, "Very heavy, master. I am afraid we cannot do it: but even if we could, perhaps you could not use it. The great halberd used by Guan Gong was only eighty-one jin."
"I am not as good as Guan Gong but he was only a man," said Lu Da.
"According to my idea, a staff of say sixty-two jin will be heavy enough."
"Now according to your account of Guan Gong's great halberd, make me one of eighty-one jin," said Lu Da.
"Reverend, it will be very big. It will not look well, and will be inconvenient to use. I think it would be better to make one of sixty-two jin, and have it brightly polished. But if you cannot use it, do not blame me. As you have decided upon it, we need not go into details: we will use the best iron and make it here."
"How much do you want for making them?" asked Lu Da.
"Not more than five taels of silver," replied the blacksmith.
"I will accept your word, so here is the money," said Lu Da. "If it is well made I will give you extra money." The blacksmith received the money, and said, "It shall be done at once."
Lu Da walked a short distance from the shop and saw the signboard of a wine shop. He lifted the curtain at the door, entered, and sat down. He tapped on the table, calling for wine.
"Excuse me, Reverend," said the innkeeper, "this wine shop belongs to the monastery that furnished the capital. The Abbot controls our affairs and does not like us to sell wine to men from his monastery but should we do so, he would expel us, so do not consider it impolite if we cannot supply you."
"Never mind that." replied Lu Da, "you can sell me some wine and I will not say a word about it."
"I cannot do that," answered the innkeeper. "Please go to another place and don't think us rude."
Lu Da rose, saying, "I will go and will not talk further with you." Going out a few paces, he saw a flag over the door of a wine shop. He entered, sat down and called for wine. "Reverend, you evidently do not understand that the Abbot controls our affairs, and so by coming here you endanger our livelihood."
Lu Da was determined to have wine but he knew that they would not sell any. He tried some more shops with the same result. In the distance he saw a broom hanging in front of a house which was situated in a cluster of the apricot trees. Upon approaching he found it was a small inn just outside the village. He went in and sat down near the window, calling, "Innkeeper, I am a stranger here and I want a cup of wine."
The proprietor looked at him carefully, "Reverend, where do you come from?"
"I am a traveling monk, and I happened to pass here." "If you are from the monastery at Mount Wutai, I cannot sell you any wine."
"I do not come from there. Bring me some wine quickly."
The proprietor saw that Lu Da had the manner and speech of another district, so asked how much wine he wanted. "Bring me a large cup of warm wine," said Lu Da. "What meat can I have with it?"
"This morning I had some beef but it is now all finished."
Lu Da could smell the meat which was being cooked, so going outside he saw along the wall an earthen boiler, containing dog's flesh. He said, "Why don't you sell me this?"
"I was afraid that a monk may not eat the dog's flesh."
"I have some silver," said Lu Da, offering it to the proprietor, "let me have half of the dog."
The proprietor prepared the dish with some powdered garlic, and placed it before Lu Da who tore the flesh apart with his fingers and dipping it in the garlic, ate it. Although he drank ten cups of wine, he still wanted more. The innkeeper was afraid and remarked he had had enough. Lu Da stared at him, "I will pay you, so why interfere?" The man asked how much he wanted and Lu Da said, "A bucketful." This was supplied and Lu Da drank it rapidly. There was still a leg of the dog which he picked up and put in his breast. As he left the inn, he said that he would come again the next day. The proprietor was speechless on hearing this, and saw that he was going in the direction of Mount Wutai.
Lu Da walked halfway up the mountain and rested in an arbour till the effect of the wine passed away. At last, getting up, he said to himself, "For a long time I have had no drill in hand combat and feel my body is not in good form—I will have a little practice here. Taking his long sleeves, he rolled up the ends and thrust in all directions. He was swinging his arm, when he struck against a pillar of the arbour with such force as to break it, and it fell with a great crash. The doorkeeper of the monastery heard this noise, and looking below saw that Lu Da was staggering up the path. He said, "Much trouble! This brute is extremely drunk again." He closed the gate, and taking the bar fastened it. Then gazed through a crack in the door, and watched Lu Da approaching. When Lu Da reached the door he struck it with his fist but the gatekeeper dared not open it. Lu Da turned and saw on the left side of the door, a guardian idol, covered with gilt, to which he shouted, "You big prick, why do you not knock the door for me, instead of frightening me with that attitude: but I am not afraid of you." He then mounted the steps—took hold of the railings in front of the idol, and pulled them up, as if plucking onions. He took one of the broken rails and struck the idol: the painted clay fell to the ground. The gatekeeper seeing this ran to report it to the Abbot. Lu Da then turned, and saw another gilded idol, at which he shouted, "You are opening your mouth wide, and laugh at me." He ascended the steps on that side and struck the foot of the idol twice with the railing. There was a tremendous noise as the idol fell to the ground at which Lu Da laughed loudly.

When the Abbot heard of the matter, he said, "We must not make him angry: you had better go away." A crowd of monks had collected, and they said, "That wild cat is extremely drunk. He has broken the arbour and the idols at the entrance. What shall we do?"
"Since ancient times the Emperor has always avoided drunken men, so why should I not do the same," said the Abbot. "As to the images and the arbour he destroyed, the patron will repair them."
The monks left the Abbot's quarters saying, "How stupid is our Abbot. The doorkeepers do not open the door but listen."
Outside, Lu Da was shouting, "You thieving stinking bald-headed donkeys! If you do not let me enter the monastery I will set fire to the building."
The monks upon hearing this told the gatekeepers to draw the bar and let the brute in. They did this quietly and stealthily, and then hurried into the buildings to hide themselves. The monks also got out of the way.
Lu Da using both hands pushed against the doors with great force and fell to the ground as they opened. Scrambling up, he rubbed his head, and then rushed into the meditation hall. There were many visiting monks seated in contemplation, and they were alarmed at his sudden, noisy entrance. Lu Da went to the side of the hall and vomited. The monks were disgusted with the stench and covered their noses with their hands. Lu Da got on a bed, took off his silk belt, and tore apart the fastenings of his clothes, and the dog's leg fell out. "How nice," he said picking it up, "I am very hungry just now." So saying, he ate it. Upon seeing this the monks covered their faces with their sleeves, and those on both sides of him withdrew. Lu Da seeing this movement, offered a piece of the dog's leg to a monk who covered his face with his sleeves. Lu Da asked why he did not eat it, and then pushed the flesh at the lips of another monk. About five monks on neighbouring beds leapt forward to intervene but Lu Da throwing the meat away hit the monk with his fist several times. This raised a loud shout from the monks who went to the cupboards to get their clothes and alms bowls with the idea of leaving. This created a general confusion which the monk in charge could not control. The superintendent summoned all the servants, including groundsmen, cooks' assistants, messengers, sedan-chair carriers, altogether about two hundred men, who seized sticks, rice shovels, staffs and cudgels, and placing towels round their heads, entered the hall in a body. Upon seeing them Lu Da howled, and, having no weapon, hurried to the centre of the hall, pushed over the table for offerings in front of Buddha, and having broken off two of the legs he advanced. When the menial monks saw his fierce expression, they retreated to the veranda but as Lu Da only flourished the table legs they soon returned to the attack. Lu Da was very angry and struck on both sides. He had moved towards the hall where the scriptures were expounded, and there he met the Abbot who called out, "Lu Da, you are unreasonable! You monks must not lay a hand on him." The monks retreated and Lu Da threw away the legs of the table, asking the Abbot, "Will you tell me what I must do?" At that moment Lu Da was nearly sober.
"Lu Da, you have implicated me seriously," said the Abbot. "You were drunk previously and created a lot of trouble. Now you are again drunk, knocked down an arbour and broken two idols. You have also made trouble with the monks, so that they have all to go away. This sin of yours is not a small one. This, my Wenshu Monastery, on Mount Wutai, has been kept holy and sacred for more than a thousand years, so how can I keep a filthy thing like you here? But you can live in my quarters for a few days more until I find a place for you to go to."
Lu Da accompanied the Abbot to his quarters. The Abbot sent word for the visiting monks to return and continue their contemplations. The monks that were injured had their wounds attended to.
Next day, the Abbot wrote a letter to Zhao Yuanwai sending it with two messengers who waited for his reply. When Zhao Yuanwai read the letter, he was very sad. He wrote a reply and said that he would pay for the repairs; as for Lu Da, he would leave him to the Abbot to be banished.
When the Abbot received the letter, he instructed his attendants to bring a gown of black cloth, a pair of shoes, ten taels of silver, and fetch Lu Da. Upon his arrival the Abbot reproved him about his offences; telling him he had decided to expel him from the monastery. He continued, "During the night I thought of your affairs, and have prepared for you four sentences from our sayings which you can use until your dying day."

Laughing monk with staff so rare,
And ordained sword so beautiful;
Fought with heroes everywhere,
And punished traitorous ministers.

005

The Big Chief Little King comes to his wedding-night & Raises & Goes Inside the Gold-Spangled Bed Curtains, Drunk; By having a Fight, Peach Blossom Village in Thrown into Confusion & Pandemonium raised by Lu Da Zhishen the Boisterous Tattooed Monk

"Zhishen," said the abbot, "you definitely can't stay here. In the Eastern Capital a Buddhist brother of mine, called the Lucid Teacher, is the abbot of the Great Xiangguo Monastery. Take this letter to him and ask him to find you a job. Last night I had a vision and composed a four-line prophetic verse to guide your destiny. You must remember these words."
Kneeling before him, Lu said: "I'd like to hear the prophecy."
The abbot intoned: "Take action in the forest, prosper in the mountains, flourish amid the waters but halt at the river."
Zhishen kowtowed to the abbot nine times, shouldered his knapsack, tied bundles round his waist, and placed the letter in a pocket. He bid farewell to the abbot and the monks, left Mount Wutai, put up in the inn next door to the ironsmith and waited for his staff and sword. The monks were glad to be rid of him. The abbot told the lay brothers to clean up the wreckage of the guardian idols and the pavilion. A few days later Squire Zhao brought some money personally and had the idols and pavilion repaired. Of this we'll say no more.
Zhishen waited several days at the inn. When his two weapons were finished, he made a sheath for the knife and had the staff painted. He gave some extra silver to the smith, shouldered his knapsack, hung the knife at his waist, took up the staff, bid farewell to the innkeeper and the ironsmith, and set forth.
"What a tough-looking monk," people on meeting him thought.
He took the road for the Eastern Capital and travelled for more than half a month. Lu didn't stop at any monasteries. He always spent the night at inns and ate in taverns during the day.
As he was walking along one afternoon he became so absorbed in the beauty of the hills and streams that he failed to notice the lateness of the hour. Suddenly he realized he'd never reach the next inn before dark, and he had no travelling companion. Where could he spend the night?
He hastened on another twenty or thirty // While crossing a wooden bridge he observed in the distance, shimmering beneath scarlet sunset clouds, a manor house in a grove of trees. Behind it rose massive tumbling mountains.
"I'd better put up for the night in the manor," Lu said to himself.
As he drew near, he saw scores of peasants busily moving things from one place to another. At the entrance to the manor he rested his staff and hailed a few vassals.
"What brings you to our manor this evening, monk?" they asked.
"I couldn't reach an inn before dark," he replied. "I hope your manor will put me up for the night. I'll be moving on tomorrow morning."
"We're busy tonight. You can't stay."
"It's only for one night. Tomorrow, I'll leave."
"Hurry along, monk. Don't hang around here if you want to live."
"That's strange talk. Why such a fuss about spending one night? What's so dangerous?"
"Get going. Otherwise you're liable to be seized and bound."
Zhishen lost his temper. "Can't you oafs be civil? I haven't said a word against you, and you threaten to tie me up!"
Some of the peasants swore at him, others tried to calm him. Lu raised his staff to sail into them when an old man emerged from the manor. About sixty, he walked with a staff higher than his head.

"What are you rowing about?" he shouted at his vassals as he approached.
"That wretched monk wants to hit us," they replied.
"I'm on my way to the Eastern Capital from Mount Wutai," said Lu. "I couldn't reach an inn and I asked to stay the night in the manor. But these surly louts want to tie me up."
"Since you're a reverend from Mount Wutai," said the old man, "come with me."
Zhishen followed him into the main building where they took their seats as host and guest. "Our peasants didn't know you were from the place of the living Buddha, Reverend," said the old man. "Don't hold it against them. They thought you were an ordinary monk. I myself have always respected Buddha, his teachings, and his disciples. Although we're busy tonight, we shall be glad to put you up."
Lu rested his staff, stood up and bowed respectfully. "Thank you, patron. May I ask your honourable name?"
"Our family name is Liu. Because this place is called Peach Blossom Village, the peasants refer to me as Grandpa Liu of Peach Blossom Village. May I ask the reverend's name, and what he is called in the Buddhist order?"
"My surname is Lu. Our abbot gave me the Buddhist title of Zhishen."
"Please have dinner with us, Reverend. Are you a meat abstainer by any chance?"
"I'm not opposed to wine or meat. The wine can be clear or cloudy. Beef or dog meat, I eat them all."
"Since you have no special scruples, I'll have my vassals serve you meat and wine."
A table was set up, and chopsticks laid out. Vassals brought Zhishen a platter of beef and three or four kinds of vegetables. He put aside the bundles which had been tied around his waist and sat himself at the festive board. A vassal warmed the wine and filled Zhishen's cup. The monk didn't need to be coaxed. In a trice he finished off both the pot of wine and the platter of meat. Grandpa Liu, sitting opposite, stared at him in amazement. Rice was brought. Zhishen consumed this as well.
Finally, the table was removed. "Please make yourself comfortable in the wing next door, Reverend," said the old man. "If you hear any noise during the night, don't come out whatever you do."
"Would you mind telling me what's going on here tonight?"
"It's not the sort of thing to discuss with a person who's disowned the material world."
"Why are you looking so unhappy, grandpa? Has my coming here put you to too much bother? Tomorrow, reckon up what I owe you and I'll pay.
"Hear me, Reverend. We give food and shelter to monks often. What difference does one more make? The trouble is my daughter is getting married tonight, and bringing a son-in-law into the family."
Zhishen laughed. "Men and women all must marry. It's an important event in every person's life and perfectly normal. What is there to be upset about?"
"You don't understand, Reverend. We don't want this marriage."
"Silly old man," Lu smiled. "If you aren't willing, why did you agree?"
"I have no other children, and my daughter's only nineteen. Not far from here is a height called Peach Blossom Mountain. Two chieftains built a stronghold on it recently with six or seven hundred men. They pillage and rob but the police of Qingzhou haven't been able to stop them. A few days ago they came to our manor to collect tribute, and one of the chieftains saw my daughter. He gave me twenty ounces of gold and a bolt of red satin as an engagement pledge, and chose tonight for the wedding. He said they would be married here in the manor. I had no way of opposing him. I had to consent. That's why I'm upset. It's not that I don't welcome you, Reverend."
"So that's how it is. Suppose I reasoned with him and convinced him not to marry your daughter, how would that be?"
"He's a rogue who kills without batting an eye. How can you make him change his mind?"
"When I was on Mount Wutai I learned the Buddhist Laws of Logic from the abbot. Now I can talk a man around even if he's hard as iron. Tell your daughter to hide. I'll reason with the groom in her chamber and get him to call the marriage off."
"It sounds all right but be sure you don't tweak the tiger's whiskers."
"I want to live too, don't I? Just leave everything to me."
"That's fine. How lucky my family is to have a Buddha like you come down from Heaven!"
The vassals were startled to hear of this arrangement.
"Would you like some more to eat?" this old man asked.
"I don't want any more food," said Lu, "but if you still have some wine you might give me a little."
"We've plenty," Grandpa Liu assured him. He told a vassal to bring a cooked goose and a large wine bowl. Zhishen drank twenty or thirty bowls of wine and finished the goose. A vassal was directed to put his bundles in a guest-room.
Lu took up his staff and knife. "Has your daughter hidden herself, grandpa?" he asked his host.
"I've sent her to a neighbour's."
"Let's go to the bridal chamber, then."
The old man led him to the door of a room. "It's in there."
"Now you can all go about your business."
Grandpa Liu and his vassals went out to prepare the wedding feast. Zhishen pushed aside all the tables and chairs in the room. He put his knife at the head of the bed and leaned his staff against the bedside. Lowering the gold-spangled bed curtains, he stripped to the buff, jumped into the bed and sat there.
It was growing dark. Grandpa Liu ordered his vassals to light lamps in the front and rear of the house. A long table with incense, lamps and candles was set up on the threshing ground. The old man called for large patters of meat and a big pot of warmed wine.
Around the first watch the sound of drums and gongs was heard on the mountainside. Grandpa Liu, worried about his ruse, and the vassals, sweating with apprehension, went out of the manor gate to look.
In the distance forty or fifty torches, turning the night as bright as day, revealed a troop of men, on horse and afoot, speeding towards the manor. Grandpa Liu shouted for his vassals to open the gate wide, and went forward to meet them. The crowding, jostling throng bore gleaming weapons bedecked with ribbons. Wildflowers adorned the hair of the lesser bandits. Four or five red gauze lanterns at the head of the procession illuminated the mounted brigand chieftain. On his head was a peaked hat, indented in front, of pale red, with a lifelike silk flower tucked under it beside his ear. His powerful frame was draped in a green silk robe embroidered with gold thread, bordered with wool, and bound at the waist by a gold-spangled red sash. He wore high-heeled leather boots and rode a big white horse with a curly mane.
At the manor gate the chieftain dismounted. His men crowded round and congratulated him. "In a shiny new hat, tonight you'll be a bridegroom. In well-fitting clothes, tonight you'll be a son-in-law."
Grandpa Liu hurried forward with a cup of good wine on a tray, and knelt before the bandit chief. The vassals did the same. The chieftain raised the old man to his feet.
"You are my father-in-law. You shouldn't kneel to me."
"Don't say that," Grandpa Liu replied. "I'm only one of the subjects in the great chief's domain."
The chieftain, who was already eight-tenths drunk, laughed heartily. "You won't lose out by taking me as a son-in-law. I'm the right match for your daughter."
The old man presented him with the ceremonial cup of wine for the dismounting guest, then led him to the lamp-lit table on the threshing ground. "You shouldn't have arranged such an elaborate welcome, father-in-law," the brigand protested courteously.
He drank three more cups and proceeded to the reception hall. He instructed his men to tie the horses to some willows. Several of the bandits began beating drums and gongs outside the hall.
The chieftain seated himself. "Father-in-law, where is my wife?" he asked the old man.
"She doesn't dare come out. She's too shy."
The brigand laughed. "Bring more wine. I must offer you a return toast." But when he took his cup in hand he said: "I want to see my bride first. I'll drink with you later."
Grandpa Liu was anxious to have the monk reason with him. "I'll show you to her room," he replied. Holding a lighted candle, he escorted the chieftain around a screen to the door of the bridal chamber. "This is it," he said. "Please go in." He departed with his candle. Not at all sure their plan would succeed, he wanted to get out of the way, fast.
The chieftain pushed open the door. Inside it was pitch dark. "That father-in-law of mine is a frugal manager," he muttered. "He doesn't even light a lamp and leaves my bride sitting in the dark. I must have my men bring him a keg of oil from our mountain stronghold tomorrow."
Lu Zhishen, seated behind the bed curtains, muffled his laughter. He didn't utter a sound. The brigand felt his way to the centre of the room.
"Wife," he exclaimed, "come out and greet me. Don't be shy. Tomorrow I'll install you as mistress of the fortress." Calling to his "wife," he groped forward until he touched the gold-spangled bed curtains. He opened them and thrust his hand inside. It brushed against Lu's belly. The monk promptly seized the chieftain by the head, hat and all, and pushed him down, struggling, on the bed. Zhishen clenched his right hand into a fist.
"Mother-raping thief," shouted the monk, and struck him a blow on the neck and ear.
"How can you hit your master?" cried the bandit chief.
"I'm teaching you to recognize your mistress," retorted Zhishen. He hauled him off the bed and pummelled and kicked him.
"Help!" howled the bandit.
Outside, Grandpa Liu was paralyzed with shock, for the cry came at the very moment he was sure Zhishen was reasoning with the chieftain. The old man took up a lamp and hurried into the room, followed by a swarm of bandits. They saw a big stout monk, without a stitch of clothes on, seated astride their chieftain beside the bed and thumping him vigorously.
"Save our chief," shouted the bandit in the lead. The others rushed at Zhishen, cudgels and lances in hand.
The monk pushed the chieftain aside, snatched his staff from the bedside, and charged. He attacked so fiercely that the bandits cried out and fled. The old man could only exclaim in dismay.
In the excitement, the chieftain crawled out of the room, ran to the front gate, and groped his way to an unsaddled horse. He broke a branch from a willow, leaped on the animal's back and flailed with his improvised whip. The beast didn't move.
"Woe is me," thought the bandit leader. "This horse is tormenting me too!" Then he looked, and saw that in his haste he had forgotten to untie the rein from the tree. Quickly, he ripped it loose, and dashed away, riding bare-back, at a gallop.
"Just wait, you old donkey," he swore at the old man as he left the manor gate. "Don't think you're going to fly out of this!" He struck the animal another couple of blows with the switch. It scampered pell-mell up the mountain.
Grandpa Liu grasped Zhishen by the arm. "You've brought disaster down on my whole family, Reverend!" he groaned.
"Excuse my bad manners," replied the monk. "Bring my clothes and cassock, then we can talk."
A vassal went back to the room and fetched the garments, and Zhishen dressed.
"I was hoping that you would reason with him, persuade him to change his mind," said the old man. "I never dreamed you were going to beat him up. He's sure to tell all about this when he gets back to the fortress. Now the bandits will come down in force and slaughter me and my family!"
"Don't worry, grandpa. To tell you the truth, I used to be a major in the border garrison of Old General Zhong in Yanan Prefecture. Because I killed a man, I had to become a monk. Two thousand mounted men wouldn't scare me, to say nothing of a few piddling bandit chiefs. Try and lift this staff, you fellows," he said to the listening vassals, "if you don't believe me."
Of course, none of them could do it. Zhishen picked up the staff and twirled it as if it were a lamp wick.
"You mustn't leave us, Reverend," pleaded Grandpa Liu. "My family needs your protection!"
"That goes without saying. I wouldn't leave if my life depended on it."
"Bring wine for the reverend," the old man called. To Lu he said: "But don't drink yourself into a stupor."
"When I'm one-tenth drunk I can use only one-tenth of my skill but when I'm ten-tenths drunk I'm at the top of my form."
"In that case, all right. I've plenty of wine and meat here. Have as much as you want."
We'll speak now of the head bandit. Seated in his stronghold on Peach Blossom Mountain, he was about to send a man down to see how his second in command was getting on with his wedding when a number of brigands, breathing hard and looking very distraught, rushed in, crying: "Woe, woe!"
"What's wrong?" he demanded quickly. "Why are you in such a pain?"
"Our number two chief has been beaten up!"
The startled leader began to question them. Voices outside exclaimed: "Number Two has come back!"
The head bandit looked. His lieutenant had lost his red hat, his green robe was ripped and tattered. Number Two dismounted and collapsed in front of the hall.
"Save me, brother, save me," he pleaded.
"What happened?"
"I went down to the manor and entered the bridal chamber. That wretched old donkey had sent his daughter away and hid a big fat monk in her bed. Not suspecting a thing, I opened the bed curtains and felt around. The lout dragged me down and punched and kicked me till I was black and blue. When our men came to my rescue, he left me, grabbed his staff and went after them. Otherwise, I'd never have escaped with my life. You must avenge me, brother!"
"So that's how it was. You go inside and rest. I'll catch that scabby thief and bring him here," said the head brigand. He called to his men: "Get my horse ready at once. All of you come with me."
He mounted and took his lance in hand. With as many men as he could muster, he rode down the slope. Everyone was shouting and yelling.
To get back to Lu Zhishen. He was drinking in the manor when a vassal announced: "The head bandit is coming down the mountain with a big gang!"
"Don't worry," said Lu. "As I knock them over, you fellows tie them up and take them to the magistrate and collect the rewards. Bring me my sword."
Zhishen removed his cassock, tied up the skirts of his robe, and hung the sword on his belt. Staff in hand, he strode out to the threshing ground. In the light of many torches he saw the head bandit carrying a long lance, riding swiftly towards the manor.
"Where is that scabby donkey?" shouted the brigand chief. "Come out and settle this once and for all!"
"Dirty unflogged scoundrel," swore Lu. "I'll teach you to know me!" Whirling his staff, he charged.
The chieftain parried his blow. "Hold off a minute, monk," he cried. "Your voice is very familiar. What's your name?"
"I'm Lu Da, former major in the garrison of Old General Zhong, and nobody else. Now that I'm a monk, I'm called Lu Zhishen."
The brigand laughed delightedly and rolled from his horse, tossing his weapon aside. He clasped his hands together and saluted.
"I hope you've been well since we parted. So it was you who gave my lieutenant that drubbing!"
At first the monk thought it was a trick. He leaped back a few paces and rested his staff. But when he got a good look at the man in the torchlight he saw it was none other than Tiger-Fighting General Li Zhong, who put on a show with weapons in the streets to sell his medicines.
Li Zhong took Zhishen by the arm. "What made you become a monk, brother?"
"I'll tell you about it inside."
Grandpa Liu, watching, was dismayed. "So the monk is one of them, too," he thought.
Lu went back into the manor house, put on his cassock, then led Li Zhong to the hall to talk over old times. The monk sat down in the middle of the hall and called to Grandpa Liu. But the old man didn't dare come forward.
"Don't be afraid of him, grandpa," said Lu. "He's my brother."
This alarmed the old man even more, and he continued to hang back. Li Zhong took the second-ranking seat. The old man then took the third.
"I will tell you my story, sirs," said the monk. "After killing the 'Lord of the West' in Weizhou with three punches, I fled to Yanmen County in Daizhou Prefecture. There I met Old Jin whom I had saved and sent off to the Eastern Capital. He had gone to Yanmen instead with a man he knew. His daughter was living with a rich landlord, Squire Zhao, who was very respectful to me the day we met. But the police were hot on my trail, so the squire paid out money and sent me to the abbot on Mount Wutai where I shaved off my hair and became a monk. Because I got drunk twice and rioted in the meditation room, the abbot has given me a letter to the head of the Great Xiangguo Monastery in the Eastern Capital, asking him to give me a job. Last night it was too late to find an inn, so I put up in this manor. I never thought I'd run into you, brother. Who is that fellow I beat up? And what are you doing here?"
"The day after I left you and Shi Jin at the tavern in Weizhou I heard that you had killed Butcher Zheng. I went to talk it over with Shi Jin but he was gone. Then I heard that the police were after you, so I quickly left, too. I was passing the foot of the mountain here when that fellow you thrashed came down with a gang and attacked me. He's called Zhou Tong, the Little King, and has a stronghold on Peach Blossom Mountain. I defeated him, and he asked me to stay as lord of the fortress, and gave me the first throne. I've been an outlaw from that day on."
"Since you're the leader, call off the marriage to Grandpa Liu's daughter. She's his only child, and he's been hoping she would look after him for the rest of his days. You can't take her and leave him alone."
Grandpa Liu was very pleased. He had food and wine placed before his two guests. Each of the lesser bandits was served two steamed rolls, two slices of meat, and a big bowl of wine. All ate their fill. Grandpa Liu also returned the engagement gifts of gold and satin.
"Take them, brother," Zhishen urged Li Zhong. "I'm putting this whole matter in your hands."

"That can be arranged," said Li Zhong. "Please stay at our little stronghold a while, brother. Grandpa Liu, you must come too."
The old man had his vassals prepare a sedan-chair for Lu Zhishen. They carried him off with his staff, knife and luggage. Li Zhong rode on horseback. Grandpa Liu went in a smaller sedan-chair. By then the morning was very light.
On reaching the fortress, Lu and the old man got out of their sedan-chairs and Li Zhong dismounted from his horse. The bandit chief left them to the assembly hall and all three took their seats.
Li Zhong summoned Zhou Tong to come forward. When Zhou Tong saw the monk he thought angrily: "Not only don't you avenge me, brother but you invite him here and give him a seat of honour!"
"Do you know who this monk is, brother?" asked Li Zhong.
"If I knew who he was, maybe I wouldn't have been beaten!"
Li Zhong laughed. "Remember I told you about a man who killed the 'Lord of the West' with three blows of his fist? Well, that's this monk!"
Zhou Tong clutched his head, "Aiya!" he cried. He stepped forward and kowtowed. Zhishen returned his greeting. "Please don't hold our clash against me," said the monk. The three took their seats but the old man remained standing before them.
"Hear me, Brother Zhou," said Lu. "There are some things you don't know about this match with Grandpa Liu's daughter. She's his only child. He needs her to look after him and carry on the family line. If you take her away in marriage, he'll have no one. In his heart I'm sure he's against that. Give her up as a favour to me and choose another good girl. Here are the gold and satin engagement gifts. What do you say?"
"Since it's you who ask it, brother, I won't enter their gate again."
"A real man never goes back on his word," Zhishen reminded him.
Zhou Tong broke an arrow as a pledge. Grandpa Liu bowed his tanks, returned the gold and satin, and went back down the mountain to his manor.
Li Zhong and Zhou Tong had oxen killed and horses slaughtered and gave a feast. They entertained Zhishen for several days, showing him the scenic spots in the front and rear of the mountain. Peach Blossom Mountain was quite remarkable. Wild and foreboding in appearance, it had steep cliffs on all sides overgrown with tangled grass, and could only be climbed by a single path.
"A good place to defend," said Zhishen.
Within a few days he realized that Li Zhong and Zhou Tong were not very generous, in fact they were rather stingy. He decided to leave. The two did their best to persuade him but he refused to remain.
"I'm already a monk," he explained. "I can't become a bandit."
"If you insist on leaving, brother," said the bandit chieftains, "we two will go down the mountain tomorrow. As much as we pick up, we'll give you for your travelling expenses."
The next day pigs and sheep were slaughtered in the stronghold and a farewell feast was laid. When all was in readiness, many gold and silver wine goblets were placed on the table.
Just as the diners were about to sit down and start drinking, a bandit came in and reported: "There are two large carts and about a dozen travellers passing at the foot of the mountain."
Li Zhong and Zhou Tong at once mustered their men, leaving only two to wait on Zhishen and serve him wine. "Brother," said the brigand leaders, "please have a few cups without us. We're going down to collect some riches. We'll join your farewell banquet later." They left instructions with the bandits remaining with Zhishen and went down the mountain at the head of their men.
"What tight-wads," thought Zhishen. "They don't give me any of this mass of gold and silver they've laid out here but wait until they rob something and present me with that! It doesn't cost them anything. Only travellers on the public road have to suffer. I'm going to throw a scare into those oafs!"
He told the two bandits attending him to pour some wine, and he drank two cups. Suddenly, he jumped to his feet, knocked them down with one blow of the fist each, bound them with his sash, and gagged them with knots of hemp rope. He emptied his rucksack of everything except absolute essentials, then swept the gold and silver vessels from the table, trample them flat, and stuffed them in. He placed the abbot's letter in the bag containing his monk's certificate that he wore on his chest. Zhishen hung the knife at his waist, took up his staff and left the stronghold with the sack on his head.
At the rear of the mountain he looked down the slope. It was steep and there was no path. "But if I leave by the front path," he thought, "I'm sure to run into those varlets. I'd better roll down here where the grass is thick."
He tied the sack and knife together, dropped them over the side, and tossed the staff down after them. Then he rolled down the slope, tumbling all the way to the foot of the mountain without injury. Zhishen jumped to his feet, found his sack, tied on his knife and picked up his staff. He selected a path and struck out in the direction of the Eastern Capital.
To get back to Li Zhong and Zhou Tong. On the side of the mountain they met the dozen or so travellers. All were armed. The brigand chiefs levelled their lances and their men moved forward. "If you have any sense," yelled the bandits, "shell out and buy yourselves a free passage!"
One of the travellers, brandishing a halberd, rushed Li Zhong. They fought more than ten rounds, back and forth, neither vanquishing the other. Zhou Tong, angered, ran up with a shout, the rest of the bandits following. The travellers couldn't withstand so many. They turned and fled. Some were too slow, and seven or eight were slain. The bandits seized the carts and valuables and slowly returned up the mountain, singing triumphantly.
When they reached the stronghold they found their two mates bound to a pillar. The gold and silver goblets which had been on the table were gone. Zhou Tong untied the two bandits and asked: "Where is Lu Zhishen?"
"He knocked us down and bound us," they replied. "Then he wrapped the vessels and took them all away!"
"That scabby thief is no good," said Zhou Tong. "He's played us dirty! Which way did he go?"
They searched until they found his prints leading to the rear of the mountain. They saw the flattened grass on the slope.
"He's an experienced crook, the scabby donkey," said Zhou Tong. "Rolling down a steep incline like this!"
"Let's catch and question him," Li Zhong proposed. "We'll put the rascal to shame!"
"Forget it," said Zhou Tong. "There's no use locking the door after the thief is gone. Where would we look? Even if we talked to him we wouldn't get our things back. You and I are no match for him in a quarrel, and it would only make things awkward if we ran into him again later on. It's better to drop the whole business. In the future, if we meet, we can pretend nothing has happened. Let's open the packages on the carts. We'll divide the gold and silver and silks into three portions. You and I will each take one. The rest can be split among the men."
"He's stolen a lot of things that belong to you," said Li Zhong. "Since I was the one who brought him here, you take my share too."
"Brother," said Zhou Tong, "we're in this together, live or die. There's no need for petty reckonings between you and me."
Reader, remember this well: From their lair on Peach Blossom Mountain, Li Zhong and Zhou Tong plundered and robbed. As to Lu Zhishen, when he left the bandit fort he travelled from morning till afternoon, covering fifty or sixty li. He was hungry but there were no taverns on the road. "I set out early with no thought but to travel fast," he said to himself. "I haven't had a thing to eat. Where can I find some food?"
He gazed all around. He heard, in the distance, the sound of bells. "Good," he thought. "If it's not a Buddhist monastery, it's a Taoist temple. Those bells are hanging from the eaves and the breeze is making them tinkle. That's the place for me." If Zhishen hadn't gone there, more than ten lives wouldn't have been lost in the night and a famous ancient landmark on a sacred mountain wouldn't have been consumed in flames. But the result was red fire spewed from golden halls, black smoke curled in jade-green temples. To which holy structures did Zhishen go?

What the Abbot said was this: "Zhishen, for you to stay here is out of the question. But I have a Brother in the Way who is at the Xiangguo Temple in the Eastern Capital. He is the Zen Master Pure Knowledge. I shall give you this letter for him. Go there and ask him to find you a position in the monastery's administration. Last night I meditated on your case, and I am going to give you this four-line verse that will serve you all your life. You must have these words always in mind."
Lu Zhishen knelt and said, "I want to hear it, this four-line verse." Then the Abbot recited:

When you find a forest, you will rise.
When you find a mountain, you will prosper.
When you find water, you will grow.
When you find a river, you will cease.

Zhishen listened, and then prostrated himself nine times before the Abbot; he picked up his bundle, tied his purse and a bag of provisions about his waist, put the letter in a safe place, and bidding farewell to the Abbot and the other monks, left Mount Wu Tai. He went straight to the inn beside the forge, to lodge there while he waited for his monk's staff and sword to be finished. Not one of the monks at the temple but was delighted at finally being rid of Lu Zhishen. The Abbot ordered workers and lay brothers to collect the broken pieces of the door-gods and the pavilion. Not long after, Mr. Zhao himself brought gifts and money to Mount Wu Tai, and the door-gods were restored and the pavilion on the mountainside repaired. We say no more of that but offer you instead this poem:

From one temple departing, he lands in another temple;
He meets an old friend, who's obliged to part with gold.
Before his awesome might the wicked tremble;
The holy verse delights his mystic heart.
For long he's known to all as the Flowery Monk;[1]
But Profound Wisdom is his true and rightful name.
When worldly desires are fled, then comes the harvest,
Only, for now, none understands his game.

So Lu Zhishen stayed on at the inn for a few days until the articles he had ordered at the blacksmith's were ready. Then he had a sheath made, that he could slip the sword into, and had the staff lacquered. After tipping the blacksmith, he slung the sword over his shoulder, picked up the staff, bade farewell to innkeeper and blacksmith, and took to the road. Those he passed on the way noted a coarse-looking sort of monk:
He wears his patched black robe with the sleeves draped over his shoulders, and the blue sash slantwise, tied at both ends. The sword sleeps in its scabbard, three feet of menace; the staff rests on his shoulder, a long steel monster. His crane's legs are carefully strapped and bound; the begging-bowl is securely tied to his spider's paunch. Around the mouth, a sprouting of hairs like steel wires; the chest bared to reveal a wintry pelt. The face shows the signs of feeding on meat and fish: this is no devotee of the scriptures; no mumbler of pious invocations, this.
Well, as we were saying, Lu Zhishen had left the Manjusri Temple on Mount Wu Tai, and was headed for the Eastern Capital. He travelled for half a month. When he needed rest he didn't look for any temple, oh no! It was to inns he went, for his comfort and solace; and at wineshops he would eat scandalously in broad daylight!
One day, as he went along, the beauty of the scenery so engrossed him that he failed to notice how late it was getting:

In the hills the shadows deepen.
The locust's shade is swallowed up.
On the town's edge, lush groves of poplars
Welcome back the birds to sleep.
Through bright orchards of peach and apricot
Homeward plod the cows and sheep.
As the sun goes down, a blue mist rises,
Water reflects the day's last gleam:
The fisherman's boat traverses the stream,
A boy in the fields rides the calf home.

Thus he went, for the whole afternoon, lost in the beauty of his surroundings and finding no inn to put up at. Nor was there any other traveller to give him company. Where would he find shelter for the night?
After following a path through the fields for almost ten miles and crossing a wooden bridge, he perceived in the distance, under the warm glow of the setting sun and just visible amid a little clump of trees, a manor house. Behind this manor the mountains crowded, range upon range of them. "I'd better go and ask them to let me stay the night," Zhishen thought to himself. When he arrived at the gate he found a dozen servants busily rushing this way and that, carrying things. Leaning on his staff in front of the house, Zhishen hailed them.
"What brings you here at this time of day, Your Reverence?" they asked him.
"I can't find an inn," he replied. "I'd like to stay — just for one night. I'll be off tomorrow."
"You can't stay," they said. "There's something happening here tonight."
"I can sleep anywhere," Zhishen insisted. "I'll be leaving tomorrow."
"You'd better be on your way, Reverend," said one of them, "if you value your life!"
"Extraordinary! I request lodging for one night, what's so difficult about that? And what's all this about valuing my life?"
"Get out right now, otherwise you're going to find yourself tied up!"
Lu Zhishen began to get angry. "You morons!" he said. "You must be raving. I haven't said a thing, and you want to tie me up!"
Some of the villagers tried to use persuasion, while others continued to threaten. But Zhishen raised his staff, and he was just about to put it to good use, when an old man appeared. He must have been more than sixty years of age, this old man, and he held a stick that was taller than himself. "What's the matter with you all?" he shouted as he came through the door.
"It's this monk, drat him, he's trying to attack us!" the retainers said.
"I am a monk from the Mount Wu Tai community," Zhishen said. "I am on my way to the Eastern Capital, on business, and I cannot find an inn for the night. I requested a night's lodging here at your manor but these ill-mannered wretches threatened to tie me up."
"If you are from Mount Wu Tai," the old man said, "do come in, please."
Zhishen followed him into the hall, where master and guest sat down ceremoniously. "Please forgive them, Father," the old man said. "They did not know you were from a house of the Living Buddha; they took you for just an ordinary monk. I personally have always venerated the Three Jewels, [2] and although we do have something going on in this house tonight, I beg you to stay and rest here."
Zhishen laid down his staff and stood up to return respectful thanks, saying: "Your Honour is most gracious. Might I be allowed to ask your name and the name of this manor?"
"My name is Liu," the old man said, "and this place is called Peachblossom Village. The people call me Squire Liu of Peachblossom Hall. May I ask Your Reverence's name and religious name, if you have taken one?"
"I am a disciple of Abbot True Knowledge," Zhishen said, "I took the religious name of Profound Wisdom, and since my own name is Lu, I am Lu Zhishen."
"I trust you will take supper, Father," the old man said. "I am not aware whether you are a strict vegetarian or not?"
"I do not exclude meat and fish," Zhishen said. "And if you happen to have any wine —cloudy or clear, I am not particular. I can eat beef, dog meat, whatever is convenient."
"Since you are not a strict abstainer then I will ask my people to get wine and meat," the old man said. And in no time, a table had been set up and a plate of beef, with three or four vegetable dishes and a pair of chopsticks, were laid for Zhishen. He removed his belt and bag and sat down. The servant brought a jug of wine and a glass and poured for him. Zhishen was not bashful or over-polite, and the jug of wine — all of it — and the meat were gone in a flash. His host, who had seated himself opposite to watch him eat, could not get over his amazement. Rice was brought, and when that too was gone the table was removed.
"I must apologize, Father," the Squire said, "for asking you to sleep at the back and not in the house. If you hear noises during the night, don't come out to investigate, I beg you."
"Forgive me for asking but what's going on here?" Zhishen said.
"It's not something for the ears of a holy man like yourself," said the Squire.
"But you seem disturbed about something," Zhishen said. "I hope it isn't because I'm giving you too much trouble. Tomorrow I shall most certainly pay you for my lodging."
"I can assure you, Father," the old man said. "In this house we always give alms and provide for many monks, how could one more be a problem? It's just that tonight my daughter is getting married. That's the reason why we're all so upset."
Zhishen burst out laughing. "When a man grows up he must find a wife, when a girl comes of age she needs a husband," he said. "It's the way of the world, it accords with the five principles. Why should it upset you?"
"But you see, this match is not of our choosing."
Zhishen remained unimpressed: "That's ridiculous, Squire. If the two partners are not in accord, there's no sense in taking on a superfluous son-in-law."
"I've only the one daughter, she's just nineteen," the old man began to explain. "Now, you see, there's a mountain in this neighbourhood, Mount Peachblossom it's called, and not long ago two robbers — 'Big Chiefs,' they call themselves — established themselves there, setting up camp with five or six hundred men. They've been causing havoc to houses and property. At present the Qingzhou militia are out on a sortie and haven't got time to do anything about them. When they came to my house to ask for money they saw my daughter. One of them threw down twenty taels of gold and a piece of red brocade and said it was a betrothal gift. He fixed on today as an auspicious date, and he's coming back tonight to take up residence in my house. I can't possibly fight him, so I've just got to put up with him. That's why I'm worried, not because of anything to do with you, Father."
"In that case," Zhishen said, "suppose I can find a way to make him change his mind, and give up the idea of marrying your daughter?"
"But he's the sort that would murder you without batting an eyelid. How are you going to make him change his mind?"

"When I was with Abbot True Knowledge on Mount Wu Tai, I learnt the art of reasoning. Even if this robber's made of iron or stone I'd be able to convince him. For tonight, send your daughter somewhere else. I'll stay in your daughter's room and I'll reason with him till he changes his mind."
"That's marvellous," the Squire cried. "Only don't go plucking the tiger's whiskers!"
"I know how to take care of myself. Just leave it all to me."
"That's wonderful then! What a blessing on my house that a living Buddha has come down to be with us!"
The rest of the household heard all this in amazement.
When the Squire asked Zhishen if he had had enough to eat, the latter replied that he was full but that he wouldn't mind a little more wine if there was any. "Of course, of course," the Squire said, and ordered the servants to prepare some slices of roast goose and bring more wine, serving it in a big bowl. Zhishen drank to his heart's content, finishing off more than twenty bowls and disposing of all the roast goose. Then, telling the servants to carry his bundle to the bedroom for him, he took up his staff and sword. "Is your daughter hidden yet?" he asked the Squire.
"I've already sent her to a neighbour's," the old man replied.
"Then lead me to the bridal chamber," Zhishen said.
The old man showed him the way. "Here it is," he announced.
"You'd better go and hide too," Zhishen said.
While the Squire and his people went off and prepared the banquet, Zhishen piled tables and chairs and everything else in one corner of the room, placed his sword by the pillow, propped his staff by the bedside, lowered the gold-embroidered curtain, removed all his clothes and sprang naked onto the bed to sit there and wait.
When the Squire saw it was beginning to get dark he ordered the servants to light lamps and candles everywhere, and set up a big table with incense, flowers and lights on the threshing-floor. Big plates of meat were also laid out and huge jugs of warm wine.
Around seven o'clock gongs and drums were heard from the direction of the mountain. Squire Liu was busy thinking of the secret plan but the rest felt their palms clammy with fear. They went to the gate of the manor and looked out. Far off fifty torches blazed like the light of day, as a troop of horsemen galloped towards them:
From the blue shadow of the mist-cloaked hills

Like a host of headless riders they pour out.
From lost green forest fringes the mob spills,
Like a pack of hungry ghosts in angry riot.
For ferocious looks there's nothing to choose between them;
Each from beneath a blood-red turban squints;
Their coats are red as maple leaves in autumn,
Red-tasseled spears surround the barbaric prince,
Crossed cudgels hedge about the heartless chieftain.
This night scene's like a Rakshasa's family outing:
The great beast rides in state down from the mountain,
With all his hideous host around him shouting.

Ordering his people to open wide the manor gates, Squire Liu went forward to receive the company. The troop surged about him, their weapons glinting, streamers of red and green waving. The ordinary soldiers had stuck wild flowers in their turbans. Four or five lanterns of red silk went in front, throwing their light on the chieftain on his horse:
He wore a conical red hat, pinched in front and hollow on top, with an artificial flower at the temple, most realistic! His mighty frame was clad in a close-fitting green tunic picked out with gold and his solid waist was girt with a red sash with gold embroidery. He was shod in high-heeled leather boots and rode a tall white charger with a long mane.
Arriving in front of the manor, the Big Chief dismounted. His escort sang out in unison:

You're getting spliced tonight,
You've a brand-new hat.
Your tunic's nice and tight.
What'll she say to that?

Squire Liu hurriedly took the jug in his own hands, poured out a cup of his best wine, and knelt to offer it. All the servants also knelt down. The Big Chief raised the Squire with his own hands and said: "You are my father-in-law, you don't have to kneel to me!"
"No, that's not right," the Squire replied. "I am only your humble subject."
The Big Chief, already three parts drunk, burst into cackles. "That's right," he said, "I'm coming to be your son-in-law, so you're not doing at all badly. Your daughter's got quite a catch, hasn't she?"
After the Squire had offered the stirrup-cup, they went on to the threshing-floor. When he saw all the lights, the incense and the flowers, the robber king said to the Squire: "Why, what a reception, O Venerable Parent!" He drank another three cups. When he reached the main hall, he remembered to tell his men to tie his horse to a willow tree. Others of his troop advanced to the doors of the hall and entertained the company with the music of fifes and drums. The Big Chief seated himself and said: "Now then, Father-in-law, where is my wife?"
"She's a little shy," the old man said. "She wouldn't come out."
"Give me some more wine then," the Big Chief said, with a leer. "I shall drink your health." He took a cup but then thought better of it: "Why don't I pay a call on my wife first? There'll be time for drinking afterwards."
Now the old man was just waiting for this, praying that the monk could make the robber change his mind. "I'll show you the way myself," he said quickly, and taking a candlestick he led the Big Chief on, till passing behind a screen they stood before the bridal chamber. "Here it is," he said. "Please go in, Your Highness." And he quickly left, taking the candlestick with him. Uncertain whether the outcome would be happy or disastrous he wanted to establish an escape route.
The Big Chief pushed open the door. It was pitch-black inside. "What a father-in-law!" he grumbled. "He's too stingy to light even a candle in the room. He lets my wife sit here in the dark. Tomorrow I'll have to get my men to bring down a big bucket of oil from the fortress to present to him."
Lu Zhishen heard all this, where he was sitting inside the curtain, and had to stifle his laughter. As the Big Chief groped his way into the room, he said: "Wife, why don't you come out to receive me? You mustn't be shy — from tomorrow you'll be the wife of a Robber King!" Thus addressing his wife, and at the same time cautiously feeling his way, he advanced till his fingers touched the gold-embroidered curtain. He stopped and stretched an exploratory hand inside till it encountered Zhishen's stomach, whereupon the latter gripped a corner of his turban and threw him onto the bed. When he tried to struggle, Zhishen made a fist with his right hand and, muttering "You dirty fornicator!" smashed it into his ear and neck. The Big Chief yelled blue murder: "Why are you beating your husband?" he cried.
"To teach you to know your wife," Zhishen roared, heaving the brigand onto the edge of the bed and raining down punches and kicks till he screamed for help.
Old Liu was thunderstruck when he heard cries for help coming from inside the room, because he had really believed that the monk would somehow convince the robber by his powers of reasoning. He snatched up his lantern, and followed by members of the robber band rushed into the bedroom. What they saw was this huge, burly monk, stark naked, sitting on the bed astride the Big Chief and pummeling him vigorously. The leader of the band shouted, "To the rescue, all of you!" and they all charged forward waving sword or staff to rescue their Big Chief. Zhishen abandoned his victim and, picking up his staff from beside the bed, jumped down and began to fight his way to the door. Before the fury of his attack the robbers scattered with cries of terror. Squire Liu simply stood there bewailing his fate.
Amid the confusion, the Big Chief managed to crawl out of the bedroom door. Following this he rushed to the front door, felt around till he found his horse that was unsaddled, broke off a branch from the willow, vaulted onto the horse's back and started belaboring it with the branch. The horse did not move. "Curse it!" the Big Chief cried. "This horse has got it in for me too." But then he realized that in his panic he had forgotten to untie the halter which held it to the willow tree. He slashed it through and galloped off, without reins or saddle. As he passed through the gate he shouted: "All right, Squire Liu, you old donkey. Don't imagine you'll get away with this!" He whipped his horse, and with a clatter of hooves disappeared in the direction of the mountain.
Squire Liu meanwhile was upbraiding Zhishen. "Look what a mess you've got us all into," he said.
"Excuse me," Zhishen said. "Please can someone bring me my clothes and my robe. Let me dress first and then we'll talk."
A servant went to the room to get the clothes and Zhishen dressed.
"I thought you were only going to reason with him to make him change his mind," the Squire said. "I had no idea you were going to use your fists on him like that. Now he's sure to go back and tell them in the mountain retreat and a whole army of brigands will come down and kill us all!"
"Don't worry about it, Squire," said Zhishen. "Shall I tell you who I really am? I was formerly commandant in the garrison of His Excellency Field-Marshal Zhong the Elder at Yanan. Because I'd killed a man I had to leave the world and become a monk. I'm not afraid of those two buggers, even if they come with an army of thousands. If anyone here doesn't believe me, let him try to pick up my monk's staff."
Well, no one in the household could pass that test! Accordingly, Zhishen himself took up the staff and started to whirl it about as if it were nothing but a straw for lighting the lamp.
"Whatever you do, don't go away, Your Reverence," the Squire said. "If you don't stay we're all lost."
"What are you talking about?" said Lu Zhishen. "Of course I'm not bloody going away."
"Bring wine for His Reverence," the Squire said. "Only please don't get yourself too drunk, Father."
"Give me a tenth measure of wine, and I've only got one-tenth of my true ability; with a full measure my strength is complete."
"Well, that's all right then," said the Squire. "The one thing we've plenty of is wine and meat, please take all you wish."
Now as for the Big Chief in the stronghold on Mount Peachblossom, he was just thinking of sending someone down the mountain to find out how the nuptials of his second-in- command were going, when a bunch of robbers appeared, out of breath and in total disarray. "Disaster, it's a disaster!" they were crying.
"You shower! What the hell's been going on?" the chief bellowed.
"Our number two has been beaten up," they said.
The astonished chief was just about to ask for details, when the cry went up: "The Second Chief is here!" And there he was, the red scarf no longer on his head, and his green tunic in tatters. He rolled off his horse and collapsed in front of the main hall, croaking "Save me, brother, save me."
"What's happened to you?" the chief asked.
"I went down to the manor, I entered the bedroom, and that bloody old donkey had hidden his daughter away and told an enormous monk to conceal himself in her bed. Suspecting nothing, I opened the curtain and felt inside. The lousy bugger grabbed me and beat me black and blue with his fists and his feet! When they came in to rescue me, he let me go, grabbed a staff, and fought his way out of the room. Only then was I able to escape from the room with my life. Brother, you've got to avenge me!"
"All right, you go to the room and rest, while I go down now and fetch the bloody villain up here for you," said the big chief, shouting for his horse to be saddled and the troops to assemble. He mounted and grasped his pike, and they set off down the mountain, the men uttering ferocious cries.
Lu Zhishen was enjoying his wine when the servants announced: "The brigand chief from the mountain is on his way with an army!"
"Now all of you, don't worry," said Lu Zhishen. "As I knock them down, all you've got to do is tie them up. Then they can be taken to the authorities for the reward. Bring me my sword."
He took off his monk's robe, tucked up his underclothing and tied it, gripped his sword and picked up his staff, and then off he strode to the threshing-floor. From here the Big Chief could be seen, on horseback among a forest of torches, approaching the manor.
The Big Chief levelled his weapon and shouted: "Where is he, where is that bald ass? Let him come out at once, and then we'll see what's what!"
Lu Zhishen was angered by this greeting. "You filthy loud-mouthed cur, you're going to learn who I am!" he riposted. Whirling his staff he charged his opponent. But the robber stayed his arm and shouted: "Wait a while, monk. There's something familiar about your voice. Tell me who you are."
"Lu Da, camp commandant under Old Field-Marshal Zhong, that's who I am!" Zhishen replied. "But since I left the world and became a monk, I'm called Lu Zhishen."
The brigand chief threw back his head and laughed. Then he slipped off his horse, cast away his pike, and threw himself on the ground before Zhishen. "Good health has been yours, I hope, since we last parted," he said. "Now I know who you are, it's no surprise to me that my second-in-command got a taste of your fists."
Zhishen, suspecting a trap, recoiled several paces. Then lowering his staff he stared at the other. By the light of the torches he saw who it was: none other than that famous member of the rivers and lakes fraternity, instructor of arms and pedlar of patent medicines, the Tiger-Killer Li Zhong.
By the way, when heroes greet each other, it is the customnot to talk of their prostrating themselves, since that doesn't sound very heroic. It's more usual to say, "pay respect," which has happier connotations.
So when Li Zhong had finished paying his respects, he gave Zhishen his hand and said: "How did you come to be a monk?"
"Let's go inside to talk," Zhishen said.
This made Squire Liu very unhappy. "This monk is one of their ilk," he muttered to himself.
Returning inside, Zhishen donned his robe again and accompanied Li Zhong to the main hall where they settled down to talk about the past. Zhishen sat down in the place of honour and called on Squire Liu to join them. But the Squire was reluctant. "There's nothing to fear, Squire," Zhishen said. "He's my friend." Hearing that the two were friends unsettled the Squire still more but he dared not refuse to sit with them. Li Zhong was sitting in the second place, so the Squire took the third.
"Well, then, hear this, both of you," Zhishen said. "After I left Weizhou, where I had killed the butcher, I escaped to Yanmen in Daizhou. There I again met the old fellow I had saved, Old Jin. He didn't go back to the Eastern Capital but went with an acquaintance and was living in Yanmen. His daughter had met a local bigwig called Zhao, who treated me with great honour when we happened to meet. But suddenly I found the authorities were on my trail. So Mr. Zhao provided me with the wherewithal and took me to Abbot True Knowledge's monastery on Mount Wu Tai, where my head was shaved and I became a monk. There were two occasions when I was said to have disturbed the meditation hall, after I happened to get a little merry, and the Abbot gave me a letter and told me to go to the Xiangguo Temple in the Eastern Capital to find the Zen teacher Pure Knowledge and ask him to give me a position in the monastery. I reached this manor as it was getting late and asked for lodging, having no idea of course that I would run into you here. Now tell me, who was that fellow I beat up just now? And what are you doing in these parts?"
"After I left you and Shi Jin in the Weizhou restaurant," Li Zhong explained, "I heard next day about your killing the butcher. I wanted to find Shi Jin to discuss it with him but he had disappeared too. I heard the police had detention orders out, so I cleared off in a hurry. I was passing Mount Peachblossom, when I encountered the fellow you just beat up. He had recently set up a stronghold here, and he said he was Zhou Tong, the Big Chief. He and his men came down that day to fight me. I beat him, and he asked me to remain here as commander-in-chief — he gave up his place to me. That's how I became an outlaw."
"Well, now, since you're here," Zhishen said, "I think this business of the marriage with Squire Liu's daughter should be dropped. The Squire has only this one daughter to take care of him in his old age. You oughtn't to take her away and leave him with no one to look after him."
These words delighted the Squire, who ordered a banquet to be prepared for the two of them, while the men all received two small loaves, two pieces of meat, and a bowl of wine to fill them up. Meanwhile the old man went to fetch the gold and the piece of brocade that he had received as betrothal gifts. Lu Zhishen said to Li Zhong: "You give it back to Zhou Tong; we'll leave the matter in your hands."
"That's no problem," Li Zhong replied. "But I was hoping you would come and spend a little time with us on the mountain. The Squire too of course."
The Squire told his people to prepare a sedan chair to carry Zhishen, who took with him his staff, his sword and his luggage. Li Zhong mounted his horse, and Squire Liu got into a smaller chair. The day had fully dawned when they set off up the mountain. Before entering the retreat, Zhishen and the Squire got down from their chairs, and Li Zhong dismounted in order to invite the monk in formally. All three went to sit in the Hall of Assembly and Li Zhong summoned his companion, Zhou Tong. When Zhou Tong saw the monk he was furious. "I asked you to avenge me," he complained, "and instead you invite him to visit and let him sit in the place of honour!"
"Do you know who this monk is?" Li Zhong said.
"If I knew him, do you suppose I'd have got beaten up by him like that?"
"This is the man I've so often told you of, the one who killed Butcher Zheng with three blows of his fist."
Zhou Tong, who was rubbing his head ruefully, gave an exclamation of surprise. Then he abased himself in token of respect.
Lu Zhishen courteously said, "Please forgive the violence of my recent behaviour." The three of them sat down, while the Squire remained standing in front of them. "Friend Zhou, listen to what I have to say," Zhishen began. "Regarding this business of marriage with Squire Liu's daughter, perhaps you didn't know that he only has this one daughter, prop of his old age and guardian of the rites, that is to say, responsible for the prayers and the burning of paper and incense over his mortal remains. If you take her, you leave him without support. Besides, he seems little pleased with the project. If you will take my advice, you should abandon it, and choose a suitable girl elsewhere. Here are the wedding gifts, the gold and the piece of brocade. What do you say?"
"I accept your proposal," Zhou Tong replied, "and will not venture to cross his threshold again."
"Spoken like a man of honour," said Zhishen. "But there can be no going back on this decision."
After Zhou Tong had broken an arrow and made a vow, Squire Liu thanked them all, handed over the gold and the brocade, and departed.
Li Zhong and Zhou Tong now had cattle killed and horses sacrificed, and feasted Zhishen for several days. They took him all round the mountain-top to show him the views. Mount Peachblossom was a remarkable spot. It was abrupt and rugged and surrounded by high cliffs; there was only a single road for access, with the wildest vegetation on every side.
"This is truly an impregnable site," Zhishen exclaimed.
But after staying several days with them, Zhishen came to the conclusion that Li Zhong and Zhou Tong were small-minded people, quite devoid of generosity and petty in all their dealings, and he could hardly wait to get away. They both urged him to stay but to no avail. "Now that I've left the world," he insisted, "how can I become an outlaw?"
"Since you won't join us as an outlaw," they said, "we'll go down tomorrow and whatever we get we'll give you to supply your needs on the journey."

Next day sheep and pigs were slaughtered in the mountain retreat for a grand farewell banquet, and the table was elaborately laid with a great display of gold and silver goblets. Just as the eating and drinking were about to start, one of the robbers appeared and announced: "Two carriages and a dozen or so men are passing the mountain." Hearing this, Li Zhong and Zhou Tong collected the company, only leaving a couple to serve Zhishen and pour for him. "Just stay here and enjoy a few cups," they said, "while we go down and get some booty, for your parting gift." Having given their instructions, they led their troops off down the mountain.

Zhishen meanwhile was saying to himself, "These two are real skinflints. Here's all this gold and silver on show but they don't want to give me any, they have to go down and steal someone else's to give to me. They seem to think gifts are what the highway brings, they will give only at others' expense. I'm going to teach those two scoundrels a lesson." First he called the remaining robbers to pour wine for him. He drank two cups, then he leapt to his feet and felled both the robbers with two punches. He undid his belt and bound them both together, and gagged them with hempen rope. Next he opened his bundle and threw out everything that was not indispensable; he took the gold and silver goblets from the table, stamped on them till they were flat, and stowed them in the bundle. He put away the letter from Abbot True Knowledge, took up his sword and staff, shouldered his bundle and left the mountain retreat.

He headed for the back of the mountain. But he found sheer precipices on every side. "But if I go down by the front way," he reasoned, "I am certain to encounter those two scoundrels. So the best way is to roll down this cliff, where it's covered in grass and shrubs." First he tied his sword and his bundle together and threw them to the bottom. Then he hurled his staff down after them. Finally he curled himself into a ball and rolled, gu-lu-lu, gu-lu-lu, all the way down to the foot of the mountain, without suffering the slightest hurt. As the poem says:

So precipitous is the spot
No single route is safe;
To proceed from here he's got
To work things out for himself.
He curls himself into a ball
And rolls down all the way,
As a melon ready to fall
Drops from the stem one day.

After rolling down the cliff, Zhishen jumped to his feet, found his bundle, sword and staff, and set off again.

As for Li Zhong and Zhou Tong, they went down the mountain and found as expected a dozen men, all armed. Brandishing their pikes they rushed forward, their men contributing war-like cries. "Ho there, wayfarers!" they shouted. "If you're wise, you'd better stop and pay the toll." But one of the travellers responded by stepping forward, sword in hand, to confront Li Zhong in single combat. Backwards and forwards, this way and that, the fight raged, with ten or more assaults and no clear indication of who was winning. Finally Zhou Tong lost patience. He shouted a signal and the whole robber band charged together. The little group of travellers, unable to withstand the onslaught, turned and fled. Some were not quick enough, and eight or nine were slaughtered. After removing everything of value from the carriages, the robber band made its way slowly back up the mountain, singing a victory song.

But when they reached the mountain retreat, one glance was enough to show them their two companions trussed and bound to a pillar and the gold and silver goblets which had been on the table all gone. Zhou Tong untied the men and asked for a full explanation. "Where was Lu Zhishen?"

"He knocked us down," they said, "and tied us up; and he's made off with all the drinking vessels."

Zhou Tong was furious. "That lousy villain has no conscience. I should have known from the way he beat me up. But where can he have got to?"

Searching everywhere for signs of him, they arrived at the other side of the mountain, where they found a swathe of crushed undergrowth, looking as if it had been flattened by a roller. Zhou Tong exclaimed: "The old crook, the tricks he knows! A sheer precipice like this and he rolls down it!"

"We must catch him and confront him," Li Zhong said. "We'll teach him to know shame."

"No, forget it," Zhou Tong said. "That's trying to shut the stable door after the horse has bolted. How can we catch him? Even if we did, we couldn't get anything back. And if he turns nasty you and I won't be able to get the better of him, and later we wouldn't know how to face him again. The best thing is to let it be, then we can still be friends with him afterwards. Let's go and open the bags we got from the carriages. We'll divide the gold, silver and silk into three parts, one for each of us and one for the rest."

"It's all my fault for inviting him into the retreat," Li Zhong said. "I'm afraid you lost a lot through it, so my share should go to you."

"Forget it, brother, we live or die together," Zhou Tong said.

Well, now reader, just keep it in mind that those two, Li Zhong and Zhou Tong, remained there on Mount Peachblossom, plundering the surrounding lands.

As for Lu Zhishen, after leaving the mountain he marched from morning till night, covering nearly twenty miles, till his stomach began to complain. Nowhere on the road was there a sign of anywhere to break his journey. "On the go since early morning without even a bite to eat," he complained to himself, "and now where am I going to spend the night?" He looked left and right and finally, far far off, he heard the faintest tinkling of bells. "Thank goodness!" he said to himself. "It's either a Buddhist temple or a Taoist one; that's the wind shaking the bells under the eaves, I'll be able to find some hospitality there."

If Lu Zhishen hadn't gone there, how would he have come to send a dozen spirits into the next world, or razed to the ground the remains of a renowned and holy temple? Truly, as it is said:

On the gold roof of the hall the red flames spread;
The black smoke rises before the temple of jade.

THE Abbot spoke, "Zhishen, you certainly cannot stay here but I have a brother in religion called Zhi Qing Jingshen, who is the Abbot of Great Xiangguo Monastery in Kaifeng, and you can go there for refuge, and work for the monks. I have here a letter of introduction for you. Last night I thought over your case, and decided to give you four sentences from our sacred sayings, and until your dying day you must not forget them."

Lu Da (Zhishen) knelt down, and said, "I am willing to listen to these sayings."

The Abbot continued and said: "When you (1) see a forest your lot will be improved; (2) see a mountain you will become rich; (3) enter a prefecture you will move on; and (4) see a river (Jiang, also a surname) you will stop."

Lu Da upon hearing these four "sayings" kowtowed three times three. He then put on his back a bundle, two girdles round his waist, hid away the letter, bid farewell to the Abbot and the crowd of monks. He departed from Mount Wutai and went to the inn in the village near the blacksmith's shop, where he stayed for a few days until the monk's staff and broadsword were finished. He also got a scabbard for the sword, and had the staff varnished. He took a number of pieces of silver and paid the blacksmith. He left, and the passers-by gazed after him as he was really a very strange sight. He followed the road towards the Eastern Capital (Kaifeng). In more than half a month he had not slept in a single monastery; but had rested and eaten his food at inns, and bought his wine in wine shops. One day he was enjoying the scenery of a mountain stream and did not notice it was evening, and that he had not found a place to sleep. The road was quite deserted. After he had gone thirty li more, he passed over a plank bridge, where he saw in the distance a red light emerging from a group of trees. It was a farmhouse in a wood with surrounding wild mountains rising one above the other. He went to the farmhouse and saw outside a dozen men who were very busy moving things about. He placed his staff against the wall and spoke to the men to attract their attention.

The villagers said, "Monk, why do you arrive so late at our farm?"

"As I cannot find an inn near here," replied Lu Da, "I should like to stay at your farm tonight, and will leave here early tomorrow morning."

"We have some business here tonight so that you cannot stay."

"However inconvenient it is, let me stay tonight," said Lu Da.

"Monk, you had better go at once, and do not risk your life here."

"This is strange," replied Lu Da. "If I only stay for one night how shall I risk my life?" "Go away!" said the villagers. "If you do not go we shall tie you up."

Lu Da became angry. "You villagers are unreasonable. I have not said anything wrong, yet you want to tie me up."

Some of the villagers abused him, while others acted as mediators. Lu Da took his staff and threatened to beat them; just then he saw an old man. He was over sixty years of age and was walking with a staff that reached above his head. He called, "What is all this noise about?"

The villagers answered, "This detestable monk desires to beat us." Lu Da spoke, "I am from Mount Wutai, and am on my way to the Eastern Capital on some business. This evening I have not found an inn, and should like to make use of your noble house for one night. Your servants were unreasonable, and wanted to tie me up."

"As you are a monk from Mount Wutai please come inside," the old man said. They went into the guest chamber and sat down. The old man said, "You must not think us impolite because our servants did not know that you are from a place where there is a living Buddha, and they took you as an ordinary person. I previously believed in Buddhism. Although we have some affair this evening, yet you may stay here tonight."

Lu Da placed his staff against a chair, and rising, signified his appreciation, and then asked his host's name.

"My name is Liu, and the villagers call me 'Grandpa Liu.' This place is called Taohua Village. May I ask your name and also your religious name?"

"My superior—the Abbot Zhi Zhen, gave me the name Zhi Shen but my surname is Lu."

"Reverend, will you take a little supper with me? but I do not know whether you are willing to eat meat with me," said Grandpa Liu.

"I can eat meat and drink wine. Whether the wine is yellow or clear, or from Shaoxing, I am not particular; and I can eat either meat or dog's flesh."

Very soon the servants prepared a table with a plate of beef and four different vegetables. Lu Da (Zhi Shen) took off his belt and waist girdle, and sat down. He did not stand on ceremony, nor did he decline anything. Grandpa Liu, who sat opposite, stared at him but only ate rice. When the servants cleared the table Grandpa Liu told them that as things were upset, Lu Da would sleep in a small side room. He then informed Lu Da that if there was a noise outside in the night, he should not notice it. Lu Da inquired what was the affair to occur that night, and he was told that it was something that a monk could not take part in.

"But why is your appearance so sorrowful?" asked Lu Da, "I hope that my coming has not been inconvenient. I will give you money for my lodging tomorrow."

"Reverend, please listen to me," said Grandpa Liu, "I always give food to monks, and bestow charity on them, so I cannot accept money from you. Tonight I have invited someone to come and marry my daughter, therefore I am quite busy."

Lu Da laughed loudly. "When men and women are fully grown they must marry; this is the proper thing for men and it is in accordance with the five constant virtues. So why should there be trouble?"

"You, Reverend, do not understand this marriage," said Grandpa Liu, "but the fact is that my daughter is not willing to marry."

Lu Da laughingly replied, "Sir, you are a silly fellow. If she does not agree why have you invited the man to marry her?"

"I have only one daughter, and she is nineteen years old," Grandpa Liu remarked. "Near here, there is a mountain called Mount Taohua. Recently two bandit chiefs have erected a stronghold there, and have collected about seven hundred men, and they rob the cottages near here. The officers in charge of the troops at Qingzhou have tried to arrest them without success. The bandits then came here, and demanded money. When one of the chiefs saw my daughter, he presented her twenty taels of gold, and a roll of red embroidered silk as a token of his desire for an engagement. He has selected this night to come and marry the girl. I cannot dispute the matter with him but I must agree to his demand. And that is why I am annoyed."

Lu Da upon hearing this said, "So that is the case. But if I have the means of causing him to change his mind about taking away your daughter, how will that do?"

"He is king of demons, and kills men without moving an eyelash, so how can you get him to change his mind?"

"I studied under the Abbot at Mount Wutai and therefore I can speak reasonably. Even if he were a man of iron or stone I could alter his decision. Tell your daughter to hide in some other place this evening, and I will stay in her room."

"That will be fine but do not pull the tiger's whiskers," said Grandpa Liu.

"Is not that my business?" asked Lu Da. "Leave it to me and I'll do the correct thing."

"Certainly it will be all right," said Grandpa Liu, "we are very lucky in meeting such a living Buddha as you."

He then asked Lu Da if he would like something more to eat but the latter replied, "only wine." Grandpa Liu ordered the servants to bring a big bowl of wine as well as a cooked goose, both of which were eaten by the monk, who told the servants to place his bundle in the room. Then putting his sword in his belt and picking up his monk's staff, he asked if the girl was in hiding. Grandpa Liu had sent his daughter to a neighbour's house, and led Lu Da to the bride's apartment. The servants withdrew to prepare the banquet. Lu Da placed the tables and chairs that were in the room to one side; put his sword at the head, and his staff at the side of the bed; let down the bed curtains covered with gilt letters, took off his clothes and lay down.

Grandpa Liu saw that it was getting dark so he told the servants to light the lanterns which were outside. He had a table placed on the threshing floor on which were flowers, incense sticks, and lanterns. He also instructed them to get a dish of meat ready, and heat a large kettle of wine. About ten o'clock they heard the sound of gongs and drums being beaten on the hill. Grandpa Liu thought of a vile scheme, and the servants were almost in a state of panic. They all went outside the gate of the farm but upon seeing in the distance a great illumination from five hundred torches, they fled into the farmhouse. Grandpa Liu had the gate opened and proceeded to welcome the guests. He saw two bodies of men, one in front of the other. They were armed with all kinds of military weapons, glittering in the light, and were decorated with red and green silk. The bandits had stuck wild flowers in their caps, and carried four or five red gauze lanterns that lit the road for their leader who was riding a horse. On his head he had a flat topped cap of red colour, and near his temple was a large imitation flower made of silk, he wore a long green gown with tiger design embroidered in gold, round his waist a red sash fastened with a golden buckle, standing away from this a few inches a stiff girdle was suspended; leather boots with designs of clouds on them. He was riding a big white horse and dismounted at the gate of the farmhouse. The bandits offered congratulations by singing:

"Tonight his cap is very bright
For he is a bridegroom;
Clothed with handsome dress is he
And all his cheek's abloom."

Grandpa Liu poured out a cupful of wine and kneeling on the ground, offered it to the bandit leader, who, however, raised him, saying: "You are my father-in-law so why do you kneel before me?"

"As you are the chief of this district, and my family is under your control, you should not object like this," replied Grandpa Liu.

The bandit chief was almost drunk and laughingly replied. "As I am to be your son-in-law I will treat you fairly; as your daughter is to be my wife things will soon be all right." Upon reaching the threshing floor, the bandit chief saw the preparations, and asked, "Father-in-law, why do you receive me in this way?" He drank three cups of wine at that spot. He told his men to tie up his horse to a poplar, and went toward the guest room. His men began to play on the musical instruments and beat the drums. Upon entering the guest room the bandit chief sat down, asking for his wife. Grandpa Liu replied, "My daughter is so timid that she dare not come here." The robber chief laughed, and taking a cup of wine said, "I should like my wife to come here and drink some wine with me."

Grandpa Liu thought this a suitable opportunity for the monk to act as mediator, so he requested the guest to come with him. He took a candle, and going to the bridal chamber pointed, saying, "This is the room. Please enter." Grandpa Liu took the candle and departed, as he did not expect trouble. The bandit chief pushed the door open, and saw that the interior was dark. He said, "My wife's father is really so economical that he has not even a lamp lighted in the room, and let my wife to sit in the dark. Tomorrow I will tell one of my men to bring a bucket of good oil to my mountain stronghold, so that my wife can light the lamp there."

Lu Da lying inside the bed curtains heard all this but he suppressed his inclination to laugh and made no sound.

The bandit chief felt his way into the dark room, calling out, "Wife, why do you not come to receive me? You need not be so timid because tomorrow you will be the leading woman in my stronghold." Feeling his way in the darkness, and calling "wife, wife," he at last touched the embroidered bed curtains, and lifted them. Then reaching with his hand he felt the belly of Lu Da. The latter at once took hold of the bandit chief's head and pressed him down on the bed. The chief struggled to get up but Lu Da abused him. "You are certainly a bastard" and lifting his fist struck a blow. "Why do you hit your husband?" he asked. Lu Da shouted, "I am teaching you how to recognize your old woman." He pulled him to the floor at the side of the bed, belabored him with his fist, and kicked him, while the bandit called out, "Save me, save me." Upon hearing this Grandpa Liu was almost startled out of his wits, and hastily picking up a lamp, led the bandits into the room. There they saw a big fat monk, stark naked, on top of the bandit chief, beating him. The bandits had their spears and cudgels, and Lu Da, upon seeing these, let go the chief and got his monk's staff from the bed. The men seeing his fierce bearing, all retreated, followed by Lu Da. Seizing the opportunity the bandit leader crawled to the door of the room, and walked into the yard. He soon found his unsaddled horse in the dark, broke off a twig from the tree, and jumped on the horse. He hit the horse with the twig but it did not move. The robber leader said to himself, "What a nuisance! Even the horse despises me!" He then realized that he had omitted to loosen the reins which were still fastened to the tree. He quickly snatched them, and the horse galloped away with him. As he passed through the gate, he cursed Grandpa Liu; saying, "You, old ass, need not hurry. Wherever you fly, I shall catch you." He lashed the horse which carried him up the mountain.

Grandpa Liu caught hold of Lu Da, saying, "Reverend, you have brought trouble to my home."

"You cannot say that I have done something improper," replied Lu Da. "Bring me my clothes, and when dressed I will talk with you." This was done, and Grandpa Liu said, "I hoped you would be reasonable, and get him to change his mind. I did not expect you to assault him; he will now gather a large body of his men and come to kill us."

"Grandpa, do not get excited, and I will tell you something," replied Lu Da. "I am a Major, in the army of Grand Secretary Liang at Yanan Prefecture. I became a monk because I killed a man. You need not speak of these bandits, for I should not be afraid of two thousands of them on foot or mounted. If you do not believe me then pick up my monk's staff and look at it." A servant tried to lift the staff but he could not move it. Lu Da, however, picked it up in his hand, and whirled it round as though it were only a lamp wick made of rush.

"Reverend, you must stay here and protect us," said Liu.

"That is needless talk because I will not go away."

The farmer told his servants to bring more wine but to be careful not to make the guest drunk.

"If I drink only a little wine, I can do only a small piece of business but if I drink a lot, then I can do more," said Lu Da.

On Mount Taohua, the principal head of the bandits was thinking of sending one of his men to inquire about his second-in-command's marriage. When the armed bandits returned with a defeated appearance he asked why they were in such disorder, and they told him that their second-in-command had been defeated. At this he was surprised but while he was listening to details, his assistant arrived. He noticed that he was not wearing the usual red cloth round his head, and that his green dress was in tatters. As he dismounted in front of the main building he called, "Elder brother, please save me," and when he was asked for an explanation, he continued, "I went down the mountain to the village where Grandpa Liu lives, and found that the detestable old donkey had hidden the woman, and had got a big monk to be on the bed in her place. I was quite unprepared for attack, and when I groped my way to the bed, and touched him, he hit me with his fists, kicked me, and severely maltreated me. When my men entered the room he chased them out, and while this was happening I managed to get away. Elder brother, I want revenge."

The principal bandit leader answered, "So, this is it! You rest indoors, while I go and seize this bald-headed thief." He then commanded his men to get his horse ready. He mounted, and led his men down the mountain, who shouted as they went along. Lu Da was drinking wine, when a servant reported that the bandits were again approaching. "Keep cool!" said Lu Da, "I will knock them down, and you can tie them up and take them to the yamen. Let somebody bring my sword." He then took off his long gown, tucked his short underclothing in his belt; put on his broad sword; he picked up the iron monk's staff, and strode to the gate where he saw the bandit leader seated on a horse and holding a spear, surrounded by many torches. He heard him shout, "Where is that bald-headed donkey? Tell him to come at once as we must fight out the matter." Lu Da was angry and abused him, "You dirty rascal! You shall certainly recognize me." He then lifted his iron monk's staff and whirled it round.

The leader of the bandits called, "The sound of your voice is familiar to me. What is your name?"
Lu Da answered, "I am none other than Major Lu Da, in the employment of Grand Secretary Liang. Just now, however, I am a monk called Lu Zhishen."
The leader of the bandits laughed, and dismounted, and threw away his spear, knelt down, and making salutations said, "Is my elder brother quite well? I am aware that my younger brother felt the weight of your hand."
As Lu Da suspected that was a trick he retreated several steps, and examined the man closely by the light of the torches. He then recognized him as a drill instructor who had often sold medicine on the streets, and was named Li Zhong, with a nickname "The Tiger Fighting General." In those days the thieves did not consider it advisable to say "kneel down" in their band, so they used another expression, "Scissors and Brush"; as a kind of code. Li Zhong now arose and said, "Elder brother, why are you a monk?"
"I will talk that over with you indoors," replied Lu Da.
When Grandpa Liu heard this he was afraid of more trouble, as he thought that they both were thieves. When Lu Da was inside, put on his clothes, sat at a table, and called for Grandpa Liu, the latter did not care to come. So Lu Da said, "Grandpa, you need not fear. He is my younger brother." When Grandpa Liu heard this he was more confused: still he came forward, and sat on Lu Da's left. Lu Da gave a résumé of how he had killed the Bully and afterwards entered a monastery where he became drunk on two occasions, had been expelled, and sent to Kaifeng.
Li Zhong explained that when he heard Lu Da had killed the butcher at Weizhou, he tried to find him. Hearing the police wished to arrest him, he also went away. He happened to pass near this mountain and was attacked by the bandits in charge of Zhou Tong, nicknamed "Little Tyrant": but he repulsed them, so they invited him to join them as their leader.
"As things are like this you need not say anything about the bridal fiasco," said Lu Da, "because if Zhou Tong had taken the girl, her father would have become a vagrant."
Grandpa Liu was much pleased at this and ordered the servants to bring wine and food, and entertained his two guests well. He also ordered that each of the bandits was to have two small loaves of bread, two slices of meat, and a big cup of wine. Lu Da told Li Zhong to take the gold and silk, prepared by Grandpa Liu and give them back to "Little Tyrant." Li Zhong asked both of them to come to the stronghold on the mountain and stay for a few days: this was agreed to. Sedan chairs were prepared for Lu Da and Liu, while Li Zhong rode his horse. It was daybreak, and upon arrival at the stronghold they entered the hall to discuss matters. Zhou Tong was sent for but when he saw the monk he was angry, and said, "So my elder brother has not carried out my revenge but asked the monk to come, and invited him to sit in the premier place."
Li Zhong laughed, "This monk is the one who killed the Bully with three blows of his fist, about which I have told you many times."
Zhou Tong rubbed his head and exclaimed, "Oh my!" He then knelt and saluted Lu Da, who returned the compliment, saying, "Pray excuse my intrusion." They all sat down and Lu Da explained the position to Zhou Tong, advising him to break his engagement, and find a better girl. The wedding presents were handed to him. Zhou Tong agreed to this, and promised to let the matter drop, saying, "This is a vow taken with the breaking of an arrow."
Grandpa Liu was satisfied and returned home while the bandits prepared a feast for Lu Da. During the following days they took their guest all over the mountain to see the splendid wild scenery. The mountain was covered with grass and trees, and was difficult of access, there being only one road. After a few days, however, Lu Da saw that Li Zhong and Zhou Tong were mean, and had no nobility in their natures. When he told them he wanted to leave, they pressed him to remain but he reminded them he being a monk could not join them.
The bandit chiefs said, "As you have definitely decided to go, please wait until tomorrow, when we will go down the mountain, and plunder somebody for some money that we will give you for your traveling expenses."
The next day they made a big banquet at which the wine cups were of gold and silver but just as they sat down one of their men came to report that below were two carts with about ten travellers. Upon hearing this the bandit chiefs summoned their followers and said to Lu Da, "Elder brother, you will have to drink our wine by yourself but we will leave two men to wait upon you. We must go and get the money for you." So saying they left with their men.
Lu Da thought, "These two men are certainly very mean as they have plenty of gold and silver here to give me but instead they want to plunder other people for money and give it to me. Is not this being generous at other people's expense? So I will frighten these two men who are attending on me." He then told the men to bring him some warm wine, and after drinking some he got up and knocked them down with his fists. He then took their girdles, and tied their arms and legs. He gagged them with balls of hempen thread; he opened his bundles and threw away everything that was not needed; and then taking the gold and silver cups he made them flat by stamping on them, and packed them in his bundles. He hid the letter from Abbot Chen in his breast pocket; put on his sword; picked up his monk staff, and left the stronghold. He had a good look round, and saw that the mountain behind the stronghold was very wild. If, however, he went down the mountain by the ordinary road he was sure to meet the brigands, so he decided to descend the mountain by rolling down through the grass. He tied his broad sword, and the monk staff to the bundle, and threw them down the steep slope. He then rolled himself down to the foot of the mountain without sustaining any injury. He soon found his bundle, and started on his way. The bandit chiefs attacked the travellers, who resisted for a long time but seeing that they were outnumbered they at last retreated abandoning their baggage. Upon returning to their stronghold with the loot, the chiefs discovered that Lu Da had gone, and had taken away the gold and silver cups, and at first they thought of pursuing him but after a little discussion they agreed to let the matter drop. That day Lu Da walked a distance of about 20 li without coming across an inn so that by evening he was very hungry. Just then, he happened to hear the tinkling of a bell that he knew was the sound of a bell hanging at the eaves of a Buddhist temple, and it was moved by the wind. So he decided to investigate this. We will now relate what this temple was.

A score of souls,
Were lost in half a day;
Temples of long standing,
In ambers were now laid.

006

The Tattooed 9 Dragons Shi Jin Robs in Red Pine Forest as a Highwayman on his own; Profound Wisdom Lu Da Zhishen Burns Waguan Monastery Temple Down

After crossing a number of ridges, Zhishen saw a path up the mountain through a large forest of pines. He followed it for less than half a li and arrived at a run-down monastery. It was from here that the tinkling of the bells came. Above an arch a faded vermilion sign read in letters of gold: "Waguan Monastery." Lu proceeded another forty or fifty paces, crossed a stone bridge, and entered the compound. He went directly to the guest-quarters. Its front gate was gone and its surrounding walls had crumbled.
"A big monastery like this," thought Zhishen. "How could it have deteriorated so?"
He went to the abbot's hall. It was filthy with swallow droppings. A cobwebbed lock secured its door. Lu pounded the ground with the end of his staff. "A passing monk wants some food," he cried.
Zhishen shouted for a long time but no one responded.
He walked around to the kitchen. There wasn't any cauldron. The earthen stove had collapsed. Lu untied his rucksack and placed it down before the idol of the kitchen god. Carrying his staff, he went on with his search. In the rear of the kitchen he found a small room in which a few old monks were sitting, their faces sallow and sunken.
"You monks are very rude," said Lu. "I shouted and shouted but none of you answered."
One of the monks waved his hand. "Keep your voice down."
"I'm a monk who's just passing through and I want something to eat," said Lu. "What's wrong with that?"
"We haven't eaten ourselves in three days. How can we find any food for you?"
"I'm from Mount Wutai. Even half a bowl of gruel would be all right."
"We should feed you, since you're from the place of the living Buddha. But what can we do? All the other monks are gone and we don't have a single grain. We have really been hungry for the past three days."
"Liars! I don't believe there's no grain in a big place like this."
"It's true that our monastery was once prosperous. Wandering monks came from all over. Then one of them brought a Taoist priest and they took control. They ruined everything. There's nothing those two won't do. They drove all our monks away. Only we, who are too old to move, remained. That's why we have nothing to eat."
"Liars! What do a single monk and a single priest amount to? Couldn't you have lodged a complaint with the government?"
"Reverend, you don't understand. We're a long way from any government office. Besides, even soldiers couldn't stop them. They're very fierce. Murder and arson mean nothing to them. They're living in a building behind the abbot's hall."
"What are their names?"
"The monk is called Cui. His Buddhist title is Daocheng—Accomplished. His nickname is Cast Iron Buddha. The Taoist priest is named Qiu. His father called him Second Son. His nickname is Flying Messenger from Hell. Neither of them act like men who've renounced the material world. They're just robbers in the greenwood. They only use their priesthood as a cloak."
As Zhishen was questioning the old monks he got a whiff of something fragrant. He took up his staff and went stealthily to the rear. There, on an earthen stove, steam was seeping through the reed cover of a pot. Zhishen raised the lid. Millet was simmering inside.
"You old monks are very rude," he cried. "You say you haven't eaten for three days but here you're heating a pot of gruel! Monks are supposed to speak the truth!"
Lu's discovery dismayed the old men. They hurriedly took away all the bowls, plates, dishes, ladles and buckets. Zhishen was hungry to distraction. He saw the gruel and he wanted to eat but the monks had removed all the utensils. Next to the stove he noticed a chipped old painted table, covered with dust. "Necessity is the mother of invention." Lu rested his staff, grabbed some straw from beside the stove, wiped the dust off, picked up the pot with both hands, and poured the gruel on the table.
The old monks rushed to snatch the porridge. Zhishen shoved and tripped them. Some fell, some ran away. Lu scooped gruel from the table and ate. He had just started when one of the old monks said: "We haven't eaten in three days. Only today we managed to beg this bit of millet and were making it into a little gruel, and now you're eating it!"
Lu had consumed no more than six or seven mouthfuls but on hearing this, he stopped.
Outside, someone was singing mockingly. Lu washed his hands, took up his staff and went to take a look. On the other side of a crumbling wall he saw a Taoist priest, his head bound by a black bandanna, wearing a cloth robe tied at the waist by a girdle of many colours, and shod in hemp sandals. On his shoulder was a carrying-pole from one end of which hung a bamboo basket containing a few fish and some meat wrapped in a lotus leaf. A jug of wine, its mouth also covered by a lotus leaf, dangled from the other end. The priest was bawling this song:

In the east are you, in the west am I,
For you no husband, no wife for me.
Without any wife I can still get by,
Without a man how lonely you must be.

The old monks hurried over, waving their hands, and whispered to Zhishen: "That's the priest Flying Messenger from Hell, or Second Son Qiu!"
Zhishen grasped his staff and followed him. The man, unaware that he was being trailed, went through a door in the wall behind the abbot's compound. Lu did the same. Under a green locust tree he saw a table laid with platters of food, three wine cups and three pairs of chopsticks. A fat monk sat in the middle chair. His brows were like streaks of smeared paint, his face was as black as ink. He bulged with muscles. Beneath his chest a swarthy belly protruded. A young woman sat beside him. The Taoist set down the bamboo basket and seated himself also.
Lu walked up to them. Startled, the monk jumped to his fee. "Please have a seat, brother," he cried. "Drink a cup with us."
"What do you two mean by ruining the monastery?" Zhishen demanded, tightening his grasp on his staff.
"Please be seated, brother," the monk replied. "Allow me to speak."
"Let's hear it. Out with it," Lu cut in, glaring.
"The monastery used to be a fine place. Its fields were broad, its monks were many. But those few old monks living in the cloisters like to eat and drink and carouse and spend money on women. The abbot couldn't restrain them. They complained against him and had him expelled. As a result, the monastery has fallen into decay, the monks have all left, the fields have been sold. I and this priest came here recently to take over. We hope to set the monastery in order and repair the halls."
"Who is this woman?' asked Zhishen. "Why is she here drinking?"
"Please hear me, brother," said the monk. "This woman is the daughter of Wang Youjin in the village below. He made contributions to the monastery often. But he's fallen on hard times and has had to sell all of their family property. His daughter has no other relatives, and her husband is ill. She's come here to borrow a little grain. Since her father used to be one of the monastery's donors, we've invited her to have some wine. That's all there is to it, brother. Don't listen to what those old animals say."
Lu was impressed by the monk's polite speech. "Those old monks have been playing tricks on me," he muttered. He returned to the kitchen, staff in hand. The monks had just finished their gruel and had been watching from a distance.
Zhishen pointed at them and said angrily: "So it was you who ruined the monastery. You lied to me!"
"Don't believe that monk, brother," the old men responded in chorus. "He's keeping a woman there right now. He saw you had a knife and a staff. He was unarmed, so he didn't dare quarrel. If you don't believe us, go back again and see how he treats you this time. Judge for yourself, brother. They're drinking wine and eating meat, while we hardly have any gruel. We were even worried that you wanted to eat it."
"That's true," said Lu. Holding his staff by the lower end, he went to the rear of the abbot's compound. The door in the corner of the wall was shut. Zhishen angrily broke it open with one kick and strode through. Cast Iron Buddha, or Cui Daocheng, halberd in hand, rushed forward to attack under the locust tree. With a roar, Lu sprang into the fray, brandishing his staff.
They fought fourteen or fifteen rounds. Cui, no match for Zhishen, could only parry and dodge. Weakening rapidly, he waited for a chance to run. The Taoist priest, seeing this, strode towards Lu with another halberd from the rear. Lu heard his approaching footsteps but dared not turn his head. Then he saw the priest's shadow, and knew the man was almost upon him.
"Now," shouted Lu.
Cui, panic-stricken, thought this signalled a blow from the ex-major's staff. He leaped out of the combat circle. Zhishen whirled, so that he was facing both his foes in a triangle. He fought the pair for more than ten rounds. But he was hungry and travel-weary, and couldn't cope with their combined strength. He executed a feint and ran, dragging his staff. His adversaries, waving their halberds, chased him to the outside of the monastery. They fought another ten rounds, and Lu ran again. They pursued him as far as the stone bridge. There, they sat down on the balustrade and rested.
Zhishen continued a long way. When he had caught his breath, he said to himself: "I left my rucksack by the kitchen god. I thought only of escaping and forgot to take it. Now I have no money for the road and I'm hungry. This is a pretty fix. I can't go back because those two rascals are too much for me. It's two against one. I'd only be throwing my life away."
He dawdled along another few li until he came to a large forest. All the trees were red pine. "A wicked-looking wood," he thought.
Suddenly, he saw a man poke his head out of the shadows. The fellow peered at him, spat, then slipped back among the trees.
"That bird is a robber, or I miss my guess, and he's here waiting for business," thought Lu. "When he saw I was a monk he knew there was no profit in me, so he spat and went away. It's just his bad luck that he's run into me. I've a bellyful of wrath and no place to get rid of it. I'll strip the lout of his clothes and sell them for wine money."
Staff in hand, he hurried towards the forest, crying: "You rogue in the wood, come out, quick!"
When the man heard this, he laughed and said: "I'm down on my luck and in need of money and he comes to pick a quarrel." He grasped his halberd and bounded out from among the trees. "Scabby donkey," he shouted. "It's you who've come looking for death! I haven't sought you out."
"I'll show you who I am," said Lu. Brandishing his staff, he charged. The other fellow rushed forward with his halberd.
When they were near each other the man said, "Hey, monk! I seem to know your voice, what's your name?"
"I'll tell you after we've fought three hundred rounds," Zhishen retorted.
Angered, the man attacked, halberd against staff. They fought a dozen or so rounds. "That monk's a grand warrior," the man said to himself admiringly. After another five rounds he shouted: "Rest a bit. I've something to say!"
Both contestants jumped from the combat circle.
"Really, what is your name?" the man queried. "I'm sure I know your voice." Zhishen told him. The man tossed aside his halberd and bowed. "Don't you recognize Shi Jin?" he asked.
"So it's you, Young Master Shi," Zhishen laughed. The two exchanged salutes and went into the forest and sat down. "Where have you been since we parted in Weizhou?" asked the monk.
"The day after I left you at the tavern I heard that you had killed Butcher Zheng and run away. The police discovered I had helped you in sending off Old Jin and his daughter, the singer, so I decided I'd better leave Weizhou too. I went to Yanzhou, looking for my teacher Wang Jin but I couldn't find him. I returned to the Northern Capital (Daming, Hebei Province) and lived there a while. But my money ran out, so I came to this place to pick up some more. I never thought we'd meet here. What made you become a monk, brother?"
Lu told his whole story from the beginning.
"If you're hungry, brother," said Shi Jin, "I have dried meat and some buns." He gave them to Zhishen. "You say you left your rucksack in the monastery," Shi Jin continued. "Let's go back and get it. If they won't give it up, we'll finish the rascals off."
"Right," said Lu.
After he and Shi Jin had eaten their fill, they took their weapons and returned to Waguan Monastery. As they neared the entrance, they saw Cui Daocheng and Second Son Qiu sitting on the bridge.
"Come on, you wretches," shouted Lu. "Let's fight to a finish!"
The fat monk laughed. "I've already licked you once. Haven't you had enough?"
Enraged, Zhishen ran towards the bridge, twirling his staff.

Cast Iron Buddha was annoyed. He charged down the bridge with his halberd.
Zhishen knew that he now had Shi Jin to back him up, and this gave him more courage. What's more, he had eaten heartily and was in high spirits. He fought the fat monk eight or nine rounds. Gradually, Daocheng weakened until he began looking for a means to escape. Qiu, the Taoist priest, saw that Cui was losing. He hurried forward with his halberd to assist.
Shi Jin bounded out of the forest and shouted: "Don't any of you try to get away!" He pushed back his broad-brimmed hat and attacked the priest, halberd in hand.
Both pairs battled furiously. The fight between Lu and Cui was reaching its climax. Lu saw an opening. "Ho," he exclaimed. With one clout of his staff he knocked Cast Iron Buddha off the bridge.
The priest saw the monk fall and lost heart. He feinted with his weapon and ran.
"Where do you think you're going?" exclaimed Shi Jin. He caught up and plunged his halberd into the priest's back. The man fell to one side. Shi Jin placed a foot on him and stabbed repeatedly.
Lu sped down from the bridge. With a single blow of his staff he broke Cui's back.
Poor ruffians, their lives vanished like a dream.
Zhishen and Shi Jin tied the bodies of their victims together and threw them into a ravine. Then they re-entered the monastery and took Lu's rucksack from the kitchen. The old monks, having seen Lu routed and afraid Daocheng and Second Son Qiu would kill them, had all hung themselves. When Zhishen and Shi Jin went through the door in the wall behind the abbot's hall, they found the kept woman had jumped into a well and committed suicide.
They searched eight or nine small buildings but found no one else.
On a bed they saw a few bundles of clothing. Shi Jin opened them. Hidden inside were gold and silver objects. They selected some and wrapped them up. In the kitchen they found fish and wine and meat. They lit the stove, cooked the food and dined.
Then each shouldered his pack. They tied reeds together into torches and ignited them in the stove. When the flames on the torches were leaping, they set fire to the small buildings in the rear. When these had burned almost to the door, they lit more torches and touched off the main hall from behind. Just then the wind rose, and crackling flames were soon spiralling into the sky. Zhishen and Shi Jin watched for a while. The whole monastery was burning briskly. "It's very beautiful here," they said to each other ironically, "but it's hardly a place to make our home!"
They set out and travelled all night. When the sky was turning light they saw a number of buildings in the distance, evidently a small town. Before long, they entered. They noticed a little tavern beside a single-plank bridge.
Lu and Shi Jin went inside and drank. They had the waiter buy them some fresh meat and rice, and they cooked these themselves. While dining they told each other of their experiences during their separate travels.
"Where will you go now?" Lu asked, when they had finished their meal.
"The only thing I can do is return to Mount Shaohua and join Zhu Wu and the other two leaders," replied Shi Jin. "After some time there, I can decide what to do next."
"Very well, brother," said Lu. He took some gold and silver drinking vessels from his bag and gave them to Shi Jin.
The two then tied on their rucksacks, took up their weapons, paid the bill and left the tavern and the town. When they had walked six or seven //they came to a fork in the road.
"We part here, brother," said Lu. "I'm going to the Eastern Capital. Don't see me off any further. You're going to Huazhou. You take that road. We'll meet again some day. If you know of anyone coming in my direction, you can have him bring me a message."
Shi Jin bowed and bid Zhishen farewell. Each went his separate way.
We'll talk now of Lu Zhishen. After eight or nine days on the road he sighted the Eastern Capital. Lu entered the city. He found it a noisy, bustling place. In the centre of town he apologetically asked a passer-by: "Could you tell me where the Great Xiangguo Monastery is?"
"There, ahead, by the bridge."
Zhishen, carrying his staff, went on to the monastery. He looked it over, east and west, then proceeded to the guesthouse. A servant went in to announce him. Soon the reception monk came out. He was somewhat startled by Lu's fierce appearance, the iron staff in his hand, the sword at his waist and the pack upon his back.
"Where are you from, brother?" he asked.
"I'm form Mount Wutai," said Zhishen. "I have a letter from my abbot, requesting Lucid Teacher, the venerable abbot of this monastery, to give me a position as a working monk."
"In that case, please come with me."
Zhishen followed him to the abbot's hall, opened his bundle and took out the letter.
"How is it you don't know the ceremony, brother?" the reception monk asked. "The abbot will be here in a minute. Remove your knife, bring out your robe and mat, and light the incense of faith so that you can do homage to the abbot."
"Why didn't you say so before?" demanded Zhishen. He took off his knife, and pulled a stick of incense and a mat and his robe out of his rucksack. But he didn't know what to do with them. The reception monk placed Lu's robe over his shoulders and told him to put the mat on the floor.
A moment later the abbot, Lucid Teacher, appeared. The reception monk stepped forward and said: "This monk comes from Mount Wutai with a letter to you from his abbot."
"It's been a long time since my brother on Mount Wutai has written," said Lucid Teacher.
"Quick, brother," whispered the reception monk. "Pay your respects to our abbot."
Lu didn't know where to put his stick of incense. The reception monk couldn't help laughing. He placed it in an incense burner. Zhishen kowtowed three times. The reception monk stopped him and presented his letter to the abbot.
Lucid Teacher opened the letter and read it. The letter set forth in detail why Zhishen had become a monk and the reason he had been sent down from Mount Wutai to the monastery in the Eastern Capital. "We pray you will exercise benevolence and give him a working post," the missive concluded. "Please do not refuse. This monk will have great attainments later on."
When he finished reading, the abbot said: "You've come a long way. Rest in the monk's quarters. They will give you something to eat."
Zhishen thanked him. He collected his mat, bundle, staff and sword, and followed a novice out.
The abbot summoned both sections of his clergy. When they had all assembled in his hall he said: "My brother abbot on Mount Wutai really has no discretion. This monk he's sent used to be an officer in a border garrison. He shaved off his hair only because he killed a man. Twice he caused riots in the monks' quarters of the Wutai monastery. He made no end of trouble. My brother abbot couldn't cope with him, so he's shoved him off on me. Shall I reject him? My brother's plea is so insistent that I can't very well refuse. But if I keep him here, he's liable to play havoc with our rules and put us in a terrible state."
"Even though he's one of our brothers," said the reception monk, "he doesn't look at all like a man who's renounced the world. How can we keep him?"
"I've thought of something," said the deacon. "Outside Sour Date Gate we have a vegetable garden behind the compound for retired working monks, don't we? The soldiers of the garrison and those twenty-old knaves living nearby are always despoiling it. They even graze sheep and horses there. It's quite a mess. The old monk in charge doesn't dare interfere. Why not let this fellow take over? At least he wouldn't be afraid of them."
"That's good idea," said the abbot. He instructed his assistant: "When that brother in the guest-room of the monks' hall has finished eating, bring him here."
The assistant went out. He soon returned with Zhishen.
"My brother abbot has recommended that you join us," said Lucid Teacher. "Our monastery has a large vegetable garden outside Sour Date Gate, next door to the Temple of the Sacred Mountain. I will put you in charge. Everyday the men tending the garden must deliver to us ten loads of vegetables. The rest will belong to you."
"I was sent by my abbot to become a member of the abbey here," said Lu. "Even if you don't make me a supervisor or deacon, how can you put me in charge of a vegetable garden?"
"You don't understand, brother," the elder interjected. "You've only just arrived. You haven't shown any special merit. How can you be appointed deacon? Overseeing the garden is also an important job."
"I'm not looking after any vegetable garden," cried Zhishen. "I won't be anything but a supervisor or deacon!"
"Let me explain," said the reception monk. "We have various kinds of members. I, for instance, am the reception monk. My job is to receive guests and visiting monks. Posts like prior, personal assistant to the abbot, scribe and elder, are special jobs. They're not easy to get. The supervisor, deacon, director and manager are custodians of the monastery's property. You've just come. How can you be given such a high post? We also have jobs like master of the surras, master of the halls, master of the rooms, master of alms begging, and master of the bath house. These positions are held by middle-ranking members.
"And then we have the keepers—keeper of the kitchen, of the tea, of the vegetable garden, of the toilets. These are all overseers' jobs, comparatively low in rank. If you keep the garden well for a year, brother, you'll be raised to keeper of the pagoda. If you do that well for a year, you'll be made master of the bath house. Only after still another year's good work might you be appointed supervisor."
"So that's how it is," said Lu. "As long as there's a chance for advancement, I'll start work tomorrow."
Lucid Teacher let him remain for the day in the abbot's hall. A notice of appointment was written and posted in the compound for retired working monks, effective the following day.
The next morning Lucid Teacher sat on his dais and issued the formal appointment of Lu Zhishen to the post of keeper of the vegetable garden. Zhishen accepted the document, bid the abbot farewell, shouldered his pack, hung his knife at his waist, and took up his staff. With two monks as escorts, he went directly to the compound to assume his duties.
In the neighbourhood of the monastery's vegetable fields were twenty or thirty rogues and gamblers. They made their living by selling the vegetables they stole from the monastery's fields. That day when a few of them went to raid the fields, they saw a notice posted on the gate of the overseer's compound. It read:

The monastery has appointed the monk Lu Zhishen overseer of these vegetable fields. Starting tomorrow, he shall be in charge. Those having no business here are strictly forbidden to enter.

The rascals called a conference of the entire gang. "The monastery has sent a monk called Lu Zhishen to take charge of the vegetable fields," they said. "He's new to the job. This is a good chance to pick a quarrel and beat him up. Teach the lout to respect us."
"I have an idea," one of them said. "He doesn't know us; how can we pick a quarrel? Let's lure him to the edge of the ordure pit instead, as if to congratulate him, then grab his legs and toss him in head over heels. It will be a nice little joke."
"Good. Good," approved the scoundrels
After making their plans, they went to seek the monk. As to Lu Zhishen, on arriving at the overseer's compound, he put his pack and luggage in the house, leaned his staff against the wall and hung up his knife. The lay brothers who worked in the fields all came to greet him and he was handed the keys. The two monks who had escorted him there and the monk he was succeeding as overseer bid him farewell and returned to the monastery. Zhishen then made a tour of the vegetable fields. He saw coming towards him 20 or 30 scamps bearing a platter of pastries and ceremonial wine. "We neighbours have heard that you've been put in charge, master monk," they said, grinning broadly, "and we've come to congratulate you." Not knowing it was a plot, Zhishen walked forward until he reached the edge of the ordure pit. The rascals advanced together, one of them intending to seize his left leg, another his right, and toss him in. The result was: A foot kicked out and a fierce mountain tiger was startled; a fist struck out and a dragon of the sea met a sorry plight. A peaceful garden was instantly changed into a minor battlefield.

Lu Zhishen, after climbing more than one hill, came to a great forest of pines and a mountain path. After following this path for two or three hundred yards, he looked up and saw an abandoned temple compound and heard the sound of bells stirred by the wind. Over the main gate was a faded vermilion plaque with four characters in gold that read, "Temple of the Ceramic Tiles." Some forty or fifty paces further on, he came to a stone bridge, and beyond it the monastery, clearly very ancient. Entering by the main gate, he looked around him. Though it had once been a large establishment, it was now in a very sorry state:
The bell-tower is down, the temple roofs have fallen in. The monastery gate is overgrown with green ferns and the Scripture Hall is covered with jade moss. Madder shoots have sprung up between Sakyamuni's knees. just like when he spent the night on the Snowy Mountain. Kuan Yin is bound with brambles. like when she defended the Fragrant Hills. Birds build their nests throughout the sacred ruins. The Lord Buddha has been knocked awry and in his mouth spiders spin their webs. Headless Lohan with chipped torsos and broken-armed door-gods show no signs of magic power. Rabbits have burrowed in the kitchens and the high dais bears the fox's print.
So Zhishen entered the monastery and went first to the guest quarters. Here the main door was missing, and the surrounding walls had collapsed. "A great monastery like this," he thought to himself, "why is it in such a state of neglect?" He found the abbot's quarters but the ground about was covered in bird-lime, and although there was a big lock on the door it was draped in cobwebs.
Zhishen struck the ground with his staff and called out "Here is a wandering monk, seeking refuge for the night!" He called repeatedly but no answer came. He then searched out the monastery kitchens: there were no pots and pans and the top of the stove had fallen in. Zhishen lowered his bundle and placed it in front of the shrine to the kitchen god. Then, staff in hand, he began a thorough exploration. At the back of the kitchen he found a little room. Inside it, several old monks were sitting on the floor. Their faces were yellow and their bodies emaciated.
"Really!" Zhishen exclaimed, "Have you gone out of your minds, you monks? I called and called but no one answered."
By way of reply they wagged their fingers at him and said: "There's no need to shout."
"I'm a travelling monk," Zhishen said, "I'm asking the favour of something to eat, is that unreasonable?"
One of the old monks said: "We haven't tasted food for three days, how can we find anything to give you?"
"I'm a monk from Mount Wu Tai," Zhishen said. "Never mind if you can only spare me half a bowl of thin gruel."
"A monk from the regions of the Living Buddha! We should certainly offer you food but unfortunately our community has dispersed and we haven't so much as a grain of rice. We've been without food for three days now."
"Rubbish!" said Zhishen. "I can't believe there are no provisions in a big place like this."
"This is indeed a house of some repute. It used to attract visitors from far and wide — that's what brought along one of those monks errant, as they're called. He, and a Taoist he had with him, they took the place over. They've ruined everything we had, they've no conscience at all. All the other monks have been driven away, and now there's just us few remaining, because we're too old to go anywhere. And we're without food."
"I still say it's nonsense," said Zhishen. "How can just one monk and one Taoist do all this? Why don't you report them to the government?"
"You don't understand, brother, the magistrate's a long way off. Besides, even the government troops wouldn't be able to stop them. Those two are monsters, they think nothing of killing and burning. Unfortunately they've taken up residence here, at the back of the abbot's quarters."
"What are their names?"
"The Buddhist is called Cui. His religious name is Daocheng, or Perfected Way but everyone calls him the Iron Buddha. The Taoist is Qiu, the youngest in his family, and people call him the Flying Yaksha. But they're not a bit like monks. They're more like robbers; the religious trappings are more of a disguise, like."
While Zhishen was making these inquiries, an exciting odour was wafted to his nostrils. Staff in hand, he padded to the back to investigate. What met his eyes was a little earthenware stove with a woven cover, a fragrant steam spiralling up from it. He lifted the cover and there was a pot of gruel bubbling away. "Well!" he exclaimed. "You shameless old men, you said you hadn't had food for three days, and here you are cooking gruel! How can monks tell such lies?"
When they saw that Zhishen had discovered their gruel, the old men lamented bitterly and decamped with every bowl, dish, spoon, ladle or receptacle in the place. Now, here was a problem. Zhishen was starving and there was the gruel but he had no means of eating it. All there was beside the stove was a broken lacquer table, its surface covered in ashes and dust. Well, necessity is the mother of invention, as they say. Zhishen laid aside his staff, collected some straw from beside the stove, and wiped the table clean. Then he picked up the pot in both hands and tipped the contents out onto the table. The old monks rushed back to try and rescue their gruel but Zhishen manhandled and kicked them: the luckier ones ran off and the less lucky were knocked down. Then Zhishen began to eat, scooping up the gruel with both hands. After he'd had only a few mouthfuls, the old monk returned to protest: "We really haven't eaten for three days; we had just managed to beg a bit of millet to make this gruel, and you've stolen it." Zhishen had only eaten five or six mouthfuls but this speech affected him, and he left them the rest.
At this point he heard someone humming outside. He washed his hands, picked up his staff, and went out to see who it was. Through a gap in the wall he saw a Taoist wearing a black cloth on his head, with a white cotton tunic, a brightly coloured belt and hemp shoes, and a carrying-pole across his shoulders. On one end of this was a bamboo basket with a fish's tail protruding from it, and also containing some meat wrapped in a lotus leaf; on the other was a jug of wine, also wrapped in lotus leaves. The song went like this: "You to the east and I to the west, you've no man and I've no girl. Things aren't so bad without a wife. A girl with no husband, what a life!" As the old monks fled past Zhishen, they gesticulated and whispered, "That's him, that's the Flying Yaksha!"
Zhishen followed the Taoist, staff in hand, as the latter, still unaware of Zhishen's presence, slipped behind the wall of the abbot's quarters. Zhishen was close on his heels. There, under an ash tree was a table, laid with dishes, three cups and three sets of chopsticks, and in the midst of this scene, sat a fat monk, with eyebrows like lacquer brushes, a face the colour of ink, and a huge muscular torso culminating in a bulging black stomach. In the side gallery a young woman was drinking wine. The Taoist put down his basket and sat down. When Zhishen materialized before them it gave the monk a considerable shock and brought him rapidly to his feet. Then he said: "Please, dear brother in religion, sit down and join us in a cup."
Zhishen, taking a firmer grip on his staff, said: "Why have you laid this temple in ruins?"
"Dear brother, sit down and let me tell you about it."
"Tell then," said Zhishen, fixing him with a fierce stare.
"This poor house of ours was once a wonderful place, with broad domains and a large community. But those old monks — you must have seen them in the gallery — began to drink and cause many scandals, squandering the temple funds on women. The abbot was quite unable to control them, in fact they succeeded in forcing him to leave. This is the reason the monastery fell into ruins. Later most of the monks left and the land was sold off. I, humble monk that I am, came to live here but recently, with this good Taoist. Our intention is to repair the gate and restore the sacred halls."
"And this young woman drinking wine here?" Zhishen asked.
"Dear brother, allow me to explain. She is the daughter of Wang Youjin, from the neighbouring village. Her late father was a benefactor of the temple but the family lost all its money, and now she is in great distress. She has lost all her own family and her husband is sick. She came here to borrow rice, and in memory of her father's generosity to our house, I thought fit to offer her a cup of wine, that's all there is to it. I trust you will not believe any scandal put about by those old scoundrels outside."
This all sounded quite respectable to Zhishen, so he said: "Those lousy old men made a fool of me," and, staff in hand, took himself back to the kitchen. The old monks were still there, after finishing off their gruel. Zhishen scowled and pointed an accusing finger: "It seems you are the ones who ruined the monastery," he said. "What do you mean by telling me all those lies?"
"Don't believe a word of it!" the old men chorused. "Don't you see he's got a woman in there? He suddenly saw you with your sword and your staff, and he hadn't got a weapon, so he didn't want to quarrel with you. If you don't believe us, just go back in there and see how he treats you now! Anyway, work it out for yourself: they've got wine and meat, and we've not even got gruel, or if we did have some, we were afraid you were going to eat it all."
"There's something in what you say," said Zhishen. So back he went to the abbot's quarters, staff in hand as always. But this time he found the door shut. He kicked it open angrily and erupted into the room. The Iron Buddha rushed forward immediately, waving a sword, and took his stand against Zhishen under the tree. Zhishen gave a roar and whirling his staff sprang to the attack.

After fourteen or fifteen assaults, it was clear that the Iron Buddha could not subdue Zhishen, so he contented himself with parrying and blocking, feinting and dodging, waiting for an opportunity to break off. Seeing his friend in difficulties, the Taoist now took up a sword and hurried up to attack Zhishen from behind. Thoroughly occupied with the fight, Zhishen heard the steps behind his back but did not dare turn round to look. But the man's shadow forewarned him of a treacherous attack, so he gave a sudden shout which startled the Iron Buddha who, assuming a crushing blow was on the way, leapt out of range. This gave Zhishen the chance to turn, so that now the three of them formed a triangle, with the big monk and the Taoist both striking at Zhishen, who bore the brunt of a dozen more attacks.

Now, one, Zhishen was hungry, two, he had travelled a good many miles, and three he could hardly match the unsapped strength of two adversaries. So he feinted, and then retreated, his staff still at the ready. They pursued, and came up with him again outside the temple, where Zhishen had to bear a further dozen or so assaults, before he could give them the slip. They followed but only as far as the stone bridge, where they sat down on the parapet and left him to flee unmolested.

Zhishen covered quite a lot of ground before he stopped to regain his breath. "I left my bundle in front of the altar to the kitchen god," he reminded himself. "I was too busy saving my skin to think of getting it. Now here I am without luggage and starving to death, what am I going to do? I ought to go back for it but I'd have to fight those two again, and two of them are too much for me on my own, it would be a stupid way to throw away my life." So he went forward, haltingly. When he had gone a mile or two, he came to a thick wood of red pines.

With curled limbs twisting every way
A thousand barefoot dragons lie;
Weird shadows clustering all around,
A million red-scaled monsters stand.
You'd say a judge's beard from far,
Near to it's more like ghostly hair.
Who sprinkled the forest with fresh blood?
Or is it soaked in cinnabar?

Lu Zhishen said to himself, "This is a pretty wild-looking wood." And just then he noticed in the shadow of the trees a man, who after sticking his head out and observing him furtively, spat, and disappeared. "This precious specimen looks to me like a highwayman," Zhishen said to himself, "And he's waiting here to do business. He must have seen I was a monk, and no good for his purposes, that's why he spat and went back into hiding. Well, it's his bloody luck that he happened to bump into me — and me with my belly full of nothing at all but anger — and just in need of something to take it out on, to boot. I'll have his clothes off him, that should at least buy me some wine." Brandishing his staff he rushed into the wood and shouted: "All right, you, show your face, fast!"

The other, hiding in the thicket, heard and smiled to himself: "Bad luck for him, he's walked straight into it!" Then he sprang into the open, sword in hand, and shouted: "Come on, you bald ass! You must want to die! It wasn't me that came looking for you."

"I'll teach you to know me," Zhishen replied, and advanced, whirling his staff, while the other, twisting the sword in his hand, prepared to engage him. But as he awaited the monk's approach, it struck him that the voice was familiar, and he said: "Hey, monk! I seem to know your voice, what's your name?"

"I'll tell you that when we've traded three hundred blows," Zhishen answered grimly.

The stranger was incensed, and staff and sword began to clash. After they had each sustained a dozen assaults, the man was secretly applauding his adversary's skill. "This monk's a wonder!" he muttered. Another five assaults and he cried: "A rest! I have something to say." They both drew back from the circle of combat, and the man said: "What is your real name? I am sure I know your voice." When Zhishen told him, the other threw down his sword, and bowed his head in respectful greeting. "Don't you recognize Shi Jin?" he said.

"Of course! It's Squire Shi!" exclaimed Zhishen.

Now they both exchanged respectful greetings, and together entered the wood to sit down. "Tell me, Squire, what happened to you after we parted in Weizhou?" Zhishen asked.

"After we said goodbye at the winehouse, I heard next day about your killing the butcher, so I took off. The police knew about our helping Old Jin to escape, so I thought it best to leave Weizhou. I continued the search for my master, Wang Jin, and went as far as Yanzhou but to no avail. I then returned to the Northern Capital, and remained there some while. When I ran out of funds I came here, in search of money. I was certainly not expecting to run into you. Why have you become a monk?"

Zhishen told him all, right from the beginning.

"But you're hungry, my friend," Shi Jin said, "and I've got some dried meat and pancake here." He took out the food and made Zhishen eat. "Since you say your bundle is at the monastery," Shi Jin said, "I'll go with you to get it. If those blighters don't want to give it up, we'll finish them off."

"Right!" said Zhishen. When he and Shi Jin had eaten their fill, they took up their weapons and set off for the Temple of the Ceramic Tiles.

When they reached the monastery, the two villains were still sitting on the bridge. Zhishen shouted a challenge: "Come on, then, you bastards, we're going to fight again; this time prepare to pay with your lives!"

The monk replied scornfully: "Aren't you satisfied with the thrashing I gave you before, have you come back for more?"

The furious Zhishen whirled his iron staff and advanced. The Iron Buddha, similarly aroused, gripped his sword and stepped down from the bridge.

Now, one, Zhishen felt a new man, knowing he had Shi Jin behind him, and two, he had eaten his fill that had restored all his natural strength and vigour. So after eight or nine assaults, the Iron Buddha began to fade and was looking for a chance to withdraw; seeing his companion weaken, the Flying Yaksha took up his sword, planning to intervene. But at this juncture Shi Jin stepped out of the wood and shouted "Not so fast, you two!" Removing his hat and raising his sword, he engaged the Flying Yaksha. Two pairs of combatants now cut and slashed at each other. As the fight between Zhishen and the Iron Buddha reached its climax, the former gave a sudden cry of "Got you!", and with one quick blow of his staff sent his opponent crashing down from the bridge. When he saw the monk fall, the Taoist had no more stomach for the fight. He feinted and then turned to flee. Shouting "Where do you think you're going?", Shi Jin caught the Taoist fair and square with a thrust in the back. He fell to one side. Shi Jin leapt on top of him and brought his sword down, splat! Zhishen meanwhile had rushed down below the bridge where a single blow on the back finished off the Iron Buddha. This was the end of those two miserable wretches. Their lives were empty as a fleeting dream. Truly it was a case of "Past deeds return to plague the doer."

Zhishen and Shi Jin took up the two corpses, tied them together, and threw them into a ravine. Then they went into the monastery. The old monks, when they saw Zhishen lose to the Iron Buddha, had assumed they would all be murdered, and hanged themselves. Zhishen and Shi Jin went to look at the room behind the abbot's quarters. Here they found that the young woman the villains abducted had killed herself by jumping into the well. They searched all the other rooms and found no living thing. All they found was Zhishen's bundle that had not been opened and which Zhishen gladly shouldered, and then, on a bed, three or four other bundles. On opening these, Shi Jin found they were mostly clothes but wrapped up in them were some pieces of silver. He made a single bundle out of what was worth having, and took it up. In the kitchen they found wine and meat, of which they ate their fill. Then they made two torches and set them in front of the stove. They scattered the embers from the stove till the torches caught. The flames mounted rapidly and soon all the little rooms at the back were ablaze. The fire spread to the front and they made more torches and set fire to the eaves of the great hall of the Buddha. A fresh breeze arose just now, making the flames crackle and leap till they were near to set the heavens alight. The two stood and admired their handiwork for a moment: the whole temple was ablaze. But as the saying is, " 'Tis fine to stay at Liang Hall but in the end its comforts pall." So they said to themselves, "We'd better get going."

The two friends set off immediately and walked all night. Just as day was beginning to dawn some figures came into view, off in the distance, and then they saw there was a village. Thither they directed their steps, and came to a tiny inn, beside a bridge made of a single plank. Here's how it was:

A rough cloth hangs in the half-open doorway. Jars of thin acid wine stand beside the earthen bed. Figures of the Immortals are inked on the dusty walls. The country lad who pours the wine is certainly not Sima Xiangru in his days of poverty, nor is the coarse girl who tends the stove at all like Zhuo Wenjun, his faithful wife. The calligraphy on the walls is done by local scholars when in their cups, and the pile of rough raincoats belongs to the rude fishermen who drink there.[1]

They entered the inn, bought some wine, ordered meat from the landlord and asked him to let them have some rice. Thus they broke their fast. And as they drank, they regaled each other with tales of the road.

"And where are you heading now?" Zhishen asked Shi Jin, when they had eaten and drunk their fill.

"The only way for me now is to go back to Little Mount Hua to rejoin Zhu Wu and the other two, and enter their band. After a while I'll reconsider."

"That makes sense," said Zhishen. He opened his bundle and took out some silver that he presented to Shi Jin. Then the two tied their bundles, took up their weapons and settled the account. After leaving the inn and the village, they walked another mile or two till they came to a place where three ways parted. "Dear Brother, here we must separate," Zhishen said. "I am heading for the Eastern Capital, so you must leave me. If Huazhou is your destination, that way lies your road. We will meet again another day. But perhaps if you can find a reliable messenger we may have news of each other."

They said their farewells, and then each pursued his separate way.

After eight or nine days on the road, Zhishen reached the Eastern Capital:

A thousand gates, a million doors: everywhere the glamour of ostentatious wealth. In busy streets and markets every style and fashion is on show. At the sign of the Phoenix, treasures of every conceivable kind are displayed. In the Dragon Room there's a dazzling set of glass objects. Famous courtesans saunter among the willows of Garden Road and the Music Room is packed with the latest singers. Noisy carousing fills the houses of rich men, while the offspring of the nobility summon prostitutes to their palaces.

Zhishen saw the hustle and bustle of the capital, the shouting and commotion. He entered the inner city. Cautiously he asked a passer-by the way to the Xiangguo Temple. "Right ahead, by the Zhou Bridge," was the answer. On he went, swinging his staff, and soon he reached his objective. He entered the main gate and gazed around. It was a fine temple!

The temple gate rears up impressively, the Hall of the Buddhas radiates peace and repose. Overhead the imperial charter is clearly displayed on a tablet. On either side of the door stand two most fearsome door-gods. The five main halls are provided with jade-coloured dragon-scale roofs; the four monks' dormitories have intricate inlays of bricks made smooth by rubbing. Bell-towers are many as trees in a wood, the Scripture Halls have a dignified and reverend air. The flagstaff soars into the clouds, the elegant pagoda pierces the heavens. The wooden fish is hung up tidily, the clapper-board is suspended on high. Before the Buddha lamps and candles burn, smoke from the incense in the braziers spirals upwards. The temple of Kuan Yin is next to the shrine of the Founder, the sacred buildings are connected by corridors and a waterway leads to the garden of the Lohan. The Holy Custodian of the Law haunts these halls; here the demon-quelling Buddha is ever at hand.

Zhishen looked about him, and then directed his steps to the guest quarters. A monk saw him and went to notify the father hosteller. The latter appeared a moment later. Seeing Zhishen's fierce appearance, with his iron staff and his heavy sword, and a heavy pack on his back, the hosteller felt apprehensive.

"Where are you from, worthy brother?" he asked.

Zhishen carefully put down his belongings and his staff and went through the formality of a polite greeting that the hosteller returned.

Then Zhishen said: "I am from Mount Wu Tai. The Abbot, the Reverend True Knowledge, has given me this letter and told me to come to here and ask the Reverend Abbot to take me in and give me a position in the monastery's administration.

"If you're bearing a letter from Abbot True Knowledge you'd better come with me to the abbot's quarters," the hosteller said. Zhishen followed him to the abbot's quarters, where he opened his bundle and took out the letter. He remained holding it in his hand.

"Worthy brother," the hosteller said, "how is it you don't know any rules of etiquette? You're about to have an audience with the Abbot! You must take off your sword! And you ought to have your robe, your mat, your sticks of incense all ready, to honour the Abbot."

"Why didn't you say so before?" said Zhishen, dutifully removing his sword and fishing about in his bundle for the incense, a candle, the robe and the mat. But he couldn't for the life of him work out how to arrange all these things. Finally the hosteller helped him on with the robe and told him to place the mat first.

A moment later the Abbot entered.

"This monk is from Mount Wu Tai and has a letter from Abbot True Knowledge," the hosteller announced.

"Ah, it is long since I was gratified with a letter from his holiness," Abbot Pure Knowledge said.

"Come, come, brother," the hosteller reminded Zhishen, "you have to show your respect to the Abbot."

Zhishen was still holding the incense, so he stuck it in a bowl, and prostrated himself three times before the Abbot, then presented the letter. The Abbot took the letter and opened it. The letter recounted Zhishen's past and the reasons for his leaving the world to become a monk, as well as his unfortunate behaviour in the meditation hall that necessitated his departure from Mount Wu Tai. It ended like this:

*I most sincerely hope that of your charity and goodness you will receive him and find him a position in your monastery. Do not reject him, I beg of you, for one thing is most certain: this monk will finally bear wondrous fru*it.

When he had finished the letter, the Abbot said: "Monk from afar please go to the hall to rest and take a little nourishment."

Zhishen thanked him and when he had picked up his robe and mat and put them away in his bundle and collected his staff and sword, an acolyte led him out.

The Abbot now summoned the entire community and addressed them as follows: "Hear all of you how unreasonable is our brother in religion Abbot True Knowledge. This monk he sends us was originally an army officer. He only shaved his head and became a monk because he had killed a man. Twice he disturbed the peace of their meditation hall with rowdy behaviour. He thus rendered himself unacceptable in that place. They can't keep him, so we must have him? Suppose we don't want him? But my brother here entreats me a thousand times not to refuse him. Suppose we receive him and he again slights the holy rules, what then?"

The hosteller said: "We have all had a look at the man, Father Abbot, and from his appearance he does not seem to be at all pious, how can we possibly take him?"

The prior spoke: "I have been thinking, Father Abbot. There is that little plot of land, behind the building we use for retreats, outside the Gate of Wild Jujubes. It is constantly being invaded by soldiers of the imperial guard and by vagabonds from outside the walls who let their goats and horses in and cause much damage. There's an old monk who's supposed to look after it but he doesn't dare do anything. Why not send Lu Zhishen there, as overseer? He might even do some good."

"We'll do as the prior suggests," the Abbot said. He sent an acolyte to the monastery guest-house, with instructions to return with the new monk as soon as he had finished his meal. In almost no time the acolyte came back to the abbot's quarters with Zhishen. Abbot Pure Knowledge said: "Since you come here with a recommendation from my brother Abbot True Knowledge, and a request that you be taken in here, temporarily, and given some position, know that this monastery possesses a large kitchen garden, just outside the Gate of the Wild Jujubes under the walls of the Temple of the Holy Mountain. I am sending you there as manager and overseer. You will see that the gardeners bring us ten loads of vegetables each day, and the rest will be yours to do what you like with."

Zhishen was indignant. "My master, Abbot True Knowledge, sent me to your temple to seek a position of some kind. Do you mean to say that instead of asking me to be prior or bursar you want me to go and look after a lot of vegetables?"

The chaplain responded. "You've misunderstood, brother," he said. "You've only just arrived, you're only just accepted, you've had no time to prove your worth. How can you expect to be made prior straight away? Anyway, superintendent of the garden is an important post."

"I'm not looking after any kitchen garden," Zhishen said. "I'll only accept the post of prior or bursar."

"Now listen here," said the hosteller. "Each of us junior monks with special offices has his own responsibility. Mine for instance, as hosteller, is to see to the comfort of any pilgrims or monks who happen to turn up. The others who serve as deacon, choir-master, librarian, registrar and so on, all have important jobs which are no sinecure. And the prior, bursar, secretary and director, they have the key positions, because they have to administer the property and funds of the monastery. Now, you've only just come, how can you expect to get one of these top jobs? There's also the master of the sutras, who looks after the scriptural texts, the master of halls, responsible for the halls, the cell master, responsible for the cells, the alms master who organizes the begging, and the ablutions master, who looks after the bathrooms — those are all posts of the middle rank; and then there's the pagoda attendant, the kitchen master, the tea master, the toilet-keeper and the garden superintendent — these are all overseer's posts, lower in rank. After a year, if you've managed the garden well, then you may be promoted to pagoda attendant, and if you perform that duty well for a year, then you may be promoted to ablutions master, and then perhaps after another year to bursar."

"All right then," said Zhishen. "If that's the way it is, and seeing there's promotion, I'll start tomorrow."

Now that Zhishen had agreed to go, the Abbot allowed him to spend the night there in the abbot's quarters. The same evening his future duties were set down, an official notice of the appointment was written and someone was sent to the garden to post it on the wall of the overseer's lodge. Following which, the company retired.

Early next morning the Abbot ascended his throne and wrote out an official letter of appointment entrusting the garden to Zhishen's supervision. Zhishen approached the throne and received the letter. Then he took his leave of the Abbot, picked up his bundle, sword and staff, and guided by two of the monks set off for his new place of residence beyond the Gate of Wild Jujubes.

The wayfarer finally reaches town
At the end of a lonesome, weary way.
The ruined monastery he's just burnt down;
He'll one day command a tumultuous fray.
At the Xiangguo Temple his case is addressed;
He's sent to manage a vegetable plot.
But the seeker has never a point of rest,
Movement and change are ever his lot.

Now there was in the neighbourhood of this garden a bunch of wastrels, a gang of idle thriftless miscreants whose habit it was to forage there, pilfering the vegetables for their subsistence. On one such expedition they saw the public notice posted on the overseer's lodge. It read: "The Xiangguo Temple announces the appointment of Father Lu Zhishen as resident manager of this vegetable plot. From tomorrow when Father Lu takes up his duties no trespassers will be permitted to enter and despoil this land." Those who saw this notice reported it to the others and a discussion ensued. "The temple is sending a monk, a Father Lu something-or-other, to look after the garden. We'd better take advantage of the fact he's new, and think up a few tricks, rough him up a bit, so he'll know he'd better do what we want."

"I've got an idea," one of them said. "He doesn't know us, so he won't be expecting any trouble. We'll wait till he comes, then lure him onto the edge of the cesspit, pretending we want to pay him our respects. Then we'll kick the bugger into the cesspit, arse-over-tip." Everyone applauded this scheme. The plan having been agreed on, all they had to do was await the monk's arrival.

When he arrived Lu Zhishen went straight to the overseer's lodge, disposed of his bundle, propped his staff against the wall and hung up his sword. The lay brothers who worked in the garden came to pay their respects and all the keys were handed over to the new incumbent. The two brothers, together with the old monk who had previously been in charge, returned to the temple. Zhishen then went out to take a good look round his new domain. The first thing he saw was a crowd of ruffians approaching with offerings of fruit and wine. With a good deal of sniggering, they said: "Welcome to your new appointment, Reverend. We are your neighbours and we've come to congratulate you."

Zhishen did not know of their plot, of course. When he was near the edge of the cesspit, the band of ruffians tried to rush him: one tried to grab his right leg and another tried to grab his left leg, they were planning to trip him up. But, as they say,

He lifts his foot, and the mountain tiger quails;
His fist descends, and the mighty dragon pales.

Or to put it another way,

A plot that wholesome fruits should yield,

Becomes a contentious battlefield.

Lu had crossed several mountain ridges before he entered a pine forest, and still following a path for about half of one li he at last came to a ruined monastery on the eaves of which bells were tinkling in the breeze. Above the main entrance was an honourary tablet in a horizontal position with four characters "Waguan Monastery" in a dilapidated condition. He crossed a stone bridge, and entering the monastery went to the monk's living rooms. There he found there were no doors, windows, or walls left standing, and wondered how the place had been destroyed. Near the abbot's living quarters the ground was covered with bird's excreta, and there a door was locked and covered with spider's webs. He stuck his staff into the ground and called out, "Are there any monks here? I want some food." Although he said this several times there was no reply. So be went to the kitchen but found that there was no boiler and that the cooking range had been destroyed. There he placed his bundle in the seat usually occupied by the supervisor at meal times, and then went to look round the place. Behind the kitchen he found a small room in which several emaciated old monks were sitting on the ground. He shouted, "You monks have no manners. I called out several times without getting a single reply from you."

They waved their hands, and said, "Do not talk so loudly."

"I am a traveling monk, and only demand a meal from you so what harm is there in that?"

An old monk replied, "For three days we have had no food so how can we give you some?"

"I am from Mount Wutai, and even if you have only stale congee I beg you to let me have half a bowl of it."

The old monk replied, "As you come from a place where there is a living Buddha we certainly ought to give you some food but as a matter of fact we have not got even a grain of rice in this monastery, and most of the monks have already left. For three days we have not had a bite of food."

"Nonsense! I don't believe that," said Lu Da.

The old monk continued, "This monastery was certainly not a small one, and we collected subscriptions over a large area. But some time ago a traveling monk came here with a Taoist and they seized all the property for themselves. They did everything that is bad, and that was why almost all the monks left. We are so old that we could not go with them, and we live here in a state of starvation."

"Nonsense! If these two men did such things why did you not complain to the government?"

"Reverend, you do not understand. The yamen is a long way off but even if the magistrate came here he would not put matters right, because these two men are exceedingly fierce, and would kill somebody or set the place on fire. They live in the abbot's quarters at the back of this building."

"What are the names of those two men?" asked Lu Da.

"The monk is called Cui; his religious name is Daocheng, and his nickname is 'Iron Buddha.' The Taoist priest is called Qiu Xiaoyi, and his nickname is 'Flying Ogre.' But they are just robbers, and not like clerics. Outwardly they look like clerics but their innermost thoughts are vile."

While Lu Da was listening to this he became aware of a fragrant smell, and turning round he saw a cooking pot with a cover of matting through which steam was issuing. He lifted the cover, and saw that the pot was full of maize and water. He said, "You old monks said that you had had no food for three days, and yet here is a pot full of maize congee. Why did you lie to me?"

When they saw that he had found the congee they removed the bowls, saucers, chopsticks, and ladles so that he should not eat any. But he was so hungry that he decided to take drastic steps. Taking a broken table near the stove he wiped off the dust with a whisp of grass; then taking the pot with both hands he emptied the contents on the table. Upon seeing this all the monks came forward with bowls to help themselves but Lu Da pushed them away. He took the congee with both hands, and ate it.

The old monks said, "For three days we have had no food, and we obtained this maize outside by begging but now you eat it."

Lu Da had taken about seven mouthfuls, and so he desisted taking any more. Just then he heard someone outside singing a ribald song, so he washed his hands, picked up his monk staff, and hurried off to see who was singing. Looking through a partitioned wall that had been partly broken down, he saw a Taoist who was wearing a black turban,[56] a shirt, a sash of many colours round his waist, hempen shoes, and was carrying a load suspended from a pole over his shoulder. In one bamboo basket was a fish with its tail showing over the side, and above it was a lotus leaf, with some meat on the top. In the other basket he carried a bottle of wine also covered by a lotus leaf. He was singing:

"You there, I here: each leads a single life,
You have no husband, I have no wife:
I have no wife: how lonely I must be,
You have no husband: don't you pity me."

All the old monks had followed Lu Da, and they now pointed to the Taoist and whispered, "That is the priest called Flying Ogre."

Lu Da took his staff, following the Taoist who entered the abbot's living quarters without knowing he was being followed. Inside, Lu Da saw an ash tree in the courtyard with a table under it, on which were plates of vegetables, three wine cups, and three pairs of chopsticks. At the table sat a fat monk, whose eyebrows looked as though they had been brushed and waxed stiff. He was very muscular and his face sallow. His clothing was not fastened, and disclosed his belly. At his side sat a young woman. The Taoist put down the baskets and took a seat. Lu Da walked to the table, and the monk, being startled at seeing him, rose, and said, "I request you, my brother, to sit down and have a cup of wine with us."

"Why have you two destroyed this monastery?" asked Lu Da.

"Brother, please be seated and listen to me."

Lu Da stared at him and said, "Say on, say on!"

The priest continued, "Previously this monastery had much land and many monks. Those old monks who are now in the veranda used to drink wine, and use the monastery money for women. The abbot issued an order prohibiting these practices, and as the monks disobeyed the order, he resigned. They ruined the monastery then, and sold the land so that many of the monks left. The Taoist and I have recently arrived, and we intend to repair the monastery."

"Who is this woman, and why is she drinking wine here?"

"Brother, allow me to tell you that she is the daughter of Wang Youjin, who lives in a village nearby. Her father was a donor of our monastery but now he is ruined, and the family is in extreme poverty. Her husband was inflicted with a disease, and as there was no other person at home she came here to borrow rice. I knew her and therefore gave her a drink of wine. There was no other intention. You, brother, must not listen to all those 'old animals' have to say."

Lu Da believed what he heard; so replied, "How that old monk has deceived me!" So saying, he picked up his staff and returned to the kitchen. The old monks had eaten all the maize congee but were still there. He pointed at them and said: "It was you who previously destroyed this monastery, and you have told me a lot of lies."

An old monk replied, "Brother, you must not listen to their talk, as they keep a woman inside there. They saw you had your sword and the heavy monk's staff, and as they were not armed, did not care to fight with you. If you do not believe me, then go back, and see how they treat you the second time. Brother, think a little. They have both wine and meat, whereas we cannot get even congee, and we were afraid that you would eat the little we had."

"What you say seems reasonable," said Lu Da. He took his staff and returned to the abbot's quarters but found the door closed. He was angry, and kicked open the door. He hurried inside, and saw that "Iron Buddha" was now armed with a halberd, and was advancing towards the ash tree, with the intention of fighting Lu Da, who gave a loud whoop, and whirling aloft his monk's staff, engaged "Iron Buddha" in conflict. They fought fifteen bouts but the "Iron Buddha" could not overcome Lu Da, and then the former took up a defensive attitude, parrying the blows and thrusts, slowly retreating. The Taoist saw that "Iron Buddha" was getting the worst of the fight, picked up a halberd, and came behind Lu Da, with the intention of stabbing him. Lu Da heard footsteps but dared not turn round. He also saw the shadow of a man, and suspected treachery. He called out " Zhao" (I will hit you), and upon hearing this Night Witch jumped out of the way of Lu Da's staff. Lu Da turned partly round so that he was facing them both in the form of a triangle. The two men combined to fight with Lu Da for ten bouts. He was hungry, and was also tired through walking so far, and knew that he could not defeat these two men with their spare energy. So he retreated, trailing his staff on the ground. The two men pursued him as far as the monastery gate, where they again fought. Lu Da withdrew to a stone bridge where the two men gave up the pursuit and sat down on the parapet. Lu Da went some distance, and then remembered he had left his bundle in the monastery. Moreover, he had no money, and wondered what he must do. He could not go back, as he knew if he faced the two men, it would mean disaster. He walked a little further but was in doubt whether to go on or not. After going a few li he saw a forest of pine trees which had a forbidding aspect.

In the shadow of the trees he saw a man looking round stealthily, and upon seeing Lu Da he uttered an exclamation, spat, and slipped back into the forest. Lu Da thought the man was a robber, who perhaps thought it would be useless to hold up a monk. But Lu Da decided to vent his rage on that man and take away the man's clothes which he could perhaps pawn for wine and food. He called, "You, footpad, come out at once."

The man in the forest laughed when he heard this, and replied, "I have bad luck, and you come here to pick a quarrel with me!" He then took his halberd, and coming into the open, called out, "You bald-headed donkey! You are evidently seeking for an opportunity to die."

"You will soon know me," called Lu Da, who advanced, nourishing his staff, while the other man also came forward, holding his halberd. When they were near each other the man said, "Your voice is familiar to me. What is your name?"

"When I have given you a good beating, I will tell you my name but not now," said Lu Da.

The man was angry, and advancing fought Lu Da but after a little contact he began to appreciate the skill of his opponent, whom he had regarded at first as only a stupid monk. So after a few more bouts of fighting, he said, "Let us rest. I have something to say to you." They both sprang apart at the same time, and the man said, "What is your name? Your voice seems familiar."

Lu Da told his name, and upon hearing it the man threw down his sword, and kneeling, saluted with folded hands; asking, "Do you not recognize Shi Jin?"

Lu Da laughed and replied, "Can you really be Master Shi?" He then knelt down and saluted. This done, they both went into the forest and sat down, telling their experiences since they last met. Shi Jin had some cold meat and cakes that he offered to Lu Da who was hungry. He said, "As your bundle is in the monastery I will go there with you and take it. If they decline to give it to us we will kill them." Lu Da agreed to this, and when they had finished their food, set off for the monastery. On their arrival they found the Flying Ogre and Iron Buddha sitting on the parapet of the bridge. Lu Da called, "Come here, you two men! This time I shall kill you."

Iron Buddha laughed, "I have just defeated you—why do you come here again?"

Lu Da whirled his monk's staff in the air and Iron Buddha seized his halberd, and went to meet him. Lu Da felt braver because Shi Jin was now with him, and moreover was no longer hungry. He fought for nine bouts until Iron Buddha became weak and thought of retreating. Seeing this Flying Ogre went to his assistance but Shi Jin ran from the shade of a tree, and attacked him. There were now four men fighting, two on each side. After a short time Lu Da became aware that he was getting the better of his opponents, and shouted "Strike," and made a final effort, striking Iron Buddha with his staff, knocking him off the bridge into the water below. When Flying Ogre saw this he retreated: but Shi Jin running after him struck him a blow in the back. Flying Ogre fell down and Shi Jin placing his foot on the body stabbed him repeatedly. Lu Da went under the bridge and killed Iron Buddha. We cannot but pity these two ruffians, who were sent to their last sleep in this way, and whose deeds passed like a bad dream.

Lu Da and Shi Jin went into the monastery and got Lu Da's bundle. They found the old monks had all strangled themselves in order to avoid what they thought would be certain death. When the woman saw Lu Da and Shi Jin, she, too, was afraid and committed suicide by jumping down the well. They went through the now vacant rooms, and found some bundles of clothing lying on a bed which they opened and found silver inside. In the kitchen they found fish, meat, and wine that gave them a good meal. Before their departure they set fire to the monastery. It happened a strong wind was blowing, so that very soon the whole place was in flames. They walked all night, and at dawn saw a large market town in the distance. Just before reaching it, they stopped at an inn, ordering the waiter to buy meat and rice, and have it cooked for them. Over their wine they discussed their future plans, and Shi Jin said he was going to Mount Shaohua to join the bandits there. They left the inn, and after traveling about seven li they came to a place where three roads met, and Lu Da decided they must separate, as he was going on to the Eastern Capital.

Lu Da arrived at the Eastern Capital in nine days. The streets were very crowded and noisy. Upon reaching the centre of the town he politely asked a passer-by where the Great Xiangguo Monastery was, and was directed. Upon entering the monastery he went towards the small room where guests are received. A servant reported his arrival, and without delay the monk came out to welcome the guest but when he saw the fierce appearance of Lu Da with his monk's staff and broad sword he was almost afraid of him. He asked where he had come from, and Lu Da replied that he had come from Mount Wutai, and had a letter for the Abbot. He took the letter from his bundle, and followed the monk when the latter reminded him that as he was going to see the Abbot he should not carry a sword but should carry a mat, and some sticks of incense, and should kowtow when he met the Abbot. So Lu Da put aside his sword, and after some time got the other things in proper order. The monk also told him how to wear his monk gown, and how to spread the mat. Just then the Abbot appeared on the scene, and the monk introduced Lu Da to him.

Abbot Qing said, "I have not heard from Mount Wutai for a long time."

The monk reminded Lu Da that he should salute the Abbot at once but the latter did not know where to put down the incense sticks he was holding, and this made the monk laugh. He took the incense from Lu Da, and placed it in an incense urn. Lu Da then saluted three times but the monk told him that he should first have presented the letter. The letter was opened by the Abbot who read how Lu Da had been expelled from Mount Wutai, and why he was recommended for employment, and that it was hoped that eventually he would become a reformed character. After reading the letter the Abbot stated that Lu Da could rest in the monks' quarters.

The Abbot Qing summoned to his living quarters all the staff of the monastery, and addressed them, "I want you all to know that Abbot Zhi Zhen of Mount Wutai is not a good judge of what is good or bad. He has sent us a monk who was previously a military officer and entered our calling because he had killed a man. He made disgraceful rows in the monastery so they have sent him here. But if he stays here he may break our rules so what shall we do?"

The monastery manager spoke, "I have a proposal to make. Just outside of the Suanzao Gate there is our branch temple with a vegetable garden attached. Near the temple is a barracks for soldiers, and everyday the soldiers come with hooligans to steal our vegetables. They also bring horses and sheep to feed there. The monk who resides there cannot stop these depredations, so how would it be if we sent this man to live there? He would perhaps control the position."

The Abbot accepted the suggestion, and sent an attendant to bring Lu Da to see him. Upon the latter's arrival the Abbot addressed him, "As you have been recommended by Abbot Zhen, I will enter your name on our register. Just outside the Suanzao Gate we have a branch temple with a vegetable garden, and I want you to take charge of that. Everyday you must see that the gardeners send ten loads of vegetables to this monastery, and you can have whatever is left over."

"Abbot Zhen told me that I could do some business here but instead of being a manager or superintendent you tell me to manage a vegetable garden," said Lu Da.

"Brother, you do not understand," said the monk who leads in worship, "you will be entered on our roll but as you have had no experience, how can you manage a monastery? The management of this vegetable garden, however, is quite an important job."

"I will not do such work, and must have a position as manager."

"You just listen to what I have to say," said the guest's host. "There must be a chief of the staff who manages our affairs. For instance, I attend to the guests who come here but more important work is done by the Wei Na (who attends to the monks' discipline); the Shi Zhe (abbot's assistant); the Shu Ji (scribe); the Shou Zuo (who conducts the prayers), and all their work is difficult. Then there are the business manager, and his assistant who look after the monastery property. As you have just arrived here, how could you occupy a leading position? Then there is the monk who looks after the storeroom where the holy scriptures are kept, he is called the storekeeper; the monk who keeps the monastery clean is called the hallkeeper; the monk who looks after the upper chamber is called the chamberlain; there are also the subscriptions collector; and the bathhouse keeper. These all manage affairs of the second class. Then there are the pagoda keeper; chief cook; chief tea maker; chief of the lavatories; and chief of the vegetable garden, all managing affairs of the lower class. If you attend to a vegetable garden well for say one year you will be promoted to look after the pagoda, and if you do that work well you will become the bathhouse keeper, and eventually become the superintendent of the temple."

"As there is a prospect of promotion I will go there tomorrow," said Lu Da.

This being decided Abbot Qing invited him to rest in his private room for the night. The next day the Abbot signed a notice to this effect, and sent a man to post it at the branch temple. Lu Da then took leave of the Abbot, and proceeded to his new duties with two monks who acted as guides. We have already mentioned that close to the garden there lived some worthless vagabonds who passed their time gambling, and stole vegetables. When they entered the garden that day they read the notice about the new arrangement, and they agreed among themselves that they must take an early opportunity to pick a quarrel with Lu Da as he would submit to them when he had been beaten. One man had a plan, "We must entice him to the cesspit to receive our congratulations, and while we are knelt down we must seize his legs, and throw him into the manure pit. That will be a nice bit of fun." The others thought it was a splendid idea, and they awaited Lu Da's arrival to put it into execution. When Lu Da arrived, the gardeners all came and saluted him, and the keys were handed over to him. The two monks who had accompanied him, and the monk also whom he had relieved, bid him goodbye and returned to the principal monastery. Lu Da then went into the garden to look round, and there he saw about thirty of the vagabonds who had a basket filled with fruit and wine. When they saw him, they smiled and said, "We heard that you have come to live here, and therefore we have come to offer you our congratulations as we are your neighbours." Lu Da had no suspicion of a trick, and therefore walked up to them near the manure pit.

A priestly foot was raised on high;
Fierce tigers slunk away;
He raised his fist up to the sky;
Scaly dragons were dismayed.

These rascals tried to molest Lu Da.

007

The Tattooed Flowery Monk Lu Da Uproots a Willow Tree; Leopard's Head Lin Chong Enters White Tiger Inner Sanctum Hall by Mistake & discovered where he ought not to be

Among the 20 to 30 knaves who lived outside Sour Date Gate, 2 were leaders. One was 'Rat Crossing the Street' Zhang the Third. The other was 'Snake in the Grass' Li the Fourth. These two were in the lead as the gang advanced. Zhishen naturally walked forward to meet them.

The gang halted at the edge of the ordure pit and chorused: "We've come to congratulate you on your new post."

"Since you're neighbours," said Zhishen, "come into the compound and sit a while."

Zhang and Li dropped to their knees respectfully. They hoped that the monk would approach to raise them courteously to their feet. Then they could go into action.

Noticing this, Zhishen grew suspicious. "This gang is a queer-looking lot, and they're not willing to come forward. Can they be planning to dump me?" he wondered. "The louts think they can pluck the tiger's whiskers. Well, I'll go to them, and show them how I use my hands and feet."

Zhishen strode up to the gang. Still kneeling, Zhang and Li cried: "We younger brothers have come especially to pay our respects," and each reached to grab one of the monk's legs.

But before they could even lay a finger on him, Zhishen lashed out with his right foot and kicked Li into the ordure pit. Zhang rose to flee but a quick thrust of the monk's left leg and the two rascals were floundering in the foul mess together.

Startled, the rest of the gang gaped, then turned to run.

"Whoever moves goes into the pit," bellowed Zhishen.

The scoundrels froze, not daring to take a step.

Zhang and Li now raised their heads out of the ordure. The pit seemed bottomless, and they were covered with excrement. Maggots clung to their hair. Standing in the filth they wailed: "Reverend, forgive us!"

"Help those two dogs out, you oafs," Zhishen shouted to the gang, "and I'll forgive you all."
The rogues quickly hauled their leaders from the pit and helped them over to a gourd arbour. The two stank to high heaven.
Zhishen roared with laughter. "Fools! Go and wash off in the pond. Then I want to talk to all of you."
After the two gang leaders had cleansed themselves, some of their men removed their own clothing to give them a change of garments.
"Come into the compound," Zhishen ordered. "We're going to have a talk."
He sat down in the midst, pointed his finger at them and scoffed, "You ragamuffins! Did you think you could fool me? How could pricks like you ever hope to make sport of me?"
Zhang, Li and the whole gang dropped to their knees. "Our families have lived here for generations," they said, "supporting themselves by gambling and begging and robbing these vegetable fields. The monastery paid people several times to drive us away but no one could handle us. Where are you from, Reverend? Such a terrific fellow! We've never seen you at the monastery before. From now on, we'll be happy to serve you."
"I'm from Yanan Prefecture, west of the Pass. I used to be a major, under his excellency the garrison commander Old General Zhong. But because I killed many men, I took refuge in a monastery and became a monk. Before coming here, I was on Mount Wutai. My family name is Lu. On entering the Buddhist order I was given the name Zhishen. Even if surrounded by an army of thousands, I could hack my way out. What do you twenty or thirty amount to!"
The knaves loudly and respectfully voiced their agreement with these sentiments. They thanked the monk for his mercifulness and withdrew. Zhishen went into the house, put his things in order, then went to bed.
The next day, after talking the matter over, the rogues scraped some money together and bought ten bottles of wine. Leading a live pig, they called on Zhishen and invited him to join them in a feast. A table was laid in the overseer's compound. Zhishen sat at the head of the table, with the twenty to thirty rascals lining both sides. Everyone drank.
"Why are you spending so much money?" the monk asked.
"We're lucky," they replied. "Now that you are here you can be our master."
Zhishen was very pleased. Wine flowed freely and the party grew lively. There was singing and talking and applause and laughter. Just as the merriment was at its height, crows were heard cawing outside the gate.
Some of the men piously clacked their teeth and they intoned together: "Red lips rise to the sky, white tongue enters the earth."
"What are you making such a blasted racket about?" demanded Zhishen.
The vagabonds replied: "When crows caw, it means there's going to be a quarrel."
"Rot!" said the monk.
One of the lay brothers who tilled the monastery's fields laughed and said, "In the willow tree beside the wall there's a new crow's nest. The birds caw from dawn to dusk."
"Let's get a ladder and destroy the nest," said some.
"I'll do it," volunteered several of the others.
Feeling his wine, Zhishen went out with the crowd to take a look. Sure enough, there was a crow's nest in the willow tree.
"Get a ladder and tear the nest down," said the men. "Then our ears can have a little peace and quiet."
"I'll climb up and do the job," said Lu, "and I don't need any ladder."
Zhishen looked the situation over, walked up to the tree and removed his cassock. He bent and grasped the lower part of the trunk with his right hand, while his left hand seized it higher up, then gave a tremendous wrench—and pulled the tree from the ground, roots and all!
The knaves dropped to their knees, crying: "The master is no ordinary mortal! He's truly one of the Lohans! If he didn't have ten million catties of strength, how could he have uprooted that tree?"
"It was nothing at all," Lu said. "One of these days I'll show you how to handle weapons."
That night the vagabonds departed. But they came again the next day, and everyday thereafter, bringing meat and wine to feast Zhishen, for they positively worshipped him. They begged the monk to demonstrate his skill with weapons.
After several days of this, Zhishen thought to himself: "These fellows have been treating me day after day. I ought to give them a banquet in return." He sent a few lay brothers into the city to buy several platters of fruit and five or six buckets of wine, and he killed a pig and slaughtered a sheep. It was then the end of the third lunar month.
"The weather's getting warm," said Zhishen. He had mats spread beneath the green ash tree and invited the rascals to sit around and feast outdoors.
Wine was served in large bowls and meat in big chunks. When everyone had eaten his fill, the fruit was brought out and more wine. Soon the feasters were thoroughly sated.
"The past few days you've demonstrated your strength, master," said the rogues, "but you still haven't shown us your skill with weapons. It would be fine if you could give us a performance."
"All right," said Zhishen. He went into the house and brought out his solid iron Buddhist staff, five feet long from end to end and weighing sixty-two catties.
His audience was amazed. "Only a man with the strength of a water buffalo in his arms could handle such a weapon," they cried.
Zhishen took up the staff and flourished it effortlessly, making it whistle through the air. The vagabonds cheered and applauded.
Just as the monk was warming up, a gentleman appeared at a gap in the compound wall. "Truly remarkable," he commended. Zhishen stopped his exercise and turned to see who had spoken.
The gentleman wore a black muslin cap with its two corners gathered together; a pair of interlinked circlets of white jade held the knot of hair at the back of his head. He was dressed in a green officer's robe of flowered silk, bound at the waist by a girdle made of double strips of beaver and fastened by a silver clasp shaped like a tortoise back. His feet were shod in square-toed black boots. In his hand he carried a folding Chengdu fan. About thirty-five years old, he had a head like a panther, round eyes, a chin sharp as a swallow's beak, whiskers like a tiger and was very tall.
"Indeed remarkable," he said. "What excellent skill."
"If he approves, it certainly must be good," said the vagabonds.
"Who is that officer?" queried Zhishen.
"A drill instructor of the Mighty Imperial Guards. His name is Lin Chong."
"Invite him in. I'd like to meet him."
Hearing this, the drill instructor leaped in through the gap in the wall. The two men greeted each other and sat down beneath the ash tree.
"Where are you from, brother monk?" asked Lin. "What is your name?"
"I'm Lu Da, from west of the Pass. Because I killed many men, I had to become a monk. In my youth, I spent some time in the Eastern Capital. I know your honourable father, Major Lin."
Lin Chong was very pleased, and adopted Zhishen as his sworn brother on the spot.
"What brings you here today, Drill Instructor?" asked Zhishen.
"My wife and I just arrived at the Temple of the Sacred Mountain next door to burn incense. Hearing the cheers of your audience, I looked over and was intrigued by your performance. I told my wife and her maidservant, Jin Er, to burn the incense without me, that I would wait for them by the gap in the wall. I didn't think I would actually have the honour to meet you, brother."
"When I first came here I didn't know anybody," said Zhishen. "Then I became acquainted with these brothers and we gather together everyday. Today, you have thought well enough of me to make me your sworn brother. That makes me very happy." He ordered the lay brothers to bring more wine.
Just as they were finishing their third round, the maidservant Jin Er, agitated and red in the face, rushed up to the gap in the wall and cried: "Hurry, master! Our lady is having trouble with a man in the temple!"
"Where?" Lin Chong demanded hastily.
"As we were coming down the stairs of the Five Peaks Pavilion, a low fellow suddenly blocked her way. He won't let her pass."
Lin Chong quickly took his leave of Zhishen. "I'll see you again, brother. Forgive me!" He leaped through the gap in the wall and raced with Jin Er back to the temple.
When he reached the Five Peaks Pavilion he saw several idlers carrying crossbows, blowpipes and limed sticks gathered below the stair railing. They were watching a young man who was standing on the stairway with his back to them, blocking the path of Lin Chong's wife.
"Let's go upstairs," the young man was urging her. "I want to talk to you."
Blushing, the lady said, "What right do you have to make sport of a respectable woman in times of peace and order!"
Lin pushed forward, seized the young man by the shoulder and spun him around. "I'll teach you to insult a good man's wife," he shouted, raising his fist. Then he recognized Young Master Gao, adopted son of Marshal Gao Qiu, commander of the Imperial Guards.
When Gao Qiu first rose to high office he had no son to help him run his numerous affairs. And so he adopted the son of his uncle, Gao the Third. Since the boy was not only his cousin but now also his foster son, Marshal Gao loved him to excess.
The young scoundrel made full use of his foster father's influence in the Eastern Capital. His favourite pastime was despoiling other men's wives. Fearful of his powerful connections, none of the husbands dared speak out against him. He became known as the "King of Lechers."
When Lin Chong saw that he was Young Master Gao, the strength left his arms.
"This has nothing to do with you, Lin Chong," said Gao. "Who asked you to interfere!" He didn't realize that the lady was Lin Chong's wife. Had he known, the thing would never have happened. Seeing Lin Chong's hesitancy, he spoke boldly.
The commotion drew a crowd of idlers. "Don't be angry, Drill Instructor," one said. "The young master didn't recognize her. It was all a mistake."
Lin Chong's rage hadn't fully abated, and he glared at the rake with burning eyes. Some of the crowd soothed Lin Chong while others persuaded Gao to leave the temple grounds, get on his horse and depart.
Lin Chong was turning to go with his wife and Jin Er, the maidservant, when Zhishen, iron staff in hand, came charging into the temple compound with huge strides, leading his twenty to thirty vagabonds.
"Where are you going, brother?" asked Lin Chong.
"I've come to help you fight," said Zhishen.
"The man turned out to be the son of our Marshal Gao. He hadn't recognized my wife and behaved discourteously. I was going to give the lout a good drubbing but then I thought it would make the marshal lose too much face," Lin Chong explained. "You know the old saying, 'Fear not the authorities—except those that have authority over you.' After all, I'm on his payroll. I decided to let the young rascal off this time."
"You may be afraid of the marshal but he doesn't scare me a bit," shouted Zhishen. "If I ever run into that young whelp of his I'll give him three hundred licks of my iron staff."
Lin Chong saw that Zhishen was drunk and he said: "You're quite right, of course, brother. It was only because everybody urged me that I let him go."
"The next time you have any trouble, just call me and I'll take care of it!"
The knaves supported the tipsy Zhishen under the arms. "Let's go back, Reverend," they said. "You can deal with young Gao later."
Iron staff in hand, Zhishen said politely to Lin Chong's lady: "Your pardon, sister-in-law. Please don't laugh at me." And to Lin Chong he said: "Until tomorrow, brother." Then he and the vagabonds departed.
Lin Chong, his wife and Jin Er returned home. The drill instructor was angry and depressed.
As for Young Master Gao, when he had drifted into the temple leading his band of idle cronies and met Lin Chong's wife, he had become sorely enamored. After Lin Chong drove him off, he returned unhappily to the marshal's residence.
A few days later, his ne'er-do-well friends called. But they found him so fretful and irritable that they went away.
One of these idlers was an attendant named Fu An, better known as Dried Pecker Head. He suspected what was troubling Young Master Gao, and later went alone to the residence. The young rake was sitting abstracted in the study.
Fu An drew near and said: "You've been rather pale lately, Young Master. You seldom smile. Something must be bothering you."
"How do you know?"
"I'm just guessing."
"Can you guess what it is?"
"Lin Chong's wife. How's that for a guess?"
The Young Master laughed. "Not bad. The problem is I don't know how to get her."
"Nothing to it. You're afraid to provoke Lin Chong because he's a big powerful fellow. But you needn't worry. He's under the marshal's command and is being well provided for. Would he dare to offend? The least that could happen to him is exile, the worst is death. Now I've got a little scheme that will put his wife right into you hands."
"I've met many beautiful women. Why should I love only her? My heart is bewitched, I'm not happy. If you have a scheme that will work, I'll reward you generously."
"One of your trusted men, Captain Lu Qian, is Lin Chong's best friend. Tomorrow, prepare a feast in a quiet nook upstairs in Lu Qian's house. Have Lu invite Lin out for some drinking. Let Lu take him to a secluded room on the upper floor of the Fan Pavilion Tavern. I'll go to Lin's wife and say: 'Your husband has been drinking in Lu Qian's house and has been stricken by a sudden illness. He's collapsed. You'd better hurry and look after him.' Then I'll bring her over to Lu's place, where you'll be waiting. Women are as changeable as water. When she sees what a handsome romantic sort you are, Young Master, and you deluge her with sweet words, she won't be able to resist. What do you think of my plan?"
"Excellent," Gao applauded. "Have Captain Lu Qian summoned here tonight."
It so happened that Lu Qian lived only one street away from the Gao residence. He agreed to the scheme immediately. He felt he had no alternative. As long as it would please the Young Master, he was willing to forget his friendship with the drill instructor.
To get back to Lin Chong. For several days he had been brooding at home. One morning he heard someone shouting at his front door: "Is the drill instructor in?"
Lin Chong went to the door, and there was Lu Qian.
"What brings you here, Brother Lu?" Lin asked quickly.
"I'm concerned about you. Why haven't I seen you on the streets these past few days, brother?"
"My mind is troubled. I don't feel like going out."
"Come and have a few cups with me and forget about your trouble."
"First sit a while and have some tea."
After the two finished their tea, they rose.
"Sister-in-law," Lu Qian called to Lin Chong's wife who was in the next room, "I'm taking Brother Lin over to my place for a few cups of wine."
The lady hurried to the door curtain and pushed it aside. "Don't let him drink too much, brother," she admonished. "Send him home early."
The two men strolled down the street. "Let's not go to my house, brother," Lu Qian said. "We can have our drinks in the Fan Pavilion."
They went to the tavern. They selected a small room and ordered two bottles of good wine and some tidbits to go with it. For a time they chatted idly. Lin Chong sighed.
"What's wrong, brother?" asked Lu Qian.
"You don't know what's happened. I have talents but no intelligent superior to recognize them. I serve under little men from whom I have to take a lot of dirty nonsense."
"There are several drill instructors in the Imperial Guards but none can compare with you. The marshal regards you very highly. Who would dare to molest you?"
Lin Chong told Lu Qian about his encounter with Young Master Gao a few days before.
"The Young Master didn't realize she was your wife," Lu Qian said soothingly. "It's not serious. Forget it. Let's drink."
Lin Chong downed eight or nine cups. Soon he had to relieve himself. He got up and said, "I have to wash my hands." He went down the stairs, left the tavern, and attended to his business in a small lane to the east. As he was coming out, he met Jin Er.
"I've been looking all over for you, master," said the maidservant. "So you're here!"
"What's up?" asked Lin Chong hastily.
"You had only been gone a little while when a man come rushing over to our house and said to the mistress, 'I'm a neighbour of Captain Lu. While drinking with him, the drill instructor suddenly gasped for breath and fell to the floor. You'd better go and look after him.' Our lady begged Dame Wang next door to take care of our house, then she and I hurried with the man to a place one street past the marshal's residence. When we got upstairs we saw a table laden with food and drink but there was no sign of you, master.
"As we turned to leave, that young fellow who pestered the mistress at the temple the other day came out and leered: 'Stay a while, lady. Your true husband is here!' I flew down the stairs. Our mistress was screaming for help. I couldn't find you anywhere. Finally I met Doctor Zhang, the medicine vendor, and he told me: 'I just saw the drill instructor and another man going into the tavern.' so I hurried over here. Master, go quickly!"

Shocked, Lin Chong without waiting for Jin Er, ran at triple speed to Lu Qian's house and raced up the stairs. The door was locked. He could hear his lady exclaiming: "In times of peace and order how dare you hold a good man's wife prisoner!" Young Master Gao was entreating: "Have pity on me, mistress. Even a woman of iron and stone shouldn't be so cold-hearted!"
"Wife, open the door," thundered Lin Chong.
Hearing her husband's voice, Mistress Lin rushed to comply. The terrified Young Master Gao pushed open a window, climbed out and fled along the top of a wall. He was gone before Lin Chong entered the room.
"Did that dog violate you?" asked the drill instructor.
"No," replied his wife.
In a fury, Lin Chong smashed Lu Qian's furniture to bits, then led his wife down the stairs. As they came out of the house, frightened neighbours on both sides of the street hastily shut their doors tight. Jin Er was waiting for them outside. The three of them went home together.
Lin Chong armed himself with a sharp knife and sped directly to the tavern in search of Lu Qian. But his treacherous friend was gone. Lin Chong went to Lu Qian's house and waited outside the door all night. But Lu Qian did not return. Finally the drill instructor went home.
"He didn't harm me. Don't do anything foolish," his wife urged.
"Who would have thought that Lu Qian is such a scoundrel," fumed Lin Chong. "Calling me 'brother' while plotting against me all the time. Even if I can't catch that Young Master I won't let Lu Qian off!"
His wife pleaded desperately with him to remain at home.
Meanwhile, Lu Qian hid in the marshal's residence, afraid to return to his own house. For three successive days, the drill instructor waited for him outside the residence gate but the traitor didn't dare show himself. Lin Chong's appearance was so menacing, no one had the courage to question him.
On the fourth day since they parted, Zhishen came to Lin Chong's home. "Where have you been keeping yourself these past few days, Drill Instructor?" the monk asked.
"I've been too busy to call on you, brother," replied Lin Chong apologetically. "Since you've honoured me with a visit to my humble home, I ought to offer you a few cups of wine. But we don't have anything decent to drink in the house. Why not go out for a stroll together and have a cup or two in the market place?"
"Excellent," said Zhishen.
They went out and drank together all day and arranged to meet again on the morrow. Thereafter, Lin drank with Zhishen everyday. In time, he gradually set the other matter aside.
As to Young Master Gao, after he received that fright in Lu Qian's house and had to flee over the wall, he became ill and took to his bed. He didn't dare say anything to the marshal about what had happened. Lu Qian and Fu An called on the Young Master at the residence. They found him pale and in low spirits.
"Why are you so unhappy, Young Master?" asked Lu Qian.
"I won't try to fool you two," Gao replied. "Now that I've failed in both attempts to get Lin's wife, and had that awful scare in addition, I feel worse than ever. If I pass out of this world in three months or half a year, you needn't be surprised."
"Be of good cheer," the sycophants urged. "Unless she suddenly hangs herself, we guarantee to get you that woman, come what may." At that moment the old chamberlain entered to see how the Young Master was faring. Lu Qian and Fu An withdrew and held a private consultation.
"There's only one way..." they agreed. After the chamberlain had concluded his call and emerged, they invited him to a quiet corner.
"There's only one way the Young Master can get well," they said. "We must let the marshal know and have him order the death of Lin Chong. Then the Young Master will be able to get Lin's wife and he'll recover. Otherwise, he's sure to die."
"That's easy," replied the old chamberlain. "I'll inform the marshal this evening."
"We already have a plan," said the two. "We only await word from you."
That night, the old chamberlain saw the marshal. "I've discovered what's wrong with the Young Master," he said. "It's Lin Chong's wife."
"When did he ever see the woman?" asked Gao Qiu.
"On the twenty-eighth of last month, at the Temple of the Sacred Mountain. Today is a little over a month," said the old chamberlain, and he told the marshal what Lu Qian had in mind.
"H'mm, Lin Chong's wife, eh? The question is how to put Lin Chong out of the way," mused the marshal. "Let me think. I can't let my son lose his life just for the sake of Lin Chong."
"Lu Qian and Fu an have a plan."
"So? Bring them in here and we'll talk it over." The old chamberlain summoned Lu Qian and Fu An into the marshal's hall. They hailed Gao respectfully.
"Do you two have a plan that can cure my son's ailment? If so, I'll raise you both in rank."
Lu Qian stepped forward. "Gracious lord, it can be done only thus and thus and thus ..."
"Very well," said the marshal. "You may take action tomorrow." Of this we need say no more.
To get back to Lin Chong. He drank everyday with Lu Zhishen and finally forgot about the matter.
One day, as the two friends were nearing a lane, they saw a big fellow standing on a corner, a cap with gathered ends on his bead and dressed in an old military robe. He was holding a fine sword in his hand, with a tuft of grass tied to it indicating that it was for sale.
"No one recognizes its value," he was muttering. "What a pity for my precious sword!"
Lin Chong paid no attention and continued walking and chatting with Zhishen. The man trailed behind them, saying: "A splendid sword. It's shame no one appreciates it!"
Lin Chong and Zhishen were still engrossed in their conversation. The man followed them.
"A big city like the Eastern Capital and not a single person knows the worth of military weapons," he cried.
At this, Lin Chong looked around. The fellow whipped the sword out of its sheath. It gleamed dazzlingly in the sun.
Lin Chong was fated for trouble. He said abruptly: "Let me see it."
The fellow handed him the sword. Lin Chong took the weapon and he and Zhishen examined it.
Astonished, the drill instructor exclaimed: "An excellent blade! How much do you want for it?"
"The price is three thousand strings of cash but I'll take two."
"It's well worth two thousand but you won't find anyone who'll give that much. If you're willing to accept one thousand, I'll buy it from you."
"I need money quickly. If you really want the sword I'll knock off five hundred and let you have it for fifteen hundred."
"A thousand is the best I can do."
The fellow sighed. "It's selling gold at the price of iron. All right, all right but not one copper less."
"Come home with me and I'll give you the money," said Lin Chong. He turned to Zhishen, "Wait for me in the teahouse, brother. I'll join you soon."
"No," said the monk, "I must go back. I'll see you tomorrow."
After taking leave of Zhishen, Lin Chong brought the sword-seller to his home, counted out the purchase price in silver and gave it to him.
"Where did you get this blade?" the drill instructor asked.
"It was handed down to me from my ancestors. Because my family became impoverished I had no choice. I had to sell it."
"What's the name of your family?"
"If I were to tell you, I'd die of shame."
Lin Chong asked no more. The fellow took the money and departed.
Lin Chong turned the sword this way and that. "Truly a beautiful weapon. Marshal Gao is supposed to have a fine sword but he won't show it to anyone. Though I've asked to see it several times, he's never been willing to bring it out. Today I've bought a fine sword too. One of these days I'll compare blades with him."
The drill instructor didn't let the sword out of his hand all evening. Late that night he finally hung it on the wall but he was up before daybreak and took the blade down again to admire it.
Some time before noon two lieutenants came to his gate and cried: "Drill Instructor Lin, an order from the marshal. He's heard that you've bought a fine sword and wants you to bring it to compare with his. The marshal is waiting for you in the residence."
"Who is the big-mouthed gossip that reported the news so fast?" wondered Lin Chong.
The lieutenants waited while Lin Chong got dressed. He took his sword and accompanied them.
On the way he said: "I haven't seen you at the residence before."
"We've only recently been transferred," they replied.
Soon they arrived at the residence. In the reception room, Lin Chong halted.
"The marshal is waiting in the rear hall," said the lieutenants.
Lin Chong went with them around a screen wall into the rear hall. But there was still no sign of the marshal, and Lin Chong halted once more.
"The marshal is awaiting the drill instructor in the rearmost court. He directed us to bring you there," said the lieutenants.
Lin followed them through two or three more gateways until they came to a courtyard lined on all sides by green railings.
The lieutenants led him to the entrance of a large hall and said: "Please wait out here, Drill Instructor, while we report to the marshal. We won't be long."
Lin Chong stood before the eaves of a porch while the two lieutenants went inside. A time long enough to drink a cup of tea passed but they did not return. Growing suspicious, the drill instructor pushed aside a hanging awning, poked his head in and looked. There, above the door, was a placard with four words written in green: "White Tiger Inner Sanctum."
"This is where the highest military affairs are discussed," thought Lin Chong, startled. "How dare I go in there!"
He turned hastily. Behind him he heard the tread of boots, the steps ringing sharply. Another man had entered the courtyard. The drill instructor recognized him. It was none other than Marshal Gao. Lin Chong proffered his sword with both hands, and greeted him respectfully.
"Lin Chong," the marshal barked. "I didn't summon you. How dare you force your way into the White Tiger Inner Sanctum! Don't you know the law? And carrying a weapon! You must have come to kill me! People told me that you were seen waiting outside the Residence two or three day ago with a knife in your hand. Your intentions are surely evil!"
Bowing, Lin Chong replied, "Benevolent lord, two of your lieutenants brought me here saying you wanted to compare your sword with mine."
"Where are they?" cried the marshal.
"They just went into the hall, sir."
"Lies! Lies! No lieutenants would dare enter my official halls. Ho, guards! Seize this lout!"
Before the order had left the marshal's mouth, from the buildings flanking the sides of the courtyard over thirty stalwarts came rushing out and knocked Lin Chong to the ground. "As a drill instructor of the Imperial Guards, you must know the law," the marshal raged. "Why also would you enter the Inner Sanctum with a sharp sword in your hand if not to murder me?" He ordered his men to take Lin Chong away. Could Lin Chong survive? And because of this there was a great tumult on the Central Plains and a wild disturbance on the waters. Peasants had to wear army designations on their backs. Military pennants fluttered on fishing boats.
Now among that bunch of wastrels and miscreants outside the Gate of Wild Jujubes two acted as leaders. They were known as Zhang the Rat and Li the Snake. When these two leaders came forward, Zhishen also advanced, till he was standing not far from the edge of the cesspit. At this point, the ragged band stopped just where they were, beside the cesspit, and called out in unison, "We come to congratulate you, Your Reverence."
"If you are neighbours," Zhishen said, "you'd better come inside and sit down."
But Zhang the Rat and Li the Snake, having prostrated themselves, refused to rise unless he came to help them up. That was supposed to give them their opportunity. Zhishen began to get suspicious. "There's something fishy about this lot," he said to himself. "They don't want to come any closer, can they be up to something? Maybe they'd like to pluck the tiger's whiskers! Never mind, I'll go to meet them. It may do them good to get acquainted with my fist and my boot." So he marched boldly up to them, whereupon the Rat and the Snake, saying, "Allow us to pay our humble respects to you, Master," reached forward, one of them aiming to grab his left foot while the other went for his right foot. Zhishen did not give them the opportunity. He raised his right foot and booted the Snake into the muck. The Rat tried to dodge but Zhishen caught him with his left foot. Both miscreants were now floundering in the cesspit while the rest of the mob behind them stood gaping in amazement. When those others tried to run off, Zhishen shouted: "Anyone tries to leave, it'll be into the shit with him; if it's two, that'll be two in the shit." After that no one stirred.
Meanwhile the Rat and the Snake were struggling to get their heads above the surface. That cesspit seemed bottomless. They were totally covered in ordure and their hair was crawling with maggots. "Please," they shouted from the cesspit, "let us out!"
"All right, you lot," Zhishen shouted to the others, "get those buggers out, double quick. I've decided to let you all off."
The mob rescued the Rat and the Snake and dumped them on a cucumber frame. They stank so much you couldn't get near them. Zhishen was laughing his head off. "You filthy brutes!" he said. "Take yourselves off to the pond and wash thoroughly, then come back here. I've got a few words to say to you all."
When they had washed, the others took off some of their own clothes to give them. Then Zhishen said, "Come inside and sit down, all of you." He sat down at the head of the table and said: "Now, don't any of you think of deceiving me. Who and what are you? What do you mean by trying to make a fool of me?"
Everyone knelt down and said: "We've always lived here. We make our living by gambling and begging. This garden is actually our rice-bowl. The temple has tried giving money to get rid of us but it doesn't work. Where are you from, Your Reverence? You're incredible! We've never seen you before at the temple. From now on we shall be only too happy to serve you!"
"I served as commandant of the Yanan garrison in Guanxi, under Field-Marshal Zhong the Elder," Zhishen said. "I decided to become a monk because I'd killed a lot of people. I came here from Mount Wu Tai. My family name is Lu, and my religious name Zhishen. Twenty or thirty villains like you don't mean anything to me. If an army of thousands came at me, I could fight my way out."
There was a murmur of assent from the raggle-taggle mob. Then they gratefully prostrated themselves and departed. Zhishen retired to his room within the lodge, tidied his things, and lay down to sleep.
The next day the delinquents held counsel. A collection was taken, with which ten bottles of wine were acquired and a pig, the plan being to invite Zhishen. The banquet was laid out in the office and Zhishen was invited to take the place of honour, while the rest seated themselves in two rows on each side of him. The toasts began.
"But why all this expense?" Zhishen asked.
"We count ourselves lucky in having you come here as boss," they said.
Zhishen thoroughly enjoyed it all. Everyone got tipsy, and there was singing and talk and clapping and laughter. And then, in the midst of the hubbub, caw, caw, a crow began to call. Superstitiously they all touched wood and began chanting, "Dirty mouths go to heaven, evil tongues go to hell."
"What the hell's all that about?" Zhishen asked.
"When the crow calls, look out for discord," they said.
"Where did you get that idea?" Zhishen said.
One of the monastery gardeners said, with a grin: "A crow has just started nesting in that willow tree in the corner of the wall, and it calls from dawn to dusk."
"We need a ladder to knock the nest down," they said. "That'll put a stop to it."
"We'll go and get one," said some others.
Lu Zhishen, elated by the wine, went out with them to look. There, sure enough, was the crow's nest on the willow tree. "Get the ladder, knock it down, then we'll get some peace," people were shouting. But Li the Snake said, "I'll climb and get it, we don't need a ladder."
Zhishen considered for a moment, then he approached the tree. He took off his robe, bent and grasped the trunk low down with his right hand, placing his left hand higher up. With a sudden jerk he wrenched the tree up by the roots.
When they saw this, the delinquents prostrated themselves and said: "Master, you're not just a man, you're a god, a real Lohan. How could you do that, unless you have the strength to lift ten tons?"
"What's all the bloody fuss about?" Zhishen said. "Next time I'll give you a martial arts demonstration and show you some sword-play."
The mob dispersed for the time being. But from then on they sank to their knees every time they saw Zhishen, brought him meat and wine each day, and stayed to watch him training in martial arts or pugilism.
After a while, Zhishen said to himself, "I've been enjoying their wine and food everyday, now I'd better lay on something for them in return."
He sent the lay brothers into town to buy some plates of fruit and half a dozen buckets of wine, and had a pig and a sheep slaughtered. It was April, and the weather was just getting hot. "It's pretty warm," Zhishen said to himself, and he told the brothers to lay the mats under an ash-tree in the garden. Then the mob were invited to come and take their seats. The wine was served in big bowls, the meat was cut in thick slices, and when everyone was full fruit was brought out and a great deal more wine.
Finally, they all said: "Master, these last few days we've seen your strength but we haven't yet had a chance to admire your skill with weapons. We wish you'd give us an exhibition!"

"Right!" said Zhishen. He went back into the house and brought out his monk's staff of solid steel, five feet from end to end and weighing sixty-two catties. Everyone was amazed. "If he hadn't the strength of a water-buffalo in his arms, he couldn't wield that thing!" they said. Zhishen proceeded to make it whistle through the air, standing firm as a rock and giving a faultless performance, to the general applause of his audience.

Zhishen was just getting really into his stride when an army officer stopped outside the compound and exclaimed: "Capital!" The sound caused Zhishen to pause and look up. He saw the officer standing beside a gap in the wall, dressed as follows:

Upon his head a blue silk scarf, with the corners folded into ears; at the back of his head two white jade and pearl rings to hold the hair in place. A light green officer's uniform of patterned silk, tied at the waist by a belt with a double silver clasp in the shape of a tortoise, and fashionable black boots. And in his hand, a Xichuan fan of folded paper.

This officer had round eyes in a leopard's head, and was equipped with a tiger's moustache and pointed chin. He was about six feet tall and thirty-five years of age. "This monk," he now declared, "is someone quite out of the ordinary. His staff-play is first-class."

"If the Instructor likes it, it must be good," the mob said.

"Who is that officer?" Zhishen asked.

"That's Instructor Lin, master-of-arms and instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards. His full name is Lin Chong."

"Then ask him to come in. I'd like to meet him."

Instructor Lin vaulted over the wall, and the two of them greeted each other under the tree. They sat down together. Lin Chong asked, "Where are you from, my friend? And what is your religious name?"

"I am Lu Da from Guanxi. I killed a lot of men so I became a monk. In my youth I visited the Eastern Capital, and I once met Major Lin, your father, there."

Lin Chong was delighted. He immediately adopted Zhishen as his sworn brother.

"But what brings you here today, Instructor?" Zhishen asked.

"I've just arrived here with my wife to burn incense at the Temple of the Holy Mountain next door," the other replied. "When I heard the sound of your drill, I was so intrigued that I told my wife to go on in with the maid, Jin Er, and burn the incense, while I waited for them here. But I didn't know it would be my good fortune to meet you here, brother."

"I only arrived here recently myself," Zhishen said. "I don't know anyone, except these fellows who come to keep me company each day. But now you are kind enough to give me your friendship and call yourself my sworn brother, that's wonderful!" Saying which, he told the lay brothers to fetch more wine for them.

They had just finished three cups when Jin Er, the maid, appeared at the gap in the wall, extremely agitated and quite red in the face: "Master," she shouted, "don't sit there so calmly. The mistress is having an argument with a man in the temple."

Lin Chong had a shock. "Where?" he cried.

"We ran into this fiend just below the Pavilion of the Five Sacred Peaks. He's standing in the way and won't let the mistress pass."

"Excuse me Brother, excuse me," Lin Chong said, distractedly, "I shall come back."

Lin Chong left hurriedly, leaping through the gap and rushing off to the temple with Jin Er. When he arrived at the Pavilion of the Five Sacred Peaks, he found a group of men equipped with crossbows, blowpipes and bird-catching sticks standing beside the balustrade; on the stairs a young gentleman, standing with his back to them, was preventing Lin Chong's wife from passing.

"Do come upstairs with me, I want to talk to you," he was heard to say, while the lady, her face crimson with mortification, protested, "What right have you, in time of peace, to treat a lady this way?"

Lin Chong bounded forward, seized the young man by the shoulders and spun him round. "Do you know the penalty for importuning a married woman?" he roared. But as he raised his fist to strike the offender, he saw who it was: young Gao, the adopted son of the Commander-in-Chief, Marshal Gao. Yes, when Gao-le-Bel had made his fortune he had no son of his own to aid him in his affairs, so he had adopted a nephew, the son of another Gao who was his relative. Marshal Gao treated this young man like his own son and loved him dearly, and the young scoundrel took advantage of his power and position in the Eastern Capital to debauch people's wives and daughters. Everyone in the capital was too scared to denounce him. He had been dubbed "Lord Libertine."

Well, the moment Lin Chong saw the libertine's face and recognized him as the Marshal's adopted son, his strength left him.

"Lin Chong, this is none of your business!" young Gao said. "Who told you to interfere?" In fact, young Gao did not know that it was Lin Chong's wife; had he known, this business would never have occurred. But seeing that Lin Chong did nothing, he grew bolder. Meanwhile Gao's associates, scenting trouble, drew near and tried to smooth the matter over: "Forget it, Instructor, His Excellency didn't recognize your wife, it was a mistake."

Lin Chong's anger was far from assuaged and he continued to glare at young Gao. But everyone persisted in urging him to let the matter drop, and finally young Gao was persuaded to leave the temple, mount and ride off.

Lin Chong began to take his wife and Jin Er away. They were traversing a gallery when Lu Zhishen appeared. Brandishing his steel staff, with the raggle-taggle mob at his heels, he bounded into the temple. "Where are you going, Brother?" Lin Chong called when he saw him.

"I'm coming to give you a hand," the monk replied.

"It turned out to be the son of the Commander-in-Chief, Marshal Gao," Lin Chong said. "He didn't see it was my wife, that's why he forgot himself. I was on the point of thrashing the scoundrel but I know the Marshal would never be able to swallow it, and as the saying is, 'Fear not the law but the one who wields the law.' It wouldn't do me any good, when I'm serving under the Marshal, so for the moment I've let him off."

"You've reason to fear the Marshal but I'm not scared of him," said Zhishen. "If I run into that little shit, he'll get three hundred of the best from my steel staff!"

Lin Chong realized the monk had been drinking, so he said: "You're absolutely right. But they all advised me to forget it and for the moment I've agreed to do so."

"Well, if you have any more trouble, come and get me," Zhishen said.

The mob, seeing Zhishen was drunk, now started to haul him away, saying: "Come on, Master, we'd better be leaving, you can settle all that tomorrow."

"Sister, excuse me," Zhishen said to the lady. "Please don't laugh at me." Gripping his staff and turning to Lin Chong, he said, "I'll see you tomorrow, Brother." After these farewells he left, along with the mob.

Lin Chong with his wife and the maid set off home. But his heart was heavy.

Now as for young Gao, that day when he and his dissipated friends encountered Lin Chong's wife, and had been sent packing, he quite lost his heart, and he went back in very low spirits to mope in Government House.

After two or three days his good-for-nothing friends came looking for him. They found him very much down, not a spark of gaiety in him, and they went away. But there was one of these spongers who could read young Gao's mind; he was called Fu An and nicknamed Shrivelled Cockscomb. He went to the Residence on his own to look for young Gao, whom he found him sitting despondently in the library. He drew near and said: "You look pale, Your Excellency, your appearance is melancholy, something seems to be weighing heavily upon you."

"How did you know?" young Gao asked.

"I was just guessing," Fu An replied.

"Then can you guess what is troubling me?"

"Your mind is running upon the charms of a pair of trees,' like the two that make up the character 'Lin.' Am I right?"

Young Gao grinned. "You're right," he said. "But I just don't know what I can do to get her."

"It's no problem," said Fu An. "You think because Lin Chong is a brave man you daren't offend him. But really there's no danger. He's under your father's command. It's a good post, too, how could he think of incurring the Marshal's displeasure? At best he could get himself branded and exiled, and he might even pay with his life. I've got a plan which will enable you to enjoy her."

Hearing this, young Gao said: "I've seen so many women, I just don't know why I want her so much. It's an obsession, I've no happiness without her. If you have some scheme which will allow me to secure her favours, I shall reward you amply."

"One of your aides is Lieutenant Lu Qian, who is a bosom pal of Lin Chong's. Tomorrow you will conceal yourself upstairs at Lieutenant Lu's in a private room, well supplied with wine and food. You'll tell Lu to go and invite Lin Chong for a drink. Tell him to go to one of the upstairs rooms at Fan's winehouse. Meanwhile, I will go to Lin's house and say to his wife: 'Your husband, the Instructor, was drinking with Lieutenant Lu and he's had an attack. He's lying on the floor unconscious. You must come quickly, to assist him!' Once we can get her upstairs, well, you know what women are like, changeable as the weather: when she sees you — a dashing person like yourself — all it'll need is a few flattering words and she'll be yours, how can she help herself? Well, what do you think of my plan?"

"Brilliant!" young Gao exclaimed. "Have Lieutenant Lu sent here right away this evening, and I'll give him his instructions."

Lieutenant Lu Qian happened to live in the next street to the Marshal's. The plan having been explained to him, Lu did as he was told, how could he do otherwise? His only thought was to keep young Gao happy; the ties of friendship were as nothing to that.

Now as for Lin Chong, his mood remained black for days and he had no desire to go out. Then one morning he heard someone outside the door calling: "Is the master at home?" When Lin Chong came out to see who it was, he found Lieutenant Lu. Hurriedly he asked, "What brings you here, friend Lu?"

"I came to see you," the Lieutenant replied, "and to find out why you never go out these days."

"I am unhappy, I don't feel like going out," Lin Chong answered.

"Then I shall take you to drink a few cups, to cure your depression."

"Sit down and drink some tea first."

After drinking tea, they both stood up, and Lieutenant Lu said to Lin's wife: "With your permission, we're going over to my place to drink a few cups of wine."

Lin Chong's wife flew to the door and said: "Don't drink too much, and don't stay out late."

The two men went out and strolled along the street for a while. Then Lu said: "Let's not go to my place. Let's go and have a drink at Fan's." So to Fan's they went, and established them- selves in a secluded upstairs room, telling the waiter to bring out two bottles of his very best wine, and some dried fruit to go with it. As they were quietly chatting, Lin Chong let out a deep sigh.

"What's the matter, brother?" Lu Qian asked.

"My dear friend, you don't know ... what avails courage or talent, when you're not appreciated? I am at the mercy of a petty tyrant, and have to put up with the most vile treatment."

"Although there are several instructors now with the imperial guards, none of them can compare with you," Lieutenant Lu said. "The Marshal knows it and treats you well. Who would want to insult you?"

Lin Chong recounted the previous business with young Gao.

"Young Gao can't have known it was your wife. Stop thinking about it, and drink up."

After eight or nine cups, Lin Chong needed to relieve himself. He stood up, saying "I'm going to wash my hands." He went downstairs and out of the winehouse, and turned into a little alley on the east to perform his business. He was just leaving the lane when who should he meet but the maid, Jin Er, screaming: "Master, here you are, I've been searching everywhere for you."

"What's the matter?" Lin Chong asked.

"Not half an hour after you left with Lieutenant Lu, a man rushed in and said to my mistress: 'I am a neighbour of Lieutenant Lu's. Your husband was drinking with the Lieutenant when he suddenly began to choke and collapsed, he is calling for his wife, he wants her at once.' When the mistress heard this she quickly told Mrs. Wang from next door to look after the house and then we went with the man and he took us to a house in a lane in front of the Marshal's Residence. We went upstairs and saw there was wine and food laid on a table but you were nowhere to be seen. We rushed downstairs again, and there we ran into that same gentleman who pestered my mistress at the Temple of the Holy Mountain the other day. He asked my mistress to sit down and said 'Your true husband is here.' I ran downstairs, and my mistress began screaming for help. I looked for you everywhere but I couldn't find you. Then I met old Zhang, the drug seller and he told me he had been at Fan's and he had seen you go in with someone else and order wine. So I came here as fast as I could. You've got to hurry."

Lin Chong was so shocked by this that he raced off three steps at a time, not waiting for Jin Er. Arriving at Lu's house, he shot up the stairs but found the door shut. He could hear his wife shouting: "I'm a respectable married woman, by what right do you detain me here, in times of peace?" And he could hear young Gao saying: "Lady have pity on me, my life is in your hands! Were you made of iron or stone, you must surely requite me." From the top of the stairs Lin Chong shouted: "Open the door, my love!" Hearing her husband's voice, the lady rushed to open the door. What a fright for young Gao! Wrenching open the window and leaping out, he fled over the wall. By the time Lin Chong got there he was gone. "Has anything happened yet?" Lin Chong asked his wife. "Not yet," she answered. Lin Chong proceeded to smash up Lu's house. Then he took his wife downstairs. They came out of the front door. They noticed that the neighbours on either side had all locked their doors. Jin Er now arrived and the three of them made their way home. Lin Chong went to get a dagger and rushed back to Fan's to find Lu Qian but there was no sign of him. He returned to Lu's house, where he waited at the door all evening but Lu did not return. Finally he went home.

His wife tried to calm him down. "He did not touch me," she insisted. "Please don't do anything rash."

"What I can't do is forgive that swine, Lu Qian," her husband said. "He calls me friend and brother, and then treats me like that! Even if I can't do anything about young Gao, at least I'll get that Lu, I'll have his hide!"

His wife pleaded with him. She was determined not to let him go out. In any case, Lieutenant Lu remained in hiding at the Marshal's, and didn't dare return home. Lin Chong waited outside three whole days but he did not appear. The Marshal's people observed the expression on Lin Chong's face and no one dared ask him his purpose.

On the fourth day around dinner time Lu Zhishen came to Lin Chong's house in search of him. "We haven't seen you for days, Instructor. Where have you been?" he asked.

"I'm sorry, I was too busy to call on you, brother," Lin Chong said. "Since you've honoured me by coming here to my house, it's only right I should offer you a few cups. I'm afraid however that I'm not well prepared, so what do you say to coming out with me now for a stroll and we can have a drink on the way?"

"Excellent idea," Zhishen replied. So off they went, the two of them and spent the rest of the day drinking. They also agreed to meet again the next day. From then on Lin Chong went out drinking with Zhishen everyday and gradually began to forget his troubles. It was a case of:

The man has a trusted friend to confide in;
Talk and song can put gloom to flight.
But the woman has only her room to hide in;
Troubles untalked-of are harder to fight.

As for young Gao, since that day when he had such a fright at Lieutenant Lu's house and had to escape over the wall, he had not dared say anything to the Marshal. He had fallen ill, as a result, and taken to his bed. When Lieutenant Lu and Fu An came to see him, they found him looking far from well and very low in spirits.

"Why so melancholy?" Lu asked him.

"I'll tell you," Gao said. "It's all because of that wife of Lin Chong's. Twice now I've missed having her, and got a severe shock into the bargain. It's made my problem even worse. I don't see how I can have more than three months to live, six at the most!"

"Take heart," they said. "Leave it to us. We'll get the woman for you, one way or another — unless of course she hangs herself first."

At this moment, the old chamberlain arrived to inquire about young Gao's health. Here's how he found him:

He has no rash, he has no spot,
His body's cold, his body's hot.
He has no ache, he has no pain,
His belly's full and empty again.
Forgetting to eat and shunning sleep
This secret to himself he'd keep.
He daren't tell whence his sickness came,
For if 'twere known he'd blush for shame.
His wits are scattered, spirit fled,
He only wishes he were dead.

Whilst the old chamberlain was asking Gao about his health, Lu Qian and Fu An were whispering together. "That's the way to do it," they concluded, and when the chamberlain was leaving, they took him aside and said: "If we want the young master to get better, it's necessary to tell the Marshal. We've got to get rid of Lin Chong so we can bring his wife and the young master together, it's the only way to cure his illness. If we don't do this, he's a dead man."

"That's no problem," said the chamberlain. "I'll put the Marshal in the picture tonight."

"We've got something worked out already," the other two said. "We're just waiting for the word."

When he saw the Marshal that evening the chamberlain said: "The cause of the young master's illness is known: it is Lin Chong's wife."

"But when did he first see this woman?" Gao-le-Bel asked.

"On the twenty-eighth of last month, at the Temple of the Holy Mountain, that's over a month ago," the chamberlain said. He gave the Marshal a detailed report of all that Lu Qian had told him.

"So it's like that, is it?" said Gao-le-Bel. "Lin Chong's wife ... but then what do we do about Lin Chong? If I try to preserve Lin Chong, I endanger the life of my son. What's to be done?"

"Lieutenant Lu Qian and Fu An have a plan," the chamberlain said.

"In that case, you'd better send them both here to discuss the matter with me."

Accordingly the chamberlain summoned the two, who entered the hall and saluted. The Marshal said: "This business of my son's, have you a remedy for it? If you can really find a cure for the boy, I shall promote you both."

Lu Qian stepped forward and humbly submitted that if this were done and that were done, the affair could be successfully concluded. At the end of his report, the Marshal expressed his approval: "Excellently conceived! Set this all in motion tomorrow."

We say no more of this but return to Lin Chong, who, since he had been drinking each day with Lu Zhishen, had managed to forget his troubles. Now, as the two companions were passing Parade-ground Road, they encountered a big fellow with a specially folded turban and an old army coat, who was standing on the street corner, holding a sword to which he had tied a bunch of straw to show it was for sale. He was muttering to himself, "No one can recognize its worth, this poor sword of mine." Lin Chong paid him no attention; he was deep in conversation with Zhishen and they passed onwards. But the big fellow followed them, still muttering: "Such a fine sword, what a shame there's no one around to appreciate it!" Lin Chong still paid no heed; he and Zhishen, still conversing, turned into a side-street, with the big fellow behind them, saying: "Such a great city, and there's not one true connoisseur of arms!" Now at last Lin Chong heard him, and turned to look. At this precise moment the big fellow whipped the sword out of its scabbard, and the blade flashed dazzlingly in the sun. Well, it was Lin Chong's fate! "Let me look at it," he said on an impulse. The big fellow handed it over, and Lin Chong took it in his hands. He and Zhishen examined it together.

It glitters irresistibly, it gives the heart a thrill
Far off it has the sparkle of winter's glistening chill;
Near to you see the elegance of objects wrought by man,
Of that which the craftsman's fashioned as finely as he can.
The blade so richly damasked a ghost's attack must fail,
The design so densely worked that demons all turn tail.
There isn't any other that with this one can compare,
Not even the masterpieces of the artisans of yore.

Lin Chong was amazed: "It's a fine weapon," he exclaimed. "How much do you want for it?"
"Its proper price is three thousand cash but I'd let it go for two thousand," the other said.
"It may be worth two thousand but there's no one who really appreciates it. If you'll take a thousand, I'll buy it."
"I really need the money. If you want it, I'll knock off five hundred and let you have it for one thousand five hundred."
"One thousand is my best offer."
The big fellow sighed and said, "It's selling gold as iron but all right, I accept — not a penny less, though!"
"If you'll come to my house then, I'll give you the money," Lin Chong said. He turned to Zhishen and said: "Brother, wait for me in the teahouse, I'll be with you presently."
"I am going home now," Zhishen said. "We can meet tomorrow."
After bidding Zhishen farewell, Lin Chong took the sword's owner to his house to give him the money. "How did you come by this sword?" he asked him.
"It's an heirloom," he replied. "But my family is ruined, I've no alternative but to sell it."
"What's the name of your family?" Lin Chong asked.
"I'd rather die than tell you," the other answered and Lin Chong did not press him further.
When the man had taken the money and departed, Lin Chong examined the sword, turning it this way and that. He was impressed. "It's really a marvellous piece of work," he thought to himself. "Marshal Gao has one like it in his residence but he never shows it to anyone. I've asked to see it many times but never been allowed to. Now that I've bought this beauty, perhaps I'll manage to get him to compare his with it." He didn't let the sword out of his hands all afternoon. He hung it on the wall that night, and in the morning he went to look at it again before dawn.
Before midday two of the Marshal's aides appeared at his door and said: "Instructor Lin! The Marshal's orders: this sword you've just bought, you're to bring it over to the Residence so he can look at it, he's waiting for you now."
"Heavens, what busybodies people are," Lin Chong thought. "It's already been reported." At their insistence he dressed, picked up the sword and went with them. "I don't remember seeing you before at the Marshal's," he said to them. "We've only just entered his service," they replied.
Soon they reached the Residence and entered the reception hall. Here Lin Chong stopped. "No, the Marshal is sitting inside in the inner hall," the other two said. Passing the entrance screen, they entered the inner hall. But the Marshal was not to be seen here either, so Lin Chong halted again. "He's waiting for you inside," they said. "He told us to take you in." They passed through three more doors and reached an area surrounded by a green balustrade. Planting him in front of a hall, they said: "Wait here, Instructor, while we go and report that you've arrived." They disappeared inside, and Lin Chong waited there under the eaves, holding his sword.
They were gone long enough for one to drink a cup of tea, and Lin Chong began to grow suspicious. He went to take a look behind the entrance screen. Over the portal were four characters, inscribed in green: White Tiger Council Chamber. He understood at once. "This is the inner sanctum where major military decisions are taken, what am I doing here?" he exclaimed in horror. He was about to withdraw hastily, when he heard the sound of boots, echoing briskly. Someone was coming. Lin Chong looked up, and who should he see but his commanding officer, Marshal Gao! Lin Chong took a pace forward and proffering his sword made a profound obeisance.
"Lin Chong!" the Marshal growled. "You dare to enter the White Tiger Council Chamber without orders? Are you ignorant of the regulations? And why are you carrying a sword? Have you come to assassinate me? I've been told you were seen loitering near the Residence with a dagger a few days back. Your intentions cannot be good!"
Lin Chong bowed his head and said respectfully: "Your Excellency, it was your two aides who told me to come here, so that you could inspect my new sword."
"What aides?" the Marshal said.
"The two who just went inside," Lin Chong said.
"You're lying that of my aides would dare enter my private apartments? Ho, there, guards! Arrest this criminal!"
Immediately a score of men rushed out of a side-room and threw Lin Chong to the ground. It was like when the black eagle seizes the hapless swallow or the ravening tiger tears the innocent lamb. "You, an instructor of the guards, and you don't know the regulations?" the Marshal bellowed. "You penetrated the council chamber with a sword in your hand, what's that supposed to mean? You planned to kill your commanding officer, eh?" Then he ordered the guards to take the culprit away. No one would have given much for Lin Chong's chances of survival at that moment.
But for this, we would not have seen "Many a tumult throughout the land, all in uproar between the four seas." This was the cause of

Insignia borne on peasants' backs,
Standards raised on fishing junks.

NOW these vagabonds had 2 leaders; Zhang the Third, nicknamed "The Crossing Road Rat" and the other Li the Fourth nicknamed "Green Grass Snake," and they tried to induce Lu Da towards the cesspit but he noticed that the crowd of men did not move at all. Lu Da invited them all to come into the temple but as the two leaders had already knelt down they did not want to get up, and waited for him to come forward to assist them to get up when they would seize his legs. As they neither moved nor got up, Lu Da at once suspected some trickery, and thought they were surely waiting to "pull the tiger's whiskers." So he decided to go forward, and make them feel the weight of his fist and foot. As he strode up to them the leaders said, "We offer you our congratulations," so saying, they advanced on their knees, and tried to grab hold of Lu Da's legs. But the latter was too quick for them, and he kicked Green Grass Snake into the cesspit, and then did the same to Old Rat. This made the crowd of rascals speechless, and they all wanted to sneak off. Lu Da shouted that if any man attempted to go away he would be treated in the same way. No one dared move. In the cesspit the leaders were peeping to see what was happening. The cesspit was so deep that they could not touch the bottom. There was a terrible stench, and their heads were covered with maggots. They called out, "Reverend, please forgive us."
"You rascals there," shouted Lu Da, "come and help these men to get out. I forgive the whole lot of you."
The two leaders were assisted out of the pit, and then they went and stood near a gourd stand some distance away as the stench was so strong.
Lu Da laughed, "You foolish fellows! You had better go to the pool and after a wash there I will talk with you."
The leaders did this, and their followers handed them a change of clothing to put on.
Lu Da ordered them all to come into the temple, and there sitting in the centre of the hall he pointed at the assembled men and said, "You gang of vagabonds need not try to deceive me. Now why did you come here to trifle with me?"
They all knelt down, and the leaders replied, "We live by gambling, and therefore have to depend on your garden for our food. The temple bribed us several times to leave the vegetables alone but there is no result. Reverend, where do you come from? You are so strong that we must submit to you. We are willing to do whatever you wish."
"I was a Major in the army," replied Lu Da, "and because I killed many men I became a monk. My name is Lu Da. You thirty men are of no account to me for even if a thousand soldiers came here I would defeat them."
The rascals expressed their appreciation of his clemency in letting them off so lightly; they then departed. The next day the rascals got together some money, ten jars of wine, and a roasted pig, and brought them to present to Lu Da. In the temple they took their seats in two rows with Lu Da in the centre, and they all drank wine.
Lu Da asked why they had wasted so much money, and they replied, "We are happy because you are with us today, and we ask you to become our chief."
Lu Da was pleased at this offer. When they had been drinking for some time, some were singing, others talking, applauding, or laughing. While in this state they heard a great noise outside, caused by some crows cawing. Some men showed their teeth to indicate dislike of this interruption and used a saying, "If there is trouble let it go to either heaven or hell."
"What trouble are you fellows talking about?" asked Lu Da.
The men said, "We are afraid there will be trouble because of the cawing of those crows."
"Where do you get that idea from?" asked Lu Da.
A servant laughed and replied, "The crows build their nests in a willow tree just outside the garden, and every evening they clamour there."
Some said they would get a ladder, and destroy the nests. Lu Da was now merry with wine, and they all went outside to look at the nests. The Green Grass Snake said he would climb up the tree but Lu Da took off his gown, and seizing the tree with both hands he made a mighty heave and uprooted the willow tree. The vagabonds were astounded, and kneeling down they worshiped him. They said, "Reverend, you are not a mortal man but must be a living Buddha. If you had not the strength to lift ten million jin in weight you could not have done this."
"That is only a small affair. Wait till tomorrow, when you can see me do some military exercises with my sword."
It was evening before they all departed. The next day they were quite submissive in spirit due to what they had seen. They brought wine and meat for Lu Da, and watched him at his exercises. After they had done this for some time Lu Da decided to give them a banquet, and ordered his gardeners to go into the town and buy various kinds of fruit and wine, kill a pig and a sheep. At that time the weather was warm it being the end of the fourth lunar month, so Lu Da had mats spread under the ash tree, and there the vagabonds sat down. They were served with big bowls of wine, and large pieces of meat, and were told to eat as much as they wanted. During the feast they said, "Reverend, for several days we have seen you exercising but we have not noticed you using your staff, and we should like to see you do that now."
Lu Da agreed, and going indoors, brought out his monk staff, seventy inches in length, and weighed sixty-two jin. When they saw this huge weapon they were startled, and said, "If a man had not the strength of a buffalo in both arms he could not use that." But Lu Da whirled it round with great ease, making it whistle in the air. On seeing this the men applauded.
Lu Da was quite in high spirit and did this display in good form. He noticed an official watching him through a break in the garden wall, so he ceased his exercises. The official wore blue gauze silk, folded in a knot on his head; round his head was a string of pearls to which were attached two white jade tablets at the back of his head; his military gown was of thin green silk decorated with a flower design; his belt was embroidered like the marks on the back of a tortoise; suspended from it were two otters' tails, and it had a silver buckle; his black shoes were of court fashion with tips turned up; in his hand he held a fan made of Sichuan paper. His face was like a leopard's, with big round eyes and a heavy beard. He was nine feet tall and seemed to be thirty-five years of age. He called out, "This is an extraordinary master, and uses his weapon well."
The vagabonds answered, "As this Drill Instructor approves, Lu Da must be very good."
"Who is that army officer?" asked Lu Da.
"He is the Drill Inspector of the Imperial Guards, and is named Lin Chong."
"Why don't you ask him to come inside?" asked Lu Da. But just then the onlooker jumped over the broken wall, and met Lu Da under the ash tree, where they sat down.
After the usual courtesies as to names, Lu Da said that he had met Lin Chong's father at the Eastern Capital. Lin Chong was much pleased, and insisted upon making Lu Da his sworn elder brother. He then informed Lu Da that he had come with his wife to worship at the Yue Temple nearby. As he saw Lu Da exercising, so he told his maidservant, Jin Er, to go with his wife to the temple, and he would wait there for them. Lu Da ordered his servants to bring wine for the guest, and when the latter had partaken three cups, he saw the servant with a red face hurrying towards the broken wall and calling, "Master! come at once! Your wife has trouble with a man in the temple."
Lin Chong quickly inquired where they were, and Jin Er replied, "She was just at the bottom of the Wu Yue Pavilion in the temple when a cheeky fellow stopped her, and would not let her go."
Lin Chong hurriedly said to Lu Da, "Please excuse me, sir; I will come back very soon." He ran towards the broken wall and jumping over, hastened to the Yue Temple followed by the maid. Upon reaching the Wu Yue Pavillion, he saw several men with bows, blowpipes, and sticks covered with lime for catching birds, standing inside the railings. On the staircase to the upper chamber was a young man, preventing his wife to proceed, and saying to her, "Come with me upstairs as I have something to say to you."
Lin Chong's wife blushingly replied, "How dare you speak to me in this way, in broad daylight?"
Lin Chong hurried forward, caught hold of the man, and pulled him away, saying; "You should be severely punished for molesting a respectable woman like this." He was on the point of hitting him, when he recognized him as Master Gao, the adopted son of the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, Gao Qiu.
Now sometime before Gao Qiu having no child of his own, had adopted his cousin, and was very fond of him but Master Gao used the influence of this official for the sole purpose of debauching the people's wives. The people at the court were afraid of his power, and dared not oppose him; nevertheless, they nicknamed him "Heavenly King of Pleasure."
When Lin Chong saw who it was, he became cautious. Master Gao saw that he was restraining himself, and not knowing that the woman was Lin Chong's wife, asked, "Why do you interfere in my affair? You are going too far!"
Men standing round saw the danger of a row, and came forward saying, "Drill Instructor, please excuse him for if he had known that she was your wife he would not have intruded."
But Lin Chong's anger had not entirely subsided, and he glared at Master Gao, who left the temple and rode off.
Just then Lu Da arrived, armed with his monk staff, and accompanied by the vagabonds, and said he had come to fight for Lin Chong.
Lin Chong explained what had occurred, and said that he had let Master Gao off this time as he did not wish to annoy Gao Qiu. He referred to the old saying, "Fear not the authorities, except those that have authority over you."
"You are afraid of the Marshal of the Imperial Guard," said Lu Da, "but I am not. If I had met that young rascal I would have given him three hundred blows with my staff."
Lin Chong saw that Lu Da was drunk so he said, "What you say is all right. These men persuaded me to let him off."
"If you have any further trouble please tell me, and I will help you," said Lu Da. They then all departed but Lin Chong was rather troubled in his mind.
Master Gao was infatuated with the wife of Lin Chong but had submitted to Lin Chong's interference, and led his followers away but as he returned to his official residence he was in low spirits. During the next few days his followers kept out of his way as they found him upset, and quite unable to attend to business. But one man, an idler named Fu An, nicknamed "Stinking Dickhead," understood his master, and waited upon him. One day as Master Gao was sitting idly in the library he entered and remarked, "You are not looking well these last few days, and there must be something worrying you."
"And don't you know the reason?"
"I think I can guess what it is," replied Fu An. "You are thinking of the wife of Lin Chong. Am I right?"
Master Gao laughed, "You have guessed correctly but I have no means of getting her."
"There is no difficulty. You are afraid of Lin Chong because he is a hero, and therefore you dare not belittle him. But never mind that, because he is in your employ, and he would not dare to offend your father, the Marshal of the Imperial Guard. If he made a slight mistake he could be banished, or if a serious error he would be ruined for life. I have a plan by which he could be implicated."
Master Gao after hearing this said, "I have met many nice young women and girls but I particularly love this one, and since I saw her, my mind has not been at peace. How could you implicate him? If applicable I will handsomely reward you."
"I have an intimate friend Lu Qian who is very friendly with Lin Chong. Tomorrow you can hide yourself in Lu Qian's house. He would arrange a feast, and invite Lin Chong to it. He however is to be told to lead Lin Chung to the Fan Inn for wine. Then I will go to Lin Chong's home, and tell his wife that her husband, while drinking wine at Lu Qian's house suddenly became ill and fell down unconscious. I will tell her that she had better go at once as it might be serious, and I will bring her to Lu Qian's house. There when she sees you so well dressed, and listens to your flattery, she will become amenable to your suggestions as she is of an unstable disposition. What do you think of my plan?"
Master Gao was pleased, and said, "This evening I will send for Lu Qian."
Now Lu Qian's house was in the same alley as the house of the Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard. The next day the plan was explained to Lu Qian who agreed to act his part. Although he was a friend of Lin Chong yet he would do this treacherous thing in order to ingratiate himself with the more influential Master Gao.
Lin Chong had been depressed in spirits for some time, and had not gone out of doors. But one day about ten o'clock in the morning he heard a man at the street door call out, "Is the Drill Instructor in?" Upon going to the door he saw Lu Qian and asked what he wanted.
"I have specially come to see you as I have not seen you for a long time."
"I have been much depressed," said Lin Chong, "and therefore have not been outside."
"Come with me," said Lu Qian, "and a few cups of wine will drive your cares away."
Lin Chong invited him to come inside, and after a few cups of tea he told his wife that he was going with Lu Qian for some wine. She asked him not to drink too much, and to get back as soon as possible. The two men then left the house, and after strolling about for a little time Lu Qian suggested that instead of going to his home they would go to the Fan Inn for the wine. This was agreed to, and at the inn they sat in a small apartment where the waiter brought wine and fruit. While they were chatting Lin Chong sighed, and Lu Qian asked why he did that.

"You do not understand," said Lin Chong, "that although I have ability I have not yet found an employer who appreciates my skill. I have to submit to the injustices and vile tempers of mean fellows."
"Although there are several drill instructors yet there is not one equal to you in ability. The Marshal of the Imperial Guard treats you well so whose vile temper have you to submit to?"
Lin Chong then told of the affair he had with Master Gao some time ago, while Lu Qian pressed him to drink more wine. Lin Chong drank about nine cups of wine, left the room, and then the inn, for the lavatory. He was returning to the inn when he met his maidservant Jin Er who said that she had been looking for him. Upon Lin Chong asking why, she explained, "You had been gone with Lu Qian less than half an hour when a man rushed into your house, and spoke to your wife, 'I am a neighbour of Lu Qian, and your husband is drinking with him. I saw your husband fall down senseless. You had better go there at once.' Your wife asked our neighbour Madame Wang to look after the house, and then set off with me. We went to the alley where Marshal Gao Qiu lives, and opposite his gate we entered a house and went upstairs where there was a table set with food and wine but you were not there. I was just about to go below when I saw the young man who had annoyed your wife at the Yue Temple the other day. He spoke to her, 'Please sit down. Your husband will be here shortly.' I hurried below, and there heard your wife upstairs shouting, 'Help! Help!' Therefore I ran to look for you, and happened to meet a man who told me that he had seen you entering the Fan Inn so I came here at once. Please, sir, hurry up!"
Lin Chong was astonished, and immediately rushed off to Lu Qian's house. Upon arriving there, and going up the staircase he found that the door of the room was fastened but heard his wife inside say, "In this day of universal tranquillity why do you detain me, an innocent woman, here?" To this Master Gao replied, "Madame, please take pity of me! Even a woman of iron or stone would change her mind."
Lin Chong shouted, "Wife, open the door." And she did so, while Master Gao being afraid, opened a window, jumped out, and ran away.
Lin Chong ascertained that his wife had not been ravished, and then smashed everything in the room. He took her downstairs, and on the streets noticed that the doors of the neighbouring houses were closed. The maidservant just then joining them, they all three went home. There Lin Chong taking a dagger concealed it in his sleeve, and went to the Fan Inn to look for Lu Qian but did not find him there. He then went to Lu Qian's house, and waited outside the door until evening without seeing that man. Upon returning home Lin Chong was exhorted by his wife, "As I did not fall into that man's trap you must be reasonable."
"It is very intolerable to think that that brute Lu Qian who used to address me as his brother should have deceived me. Now I am only afraid that I shall not meet that Master Gao, and get my revenge."
His wife strongly appealed to him not to go out.
Lu Qian hid in the private quarters of the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, as he dared not go home. Lin Chong waited for three days without seeing Lu Qian. On the fourth day Lu Da called on Lin Chong, and remarked that he had not seen him for several days. Lin Chong explained, "I have been somewhat busy these few days so that I have not been able to see you but as you have favoured me by visiting my little hut you should drink three cups of wine with me. Unfortunately I have no wine here so how will it be if we go for a stroll and call at some inn?"
Lu Da agreed and they went out. They were drinking wine for the whole day, and then agreed to meet again the following day. They even did this everyday until at last the affair of Master Gao was almost obliterated from Lin Chong's mind.
After escaping from Lu Qian's house, Master Gao did not dare to mention the matter to his adopted father, and remained at home sick. Lu Qian and Fu An came to see him, and noticed that he still seemed to be depressed. Upon their asking why he was not well, he replied, "I will not deceive you in any way. It is because I have twice failed to get hold of that woman, and have been scared by her husband. My lovesickness is more acute than ever. I think I shall be like this for a long time, and that even my life is in danger."
The two men said, "Master, do not worry! We will take this matter in hand, and will be responsible for bringing you and her together. She can only escape by committing suicide."
While they were talking the steward came in to see how his master's sickness was progressing. When he had made the usual inquiries Lu Qian and Fu An asked him to go with them for a private conversation. Upon reaching a quiet spot they said to him, "If you want Master Gao to recover you must report the affair to his father, Marshal Gao Qiu, and put an end to Lin Chong's life. Then we can get hold of the woman and take her to Master Gao who will recover. If you do not do this your master will certainly die."
"That is an easy thing," replied the steward, "and I will inform Marshal Gao Qiu this very evening."
"We have already the plan," said the two men, "but we will wait until you tell us what's Marshal Gao Qiu's idea."
The steward went to see the Marshal of the Imperial Guard that evening, and told him, "Your adopted son is melancholy because he cannot have the wife of Drill Instructor Lin Chong. He met her at the Yue Temple, more than a month ago, and ever since he has become lovesick." He then explained Lu Qian's plan for curing Master Gao.
Gao Qiu thought the matter over but could not see how he could damage the prospects of Lin Chong, and said so. He agreed however to hear what plan Lu Qian had, and sent for him. Upon their arrival they called out "nuo!" in the usual way, and Gao Qiu asked what plan they had to cure his son. Lu Qian explained the plot, and the Marshal approved of it, and ordered them to carry it out the next day.
Lin Chong had been drinking with Lu Da everyday so that he had quite forgotten about the affair of Master Gao. It happened, however, on one day as they were walking near Yue Wu Fang lane they saw a big man with a splendid sword on which was a tuft of grass to indicate that it was for sale. He called out, "I have not yet met a man who knows the value of this sword." But Lin Chong and Lu Da paid no attention, and strolled along. The man followed them calling out, "A good sword! What a pity that nobody knows its value!" The two friends still paid no attention so the man called out as they entered an alley, "This capital is a very big place, and yet there is no one who knows about military weapons."
Lin Chong could not help but hear this, and turned round. The man drew the sword out of its scabbard, and displayed its dazzling brightness. Lin Chong was not aware that this sword would doom his fate as he asked to look at it. The man handed it over for inspection, and Lin Chong exclaimed, "What a fine sword! How much do you want for it?"
The man said it was worth three thousand strings of cash but he would take two thousand.
"It is worth two thousand," said Lin Chong, "but nobody here knows its value. If you will take one thousand I will buy it."
"I am hard up for ready money," said the man, "and as you want it I will make a reduction of five hundred."
But Lin Chong would offer only one thousand so the man heaved a sigh; saying, "Now gold is for sale at the price of scrap iron. But enough! But don't give me a single cash less."
Lin Chong said he would pay him at his home, and so departed with Lu Da, promising to see him again the following day. He duly paid for the sword, and then asked where he got it from.
"It is a family heirloom, and I sell it because we are very hard up," replied the man.
"Who was your ancestor?"
"If I told you I should be ashamed."
Lin Chong did not press the point, and the man departed. He examined the sword, turning it this way and that, and saying to himself, "This is certainly an excellent sword. Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard, has a sword like this but he does not let anybody see it. I have asked him several times to let me see it but have been refused. By and by I will take this sword and compare it with his." He continued examining the sword till it was evening. At night he hung it on the wall but got up long before daybreak to have another look at it.
The following day he heard two minor officials at the door calling out, "Drill Instructor Lin Chong, Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard has heard that you have bought a sword, and he orders you to bring it for his inspection. He is specially waiting for you in his yamen." Upon hearing this Lin Chong wondered who could have reported the purchase to the Marshal. The two men waited until he was dressed, then he took the sword and went with them.
On the way he said, "I have not seen you at the headquarters."
"We have been appointed quite recently," they replied.
Upon reaching the headquarters they entered while Lin Chong remained in the courtyard. The two men then came back and said that the Marshal was in the hall at the back. Upon going there they passed round the screen before the door of the hall and then saw that the Marshal was not inside. Lin Chong stopped there but the men said that the Marshal had instructed them to take him inside. So he went with them through three doors, until they came to a building surrounded by green railings. There they asked him to wait while they were going to announce his arrival. They went inside and Lin Chong stood under the eaves of the hall for so long a time that it would take to drink a cup of tea but the men still had not returned. Such a delay and silence made him suspicious. He lifted up the door curtain and peeping inside saw an honourary tablet with four black characters, "White Tiger's Private Hall." He understood immediately that this was the hall where councils of war were held, and that he was trespassing. He quickly turned round to go away but just then he heard the sound of footsteps behind him, and looking back saw the Marshal himself. He stepped forward, and called out, "nuo" (awaiting your attention).
Marshal Gao Qiu shouted, "Lin Chong! How dare you enter the White Tiger's Private Hall, seeing that I have not summoned you? Moreover you have a sword in your hand, and evidently intended to kill me. I have heard that you have been hanging about these headquarters for several days with a sword so you evidently have bad intentions."
Lin Chong bowed his head, and said, "Your Benevolent Excellency! I was favoured by a visit of two junior officers who told me to bring my sword here to compare it with yours."
Marshal Gao Qiu shouted, "Where are those junior officers?"
"Your Benevolent Excellency, they went inside this hall."
"Nonsense! No junior officer dare enter my rooms! Seize this person!"
Before he had finished saying this, about thirty men rushed out of the building on both sides, and arrested him. Marshal Gao Qiu pretended to be angry, and said, "You are a Drill Instructor, and yet you do not know the law. Why do you enter the White Tiger's Private Hall with a sword in your hand, and try to kill me?" This event was to lead to much trouble in the empire.

Marks inscribed on farmer's backs;
Fishing boats studded with flags.

008

Drill Instructor Lin Chong's Tattooed/Branded, Exiled to Cangzhou, & prospects seem far from good; Lu Da Zhishen to the rescue in the Forest, has a Big Row, & makes a Shambles of Wild Bull Wood

As we were saying, Marshal Gao shouted for his guards to take Lin Chong out and execute him. Lin Chong loudly exclaimed that he was innocent.
"Why did you enter the Inner Sanctum with a sword in your hand?" demanded the marshal. "Of course you wanted to kill me!"
"Would I dare go in if the marshal hadn't summoned me?" countered Lin Chong. "I saw those two lieutenants enter the hall! They tricked me into coming here!"
"Nonsense! What lieutenants are you talking about? This scoundrel refuses to admit his guilt," said the marshal. And he directed his guards: "Take him to Kaifeng Prefecture. Ask Prefect Teng to examine him and investigate the case. Get the truth out of him, then have him executed. Label the sword as an official exhibit and take it along."
Bearing the marshal's order, the guards escorted Lin Chong to Kaifeng Prefecture. It happened that the prefect was still holding court, and Marshal Gao's emissary brought Lin Chong to the prefect's hall and knelt at the foot of the dais. The prefect's secretary relayed the emissary's message from Gao Qiu and placed the labelled sword down in front of Lin Chong.
"Lin Chong," said the prefect, "you're a drill instructor in the Imperial Guards. You must know the law. How could you enter the Inner Sanctum holding a sword? That's an offence punishable by death."
"Benevolent lord, you reflect the truth like a mirror. Lin Chong has been grievously wronged! Although I'm only a crude and stupid military man, I'm not exactly ignorant of the law. How would I presume to enter the Inner Sanctum? The reason I went there was this: On the twenty-eighth of last month I took my wife to the Temple of the Sacred Mountain to burn incense. There I caught Marshal Gao's son trying to seduce her. I berated him and drove him away. Next, he had Captain Lu Qian trick me into going out to drink and got Fu An to lure my wife to Captain Lu's home, where he tried to ravish her. This too I discovered and wrecked Lu Qian's furniture. Though Young Master Gao failed to despoil her, I have witnesses to both attempts.
"Yesterday, I bought this sword. Today, Marshal Gao sent two lieutenants to summon me. They said he wanted me to bring my sword to compare it with his. And so I went with them to the Inner Sanctum. After they went inside, Marshal Gao suddenly entered the courtyard. It's all a plot to destroy me. Please help me, Your Honour!"
After hearing Lin Chong's story, the prefect ordered that a receipt-of-prisoner be issued, a wooden cangue locked around the drill instructor's neck, and that he be held in custody. Lin Chong's family sent food to him in jail and gave tips to the keepers. His father-in-law, Drill Instructor Zhang, also called at the prison. He spent quite a bit, bribing high and low.
It happened that in the prefecture there was a scribe named Sun Ding. Because he was extremely just and kindly and always willing to help people, he was known as Sun the Buddha. Learning the facts of the case, he diplomatically informed the prefect what he had discovered.
"Lin Chong has been wronged," he said. "You must help him."
"But Marshal Gao has confirmed that he committed a crime. He insists that I convict Lin Chong for entering the Inner Sanctum, sword in hand, with the intention of murdering him. What can I do?"
"Is Kaifeng Prefecture ruled by the imperial court or the family of Marshal Gao?"
"Don't talk nonsense!"
"Everyone knows Gao Qiu uses his position tyrannically. There's nothing he won't do. Whoever offends him, even in the slightest, he sends to Kaifeng Prefecture. If he wants a man killed, we kill him. If he wants him hacked, we hack him. We've become a mere subdivision of his family."
"How can I make things easy for Lin Chong? What sort of sentence should I pass?"
"From Lin Chong's story, it's plain that he's innocent, although we haven't been able to find those two lieutenants. Why not have him confess to entering the Inner Sanctum improperly wearing a sword at his waist, sentence him to twenty strokes of the bamboo, tattoo him and exile him to some distant military district?"
After considering this, Prefect Teng went to see Marshal Gao and urged him to agree to such a confession from Lin Chong. Knowing that reason was against him, and since the prefect seemed reluctant to cooperate, the marshal was forced to consent.
The very same day, the prefect called court into session. He had Lin Chong summoned, the cangue removed and twenty blows of the bamboo administered. The prefect directed the tattooer to place the mark of a criminal on Lin Chong's cheek. Then he calculated the distance and decided upon Cangzhou as Lin's place of exile. In full court, a hinged wooden cangue of seven and a half catties was placed around the drill instructor's neck and nailed fast, and prefectural seals were affixed. The prefect issued a deportation order and designated two guards to escort the prisoner to his destination. Their names were Dong Chao and Xue Ba.
The guards left the prefectural compound with Lin Chong. Outside the gate, many of Lin Chong's neighbours and his father-in-law, Drill Instructor Zhang, were waiting. All repaired to a tavern and took seats.
"Thanks to the assistance of Scribe Sun, my beating was not heavy and I'm still able to walk," said Lin Chong.
Drill Instructor Zhang told the waiter to serve the two guards with wine and fruit. They drank several cups, and the old man presented them each with some silver.
Clasping hands respectfully, Lin Chong addressed his father-in-law. "Bad times have befallen me, exalted father-in-law. I clashed with Young Master Gao and the court has condemned me wrongfully. Now I have something to say: In the three years since you generously gave me your daughter in marriage she has never done anything to displease me. Although she's borne no children, not once have we quarrelled or even grown red in the face. Today I've suffered this misfortune. I'm being exiled to Cangzhou and there's no telling whether I'll live or die. My lady will be left at home. I'm worried about her. I'm afraid Young Master Gao will try to force his suit.
"She's still young. I shouldn't tie her down. This is my own idea, it's entirely voluntary. In the presence of our honourable neighbours I want to write out an annulment of our marriage, consenting to her making a new match and promising not to contest it. Only in this way will I feel at ease, assured that Young Master Gao won't be able to harm her."
"What words are these, good son-in-law," cried the old drill instructor. "You've been unlucky and this misfortune has happened. It's not of your own doing. Today you're going to Cangzhou for temporary refuge but sooner or later Heaven will pity you and let you return, and husband and wife will be together again. I've got a bit of money. I'll have my daughter and Jin Er move in with me. Come what may, I can support them for four or five years. I won't allow my daughter out on the streets. Young Master Gao won't be able to see her even if he wants to. Don't worry. I'll take care of everything. You go on to Cangzhou. From time to time I'll send you letters and clothing. Don't get any foolish ideas. Just go in peace."
"Thank you, father-in-law, for your good intentions. But I wouldn't feel right, tying her down. Have pity, father-in-law, let me have my way. Then, even if I die, I can close my eyes peacefully."
But Drill Instructor Zhang wouldn't hear of it. The neighbours also were opposed.
"Unless I am allowed to do this, even if I succeed in coming back I swear I'll never see her again," said Lin Chong.
"Write out the annulment if that's how you feel," said the old man. "In any event, I won't let my daughter marry another." Lin Chong then sent for a scribe and purchased a sheet of paper. The scribe wrote as Lin Chong dictated:
Because he was convicted of a serious crime, Lin Chong, drill instructor of the Imperial Guards, Eastern Capital, has been sentenced to exile in Cangzhou. What will happen to him is difficult to foretell. His wife (maiden name Zhang) is still young, and he therefore wishes to annul their marriage. He grants her permission to contract a new marriage and guarantees that he will never contest it. The annulment is truly voluntary and not issued under compulsion. In the event of any doubt, this document shall serve as proof.
Year ... Month ... Day ...
When the document was completed, Lin Chong took the writing brush and signed his name below the date, then added his thumb print. Just as he was about to hand the annulment to his father-in-law, his wife, weeping and crying aloud, came hurrying to the tavern, followed by the maidservant, Jin Er, who was carrying a bundle of clothing. Lin Chong rose and went forward to meet her.
"Wife," he said, "I have something to tell you. I've already spoken to father-in-law. Because I've fallen on bad times, I've had this misfortune. Today, I start for Cangzhou. It's hard to say whether I'll live or die. I don't want to hold you back in the flower of your youth, so I've had this document written. Please don't wait for me. If you meet a good man, marry again. Don't delay your happiness on my account."
"Husband," she wept. "I've never wronged you in the slightest. How can you discard me?"
"I mean well, wife," said Lin Chong. "Otherwise, we'll only impede each other. You'll be harmed."
"Don't worry, my daughter," said Drill Instructor Zhang. "Even though son-in-law recommends it, I'll never allow you to remarry. He can depart easy in his mind. If he doesn't return, I'll provide for you for the rest of your life, so that you can remain faithful to him."
The young woman uttered heart-rending sobs, tears streaming down her cheeks. When she saw the annulment document she collapsed swooning to the floor. Lin Chong and his father-in-law hurried to raise her. It was some time before she revived. She wept uncontrollably as Lin Chong presented the document to her father. Women neighbours did their best to comfort her. Supporting the bereft woman under the arms, they escorted her home.
"Go, and try to come back soon," Drill Instructor Zhang told Lin Chong. "Tomorrow, I shall move your wife over to my house. I'll take care of her until you return. You can depart without any worries. Be sure to write to us from time to time, if you find people who can deliver your letters."
Lin Chong rose and thanked his father-in-law and his neighbours, placed his bundle on his back, and went off with the guards. Drill Instructor Zhang and the neighbours departed for home. Of them we shall say no more.

We'll speak of the two guards and Lin Chong. Dong Chao and Xue Ba locked their prisoner in a guard house, and returned to their homes to pack some things for their journey. As Dong Chao was tying a bundle together, a waiter from the tavern at the head of the lane came in.
"Sir, a gentleman wishes to speak with you in our tavern."
"Who is he?"
"I don't know. He only told me to invite you over."
Dong Chao went with the waiter to a room in the tavern. He found a man wearing a hat decorated with Buddhist swastikas and dressed in a black silk tunic. On his feet were black boots and plain stockings. When Dong Chao entered, the man quickly rose and clasped hands in greeting.
"Please be seated," he said.
"I have not had the privilege of meeting Your Honour before," said Dong Chao. "How can I serve you?"
"Please sit down. You'll know shortly."
Dong Chao took a chair on the opposite side of the table. The waiter brought wine cups and food and fruit and laid them out.
"Where does Xue the guard live?" the man asked.
"In that lane ahead," replied Dong Chao.
The man called the waiter and asked him for Xue's exact address. "Invite him here to meet me," he instructed.
In less time than it takes to drink a cup of tea, the waiter returned with Xue Ba.
"This gentleman has invited us for a talk," Dong Chao explained.
"May I ask your name, sir?" queried Xue Ba.
"You'll know very soon," replied the man. "First let us drink."
The three took their seats and the waiter served wine. After they had consumed several cups, the man drew from his sleeve ten ounces of gold and placed them on the table.
"Five ounces for each of you," he said. "There is a small matter I want to trouble you about."
"But we don't know Your Honour. Why should you give us gold?" they asked.
"Aren't you going to Cangzhou?"
"We're taking Lin Chong there under orders of the Kaifeng Prefect," said Dong Chao.
"It's precisely for that reason that I must bother you two. I am Marshal Gao's trusted Captain Lu Qian."
Dong Chao and Xue Ba immediately greeted him with profound respect. "How can insignificant men like us presume to sit at the same table with Your Honour," they cried.
"As you know, Lin Chong has incurred the marshal's displeasure. The marshal has ordered me to present you with these ten ounces of gold. He hopes you will finish off Lin Chong in some secluded place along the road—it needn't be too far—and bring back a certification of his death from the local authorities. If Kaifeng Prefecture causes any difficulty, the marshal will take care of it personally. You needn't worry about that."
"I'm afraid it's not possible," said Dong Chao. "The official order of Kaifeng Prefecture directs that we deliver Lin Chong alive, not that we kill him. He's not an old man: How could we explain his death? We'd surely get into trouble. I'm afraid it can't be done."
"Dong, old fellow," said Xue Ba, "listen to me. If Marshal Gao ordered us to die, we would have to obey, to say nothing of a case like this, when he sends this gentleman with gold. Say no more. I'll share it with you and that's that. If we do this little favour, we'll be looked after in the future. On the road to Cangzhou there's a big pine forest, a wild evil place. Come what may, we'll finish him off there."
Xue Ba took the gold and said, "You can rely on us, Your Honour. At the latest on the fifth stage of the journey, at the earliest the second, the thing will be done."
Very pleased, Lu Qian exclaimed: "Xue Ba is truly straightforward and to the point. When the deed is accomplished, bring back the golden print on Lin Chong's face as proof. I will then reward you both with another ten ounces of gold. I shall be waiting for good news. Be sure not to delay."
In Song times, prisoners who were to be exiled were always tattooed on the face. To make it sound better, the mark was called "the golden print."
The three finished their wine, Lu Qian paid the bill, then all left the tavern and went their separate ways.
Dong Chao and Xue Ba, after dividing the gold, returned to their homes and finished packing. Then they took their official staves, called for Lin Chong at the guard house, and set out from the city. They travelled more than thirty //before calling a halt. In Song days, guards escorting a prisoner did not have to pay for lodging in public inns. Xue and Dong brought Lin Chong to an inn, and they stayed the night.
At dawn the next morning, the guards lit a fire and made breakfast, and the three continued their journey to Cangzhou. It was the height of summer and the weather was scorching. Lin Chong had not suffered much when he was beaten. But now a few days had passed, and the fiery heat irritated his wounds. He walked painfully, with dragging steps.
"Stupid clod," Xue Ba said. "It's over two thousand //from here to Cangzhou. Who knows when we'll get there, at the rate you're going!"
"I was buffeted a bit in the marshal's compound, and then, the other day, I was beaten with bamboos. My wounds are paining me in this awful heat," Lin Chong explained. "Please, sirs, don't be impatient."
"Just take your time," said Dong Chao. "Never mind his grumbling."
Xue Ba kept complaining and cursing all along the road. "It's our misfortune to have run into a wretched demon like you," he berated Lin Chong.
As the day was drawing to a close, the three again put up at a village inn. Entering the door, the guards rested their staves and removed their packs. Lin Chong also dropped his luggage bundle. Before the guards could say anything, he took out some pieces of silver and told the attendant to bring wine, meat and rice, and set the table. Lin then invited the guards to dine with him.
Dong Chao and Xue Ba ordered still more wine, and they gave Lin Chong so much that he became drunk and lay down on the floor, with the cangue still round his neck. Xue Ba then boiled a large pot of water. When it was bubbling hot he poured it into a basin.
"Wash your feet, Drill Instructor," he said. "You'll sleep better."
Lin Chong struggled to a sitting position but he couldn't lean forward because of the cangue.
"I'll wash them for you," Xue Ba offered.
"How could I impose upon you?" Lin Chong hastily replied.
"Men travelling together shouldn't be ceremonious over such details," said Xue Ba.
Lin Chong didn't realize it was a plot. He stretched out his legs. Xue Ba seized them and plunged them into the boiling water.
"Aiya!" exclaimed Lin Chong, hurriedly pulling his feet out. They had turned red and swollen. "I mustn't trouble you!" he cried.
"Plenty of prisoners have looked after guards but how often do you see a guard serving a prisoner?" said Xue Ba. "With the best of intentions I wash his feet but he has the nerve to complain—the water's too cold, the water's too hot ... If this isn't returning evil for good I don't know what is!"
He grumbled and swore half the night.
Not daring to reply, Lin Chong could only fall over and lie on his side.
The two guards poured out the boiling water, filled the basin afresh, then went to wash their feet outside.
They slept until the fourth watch, rising while the rest of the inn was still in bed. Xue Ba heated some water to wash with, and cooked breakfast. Lin Chong, dizzy, was unable to eat and barely able to walk. Xue Ba threatened him with his staff. Dong Chao untied from his belt a pair of new straw sandals with loops and bindings of woven hemp. He told Lin Chong to put them on. Lin Chong's scalded feet were covered with blisters. He wanted his old soft sandals but they were nowhere to be found. He had to put the new ones on.
The waiter added up the bill and the guards led Lin Chong from the inn. It was by now the fifth watch.
Before Lin Chong had gone more than two or three //; the blisters on his feet, broken by the new straw sandals, bled freely. He could hardly drag himself along and he groaned ceaselessly.
"Walk! Faster!" shouted Xue Ba. "Keep moving or I'll help you with this staff."
"Have pity on me, good officer," Lin Chong pleaded. "Would I dare slow down deliberately and delay our journey? It's because my feet are killing me. I can't walk."
"You can lean on me," said Dong Chao. He supported Lin Chong. But since the drill instructor walked with difficulty, they covered only four or five //;
It became obvious that Lin Chong really couldn't go much farther. They saw ahead of them a wild evil wood shrouded in mist. Known as Wild Boar Forest, it was the first dangerous place on the road from Kaifeng to Cangzhou. During the Song Dynasty, those who had grudges against prisoners being sent into exile often bribed their escorts to murder them there. Who can say how many good men lost their lives in that wood?
Now, the two guards led Lin Chong straight into the forest.
"In the whole fifth watch we haven't even walked ten //; "said Dong Chao. "We'll never reach Cangzhou at this rate."
"I'm tired," said Xue Ba. "Let's rest here."
The three men walked deeper into the forest, then removed their packs and placed them at the foot of a tree. Lin Chong groaned. With his back against a tree trunk he slid to the ground.
"Having to wait for you every time we take a step has worn me out too," said Dong Chao. "I want to sleep a while, then we'll go on."
They rested their staves and lay down beside a tree. But no sooner had they closed their eyes than they leaped up with an exclamation.
"What's wrong, good officers?" asked Lin Chong.
"We were just about to sleep when we remembered that there are no doors and locks here. We're afraid you'll run off. We're worried, so we can't sleep in peace."
"I'm a respectable man. Since I've already been convicted, I'd never run away."
"Who can believe that?" scoffed Dong Chao. "The only way we can really feel secure is to tie you up."
"If that's what you good officers want, how can I refuse?"
Xue Ba took a rope from his waist and bound Lin Chong hand and foot and tied him, together with the cangue, tightly to the tree. Then he and Dong Chao sprang up, whirled around, seized their staves and advanced on Lin Chong.
"Killing you isn't our idea," they said. "The other day Captain Lu Qian informed us of the order of Marshal Gao. We're to finish you off here and return immediately with the golden print. Even if we travelled a few more days, it would still be your death march. Doing the job here, we can get back that much earlier. Don't blame us two brothers. We're only carrying out orders. We have no choice. You must know: A year from this day will be the first anniversary of your death! We've been given a time limit. We must return quickly with our report."
When Lin Chong heard this, his tears fell like rain. "Officers," he cried, "there's never been any enmity between us. Spare me, and I'll never forget you in this world or the next!"
"Empty talk," said Dong Chao. "You can't be saved!" Xue Ba raised his official staff and swung it fiercely at Lin Chong's head. What a pity that a hero's life should vanish like a dream! There are no inns on the long road to the Nether Regions. In whose home can a wandering spirit rest in the deep of night?

Well, when the Marshal called for his escort to arrest Lin Chong, and have him executed, Lin Chong loudly protested his innocence.
"Then what were you doing in the council chamber?" the Marshal interjected. "You were carrying a sword. What can that mean except that you went there with intent to assassinate me?"
"But sir, I would never have entered, had I not been summoned. It was your two aides, the two officers who went into the hall. They tricked me into entering."
"You're lying!" the Marshal roared. "There are no such officers on my establishment. The bastard's trying to wriggle out of it!" He gave orders for the guards to carry the prisoner to the Kaifeng court and request Governor Teng to interrogate him and, having ascertained the truth, execute him. The sword was also sent, under seal, as evidence.
In accordance with the Marshal's orders, the guards escorted Lin Chong to the Kaifeng Magistracy where the court happened to be still in session.
The courtroom is resplendent with red silks and purple sashes. Vermilion inscriptions hang overhead, while all around there are screens of mottled bamboo. Government officials are seen handing out justice and a stone tablet bears an admonition from the Emperor carved in four lines of the imperial characters. Meanwhile court officers carry out their duties meticulously. Lacquered tablets carry two words: "Keep silence!" There are security officers to handle the confidential documents and clerks to keep records. Tough-looking guards with rattan canes line the steps leading up to the bench and impressive officers holding truncheons wait to left and right. When civil cases are heard the judgement is clear and even-handed: when disorderly conduct is the crime, the sentences handed out match like the reflection in a gold mirror. The magistrate, a high-ranking government official, is like father and mother to the people. The accused approaches the bench like one walking on ice, or like a man walking towards a mirror. For its indescribable solemnity, this court resembles the tribunal of Heaven itself.
The Marshal's men escorted Lin Chong into the courtroom, where he was made to kneel at the foot of the rostrum while the Marshal's instructions were repeated to Governor Teng. Then the sword, sent by the Marshal under seal, was produced and shown to Lin Chong. "Lin Chong!" the Governor said, "you are an instructor of the guards, how could you be ignorant of the regulations? How could you go to the council chamber with an offensive weapon in your hand? It is a capital offence."
"Your Honour," Lin Chong began, "I am unjustly accused, the victim of a plot! I may be only a rough and ready soldier but of course I know the regulations. I wouldn't have dreamed of entering the council chamber without authorization. What happened was that on the twenty-eighth of last month, when I went with my wife to burn incense at the Temple of the Holy Mountain, I caught the Marshal's son molesting my wife. He fled when I expressed my outrage. Later he had Lieutenant Lu invite me to drink wine, while my wife was lured by Fu An to a private upstairs room in Lieutenant Lu's house, where she was again molested. I rescued her, and vented my feelings on Lieutenant Lu's property. There have been two attempts on my wife's honour, as witnesses could testify. Yesterday I bought this sword, and this morning the Marshal sent two officers to my house to fetch me. They told me to take the sword to Government House because the Marshal wanted to examine it. That is why I went with the two men to the council chamber. They disappeared into an inner apartment, and then the Marshal suddenly entered from outside. It was a deliberate plot to ruin me. I beg you to help me!"
The Governor heard Lin Chong's story. He returned a reply to the Marshal and had Lin Chong thrown into prison, duly loaded with manacles and cangue. Lin Chong's family sent him food and paid out money. His father-in-law, Instructor Zhang, bribed all the officials he could, spending a small fortune in cash and rolls of silk.
Now at that time there was an archivist named Sun Ding who was very outspoken and entirely honest, and made it his business to help people, for which reason he was known as "Sun the Compassionate." He saw exactly how things were, he understood all the ins and outs of this case. He advised the Governor: "Lin Chong is clearly the victim of an injustice, we ought to help him."
"But he's accused of a serious crime," the Governor objected. "The Marshal says he must be interrogated, to find out why he penetrated the council chamber with a sword in his hand, intending to kill his superior; how can we help him?"
"So this court of the Southern district of Kaifeng is not under the Emperor's jurisdiction then, it's run by the Marshal," said Sun Ding.
"What are you talking about?" said the Governor.
"Everyone knows Marshal Gao abuses his power and oppresses the people, not to mention the way he carries on in his own house. For the slightest misdemeanour he'll send people to the court; if he says kill them, we kill them, if he says cut them into little pieces, we cut them into little pieces. Are we nothing but a tool in his service?"
"According to you, then, what should we do about Lin Chong? How can we get round this sentence we're expected to hand out?"
"By Lin Chong's own account he's totally innocent. The only problem is we can't lay hands on those two officers. What we must do is get him to confess that he entered the council chamber by mistake, illegally wearing a sword. Sentence him to twenty strokes of the cane, brand him and banish him to a frontier post."
Now that he understood the affair, the Governor went in person to the Marshal's and impressed on him the need to accept such a confession from Lin Chong. Marshal Gao, knowing full well the weakness of his case, was obliged to accept the Governor's judgement.
The court resumed the same day. Lin Chong was summoned; the cangue was removed and he was subjected to twenty strokes of the cane. The tattooer was called to place a mark on each side of Lin Chong's face. Distances were calculated, and Cangzhou was decided on as the place of exile. At the court's instance a hinged cangue weighing seven and a half catties was forthwith clamped round Lin Chong's neck and officially sealed. An official order was issued and two guards appointed to escort the prisoner to the place of exile.
The two guards were called Dong Chao and Xue Ba. When, carrying the official order, they left the Kaifeng courthouse with Lin Chong, all his neighbours together with his father-in-law, arms instructor Zhang, were waiting at the gate. They all accompanied Lin Chong and his two guards to a tavern under the Zhou Bridge.
"I have to thank Mr. Sun, the archivist, for the fact that the caning was not too severe and I am still able to walk," Lin Chong told them.
Instructor Zhang told the innkeeper to prepare wine and fruit to entertain the two guards. After a few cups, Instructor Zhang was seen to fetch out silver and pass it to the guards. Then Lin Chong took his father-in-law's hand and said: "Respected father-in-law, it is my misfortune to have fallen foul of the Marshal's son and thus incurred this injustice. Now I crave your indulgence to permit me to speak what is on my mind: You have granted me your love, more than I merit and, three years since, you gave me your daughter in marriage. I have not the slightest fault to find with her. True, we have not been blessed with children yet but I can say that we have never flushed in anger or raised our voices to each other. But now misfortune has fallen upon me, I am branded and banished to Cangzhou and my future is clouded with uncertainty. My wife will remain here, and I must be forever uneasy, fearing that the Marshal's son will take advantage of my predicament to force his attentions upon her. Moreover, she is now in the very flowering of her youth, and it is not fair that her future should be compromised because of me. I therefore propose — and this purely on my own initiative, entirely without outside prompting or interference — to draw up a document, with these good neighbours as witnesses, stating in unambiguous terms that I divorce her, leaving her entirely free to remarry, without let or hindrance from me. After this I shall depart with an easy mind, confident that it is no longer in Gao's power to ruin her."
Instructor Zhang was horrified. "My dear son-in-law," he said. "What an idea! You've had some bad luck, you've got involved in an unfortunate business but none of it through your own fault. For the present you must go to Cangzhou, where at least you'll find a refuge and be out of harm's way but sooner or later heaven will take pity on you. When you're allowed to return my daughter will be waiting for you, it'll all be as before. I'm not so badly off, I will take my daughter and Jin Er to live with me, ... I'll look after them for three or four years. I won't let them out of the house, so even if young Gao comes looking for them he won't have a chance to see them. Don't worry, put your trust in me. Whilst you're serving your time in Cangzhou I will send you letters and clothes. So enough of these foolish ideas, I want you to go with a quiet mind."

Lin Chong said: "I am truly grateful to you, father-in-law but it cannot set my mind at rest. The situation is prejudicial to us both. Have pity on me and accept my request, so that if need be I can die at peace."
Of course Instructor Zhang did not want to say yes, and all the neighbours likewise said it was impossible. But Lin Chong still insisted: "If you won't listen to me, then let me say to you that if I ever manage to get free I swear that I will not come back to find my wife."
Then Instructor Zhang said, "If that's the way it's got to be, write out your document. But I will not marry my daughter to anyone else." He told the innkeeper to summon a scribe and buy paper, and the scribe then wrote down what Lin Chong dictated:
I, Lin Chong, instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards, having been convicted and banished to Cangzhou and whereas my future is full of uncertainty, and my wife is still young, hereby divorce her, so that she may marry whom she will, without let or hindrance from me. I certify that this is my own decision, arrived at without outside prompting of any kind. I write this in order for it to be known, that no conflict may arise later through lack of documentation.
Having supervised the production of this document, Lin Chong took a pen and signed his name beneath the date and year and added his thumb print. He was just about to hand the completed document to his father-in-law, when his wife burst into the room, with great weeping and wailing, followed by Jin Er with a bundle of clothes. At last she had managed to find her husband, here in this inn.
Lin Chong started up to greet her and said, "Wife, I have something to say to you. I have already told your father. Because of ill fortune I have been unjustly accused and must leave for Cangzhou at once, where who knows what will become of me? It saddens me to think of you wasting away in the flower of your youth, so I have had these few words copied down. I implore you not to wait for me; if a good man presents himself, marry him. I would not have your life wasted, my dear, on my account."
At this the lady burst into tears. "When have I given you the least cause for complaint?" she sobbed. "How can you abandon me?"
"Believe me, it is for the best. I fear the future can hold nothing but misfortune for us and you will suffer."
Instructor Zhang now spoke: "Take heart, my daughter. No matter what your husband proposes, I will not have you remarry. Accept this arrangement so that he can depart in peace but if he does not return I shall provide for you always and thus you can remain faithful to him."
The lady continued to sob pitifully, and when she saw the certificate of divorce she gave a cry and fell to the ground in a lifeless swoon.
What now of wedded bliss, the long years of mutual harmony and trust?
What of the joys of marriage, the lost days of service to the God of Spring?
What a blight on beauty now, failing like the peonies in the West garden that turn their heads to the wall!
The sweet lips now are closed, silent as Kuan Yin of the Southern Sea entering meditation!
Last night's cruel East wind has wrecked the plum blossom down by the river.
Husband and father raised her up but it was a long while before she came to herself. Then her weeping continued without pause. Lin Chong handed the certificate of divorce to his father-in-law. Some good women among the neighbours rendered assistance to his wife and carried her home. Instructor Zhang then exhorted Lin Chong as follows: "You must go forward confidently now to whatever awaits you, and think of nothing else till your return. I shall take your wife home with me tomorrow and keep her safe for you until you can be reunited. So be at ease and have no care. But do, I beg you, send us news, if you can find a reliable messenger."
Lin Chong now rose and thanked his father-in-law and bade him farewell, and the neighbours also. Then he shouldered his bundle and left with his escort. Instructor Zhang and the neighbours went home, and we shall say no more of them.
We turn now to the two guards, who had escorted Lin Chong to the cell for banished criminals. Having secured the prisoner, Dong Chao and Xue Ba went to their separate homes to pack for the journey. As Dong Chao was tying his bundle, the innkeeper from the tavern on the corner of his street appeared and said:
"Officer Dong, there's a gentleman sitting in my establishment who says he wants to see you."
"Who is it?" Dong asked.
"I don't know him but he's asking for Officer Dong." During the Song Dynasty it was the custom to call policemen "officer."
Dong hurried off to the tavern with the publican. Sitting in one of the small rooms he found a man with a hat decorated with a Buddhist swastika, a black silk tunic, black boots and plain stockings. "Sit down, officer," he said, the moment he saw Dong Chao.
"I haven't had the honour," said Dong Chao. "But since you've sent for me, I imagine you have some commission for me?"
"Sit down and you'll soon hear about it," said the other.
Dong Chao sat down opposite, while the innkeeper brought wine, and a quantity of vegetables and fruit to go with it that covered the whole table.
"Where does Officer Xue live?" the stranger asked.
"Just across the road from here," Dong Chao answered.
The stranger summoned the innkeeper, made Dong Chao repeat the exact address and said: "Go and ask him to come here." The publican was gone the time for a cup of tea; returning, he ushered Xue Ba into the room. "This gentleman wants to speak to us," Dong explained.
"May I be so bold as to ask your name, sir?" said Xue Ba.
"You'll know soon enough. First drink some wine."
Whilst they sat there, the innkeeper filled the cups. After several rounds, the stranger threw ten taels of gold on the table and said: "There's five taels for each of you, if you'll do me a little service."
"We don't know you at all," they said, "why are you giving us gold?"
"Are you not headed for Cangzhou?" said the stranger.
"That's correct, sir, we are under orders from the Governor to escort the convict Lin Chong there," said Dong.
"In that case I've got a job for you. You may as well know that I'm Lieutenant Lu, a personal friend of the Marshal's."
"Then it's not right for us to be sitting in Your Honour's presence like this," the two murmured, overwhelmed by the honour.
"You both know that Lin Chong is the Marshal's enemy," said the Lieutenant. "I have orders from the Marshal. I am to give you these ten taels of gold. In return you are to undertake something. There is no need to go very far. Simply choose the first quiet secluded spot you come to, and when you have finished Lin Chong off, remember to get a proper death certificate from the local authorities. Then you can return. If any tongues happen to wag in the district, the Marshal himself will deal with it. There will be no problem."
"But I don't see how it can be done," Dong said. "Our orders are to deliver him there alive. We're not authorized to kill him. And the man's quite young; how could we explain his death? If someone wanted to make trouble for us, it could turn nasty."
But Xue Ba said: "Dong, old man, listen to me. If the Marshal told us to kill ourselves, you and me, we'd have to obey. Then all the more reason to listen when he sends this gentleman along to give us gold. You'd much better keep your mouth shut. The money's for both of us. The way I see it, we do them this little favour and we'll not have cause to regret it afterwards. On our way there's a big pine forest. It's a wild, fearsome sort of place. It won't be a big problem, just to do him in." So saying, Xue took the gold and said: "Don't worry, sir. After five stages at most, two if possible, we'll do what's needed!"
Lieutenant Lu was pleased. "Between you two, it's Officer Xue who's the smart one," he said. "When you get to the point, make sure you cut off the two golden seals on Lin Chong's cheeks and bring them back with you as proof that you've done the job. You'll receive another ten taels of gold from me as reward. I look forward to hearing the good news from you. Make sure there are no mistakes." In Song times, by the way, all exiled convicts were tattooed on the cheeks, and these marks were euphemistically known as "golden seals."
The three downed a few more cups, then the Lieutenant paid the bill and they left the winehouse and went their ways.
Dong and Xue contentedly divided the gold and returned home with it to collect their things. They each took the special staff denoting their office and returned to the cells to get Lin Chong. Then they took to the road.
Ten miles or so out from the city they called a halt. In Song times guards escorting a prisoner did not pay for their lodging on the road, so on this occasion they all spent the night together at an inn. Next day they were up at dawn; they lit a fire and made breakfast, then set off again on the Cangzhou road.
It was real midsummer weather, hot as a furnace. At first the flogging had not greatly affected Lin Chong but after two or three days' journey, together with the great heat, the wounds reopened. There was also the fact that he had not been flogged before. Soon it was all he could do to drag one foot after another. "You moron, it's more than six hundred miles to Cangzhou, when are we ever going to get there at this rate?" Xue Ba grumbled.
"I had quite a time of it at the Marshal's residence, and then just the day before yesterday I had that flogging and the wounds have reopened," Lin Chong said. "And on top of it, this blazing heat! Don't you think you could go a little slower?"
"Just keep on at your own pace," Dong Chao said. "Don't worry about him!"
Xue continued to mutter to himself, grumbling and grousing all the way. "Just our rotten luck to be stuck with a lazy devil like you!" he said.
By now it was getting late:
The sun's red disk has sunk, the moon's mirror hangs on high. In the distance the smoke of cooking fires, in the foreground cottage doors half open. While the monk makes his way towards the old temple, rooks flock home to the misty wood. As the fisherman draws near to the dark shore, wind shrills in the trees like the cicada's song. Cows and sheep crowd together on the sheltered slopes; donkeys and horses plod down the well-trodden highway.
That evening they lodged at a village inn. As soon as they entered, Dong and Xue put down their staves and unburdened themselves of their packs. Lin Chong also removed his pack and without waiting for the two policemen to open their mouths, took out some change and told a boy to go and buy wine and food, procure some rice and prepare a repast. This done, he invited the two guards to share it.
The guards provided more wine themselves, and got Lin Chong completely drunk, so that in the end, despite the cangue round his neck, he simply collapsed on the floor.
Xue went and warmed a big pot of water. When it was boiling, he poured it into a foot-bath, and said to Lin Chong: "Here you are, Instructor: bathe your feet, and then you'll sleep better." Lin Chong struggled to sit up but the cangue got in the way and he couldn't bend, so Xue said: "I'll wash them for you."
"I couldn't allow you to do that," Lin Chong said.
"No need to be shy about it, when you're on the road," Xue said.
Lin Chong innocently stretched out his legs, and Xue grabbed them and thrust them into the boiling water. Lin Chong let out a scream and jerked his legs back. His feet were covered in angry red blisters. "Forget it, I'd rather not trouble you," he said.
"Usually it's the prisoner serves the officer," Xue said. "Who heard of the officer serving the prisoner? Here's me, offering out of the kindness of my heart to wash his feet for him, and what do I get but complaints? Either it's too cold or it's too hot. There's the thanks you get for trying to help!" He went on grumbling half the night but Lin Chong knew better than to reply. He simply withdrew to one side. The guards threw away the water, refilled the basin and went to wash their feet outside. Then they went to bed. They were awake before dawn, when no one else was stirring in the inn. Xue rose and went to warm water for washing. Then he lit a fire and made breakfast. When Lin Chong awoke he was dizzy, scarcely able to eat or stand. Xue got his staff of office and threatened him with it. Dong was carrying a pair of straw sandals tied round his waist, with hemp eyes and laces; these he offered to Lin Chong. Lin Chong's feet were covered in big round blisters and he would have preferred his old sandals that were soft but they were nowhere to be found. Reluctantly, he put on the new ones. The waiter made out the bill for the wine and then the two guards led their charge away. It was nearly dawn.
But before they had gone a mile, the new sandals caused all Lin Chong's blisters to burst and his feet began to stream with blood. It was really becoming impossible for him to walk, and he groaned ceaselessly. Xue began to curse him: "If you can't walk faster than this, I'll have to see if my staff will help you."
"Have a little sympathy," Lin Chong said. "I'm not trying to be difficult. But my feet are so painful I can scarcely walk."
"You can lean on me," Dong said. But even when he helped Lin Chong along, they only managed another mile and a half. When it was obvious they could go no further, they saw ahead of them, swathed in mist, a wood of wild and ominous aspect:

'Tis dressed in withered creepers sad as rain,
All roofed with foliage dark as lowering cloud:
A dismal bourne where sun is never seen,
Where spirits haunt, with lamentations loud.

This was Wild Boar Wood. It was the first dangerous spot on the road from the Eastern Capital to Cangzhou. It was to this place that prisoners were always brought during the Song Dynasty, when those with a grudge against them had bribed the guards. Goodness knows how many good men ended their days here. Now the two guards and their charge plunged into this wood. Then Dong Chao said: "We have been walking since dawn, and we haven't covered five miles yet. When are we ever going to get to Cangzhou like this?"
"But I'm tired too," Xue Ba said. "We'll rest in this wood."
Once they were well into the wood, they removed their packs and flung them down at the foot of a tree. Lin Chong leaned his back against a tree and slid to the ground with a groan.
"It's stop and go all the time with you. That's the most tiring way," said the guards. "Well, we'd better sleep a bit, before we go on." They put down their staves and lay down beside a tree. But just as they were closing their eyes, they leapt up with a cry.
"What's the matter?" Lin Chong asked.
"We want to sleep," they said. "But there's nowhere here to lock you up. How can we relax, how can we sleep secure?"
"I'm a man of honour," Lin Chong said. "I've received my sentence, of course I wouldn't run away."
"You expect us to believe that?" said Xue. "No, the only way our minds will be at rest is if we tie you up."
"All right, tie me up, if you must. What can I say?"
Xue took a length of rope he had round his waist and bound Lin Chong hand and foot, passing the rope through the cangue to secure him to a tree. Then he and Dong leapt back and picking up their staves whirled about to face Lin Chong, saying: "It's not our idea to take your life, it's that Lieutenant Lu who came to see us the other night, he said he had orders from the Marshal: we're to bring you here and do you in and report back with the golden seals. We could have gone on a few more days but you'd still be a dead man, so it might as well be here and now … if we get it over with we can go back all the quicker. Please don't hold it against us. Remember, we're doing a job, we can't just do as we please. Besides, you ought to think it's all for the best: this day next year will be your anniversary. As for us, we've been given a time-limit and we've got to report back before it runs out."
Hearing this, Lin Chong could not hold back his tears. "My friends," he said, "I have shown you no ill-will, and to this day there is no quarrel between us. If you can help me, be sure that I shall not forget it, in this world or the next."
"Stop drivelling," said Dong. "There's no way for us to save you." Xue now raised his staff, preparing to bring it down and split Lin Chong's skull. He was just on the point of finishing our unfortunate and defenceless hero off:

There's no inn along the road to Hell;
The spirit un-housed, tonight where'll it dwell?

When the bodyguard of the Marshal Gao Qiu seized Lin Chong, and were going to behead him on the spot, Lin Chong called out that he was being wronged.
Marshal Gao said, "What business had you to come to this Private Hall with a sharp sword in your hand? Did you not come to kill me?"
Lin Chong beseechingly said, "If you had not ordered me to come here, how could I have dared to enter? The two junior officers who just went inside the hall brought me here."
Marshal Gao said, "Nonsense! What junior officers are there at my headquarters? Why don't you accept my word!" He then told his bodyguard to take the prisoner to the Kaifeng Prefectural yamen, and he would instruct the Prefect there to examine the case very minutely, and after a clear investigation he could execute the prisoner.[57] He told them to wrap up the sword, and seal it.
The bodyguard obeyed the orders, and took Lin Chong under arrest to Kaifeng Prefectural yamen, and fortunately upon arriving there they found that the Prefect was still sitting in the court hearing cases. Marshal Gao's officers took Lin Chong into the court, and they knelt down at the steps in front of the bench. The Prefect's officer got the particulars of the case, and then reported the matter to Prefect Teng. He then took the sword which was still sealed up, and placed it in front of the prisoner.
The Prefect said, "Lin Chong, you are a Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guard so how is it that you did not know the rules of the army, and entered the Private Hall with a sword in your hand? That is a crime to be punished by death."
Lin Chong said, "Most benevolent and wise official, I am falsely accused, and seriously wronged. Although I am a stupid army officer I understand a few of the rules. How dared I enter the Private Hall? The fact of the matter is, that on the twenty-eighth day of last month I went with my wife to the Yue Temple to sacrifice, and there we met the adopted son of Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard, who attempted to trifle with my wife, and I interfered and separated them. Afterwards Lu Qian cheated me by asking me to go to drink wine with him, while he employed Fu An to deceive my wife, and told her to go to Lu Qian's home where they had arranged to trifle with her. As soon as I heard of this I went there at once, and smashed up all the furniture. Thus although they had twice tried to ravish my wife, they had not succeeded, and I have a witness to bear that out. The following day I bought this sword, and today the Marshal of the Imperial Guard sent two junior officers to my home to tell me to take the sword to his yamen. So I went with those two men to the Private Hall. They went inside the Hall, and I thought that the Marshal was inside there. Those men had contrived this plot to injure me, and I hope that you, the benevolent official, will give me justice."
The Prefect listened to Lin Chong's statement, and then gave instructions for a dispatch to be prepared for the Marshal of the Imperial Guard. He gave instructions for the cangue and handcuffs to be placed on Lin Chong who was to be taken to the prison. Lin Chong's family supplied him with food and money while he was in prison. Lin Chong's father-in-law bribed many court officials to try to arrange matters for him. Fortunately in the court was a secretary named Sun Ding, who was a very honest and exceedingly good man, and was always trying to help people in distress. Because of his character everybody called him "Sun, the Buddha." He understood the case, and spoke to the Prefect several times about it. He said, "I think this case has been brought up simply to injure Lin Chong, and it would be better for you to show mercy to him."
The Prefect said, "He has committed a grave offence and the Marshal of the Imperial Guard has instructed me to question him as to (1) why he had a sword in his hand; (2) why he entered the Private Hall; (3) why he intended to kill the Marshal. How can I help him?"
Sun Ding spoke sarcastically, "This yamen does not receive its authority from the Imperial Court but evidently from the Marshal of the Imperial Guard."
"Nonsense!" said the Prefect.
Sun Ding said, "Does not everybody know that the Marshal Gao Qiu, uses his great influence to oppress people? and, moreover, those under him do the same thing? And if a man unintentionally breaks the least fraction of the law, Gao sends him here under arrest. If he wants him killed he is killed, if he wants him hacked to pieces that is done. So does it not appear that this yamen belongs to him?"
The Prefect said, "Assuming that what you say is correct how could this case of Lin Chong be settled in any other way?"
Sun Ding said, "According to Lin Chong's evidence he is quite innocent but the difficulty is that we cannot arrest the two junior officers. Now you had better tell him to admit that he ought not to have unintentionally entered the Private Hall with his sword in his belt. And having branded him you can banish him to a distant military outpost."
Prefect Teng thought the plan a good one, and decided to go to see Marshal Gao Qiu, and repeat to him the evidence of Lin Chong. Marshal Gao was aware of the weakness of his case, and had to agree to the sentence of the Prefect. Straightway he returned to the judgment hall and gave an order for the cangue to be taken off Lin Chong, and that he was to receive twenty blows on his back. He then told the workman who branded prisoners to brand Lin Chong on his cheek. He was to be banished to the prison at Cangzhou.

A cangue was at once made weighing ten pounds with round corners, and strips of metal nailed to it, and with a paper pasted on to seal the two halves together. A document giving particulars of the case was then handed to two constables who were to escort the prisoner to Cangzhou. The two men were named Dong Chao and Xue Ba, and as soon as they got the official documents they left the yamen.

At the gate of the yamen a large number of neighbours with Drill Instructor Zhang (Lin Chong's father-in-law) were assembled and they conducted Lin Chong and the two constables to a wine shop near the Zhou Bridge where they all sat down.

Lin Chong said, "Fortunately I have been helped by the secretary Sun, and although I was beaten with a bamboo yet I can walk without pain."

Drill Instructor Zhang told the waiters to bring wine and fruit, and treat the two constables well. After they had drunk a few cups of wine Drill Instructor Zhang took out some silver, and presented it to the constables.

Lin Chong raising his handcuffed hands to his father-in-law said, "Please listen to what I say. This year I have had misfortunes, and since I offended Master Gao I have been wrongly prosecuted. Today I wish to speak to you, and request your attention. I am indebted to you for your kindness. Three years ago you gave me your daughter, and since that time we have had no quarrels. Although she has not had any children, yet we have not had the least bit of dispute about it. But now this calamity has resulted in me being banished to Cangzhou, and now even my life is uncertain. My wife remains at home but I shall always be thinking of her. I am very much afraid that Master Gao will press his suit very strongly. As my wife is quite young I do not want to stand in her way of being happy. It is my own will, not influenced by any outside pressure at all. Now in the presence of all my neighbours I will write a bill of divorcement so that she may marry another husband as she will and there will be no dispute. In this way I shall be contented, and she will avoid any injury from Master Gao."

Drill Instructor Zhang said, "My worthy son-in-law! What are you talking about? You have been unlucky, and have encountered a calamity which was arranged by your enemy. You are going to Cangzhou today to avoid the coming trouble. When heaven have pity on you, and allow you to come back, you will be reunited to your wife. At my home there is plenty of money, and your wife, and her maid Jin Er, can both live at my home and whether they are there for three or five years I will look after them. So Master Gao shall not get the opportunity to see your wife. I will be responsible for this, and you need not worry about it. While you are in the prison at Cangzhou I will write you letters, and send you clothes frequently. You can go with a contented mind, and must not be anxious."

Lin Chong replied, "I am extremely grateful for your kindness. But I cannot rid myself of concern about my wife in the present state and any delay would only be a sorrow to each of us. I hope you will accept my wishes, and then I shall die with a peaceful mind."

Drill Instructor Zhang was unwilling to agree to do this. All the neighbours who were there also said that it could not be done.

Lin Chong said, "If you will not do as I wish I swear on my oath that when I return from prison I shall not live with my wife."

Drill Instructor Zhang said, "As it is that way then even if you write down such a wish I shall certainly not take your wife, and marry her to another man. He then told the waiter to buy a sheet of paper and then find a man who could write a letter. Upon the arrival ot the letter writer Lin Chong dictated the following:

"I, Drill Instructor Lin Chong of the Imperial Guards of Eastern Capital, am banished to Cangzhou because I have committed a serious crime, and as it is uncertain whether I shall die there or not I write this letter to express my willingness to give my young wife (family name Zhang) full liberty to marry a second husband, so that there shall be no dispute about it afterwards. This is certainly my wish, and there shall be no obstacle in the way of this being done. I have therefore written this document so that hereafter it may be proof of my desire."

Lin Chong saw that the date had been inserted, and then affixed his seal, and impressed his fingerprint on the document. When this had been completed he went to hand the document to Drill Instructor Zhang but the former's wife just then arrived, bewailing loudly. With her was the maidservant Jin Er who was carrying a bundle of clothes. Lin Chong rose to receive her, and said, "Wife, I have something to tell you which I have already imparted to your father. I have had to submit to a serious injustice. I have to go to Cangzhou, and whether I shall survive is uncertain. I am very much afraid that this will spoil the days of your youth and therefore I have signed this document expressing my fervent hope that you will not wait for my return but if there is a suitable man you will marry him, and not allow me to stand in the way of such a virtuous wife."

His wife wept upon hearing this and said, "Husband, I have not the slightest stain on my character, so why do you dismiss me in this way?"

"Wife, I have the best of intentions but I am afraid that they cannot be realized, and I do not want to deceive you."

Drill Instructor Zhang said, "My daughter, be contented. Although my son-in-law wants to arrange your affairs in this way I will promise you that I shall not press you to remarry. If we do this business in the way suggested he will depart with a contented mind, and if he does not return then I will provide for you at my home for the remainder of your life so that you can maintain your chastity."

His daughter listened to this and continued to sob but when she saw the sealed document she fell down in a faint. Lin Chong and Zhang raised her up, and after a long time she regained consciousness but still continued to weep.

Lin Chong took the document, and handed it to Zhang. The wives of the neighbours had now arrived, and they gave advice to Lin Chong's wife, and supported her back to her home.

Drill Instructor Zhang bade farewell to Lin Chong; saying, "Now be carefree and proceed on your journey, and try to come back as soon as possible. Tomorrow I will take your wife to my home, and provide for her, and she can wait there until you are reunited. You go now, and do not worry about her. And if there is anybody coming here, never fail to send a letter by that person."

Lin Chong rose and expressed his thanks. He then saluted Zhang and all the neighbours, shouldered his bundle, and departed in the company of the two constables. Inspector Zhang and the neighbours went back to their homes, and we will not say anything more about them.

The two constables took Lin Chong to the jail and there left him for the night. They then went to their homes, to get their baggage. While one of them named Dong Chao was packing up his bundle, a waiter from a wine shop in the same alley came, and said to him, "There is an official in our wine shop who wishes to speak to you."

Dong Chao asked who he was, and the waiter replied that he did not know him. The man, he said, had simply asked him to invite him.

Dong Chao went with the waiter to the inn, and there he saw a man sitting in a small room with the character "Wan" on his turban, wearing a short black crape coat, and a pair of black shoes with white socks. When he saw Dong Chao he immediately saluted with folded hands, and asked the constable to be seated.

Dong Chao said, "I have never had the pleasure of knowing you, and do not know what business you have for me."

"Sit down, and you will soon know about that."

Dong Chao sat down opposite the official, and the waiter laid upon the table cups and wine, vegetables and fruits.

The official asked, "Where does Xue Ba, the other constable, live?"

Dong Chao said, "He lives in the alley over there."

The official then told the waiter to go and bring Xue Ba. The waiter went off, and very soon Xue Ba arrived.

Dong Chao said, "This official has something to say to us."

Xue Ba said, "I dare not ask for his name."

The official said, "You will soon find that out. Please drink some wine."

The three men sat down, and very soon the waiter brought them some warm wine. After they had drunk a few cups of wine the official took ten taels of silver out of his sleeve, and placed them on the table. He said, "I have a little troublesome business for you two men to do, and you can have five taels each."

The men said, "We have not seen you before, so why do you offer us money?"

"Are you not going to Cangzhou?" asked the official.

Dong Chao said, "We have received an order from the yamen to escort a prisoner, Lin Chong, to Cangzhou."

"That being the case, I shall have to trouble you. I am Lu Qian, the confidential steward in the family of Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard."

Dong Chao and Xue Ba made many salutations and said, "We should not be sitting at the same table with you."

Lu Qian said, "Are you two men aware that Lin Chong has offended the Marshal of the Imperial Guard? You must now observe the order of the Marshal. He told me to give you these ten taels of silver, and say that you are not to take Lin Chong very far away. When you reach some quiet deserted spot you must kill Lin Chong, and then get an official near there to give you a report about his death. If any questions are raised when you get to Kaifeng you will be free from blame as the Marshal will deal with the matter himself."

Dong Chao said, "I am afraid that we cannot do that. Our order from the Prefect of Kaifeng says that we must escort the prisoner, and says nothing about killing him. Moreover, I am not very old, so how can we do such a vile thing? We are also afraid that we should be blamed if anybody got to know of the affair."

Xue Ba said, "Old Dong, you just listen to me. You must not forget that even though Marshal Gao Qiu, condemns us both to death we have to obey him. Moreover he has sent this official to give us this money. Let us talk no more about it but just divide the money. When we have done the deed Marshal Gao will be grateful to us, and will find us something to do. There is a wild deserted forest—let us dispatch him there." Xue Ba took his part of the silver and then said, "We shall do this after we have travelled not less than fifty li or not more than one hundred li."

Lu Qian was much pleased at this and said, "That will be very well. Don't forget that after you have murdered Lin Chong you must tear off the skin of his face, bearing the brand mark, and bring it back as an evidence that you have killed him." He also promised to give them an extra ten taels of silver when they returned. He would wait anxiously for their report, and he also urged them to get the matter done without delay.

During the Song Dynasty it was the practice to brand criminals on their faces when they were sentenced to banishment. But as the branding was disgustful to the people, it was called, "Fixing Golden Seals."

The three men finished their wine, and then separated. Lu Qian paid for the wine.

Dong Chao and Xue Ba divided the bribe between them, and took the money to their homes. There each man made up a bundle of necessary things for his journey, and carried this on a stick over his shoulder. They got Lin Chong out of the jail, and escorted him out of the city. That day they travelled about ten li before they stopped for the night.

During the Song Dynasty it was a rule that all inns were to give shelter to an escort in charge of criminals without charging for the room but would receive payment for food or wine taken.

The next day the three men rose early, and after breakfast they started out again on the road to Cangzhou. It was the sixth lunar month, and the weather was very hot. Previously Lin Chong had felt no pain from the blows he had got at Kaifeng but under the heat of the day he now felt pains, and limped along slowly.

Xue Ba said, "You do not seem to realize that we have to go about seven hundred li to Cangzhou, and that it will take a very long time to get there if you walk like this."

Lin Chong said, "While I was at Kaifeng I did not feel uncomfortable but, owing to the hot weather I now feel pains resulting from being beaten with the bamboo the day before yesterday. I beg you to walk a little slower."

Dong Chao said, "You can walk slower, and take no notice of what we say."

Xue Ba resented this kind of talk, and muttered to himself as he walked along. "We two are unlucky as we meet such a demon as this prisoner."

It was getting late in the evening when they got to an inn. When they got inside they all three took off their bundles. Lin Chong did not wait for the two constables to speak but taking some silver out of his bundle he gave it to waiter, and told him to bring some meat, rice, and wine for dinner. He then asked the two constables to dine with him.

The two constables purchased some more wine, and they gave Lin Chong so much that he became drunk, and lay down on the floor with the cangue still round his neck.

Xue Ba then went, and boiled some water, and when it was extremely hot he poured it into a tub. He then roused Lin Chong, and said to him, "Just wash your feet, and afterwards you will sleep better."

Lin Chong struggled to get up but the cangue prevented him from doing this.

"I will wash your feet for you," said Xue Ba.

Lin Chong would not agree to this but Xue Ba insisted that as they were traveling together they need not be too particular.

Lin Chong did not suspect anything, and therefore put forward his feet that Xue Ba seized and thrust them into the boiling water. Lin Chong yelled with the pain, and quickly withdrew his feet but they had already been scalded, and covered with red blisters. He said that it was awfully painful.

Xue Ba said, "Before this I have seen prisoners waiting upon us but now we have apparently to wait upon a prisoner. We had the best of intentions in telling you to wash your feet but you are so fastidious and would complain that the water was too cold if it was only a little cold and too hot if only a little hot. So we get no thanks for our labour."

Xue Ba continued muttering about this for a long time, and as Lin Chong dared not reply to his remarks he lay down on one side and tried to sleep. The two constables threw the boiling water away, and getting fresh water washed their own feet, and then went to bed. Early the next morning long before any of the people of the inn were out of bed Xue Ba got up, and after washing himself he lit the fire, and cooked some rice. But Lin Chong could neither get up, nor eat his breakfast. Xue Ba seized his stick, and told Lin Chong to get up. Dong Chao seeing the difficulty unloosened a pair of new straw sandals from his belt, and told Lin Chong to put them on.

But Lin Chong seeing the huge blisters on his feet would have preferred to wear his old shoes as being more comfortable but as he could not find them he put on the new straw sandals.

They then paid for the wine they had had, and escorted Lin Chong out of the inn about five A.M. After walking about a li the blisters on Lin Chong's feet, caused by the new straw sandals burst, and the blood oozed out. Walking was extremely painful, and he could not suppress his groans.

Xue Ba abused him, saying; "If you can walk, then walk quickly, and if you don't walk quickly I shall have to use this stick to make you get on."

Lin Chong said, "Have pity on me. I dare not go slow and so delay our journey. But the fact is that my feet are very painful, and I cannot walk quickly."

Dong Chao said, "I will support you a little, and that will make it easier for you to walk." He assisted him in this way for about two li. They then saw in the distance the gloomy, dense forest, called "Yezhu Forest." On the road between the Eastern Capital and Cangzhou, this was well known as the most dangerous place. In the Song Dynasty it often occurred that when somebody owed a grudge to a person the latter was accused, and banished, and then the escort was bribed so as to put him to death when passing through this forest. It is unknown how many innocent people were killed in this way.

On this day when the escort with Lin Chong entered the forest Dong Chao said, "We have been traveling for two hours but have not covered three li. If we keep on like this how can we get to Cangzhou?"

Xue Ba said, "Well, I cannot walk any further, and must have a rest in this forest."

The three men then left the road, and went into the forest where they threw down their bundles. Lin Chong cried out with the pain and fell down.

Dong Chao said to Xue Ba, "I am quite tired so we must rest a while here, and have a sleep before going on."

They then put down their sticks, and lay down at the foot of a tree. After closing their eyes for a short time they got up, and shouted at Lin Chong.

Lin Chong asked, "What is the matter with you?"

"There is no place here where we can lock you up, so we do not care to sleep as you might escape."

Lin Chong replied, "I am a brave man. As I have already been condemned I will never run away."

Xue Ba said, "We do not believe that. In order to feel safe we must tie you up."

"If you want to tie me up, of course I must agree."

Xue Ba thereupon took a rope, and tied Lin Chong to a tree—hands, feet, and the cangue. As soon as he had done this he turned round, picked up his stick and looking at Lin Chong said, "We do not wish to kill you but the fact is that the day before yesterday Lu Qian told us that Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard had given an order that we must kill you at this place. We must also quickly bring to him your brand mark as proof that we have done the deed. So it does not matter how many days we should travel you would eventually be killed. So today we have come here to finish the matter, and to get back as soon as possible. You must not bear resentment against us two as we are only obeying orders. If you think the matter over you will see that it is not our arrangement. A year from today will be the anniversary of your death. We have decided upon today for the deed, and we must return at once to report the matter."

Upon hearing this, Lin Chong burst into tears, and said, "Gentlemen, I have had no grudge against you. So if you two will save my life on this occasion I shall never forget your gracious action."

"We cannot do that, and it is a waste of time to talk about it." So saying the two men took their sticks to hit Lin Chong on the head. How pitiful to see a hero bound up and killed in this way!

On the way to Hell no inn is found
Lin Chong's soul will now be roaming round.

009

Chai Jin comes home, keeps Open House for All Bold Men, offers Hospitality, and finds a guest; Lin Chong Hits with His Cudgel & Defeats Drill Instructor Hong in a Bout with Staves by putting Chong's mastery to the test

Xue Ba raised his staff with both hands to bring it down on Lin Chong's head. But quicker than words can tell, from behind the pine tree came a thunderous roar as a solid iron rod shot forward, intercepted the staff and sent it flying into the sky. Then out leaped a big fat monk.

"I've been listening quite a while," he yelled. Dressed in a black cassock, he was wearing a knife and carried a Buddhist staff which he brandished at the two guards.

Lin Chong, who had just opened his eyes, recognized Lu Zhishen, and he hastily cried: "Brother! Stay your hand. I have something to say!"

Zhishen lowered his iron staff. The guards gaped at him, too frightened to move.

"It's not their doing," said Lin Chong. "Marshal Gao, through Captain Lu Qian, gave them orders to destroy me. How could they refuse? It would be wrong to kill them!"

Unsheathing his knife, Zhishen cut the drill instructor's bonds and helped him to his feet.

"Brother," he said, "I've been worried about you ever since that day we parted, when you bought the sword. After you were convicted, I had no way to rescue you. I heard that you were being exiled to Cangzhou, and I sought you outside Kaifeng Prefecture but in vain. Someone said that you had been locked in a guard house. Then I learned that a waiter had gone to the two guards, saying: 'A gentleman wishes to speak to you in the tavern;' and I became suspicious. I was afraid these oafs would try to harm you along the road, so I followed.

"When these knaves brought you to the inn, I put up there too. I heard them plotting in whispers. When they tricked you and scalded your feet in the boiling water, I wanted to kill them on the spot. But there were too many guests at the inn and I was afraid I couldn't carry it off. I knew the rogues were up to something dirty. I was very worried.

"You set out before dawn at the fifth watch. I hurried ahead to the forest and waited to kill the two wretches here. They intended to harm you, so I ought to destroy them."

"Since you've saved me, brother, there's no need to kill them," urged Lin Chong.

"Scurvy knaves," bellowed Zhishen. "If it weren't for my brother here, I'd pound you both into mincemeat! Only because he asks it, I'll spare your lives." He put his knife away and shouted: "Support my brother, and be quick about it! Come with me!" Taking his staff he set off.

How dared they refuse? "Save us, Instructor Lin," the guards pleaded. They again shouldered their packs and took up their staves. Supporting Lin Chong and carrying his bundle, they followed the monk out of the forest.

After walking three or four //; they saw a little tavern at the entrance to a village. All four went in and sat down. They ordered five or six catties of meat, two jugs of wine and some griddle cakes. The waiter laid the table and served the wine.
"May we presume to inquire," the guards said to Zhishen, "in what monastery you reside, Reverend?"
Zhishen chuckled. "Why do you ask, scoundrels? So that you can tell Marshal Gao how to harm me? Others may fear him, I don't! If I meet that wretch I'll give him three hundred licks of my iron staff!"
The guards dared say no more.
The four finished the meat and wine, got their luggage in order, paid the bill and left the village.
"Where are you planning to go, brother?" asked Lin Chong.
" 'To kill a man you must draw blood, to rescue a man you must see him to safety.' I still don't feel at ease about you, brother. I'm going to escort you all the way to Cangzhou."
The two guards secretly groaned: "Woe! That ruins our scheme! What will we say when we get back?" But they could only continue the journey, docilely obeying the monk's orders.
From then on, they marched when Zhishen wanted to march, and rested when he wanted to rest. How dared they oppose him? In a good mood, he merely cursed them, in a bad, he beat them. Neither of the guards dared say a word for fear of arousing the monk's ire.
After marching two more stages, they hired a cart. Lin Chong rested on it, while the other three walked behind. The guards had guilty consciences and were anxious to preserve their lives, so they tagged along cautiously.
On the road, Zhishen frequently bought wine and meat for Lin Chong, and the guards were permitted to join him. When the party came to an inn, they would retire early and rise late. Of course, the guards lit the fires and did the cooking. Who dared to disobey the monk?
They conferred worriedly in private. "We've become the prisoners and the monk the escort. When we get back, Marshal Gao will surely punish us."
"I've heard that a newly arrived monk has been put in charge of the Great Xiangguo Monastery's vegetable fields," said Xue Ba. "He's called Lu Zhishen. This must be the man. Let's tell the truth when we get back. We'll say that we wanted to finish Lin Chong off in Wild Boar Forest but that the monk rescued him and went with us all the way to Cangzhou. That was why we couldn't do the job. We'll return the ten ounces of gold to Captain Lu Qian. Let him settle accounts with the monk himself! All you and I want is to be clear of the whole thing."
"My feelings exactly," said Dong Chao.
Of their discussion we shall say no more.
To make a long story short, they marched for seventeen or eighteen days, with the monk never relaxing his watch over the two guards. Soon they were only about seventy //from Cangzhou. It was a well-travelled road the rest of the way, with no desolate stretches. After inquiring to make sure of this, Zhishen led the party into a pine grove to rest.
"Brother," he said to Lin Chong, "From here to Cangzhou is not far. There are plenty of people on the road and no deserted places. I've already checked on it. I'll part with you here. Some day we'll meet again."
"Go back, brother. Let my father-in-law know I'm all right," said Lin Chong. "If I live, I'll repay you for your gracious protection in full."
Zhishen took out a score or more ounces of silver and gave them to Lin Chong, then handed two or three ounces to the guards.
"Scurvy knaves! Originally I was going to cut your heads off along the road. Out of courtesy to my brother I've spared your paltry lives. The journey is nearly over. Don't get any evil ideas!"
"Would we dare? It was all Marshal Gao's doing," they replied, and accepted the silver.
As they turned to leave, Zhishen glared and shouted: "Wretches! Are your heads harder than this pine tree?"
"We humble servants have heads only of the flesh and skin our parents gave us, wrapped around a few bones."
Zhishen raised his iron staff and struck the tree a mighty blow, cutting a gash two inches deep. The pine folded over neatly and fell.
"Scurvy knaves," roared the monk. "If you get any wrong ideas, I'll clout your heads like I did this pine!"
Dragging his iron staff and swinging his other arm, Zhishen walked off, calling: "Take care of yourself, brother."
The two guards stuck out their tongues in astonishment. It was some time before they remembered to retract them.
"Let's go, good officers," said Lin Chong.
"Terrific," exclaimed the guards. "With one blow he snaps a tree in half!"
"That's nothing," said Lin Chong. "Back in the monastery, he pulled a willow tree up by the roots!"
The two guards wagged their heads. This confirmed their guess about the monk's identity.
Leaving the grove, the three continued walking until noon. Down the highway they observed a tavern. They entered, and Lin Chong invited the guards to sit at the head of the table. Dong and Xue relaxed for the first time that day.
The tavern contained several tables, and the four or five waiters were busy rushing from one to another serving food and drink. Lin Chong and the guards sat for nearly an hour but no one came to take their order.
Finally, Lin Chong pounded on the table and shouted impatiently: "Ho, tavern keeper, how dare you abuse a customer? You see that I'm a prisoner, so you ignore me! I can pay for what we eat. What's the meaning of this?"
"You don't understand," said the tavern keeper. "My intentions were good."
"You don't sell me wine or meat. What's good-intentioned about that?"
"You don't understand. In our village there's a wealthy man called Chai Jin, known in these parts as Lord Chai. In the fraternity of bold men, all address him as Small Whirlwind. He's descendant of the Later Zhou Dynasty royal family. When the last Later Zhou emperor surrendered his throne, the first Song emperor bestowed on Chai's ancestors a 'Wrought Iron Pledge.' Since then, no one has dared to molest his family.
"Chai Jin makes a practice of welcoming all bold men. He's always supporting forty or fifty of them in his home. He's left instructions with us at the tavern: 'Tell any prisoner on route to exile to come to my manor. I will help him with money.' If I sold you meat and drink today and you ate until you were red in the face, he would say that you have money and don't need his help. My intentions were good."
Lin Chong turned to the guards. "When I was giving drill instruction to the soldiers in the Eastern Capital, I often heard military men speak of Lord Chai. So this is where he comes from. Why don't we pay him a call?"
Xue Ba and Dong Chao thought it over, then said: "Since we're already here, what have we got to lose?"
They collected their luggage and asked the tavern keeper: "Where is Lord Chai's manor? We want to visit him."
"Go straight ahead for about three //until you cross a big stone bridge. One or two turns, and you'll see a large estate. That's it."
Lin Chong and the guards thanked the tavern keeper and set out. After marching about three //; sure enough, they came to a big stone bridge. They crossed to the other side where they found a smooth broad road. In the distance, amid many green willows, they could see the outlines of a manor. A wide moat, flowing around the four sides, was fringed on both banks by large weeping willows. Through the trees, the white outer wall of the manor was faintly visible.
After a few more turns down the road, they neared the entrance. Four or five vassals were sitting on a plank bridge, enjoying the cool breeze. Lin Chong and the guards approached and bowed to the vassals. The drill instructor asked: "Could I trouble you to report to Lord Chai that a prisoner named Lin, on his way to exile from the capital, requests to see him?"
"You're out of luck," said the vassals. "If His Lordship were at home, you'd receive wine and food and money. But he left this morning to go hunting."
"When will he return?"
"Hard to say. Probably he's resting at the eastern manor but maybe not. We can't tell you for sure."
"That's my misfortune. I won't be able to meet him. Let's go back," said Lin Chong to the guards.
The three men took leave of the vassals and returned along the same road on which they had come. Lin Chong felt very depressed.
They walked more than half a //; Far off they saw a column of horsemen dash out of a grove and come galloping in the direction of the estate. On a snow-white steed with a curly mane rode a noble-looking gentleman. He had the brows of a dragon and the eyes of a phoenix, gleaming white teeth and ruble red lips. Drooping mustaches framed his mouth, below which was a slim goatee. About thirty-five years of age, he wore a black flowered silk hat with curled-up corners, and was dressed in a figured purple gown with designs embroidered on the chest. Around his waist was a handsome girdle inlaid with precious jade. On his feet were black boots with green stripes and filigreed gold thread. He carried a bow and a quiver of arrows.
The long line of riders raced towards the manor.
"Can that be Lord Chai?" Lin Chong wondered. But he didn't dare to ask.
The young nobleman turned his white horse out of the column and trotted up to Lin Chong.
"Who is this gentleman wearing a cangue?" the nobleman asked.
Lin quickly bowed and replied: "Your humble servant is called Lin Chong, formerly a drill instructor in the Eastern Capital's Imperial Guards. Because I offended Marshal Gao, he invented an excuse to send me to Kaifeng Prefecture and have me sentenced to exile in Cangzhou. We were told at the village tavern that the gallant hero who lives here, Lord Chai, keeps open house for men of talent. But my luck was poor and I was unable to find him."
Leaping from his saddle, the gentleman rushed forward, saying: "Forgive Chai Jin for not having received you fittingly." He fell to his knees on the grass and clasped his hands in salute.
Lin Chong hastily returned the courtesy. The gentleman took him by the hand and led him towards the manor. The vassals saw them coming and pushed wide the gates. Chai Jin led Lin Chong directly to the ceremonial hall, where the two men again exchanged obeisances.
"I have long known of your fame," said Chai Jin, "Who would have thought that today you would come to our humble place. To be able to gaze on your respected countenance is one of the happiest events of my life."
"Your Lordship's name is honoured everywhere. It is revered by all. I never thought that because I was convicted and was passing here on my way to exile I would have the joy of meeting you."
At Chai Jin's insistence, Lin Chong took the chair of honour at the table. Xue Ba and Dong Chao also were seated. The men who had accompanied Chai Jin on the hunt led their horses into the rear compound and retired. Of them we shall say no more.
Chai Jin ordered his vassals to bring wine. Before long they served a platter of meat and one of griddle cakes and a pot of warmed wine. Then came another platter heaped with rice. On top of the rice were ten strings of cash.
"These rustics don't recognize a man of quality," said Chai Jin. "How can they value the drill instructor so lightly? Ho! Take these things back. Bring fine fruit and wine. Slaughter a sheep. Be quick."
"Please, no more, Your Lordship," protested Lin Chong, rising politely. "This is quite enough."
"You mustn't say that. It's a rare privilege to have you here. We can't be remiss in courtesy."
The vassals soon came rushing in with fruit and wine. Chai Jin stood up and handed out three full goblets. Lin Chong thanked him and drained his cup. The two guards also drank.
"Excuse me a moment, Drill Instructor," said Chai Jin.
He took off his bow bag and quiver of arrows, went over to the guards and asked them to down a drink with him. Then he seated himself in the host's chair. Lin Chong occupied the chair of the guest of honour. The two guards sat beside him. All chatted idly for a time of bold adventures and feats of arms.
Before they knew it, the sun had sunk in the west. Wine, food, fruit and delicacies from the sea were set upon the table. Toasting each guest personally, Chai Jin drank three rounds. Then he resumed his seat and called: "Bring the soup."
After the soup was consumed, and six or seven more goblets of wine, a vassal entered and announced: "The teacher has come."
"Good. Invite him to sit with us and meet our guests," said Chai Jin. "Bring another setting."
The new arrival entered and Lin Chong rose to greet him. Cap tilted to one side, chest protruding, the man swaggered into the hall. "He must be His Lordship's arms teacher," thought Lin Chong. Hastily bowing, the drill instructor intoned: "Lin Chong tenders his respects."
Completely ignoring him, the man did not return his salutation. Lin Chong dared not raise his head.
Chai Jin said to the man, whom he called Drill Instructor Hong: "This is Drill Instructor Lin who teaches the art of spears and staves in the Eastern Capital's Imperial Guards. You two should know each other."
Lin Chong immediately dropped to his knees and kowtowed.
Drill Instructor Hong said brusquely: "Don't kowtow. Get up." He himself didn't even bow.
Chai Jin was annoyed. Lin Chong kowtowed twice, then rose and begged Hong to be seated. Without even a pretence of courtesy, the fellow promptly took the guest of honour's chair. Chai Jin was quite displeased. Lin Chong slipped into the next seat. The two guards sat down beside him.
"Why is Your Lordship so courteous to an exiled man?" Drill Instructor Hong asked.
"This gentleman is not an ordinary person. He's a drill instructor in the Mighty Imperial Guards. How can you regard him lightly, Teacher?"
"Because Your Lordship is fond of feats of arms, these exiled men are always coming to enjoy your bounty. Anyone who says: 'I'm a drill instructor in spears and staves,' can call at the manor and get food and drink and money and rice! Your Lordship is too gullible."
Lin Chong said nothing but Chai Jin retorted: "It's difficult to tell from appearances. You shouldn't underestimate him."
Stung by this last remark, Hong leaped to his feet. "I don't believe him. If he dares to take me on in a bout with staves, then I'll admit he's a genuine drill instructor!"
Chai Jin laughed. "Not a bad idea. Drill Instructor Lin, what do you say?"
"Your humble servant couldn't presume to such a thing," said Lin Chong.
Hong thought to himself: "He doesn't know how to fight, that's sure. He's afraid." And so he insisted that Lin Chong accept his challenge.
Chai Jin not only wanted to see an exhibition of Lin's skill, he wanted him to beat Hong and shut the oaf's mouth. "Bring wine," he called. "We'll drink first. The match can wait till the moon is high."
By the time they had consumed another six or seven rounds, the moon had risen and was shining in with such brilliance that the hall was as bright as day. Chai Jin stood up and said: "Drill Instructors, please give us a bout."
Lin Chong saw that Hong was teaching Chai Jin to drill with the cudgels, so he thought that Chai Jin would not like it if he knocked his teacher down.
Observing Lin Chong's hesitation, Chai Jin said: "Instructor Hong has not been here long either. No one has taken him on. Please don't refuse, Master Lin. I am most eager to see the skill of you two instructors." Chai Jin said this to indicate that Lin need have no fears of offending him, and that he should not hold back.
Lin Chong at last felt reassured.
"Come on, come on," cried Hong, rising. "I'll give you a bout with staves!"
Everyone surged out of the hall into the courtyard. Vassals brought a bundle of wooden staves and laid them on the ground. Hong removed his outer robe and tied up his skirts. Selecting a staff, he struck a fighting pose.
"Come on, come on," he urged.
"Instructor Lin," said Chai Jin, "please start the bout."
"Don't laugh at my clumsiness, Your Lordship," Lin Chong begged. He chose a staff and said to Hong: "Master, please teach me."
Hong glared as if wanting to swallow him down in one gulp. Lin Chong advanced holding the staff extended in both hands. Hong rapped his staff sharply on the ground and rushed at Lin.
After the two drill instructors had fought four or five rounds in the bright moonlight, Lin Chong leaped out of the combat circle. "Halt the bout," he cried.
"Why won't you show us your skill, Instructor?" queried Chai Jin.
"I've lost," said Lin.
"But you haven't fought to a conclusion. How can you say you've lost?"
"If I have to fight with this cangue around my neck, I may just as well consider myself defeated."
"How thoughtless of me," Chai Jin laughed. "That can be remedied easily enough."
He directed his vassals to fetch ten ounces of silver. When the money was brought he said to the two guards: "May I trouble you to take Lin Chong's cangue off temporarily? If there's any question raised about this when you arrive at the Cangzhou Prison, I will bear all responsibility. Divide these ten ounces between you."
Chai Jin looked so lofty and dignified that the guards didn't dare refuse. They wanted to stay in Chai's good graces and wanted the silver as well. Since there was no danger of Lin Chong running away, Xue Ba removed the wooden collar from his neck.
"Now the two masters can continue their match," said Chai Jin joyfully.
Because Lin's tactics had been cautious, Hong regarded him with scorn. Raising his staff, he prepared to resume combat.
"Just a moment," Chai Jin exclaimed. He ordered his vassals to bring an ingot of silver weighing twenty-five ounces. In no time at all, the ingot was produced.
"A match between you two instructors is no ordinary contest," said Chai Jin. "Whoever wins gets this silver as a prize." He was hoping in this way to encourage Lin Chong to display his skill. Deliberately, he tossed the ingot on the ground.
Hong was very annoyed that Lin Chong had come, and he coveted the big piece of silver. What's more, he was worried that a defeat would lower his prestige. Vigorously, he struck a fighting pose, then executed an opening flourish called "lifting the torch to sear the heavens."
"His Lordship wants me to defeat him," thought Lin Chong. First holding his staff level, he performed a move called "separating the grass to find the snake."
"Come on, come on," yelled Hong.

He swung his staff downwards. Lin dodged back. Hong pressed forward another pace. Raising his staff, he again chopped down. Lin Chong saw that he was off balance and brought his staff sweeping upwards from the ground. Hong had no time to recover. He tried to twist out of the way but Lin's staff cracked him hard on the shin bones. Hong dropped his staff and fell heavily.
Delighted, Chai Jin called for wine and presented Lin Chong with a congratulatory goblet. The watchers all laughed. Hong struggled but was unable to rise to his feet. Grinning vassals helped him up. Hong, shamefaced, limped away and left the manor.
Chai took Lin Chong by the hand and led him into the rear hall and feasted him with wine. He directed vassals to present Lin with the prize. Lin tried to refuse but his host insisted, and finally he was compelled to accept.
Chai Jin kept Lin Chong at the manor for several days, entertaining him daily with excellent wines and delicious food. After another six or seven days, since the guards were pressing Lin to leave, Chai gave him a farewell banquet. He also wrote two letters which he handed to the drill instructor.
"The prefect of Cangzhou is a good friend of mine," he said, "I'm also on intimate terms with both the warden and head keeper of the garrison prison. Give these letters to them and they'll be sure to treat you well."
He presented Lin Chong with another ingot of twenty-five ounces of silver, and bestowed five ounces on the two guards. They feasted all night.
Early the next morning, after breakfast, Chai Jin directed a few vassals to go with them and carry their luggage. The cangue was again fastened around Lin Chong's neck. Chai Jin accompanied the party to the manor gate.
"I will send someone with winter clothing for you in a few days," he said to Lin Chong in parting.
"I don't know how to express my gratitude to Your Lordship," said Lin Chong. The guards also thanked Chai Jin, then the three departed for Cangzhou. They arrived about noon and sent the luggage bearers back. The guards went directly to the prefecture and presented their order of exile to an official, who immediately brought Lin Chong before the prefect. Accepting custody of the drill instructor, the prefect issued a receipt and wrote out an order committing Lin Chong to prison. The guards bade Lin farewell and departed for the Eastern Capital. Of them we shall say no more.
We'll tell of Lin Chong after he was escorted to the prison. He was placed in a room by himself and directed to await registration. The other prisoners came to see him.
"The warden and the head keeper here are very bad," they said. "They only want to extort money. If you can bribe them, they treat you well. If you have no money, they throw you in the dungeon where you pray for life and long for death, both in vain! If their palms are greased, you can avoid the hundred blows they give all new prisoners to beat discipline into them. You need only say you're ill and the matter will be postponed indefinitely. Otherwise, it's a hundred strokes that will leave you more dead than alive."
"It's good of you brothers to advise me. If I were to give money, how much would be enough?"
"To do it properly, five ounces of silver for the warden and five for the head keeper would be just about right."
As they were talking, the head keeper came over and asked: "Which one of you is the new arrival?"
Lin Chong stepped forward. "I am that humble person." When the head keeper saw that the drill instructor failed to produce any money, his face darkened.
Shaking his finger at Lin, he shouted: "You wretched exile! How dare you not bow and hail me respectfully when I enter? I've heard all about your carryings-on in Kaifeng! Where do you get the gall to behave so insolently in my presence? I can read from the lines on your face that you're destined for nothing but hunger! You'll never rise in the world! What you need is plenty of beatings, you stubborn jail-bird! For better or worse, you're in my hands now, you felonious wretch! I'll pulverize your bones and pound your flesh to jelly soon enough!"
The keeper cursed vigorously while Lin Chong stood with bowed head. At this storm of invective, the other prisoners fled.
Lin Chong waited until the head keeper had blown off most of his steam, then took out five ounces of silver and handed them to him with a smile. "A trifling gift, brother. Please don't despise it."
"Is this for me and the warden both?"
"Just for you, brother. In addition, here's another ten ounces for the warden. I must trouble you to deliver them to him."
The head keeper grinned broadly. "Drill Instructor Lin, I've heard of your good name before. You're truly a splendid fellow. Marshal Gao has framed you, no doubt about it. Although, for the time being, you have to suffer this inconvenience, I'm sure you'll eventually make your mark. A man with your reputation and talents never waits around idly for long! One of these days you'll be a big official."
Lin Chong laughed. "I'm entirely dependent on your kindness."
"You can rest assured," said the head keeper.
Giving him Chai Jin's letters, Lin Chong said: "May I trouble you to deliver these?"
"Letters from Lord Chai? Then you've nothing to worry about. They're worth an ingot of gold each! I'll deliver them now. In a little while, the warden will send for you to be registered. When he orders the hundred blows, say that you were ill during your journey and that you still haven't recovered. I'll speak up for you. We must make it look genuine."
"Many thanks."
The head keeper took the silver and the letters and departed, leaving Lin Chong alone in the room. The drill instructor sighed. " 'With money you can reach even the gods.' A bitter truth indeed."
To the warden, the head keeper gave only the five ounces which Lin Chong had originally presented to him. "Lin Chong is an excellent man," he confided. "Here is a letter of introduction from Lord Chai. It seems that Marshal Gao had him exiled on a trumped-up charge. There's nothing much to the whole thing ..."
"Since Lord Chai has sent us this letter," said the warden, "we must look after him." He directed that Lin Chong be summoned.
To get back to Lin Chong. He was brooding alone in his room when a turnkey shouted: "The warden orders that new prisoner Lin Chong report to the warden's hall to be registered."
Lin Chong went directly to the hall.
"You are a new prisoner," said the warden. "The first emperor of Song has bequeathed to us the ancient regulation: 'One hundred blows must be administered to every prisoner newly sent into exile.' Guards! Get him ready!"
"Your humble servant caught a bad cold during his journey here, and still hasn't recovered," said Lin Chong. "I request that the beating be postponed."
"He's not at all well," said the head keeper. "Please have pity on him."
"Since the symptoms of his illness are still evident, perhaps we can put this off for the time being," said the warden. "We can beat him when he regains his health."
"Today, the time is up of that prisoner who has been taking care of the garrison prison temple. Why not let Lin Chong replace him," suggested the head keeper.
The warden promptly wrote out an order and the head keeper accompanied Lin Chong back to his room, where he collected his belongings, then led him to the temple.
"I'm being very considerate to you, Drill Instructor Lin, getting you this job," said the head keeper. "It's the easiest work in the garrison prison. All you have to do is burn incense and sweep the floor once in the morning and once again in the evening. You'll soon see that we don't let up on other prisoners from morning till night. As for those without money, we throw them into the dungeon where they pray for life and long for death, both in vain."
"Thanks for your protection," said Lin Chong. He gave the head keeper another few ounces of silver. "There's one more matter I must trouble you about, brother. Could you have this cangue taken from my neck?"
"Just leave it to me," said the head keeper as he tucked the money away.
He hurried to the warden and relayed the plea. The cangue was removed. From then on, Lin Chong slept and ate in the temple. Everyday, he did nothing except burn incense and sweep the floor. Before he knew it, forty or fifty days had gone by. The warden and the head keeper, having been bribed, were always very cordial. He was left free to come and go as he pleased, with no restrictions. Lord Chai sent a man with winter clothing and other gifts. All the prisoners became recipients of Lin Chong's charity. To make a long story short, one day around noon as winter was drawing near, Lin Chong was strolling outside the garrison gates. Suddenly, he heard someone behind him call: "Drill Instructor Lin, what are you doing here?" Lin Chong turned around and looked. And because of seeing the man who hailed him: Fire and flames nearly put an end to his life. In the wind and snow he narrowly escaped suffering mortal wounds.

And now, just as Xue Ba lifted his staff in both hands and was about to split open Lin Chong's skull — it's slow in the telling but happens in a flash — just as Xue Ba's stick was poised to come down, I say, there was a sound like thunder from behind a pine tree and out shot a Buddhist staff of steel which, clashing with the guard's stick, sent it flying into the clouds. And behind the staff, out leapt an enormous monk! "I was right here in the wood and I've been listening to you for a long time," he roared.
The two guards stared at the monk. He wore a robe of rough black cotton, and was furnished with a sword. He also brandished a staff, to which he was about to give employment by applying it to the two guards. Lin Chong opened his eyes and in a flash recognized Lu Zhishen. "Master," he said hurriedly, "stay your hand. Hear what I have to say first."
Zhishen forthwith arrested his stroke. The two guards stood there dumbfounded, unable to stir hand or foot. "Don't blame them," Lin Chong said. "It's all because of the Marshal, who sent Lieutenant Lu to give them their orders; he told them to murder me, so how could they disobey? It would be an injustice to kill them."
Zhishen drew his sword and cut Lin Chong's bonds. Then, helping him up, he said: "Brother, I was worried about you, after I left you that day when you bought the sword. But when you were sentenced, there seemed to be no way to save you. Then I heard you had been exiled to Cangzhou. I went to the court-house, to try and catch you on the way out but I missed you. Some one said you were in the lock-up. Then I heard the waiter telling these two there was a gentleman at the wineshop who wanted to talk to them, and that made me suspicious. Better keep you in view, I thought to myself. I was afraid these villains might do something to you on the journey, so I decided to follow. I watched the buggers take you into that inn, so I lodged there too. That night I heard them scheming and conniving. I saw them scald your foot in the bath. I would have killed the swine right away but there were too many people staying at the inn and I was afraid I might be stopped. But knowing they were up to no good, I was even more determined not to let you out of my sight. When you left before dawn this morning, I hurried on ahead to this wood, where I reckoned to settle with these two bastards. Since they were planning to do you in here, it seems appropriate to kill them."
"Now that you've saved me," Lin Chong said, "please spare them."
"Do you hear that, you two?" Zhishen roared. "If it wasn't for my friend here, I'd make you into mincemeat. It's purely out of consideration for him that I let you off with your lives!" Sheathing his sword, he yelled, "Give my brother a hand and follow me." He led the way, swinging his staff. The two guards had no mind to answer back. Their only thought was to implore Lin Chong to protect them. They shouldered their packs again, picked up their staves, and helped Lin Chong up. They even carried his pack for him.
Emerging from the wood, they travelled another mile or so till they came to a very small inn at the entrance to a village:
It was a cosy place, agreeably situated between the high road and the village brook, sheltered by willows and an orchard of peach trees, and brightened by patches of mallow and pomegranate. Beyond the gates stretched fields of barley and hemp, and in front there was a lily pond. The pennant fluttered gaily in the breeze and an unpretentious awning gave protection from the sun. By the wall cool earthenware jars held the village's new fermentation, while on the counter an unstoppered china bottle gave off the sweet scent of wine. A white-haired village elder was washing his plough and a fresh-faced country girl smilingly tended the stove.
Entering, they seated themselves and told the waiter to bring five or six catties of meat, two jugs of wine and some pancakes. The waiter set the things on the table and served the wine. "May we presume to ask what temple you are from, Your Reverence?" the two guards asked Zhishen.
"Why are you two buggers so inquisitive?" he said. "Don't tell me you're thinking to make trouble for me with Gao-the-Ball? Well other people may be scared of him but I'm not. If ever I run into that bastard, he'll get three hundred of the best from my monk's staff." After this the two guards naturally didn't open their mouths again.
After eating and drinking, they collected their things, settled the bill and left the inn. Lin Chong asked Zhishen: "Master, where are you going now?"
"If you're going to kill a man, better be prepared for blood; if you rescue someone, better see it through to the end," Zhishen said. "I'm still worried about you, I shall see you safely to Cangzhou."
"Bloody hell!" the two guards said under their breath when they heard this, "that really puts the lid on it. What are we going to say when we get back? Still, there's nothing for it, we'll just have to go ahead and do what he says." Well, as the poem says:

Shun all wicked plots, that bring evil out in the daytime,
Hold fast to manly virtue and despise the lure of gold,
Fear not the longest journey, the endless weary grind:
Suffering's nothing more than an idea in the mind.

From now on Zhishen dictated their progress: they went forward or rested according to his command, there was no arguing with him. At best the two guards got the rough edge of his tongue, at worst, blows. They kept their mouths shut, terrified of awakening the monk's ire. After two days' travel, a cart was procured and Lin Chong rode in state, while the other three followed behind. No matter what evil designs they might have, the guards knew they had to be circumspect if they hoped to stay alive. Along the way Zhishen bought wine and meat with which to regale Lin Chong, and the guards had their share. When they found an inn they rested early and set out late. Even if it was always the guards who cooked, they didn't protest! But they continued their confabulations: "This monk has turned us into the prisoners now, we're bound to be in trouble with Marshal Gao when we get back." Xue Ba said, "I've heard stories about a new custodian at that vegetable garden belonging to the Xiangguo Temple. He's called Lu Zhishen, this must be him. When we get back we'll tell the truth, we'll say that when we were about to finish the prisoner off in Wild Boar Wood, we were prevented by this monk, who insisted on accompanying us all the way to Cangzhou and that's why we couldn't do it. We'll offer to return the ten taels of gold, and let Lieutenant Lu look for the monk and deal with him himself. You and I, we just want to keep out of all this."
"You're dead right we do," Dong Chao said.
We say no more of their discussions.
To cut a long story short, they travelled seventeen or eighteen more days, during which Zhishen never let them out of his sight. Finally they were only another twenty miles or so from Cangzhou. The remaining way was populated and passed through no solitary regions. Having verified this fact, Zhishen called a halt in a little pinewood. "Brother," he said to Lin Chong, "we're not far from Cangzhou now. The road ahead is well populated, there are no lonely spots, I've already checked up on that. The time has come for us to part but we'll meet again another day."
"When you return, Master," Lin Chong said, "please tell my father-in-law I am safe. I owe you my life, and if I live I will repay you."
Zhishen took out some twenty taels of silver which he gave to Lin Chong, and a further two or three taels for the guards, whom he addressed as follows: "Listen here, you two. I had intended to cut your heads off but for the sake of my friend here I spared your lives. You haven't got much further to go now. Just make sure you don't get up to anything."
"We wouldn't dream of it," they said. "It was only because we were under orders from the Marshal." They took the silver. As they were about to leave, Zhishen fixed his eye on them again and said: "Are your heads as hard as this pine tree?"
They replied: "Our heads are such as our parents gave us, just skin and flesh and a little bit of bone."
Zhishen whirled his staff and struck the pine tree, cutting right into the trunk a good two inches and causing it to come crashing down. "Take good note," he roared. "Any evil scheming and I'll treat your heads the same as that pine tree!" Then, swinging one arm and trailing his staff he took himself off but not before calling out to Lin Chong "Take good care, brother!"
For a long time Dong and Xue stood gazing after him open-mouthed. Finally Lin Chong said, "Come, let's get going."
"What a monk!" the two guards said. "With one blow he can fell a tree."
"That's nothing," Lin Chong said. "In the garden of the Xiangguo Temple he pulled up a whole willow tree by the roots."
The two guards nodded to themselves; this confirmed their suspicions.
Emerging from the pine forest, the three marched till noon, when they descried an inn beside the road.
When they entered, Lin Chong made Dong and Xue take the place of honour. At last the two guards found themselves able to relax!
There were several tables and the three or four waiters were busily rushing backwards and forwards serving wine. Lin Chong and his guards sat for an age but no one came to take their order. Finally Lin Chong lost patience. He struck the table and cried: "Landlord! Have you no manners here? You seem to think just because I'm a convict you can ignore me. I shall certainly pay for what I take, so you've no excuse!"
The landlord said: "You don't understand; it's for your own good."
"What are you talking about? You refuse to sell me wine and food for my own good?"
"There's this rich landowner, see, in the village here. He's called Chai, Chai Jin. Most people call him the Governor. Or 'The Little Whirlwind', that's what the rivers and lakes lot call him. He's a descendant of the royal family of Later Zhou. Back in the time when Emperor Tai Zu came to the throne at Chenqiao, his ancestors earned themselves a cast-iron pledge. That's why no one ever dares interfere with him. What he likes to do is entertain passing heroes, that's to say, he provides for thirty or forty of them in his house. He's always saying to us: 'If any convicts stop here, tell them to call in at the manor and I'll look after them.' Suppose I'd sold you the wine and food now, he'd have seen you all flushed with eating and drinking and thought you had plenty of funds of your own, so then he wouldn't help you. So there you are, I'm only doing what's best for you."
When he heard this, Lin Chong said to the guards, "When I was an instructor in the Eastern Capital, I often heard the men talking about someone they called the Governor. So this is where he hangs out. Why don't we go and pay him a visit?"
Dong and Xue considered this for a moment. So far as they could see it couldn't do any harm. They collected their things and said to the innkeeper: "Tell us where this Mr. Chai lives, we'll go and see him."
"Just keep straight on for about a mile. You'll come to a big stone bridge, and then it's just a few more bends before you see a big manor house. That's it."
They thanked the innkeeper and set off. Sure enough, after a mile or so they came to the stone bridge. After crossing it and proceeding along a flat stretch of road, they saw the manor house, set among green willows. It was surrounded on all sides by a moat overhung with weeping willows on both banks. A whitewashed wall gleamed through the foliage. One more bend in the road brought them right to the gate. What a fine place it was!
Its front gate greets the Yellow Way, the hill behind receives the Green Dragon. A multitude of flowering peach trees encroach on the river, a forest of shrubs brightens the Golden Valley park. In the Hall of the Heroes, rare flowers bloom unfading throughout the four seasons; before the Hall of a Thousand Plants gardeners compete during all the eight festivals to produce the most striking spring landscape. Above, an imperial charter with gold characters hangs, for this house has a cast-iron pledge. The nine-tiered hall, with its red rafters and green tiles, stands richly modelled in light and shade. The painted roof-tree and carved beams are worthy of some fabulous home in ancient myth. This is not the house of some parvenu, promoted through parentage with the present emperor but the princely heritage of a bygone age.
When they reached the manor they found a bridge of wide planks, where four or five retainers were sitting enjoying the fresh air. They approached and politely greeted the locals. Lin Chong said, "Can I trouble you to inform your master that a convict from the capital is here, travelling to his place of exile? Lin is my name, and I would like to speak with him."
"I'm afraid you're unlucky," the servants said. "If the master was at home there'd be food and drink for you, and money and supplies as well but this morning he went out hunting."
"Do you know when he will be back?" Lin Chong asked.
"It's impossible to say, he might go to sleep at the eastern residence, or then again, he might not. We just can't tell."

"In that case I'm unlucky, as you say. Since we can't see him, we'd better be going." They bade the villagers farewell and resumed their former way, their spirits considerably cast down. But they had not gone more than a few hundred yards when they saw far off, issuing from a wood and galloping in the direction of the manor, a troop of horsemen:

It is a goodly company, handsome and brave to a man. A dozen or so thoroughbreds prance and curvet, several banners flutter above them. A confusion of green hats rises like upturned water-lily leaves, while pink complexions and scarlet lips resemble a profusion of hibiscus flowers. The finely crafted light bows for shooting birds are in their flying-fish covers, and lion-head quivers hold bunches of arrows flighted with eagle's feathers dyed blue. Some of the group are restraining whippets trained to pursue the deer and others hold aloft falcons for hunting rabbits. Cords are cast away as a handsome flock of doves soars into the sky; as the hawks are unhooded, the falconers try to guard their fingers. Sword blades and spear tips glitter coldly beside the saddles. The painted kettle-drums produce rhythmic thunder as they ride. Wild birds, that else would take wing, are tethered to the pommels and beasts that normally roam wild in the mountains are slung across saddles. It's all in the spirit of the Lord of Ancient Jin riding to the red fort, or the Lord of Han arriving in Changyang.

The riders galloped towards the manor. In the midst of the troop was an official-looking type who rode a snow-white charger with a docked mane. This gentleman was possessed of dragon brows and phoenix eyes, bright red lips and dazzling teeth, drooping moustache and pointed beard, and was about thirty-five years of age. On his head he wore a black gauze cap with turned-up corners, embroidered with flowers, and he was dressed in a purple gown with an embroidered design on the chest, and a belt with a jade clasp and pendants of precious stones; on his feet were long black boots with green stripes and gold filigree. He carried a bow and a quiver-full of arrows. He led his troop to the gates of the manor.

When Lin Chong saw this, he said to himself: "I wonder if that's Mr. Chai." But he felt awkward about approaching and asking, so he remained where he was, hesitating. At this point the young gentleman turned his horse and approached. "Who is this person with the cangue?" he asked.

Lin Chong hurriedly bowed and said: "I am an instructor of the guards in the Eastern Capital. My name is Lin Chong. Because I offended Marshal Gao I was unjustly accused and brought before the judge of Kaifeng, sentenced and banished to Cangzhou. I heard at an inn a little further back that there is an honourable man here, a Mr. Chai, who welcomes gentlemen — men of spirit. I therefore came here looking for him. But I was not in luck. I have not been able to see him."

The young gentleman slipped from the saddle and rushed forward, saying, "Forgive Chai Jin for not having received you fittingly," and prostrated himself right there on the grass. Lin Chong hurriedly returned the courtesy. This done the young man took Lin Chong by the hand and led him towards the manor. When the retainers saw them coming, they opened wide the gates. Chai Jin then invited Lin Chong into the main hall. After the formal reception ceremony, Chai Jin said: "I have heard so much about you, Instructor but I did not foresee that you would enter my humble home today. Now you have made my life happy."

Lin Chong replied: "Your fame and renown, sir, have spread throughout the land. Who would have thought that today, convicted and here on my way into exile, it would be my good fortune to meet you; it is the greatest happiness of my life."

At Chai Jin's insistence, Lin Chong sat in the place reserved for honoured guests, and the two guards sat down nearby. The others of Chai Jin's troop led the horses away to the stables at the back. We say no more of this.

Chai Jin now called for wine to be brought. Soon servants appeared carrying a platter of meat, a plate of pancakes, and a jug of warm wine. To this was added a dish bearing a mound of rice, on which reposed ten strings of cash. As soon as all this had been set before them, Chai Jin said: "You ignorant peasants! Can't you see who is here? What do you mean by bringing such ordinary fare for the Instructor? Take it back to the kitchen at once. Then serve us with wine and fruit while you go and kill a sheep and cook it. Quickly, go and see to it."

Lin Chong jumped to his feet and said: "Please, don't order anything more. What there is here is more than enough."

"Please don't argue, Instructor. Now that we have you here we can't possibly be lacking in hospitality."

The servants complied. First they rushed back with fruit and wine. Chai Jin stood and toasted his guest with three cups. Lin Chong thanked him, and when they had drunk the two guards drank too. Then Chai Jin said, "Let us move to the inner room, Instructor." He unburdened himself of his bow and quiver, and invited the guards to join them and drink with them.

Chai Jin sat at the head of the table, Lin Chong took the place of honour, and the two guards sat down after him. Conversation grew lively, and there ensued many tales of adventure among the rivers and lakes. Unnoticed, the sun's red disk sank in the west. The banquet was ready, with fruit and seafood all laid out on the table before the company. Chai Jin raised his cup and toasted his guest three times. Then he sat down again and gave the order: "Bring in the soup and let the feast begin."

They had finished a bowl of soup and four or five cups of wine when a servant came and announced: "The Instructor is here," to which Chai Jin responded with: "Then you'd better ask him to come and join us. Bring another table at once."

Lin Chong stood up to look when this instructor entered. He wore a cotton turban at a slant and proudly puffed out his chest as he marched in. "Since the servants called him the Instructor," Lin Chong decided, "he must be the personal sword instructor of the master of the house, so I'd better honour him." He hastily inclined from the waist and sang out: "Lin Chong, at your service." But the other paid no attention and did not even return the greeting, so Lin Chong was left there unable to straighten up. Chai Jin pointed to Lin Chong, and said to the newcomer, who was Instructor Hong, "I want you to meet this gentleman, who is military arms instructor Lin Chong of the imperial guard in the Eastern Capital." When he heard this, Lin Chong straightened up to look Hong in the eye, and then prostrated himself. Hong said, "Cut the ceremony, get up!" Not with so much as a nod did he return the courtesy. Chai Jin was highly displeased. Lin Chong prostrated himself twice, then stood up and waited for Hong to take a seat. The latter, without an instant's hesitation, sat down in the place of honour. Chai Jin was still more put out. But Lin Chong meekly took the lower seat, and the two guards seated themselves after him.

Hong now asked: "Why must you receive a convict with such ceremony?"

"This is no ordinary convict," Chai Jin said. "This is an instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards, how can you treat him with such disrespect?"

"Mr. Chai," said Hong, "you are so besotted with martial arts that every little convict who comes this way is allowed to come and sponge on you; they only have to say they're arms instructors and you receive them here at the manor and let them guzzle your meat and drink, and money and rice. How can you take them so seriously?"

Lin Chong heard but he said nothing. Chai Jin spoke. "You shouldn't judge by appearances. Don't underestimate him."

Hong was greatly incensed by this. He sprang to his feet, saying: "I believe he's an impostor. Let's see if he dares to take me on with the staff, we'll soon see whether he's a real instructor or not."

The idea excited Chai Jin. "All right, then. Instructor Lin, what do you say?"

"I'm not worthy," Lin Chong said.

This convinced Hong he was right. "This fellow doesn't know anything, he's scared," he said to himself. And so he continued to challenge Lin Chong to a duel.

Now, in the first place Chai Jin wanted to see Lin Chong demonstrate his skill. And secondly, he wanted him to win, in order to take the braggart down a peg. But he said, "Let us drink first. We'll wait till the moon is up."

By the time they had drunk six or seven cups the moon had risen, bathing the hall in light as if it were day. Then Chai Jin rose and said, "Now let the two instructors exchange a few passes." But Lin Chong said to himself, "This Hong must be Chai Jin's teacher, and suppose I should knock him down, it would seem discourteous." Seeing Lin Chong's hesitation, Chai Jin said: "Instructor Hong has not been here very long, and as yet he has not found a worthy adversary. Please do not deny him this opportunity. I have a great desire to see you both demonstrate your skill." He said this because he was afraid that out of deference to him Lin Chong would conceal his true ability. Lin Chong, seeing that Chai Jin really meant what he said, put aside his scruples. Meanwhile Hong had risen to his feet and was shouting: "Come on, come on! Let's see what you can do!" They removed to a bare space behind the hall. The servants brought a bunch of staves that they placed upon the ground. Hong removed his robe and tied up his sleeves. Then he chose a staff and took up a position, crying: "Have at you!"

Chai Jin said: "Instructor Lin, I request you to show us a few passes."

Lin Chong said: "I hope you won't laugh at me." Then he bent down and picked up a staff, saying to Hong: "I shall be happy to learn from you." Hong glared at Lin Chong, as if convinced he was going to make just one mouthful of him. Lin Chong advanced, his stick held ready in the Shandong defence. Hong struck his staff upon the ground and charged. Under the bright light of the moon the two instructors traded blow for blow. What a sight it was!

The Shandong defence and the Hebei pincers. The Shandong defence is a loach lurking in its burrow, spitting out sand as camouflage. The Hebei pincers is a great python slithering from its lair. The Shandong defence is like uprooting a locust tree. The Hebei pincers is like tearing down a withered creeper. They were two dragons contending in the deep sea for the pearl. They were two tigers before their den fighting for the food.

So they fought in the moonlight, until after some four or five passes, Lin Chong leapt out of the circle of combat and cried: "I request a pause."

Chai Jin said: "Why are you holding back, Instructor?"

"I am unable to do more," Lin Chong said.

"But you've only just begun, how can that be?"

"This cangue is a handicap," said Lin Chong, "it limits my power."

"Of course. I ought to have thought of it. But that can be remedied," Chai Jin said easily. He told his servants to go and get ten taels of silver. These were quickly brought. Chai Jin then addressed the prisoner's two guards: "I have a request to make. Would you be so good as to remove Instructor Lin's cangue? If any questions are asked later when you get to the prison fortress, I will take full responsibility. I would like you to accept these ten taels of pure silver."

Dong and Xue were aware that Chai Jin was an important personage, and dared not refuse. Their dearest wish was to please him. And besides there was the silver, and the fact that they were confident Lin Chong would not run off. So they removed the restricting cangue at once. "Now sirs," cried Chai Jin with satisfaction, "you can engage in a few more bouts."

Hong had made up his mind that Lin Chong's staff-work was unadventurous and he didn't think much of it, so he raised his stick, eager to proceed with the contest.

"Wait!" Chai Jin cried. He sent some of his servants off to get a twenty-five-tael silver ingot that they returned with in no time. "This is a contest between two instructors," Chai Jin said, "it's something special. This silver ingot here shall be the prize, it will go to the winner." Chai Jin's intention was to stimulate Lin Chong to give of his best. He cast the ingot down on the ground.

Now Lin Chong's presence was odious to Hong, and on top of this he was keen to win the silver. To maintain the initiative, he whirled his staff and quickly, before he should lose his impetus, steadied it and took up the "putting heaven to the torch" position. Lin Chong thought to himself, "Secretly Mr. Chai wants me to win," so he angled his staff and initiated the movement called, "combing the grass for snakes." With a shout of "Have at you, have at you!" Hong thrust with the point of his staff. But Lin Chong had already backed off a pace. Hong pursued, raising his staff and bringing it smartly down again. Lin Chong saw that Hong's stance was awkward, and struck a sweeping blow close to the ground that Hong had no time to parry. When he tried to dodge, his opponent's staff caught him a cracking blow on the shins. Dropping his staff, he fell to the ground.

Chai Jin could not hide his delight. He called for wine, amidst a general buzz of excitement from the audience. Hong was quite unable to get up and it fell to the lot of the grinning retainers to go and help him to his feet. He left immediately with a face like thunder. Chai Jin took Lin Chong by the hand and led him to the inner hall where more wine was drunk. He told the servants to fetch the silver ingot and present it to Lin Chong. The latter refused but despite his protests he had to accept in the end.

This was indeed a case of:

It's hard to endure such bullying,
The haughty find few friends:
Behold him, sore and profitless,
Whose pride now lies in ruins.

Lin Chong stayed at Chai Jin's for several days and everyday there was great feasting and carousing. But on the fifth or sixth day, the two guards wanted to be off. So Chai Jin organized a farewell dinner and wrote two letters which he gave to Lin Chong, saying: "The Governor of Cangzhou is one of my friends, and I am also on excellent terms with the Warden of the prison and the chief gaoler. Give them these letters and you can be sure they will treat you well." He also gave Lin Chong another twenty-five-tael ingot of silver and five taels each to the guards. They spent the evening drinking, and then, next day, after they had breakfasted at dawn, Chai Jin told his people to carry the bags, while Lin Chong, wearing the cangue once more, bade farewell and set out. When Chai Jin saw them off at the manor gate, he said: "In a few days I'll send some of my people to you with winter clothes."

"How can I ever repay you?" Lin Chong said gratefully. The two guards also expressed their thanks.

So the three of them set off for Cangzhou, whose walls they sighted around midday. It turned out to be quite a small place, just the necessary six streets and three markets. They went straight to the court to deliver the documents, and Lin Chong was presented straight away to the magistrate. The latter, having interviewed him, dictated a letter announcing receipt of the prisoner and consigned him to the prison of the fortress. The two guards took the letter and left to return to the Eastern Capital. Of them we say no more.

As for Lin Chong, here is what he saw when he reached the prison:

The gates are tall and the walls thick, the area enclosed is vast and there is a deep moat. Beside the Temple of the Heavenly Prince two lines of willows hang down their green smoke; before the guardhouse stands a clump of pines like a streak of eyeshadow. Those who enter here are men of iron, hard as nails; none pass these doors but desperadoes bathed in blood.

Lin Chong, now a prisoner in the fortress of Cangzhou, was placed in a cell on his own until his case could be examined. During this time a group of prisoners came to see him and said: "The Warden and the head gaoler in this place are really vicious, they'll try to squeeze whatever they can out of you. If you've got something to sweeten them up with, they'll treat you okay. But if you've no money, they'll throw you into a dungeon, where you won't know if you're alive or dead. You're supposed to get a hundred lashes when you first come, to take the fight out of you but if you give them presents, they'll let you off it. They just say you're sick and the flogging is put off indefinitely. But if you don't give them anything, you'll be flogged till you're more dead than alive."

"Thank you for the good advice, friends," said Lin Chong. "But if I want to buy favour, how much should I give?"

"If you really want to be treated well, give the Warden five taels of silver and another five to the head gaoler. Then you should do fine."

They had hardly finished speaking when the head gaoler appeared. "Which one's the new convict?" he growled.

Hearing this, Lin Chong stepped forward and said, "I am."

When he saw no money in Lin Chong's hands, the gaoler's expression changed. "Who do you think you are?" he shouted, pointing his finger at Lin Chong. "Why don't you kowtow when you see me? Why don't you salute? You villain, after all the crimes you've committed in the capital, you still dare to put on airs in front of me, do you? Well I can see from the lines on your face you're destined to starve to death. You'll never make it! Think yourself the type that can't be finished off by beatings or torture, do you? Too bad, because you've fallen into my hands, you bunch of offal, and I'm going to teach you how we cut a body up into little tiny pieces. Just wait till I show you what's what!" He continued his litany of abuse till Lin Chong was almost in despair. He dared not even lift his head to reply. Hearing the shouting the other prisoners all made themselves scarce.

Lin Chong waited till the storm seemed to have blown itself out, then went and got five taels of silver that he presented to the gaoler, saying pleasantly: "My friend, I hope you will accept this simple gift, and not despise it."

The gaoler looked and said: "Do you want me to give this to the Warden, or is some of it for me?"

"It's all for you," said Lin Chong. "There's another ten taels that I'd like to trouble you to deliver to the Warden."

Suddenly the gaoler was all smiles, and he said: "Instructor Lin, I've heard many good things about you. I can see you're a good man. I believe you had a little problem with Marshal Gao. I know things are a bit tough for the time being but don't worry, you're bound to flourish, eventually. From your reputation and your looks, it's obvious you're no common man. I've no doubt you'll be someone big one day."

"Well, I shall rely on your help," Lin Chong said with a smile.

"Of course, never doubt it," said the gaoler.

Lin Chong then took out Chai Jin's letters of introduction and said: "Please do me the favour of delivering these letters."

"Oh!" the gaoler exclaimed, "if you've got letters from Mr. Chai, say no more. Each of these letters is worth a gold ingot with me. I will deliver them at once, and in a little while the Warden will want to see you. If he orders the disciplinary hundred lashes, all you've got to do is say you were ill on the journey and haven't recovered yet, I'll speak up for you, we can easily pull the wool over their eyes."

"I am most grateful for all your help."

Taking the silver and the letters, the gaoler left the cell. Lin Chong sighed and said to himself: "They say that with money you can win even the gods over. Well, they're not wrong. But the things I have to suffer!"

Meanwhile the gaoler, of course, kept back five taels of the Warden's silver and only took him the other half and the letters: "This Lin Chong is a good man," he reported, "he has letters of introduction from Mr. Chai. Here they are. It seems Marshal Gao had it in for him, that's why he's been banished here. I don't think he's done anything much."

"If he has letters from Mr. Chai, of course we must treat him well," the Warden said, and sent for him at once.

Now Lin Chong was sitting gloomily in his cell, when a sergeant appeared and said: "Warden's orders: new prisoner, Lin Chong, report to the office." Accordingly, Lin Chong presented himself at the Warden's office. The Warden said: "You're a new prisoner. According to the tradition instituted by Emperor Tai Zu, every new convict is to receive one hundred strokes of the cane as a reminder of his position. Guards! carry out the order for me."

"I beg to report, sir, that I am suffering from influenza, contracted on the journey here," Lin Chong said. "I humbly request a postponement until I am fully recovered."

"There's no doubt that this man is sick," the sergeant said. "I support his request for lenience."

"Ah yes," said the Warden. "I can see the man is not well. We will postpone the beating. He can be given it when he is cured." Next the gaoler made a proposal: "The guardian of the Temple of the Heavenly Prince has completed his sentence. We could send Instructor Lin to replace him." The order was made out there and then, and the gaoler escorted Lin Chong to his cell to collect his things and then to the Temple of the Heavenly Prince where he was to take over.

"Instructor Lin, I am really looking out for you," said the gaoler. "This job of looking after the Temple of the Heavenly Prince is the cushiest billet in the prison. All you have to do is burn incense every morning and evening and sweep the floor. You just compare that with the other prisoners: they have to sweat from morning to night, there's never any rest for them. And the ones who don't cooperate, we stick them down in the dungeons. Down there they don't even know whether they're alive or dead."

"I am truly grateful for your help," said Lin Chong, and he took out another two or three taels of silver for the gaoler. "I wonder if I could ask you a small favour. It would really make life easier if the cangue could be removed."

"Leave it to me," said the gaoler.

After petitioning the Warden, he returned and took off the cangue. From now on Lin Chong lived in the Temple of the Heavenly Prince, and his sole duty was to light incense everyday and sweep the floor. Time slipped by imperceptibly and soon he had been there over a month. Now that he had paid off the Warden and the head gaoler they became more and more complaisant, giving him a free rein, placing no restrictions upon him. Moreover, Mr. Chai sent someone with winter clothing and other gifts. And all the other prisoners also benefited indirectly from Lin Chong's presence. But enough of this. Time passed and the rigours of winter were at hand. One day around noon Lin Chong happened to leave the fortress for a stroll. As he was walking, he heard someone shout behind him: "Instructor Lin! What brings you here?" Lin Chong turned round to see who it was. It was a meeting that was to have fateful consequences for Lin Chong. Because of it:

Lin Chong came near to perishing in the blaze,
In the howling storm, he all but ended his days.

XUE BA took up his stick in both hands, and was on the point of striking Lin Chong with it when all at once there came a tremendous noise in the fir trees, and a big fat monk jumped out and shouted, "I have been in the forest for some time and have heard all that you have said." So saying he knocked the stick out of Xue Ba's hands with his monk staff. He then whirled his staff, and was going to hit the constable with it when Lin Chong, recognizing Lu Da, called out, "Brother, leave them alone. I have something to say."
Lu Da upon hearing this stayed his hand. The two constables were almost paralyzed with fear.
Lin Chong said, "They are not responsible for this as the Marshal of the Imperial Guard gave instructions through Lu Qian that they were to kill me. They were only carrying out the order. So if you kill them it will only create another grievance."
Lu Da unsheathed his sword, cut the ropes binding Lin Chong to the tree, and raising him said, "Younger brother, I have been thinking of your trouble ever since we parted on the day you bought that sword. Since you were arrested, I have been planning to save you. I heard that you had been banished to Cangzhou but although I waited outside Kaifeng I did not see you depart. Afterwards I heard that you had been sent to the prison in Kaifeng, and also heard that an official had had a private conversation with the two constables in an inn. Because of this procedure I was very suspicious, and anxious about your safety. So when you left I secretly followed you. I saw these two rascals take you into the inn, and I therefore stayed there myself. In that night I heard these two men discussing their evil schemes, and saw them thrust your feet in the boiling water. At that time I thought of killing them but there were many people in the inn who might have tried to stop me. But as they had bad intentions I was more anxious about you. I left the inn before you in the morning, and hid in the forest with the intention of killing these rascals as they passed that way. As they came here with the object of killing you it will be better if I kill them."
"Elder brother," said Lin Chong, "as you have saved my life, you should not kill these two men."
Lu Da spoke in a loud voice, "If my younger brother had not interfered, I would have cut you two rascals into mincemeat. But at his request I forgive you." After sheathing his sword, he continued, "Now you assist my younger brother, and follow me." The two men dared not utter a word in reply but helping Lin Chong they followed Lu Da. They also carried Lin Chong's bundle. After going about a li they came to a village where there was an inn. The four men entered the inn and sat down ordering from the waiter eight pounds of meat, two big tankards of wine, and flour cakes. The waiter soon spread the table, and placed the tankards of wine in a dish containing hot water so as to keep them warm.
The two men then said, "Reverend, we dare not ask you at what monastery you live?"
Lu Da laughed and said, "You rascals! If I tell you what will you do? I suppose you would just go and report it to Marshal Gao of the Imperial Guard. Some men fear him but I do not. If I met him I should give him three hundred blows with my staff."
After that the two men dared not open their mouths. After they had finished their meal and paid the innkeeper they left the village, and on the road Lin Chong asked, "Elder brother, where are you going to?"
Lu Da said, "A murderer must see some blood, and so a rescuer must see that his man is quite safe. I am not yet quite easy in my mind about you so I will go with you as far as Cangzhou."
The two constables upon hearing this muttered to themselves, "Here is more trouble! Our business is entirely spoiled! What can we say when we get back? But we cannot do anything except follow them."
After that they were so afraid that Lu Da might kill them that they immediately agreed to whatever he wanted to do. If things were all right he cursed them, or if anything was wrong he hit them without the least protest from them. After about two days they got a cart for Lin Chong to sit in. The two constables were still so afraid and suspicious that they decided to follow Lu Da in order to preserve their own lives. On the way Lu Da paid for the food and wine for the party. Everyday they stopped at inns quite early in the afternoon, and departed late the following morning. The two constables cooked the rice for the party, and also did whatever they were told to do. They discussed matters privately, and Dong Chao said, "We are under the close supervision of this monk, and when we go back Marshal Gao will blame us for our failure in carrying out his order."
Xue Ba said, "I heard that a monk called Lu Da had recently been placed in charge of the vegetable garden at the branch temple of the Great Xiangguo Monastery, and I think this monk must be that person. So when we get back we must tell the truth, that we really tried to kill Lin Chong in the Yezhu Forest but this monk stopped us from doing so, and then took us with him on the road to Cangzhou. In this way we shall escape punishment. We must return the ten taels of silver we received, and then Lu Qian will himself go and search for this monk. We shall thus be free from blame."
Dong Chao said, "What you say is quite right."
But Lu Da never let them get out of his sight, and after traveling for about eighteen days like this they were within twenty-three li of Cangzhou. Lu Da inquired and found out that there was no desolate spot about there as there were houses all along the road, and then decided to have a rest in a forest of fir trees nearby.
Lu Da spoke to Lin Chong, "Younger brother, we are now close to Cangzhou. I have made inquiries, and find that there are many houses on the way, and no unfrequented places. So I will leave you now, and see you again some other day."
Lin Chong said, "Elder brother, when you return, you can report my safety to my father-in-law. If I live I will certainly reward you liberally for your benevolent protection."
Lu Da took twenty taels of silver, and gave them to Lin Chong. He also gave three taels of silver to the two constables, and said, "If I had been by myself I would have decapitated both of you before now but as my younger brother has pleaded for you I will let you off this time. Now your destination is not far away so you must not harbour your original vile plan."
The constables said, "We will not do so. It was Marshal Gao Qiu, who deputed us to kill him."
They received the silver, and just before they separated on their different ways, Lu Da spoke to the constables, "Are your heads as hard as the fir trees?"
The men replied, "Our heads are as they were at birth."
Lu Da swung his staff and hit a tree with it leaving a gash two inches deep—and causing the top part to fall down. He then shouted, "If you two rascals have vile intentions I will treat your heads in the same way as that tree." He then turned to Lin Chong, and said to him: "Younger brother, you had better be on your guard against these two men. I must now leave you."
The two constables were so frightened that their tongues hung out for a long time.
Lin Chong said at last, "Well, we had better go."
The constables said, "What brute strength that monk has! He broke a tree with just one blow of his staff."
Lin Chong said, "That is only a small affair. At the Great Xiangguo Monastery he tore a tree up by its roots."
The two men shook their heads upon learning that this monk was the very Lu Da they had supposed.
The three men then left the forest, and about noon they came to an inn which they entered, and Lin Chong requested the constables to take the seat of honour. After seven hours the two constables began to feel that they recovered their spirits. There were many men in the inn drinking wine, and five waiters attending to their wants. The waiters were very busy bringing first one thing and then another, Lin Chong and the two constables sat waiting for an hour, without a waiter coming to attend to them. Lin Chong's patience was exhausted, so he rapped the table and called out, "I suppose the proprietor of this inn despises us because I am a criminal, and therefore he does not attend to us. But as I can pay for the wine, your conduct is most unreasonable."
The proprietor replied, "You evidently do not understand why we do this."
"As you do not supply us with food and wine what else is there to understand?"
The innkeeper said, "You evidently do not know that in this village we have a very wealthy man named Chai Jin who is also known as Squire Chai; he has been nicknamed by the robbers as Small Whirlwind. He is the descendant of Chai Shizong, of the Later Zhou Dynasty, who at Chen Qiao abdicated in favour of the Emperor Taizu, founder of the Song Dynasty and the latter bestowed on him a charter made in iron that all men must respect him and his offspring for all future time. In his home there are generally about fifty brave men who have come from all parts of the empire at his invitation. He has given us a general order that should any banished criminals pass this way they can go to his home, and he will assist them with money. If I supply you with wine and food your face would be red, and when he sees you in that condition he would assume that you are not short of money and would not assist you."
Lin Chong upon hearing this turned to the two constables, and said, "While I was in the army at Kaifeng I often heard about this Squire Chai but I never knew that he lives here. So why should we not go, and ask him to help us?"
The two constables saw no objection to this so they asked the proprietor of the inn where Squire Chai lived. The proprietor told them that they must follow the road in front of the inn for about a li till they came to a large stone bridge, and there turning off the road they would come to the village where Squire Chai lived.
Lin Chong thanked the proprietor of the inn, and leaving the inn they found the bridge. From there stretched a fine road leading to a clump of willow in which was situated the village they were looking for. The village was surrounded by a white wall and also a very broad moat on the banks of which were many big weeping willows. Upon reaching the moat they found there were about five men sitting on the bridge enjoying the cool air. The three men saluted, and then Lin Chong said, "Excuse me troubling you but will you please inform your master that a criminal, named Lin, who is being escorted to the prison wishes to see him."
The rustics replied, "You are unfortunate, as if our master had been at home he would have given you wine, food, and money. But today he went out hunting, and has not returned yet."
Lin Chong asked, "When will he come back?"
The rustics replied, "We are not sure about that as he may have stopped at the eastern estate for a rest."
Lin Chong said, "It is evident that I cannot see him, and that is unfortunate; so we will go." The three men were very much disappointed but they had not gone more than a quarter of a li when they saw a long way off a large body of horsemen emerge from a dense forest, and gallop towards the estate. In front of the horsemen was the leader who was riding a white horse. He had long eyebrows, long slit eyes, pearly white teeth, crimson lips, with a minute beard hanging from his lower lip, and a flowing mustache. He was about thirty-five years of age, and on his head he wore a black hat. He wore a brown silk gown embroidered with flowers in circular designs, and round his waist was an elegant silk girdle with a large circular jade buckle. His boots were of black silk embroidered with a design in gold and green. On his back hung a bow, and at his side was a quiver full of arrows.
When Lin Chong saw him he thought that this might be Squire Chai but still he was not quite sure about it. When the horse got near, the rider asked, "Who is this man wearing a cangue?"
Lin Chong quickly bowed, and said, "I am Lin Chong, Drill Instructor in the Imperial Guards at Kaifeng. I was in ill favour with Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard, who sent me to be tried, branded, and banished to Cangzhou. At the inn I heard that here is a fine man named Chai who likes to meet all celebrated scholars, and therefore I came specially to ask for his help. But unfortunately he was not at home."
The man jumped off his horse, and walking rapidly towards Lin Chong said, "Chai has lost the opportunity of welcoming you." He then saluted.
Lin Chong immediately returned the compliment. Chai then took Lin Chong by the hand, and led him towards the house. When the rustics saw them coming they opened the gate. Chai conducted Lin Chong to the guest chamber where he observed the usual courtesies.
Squire Chai Jin then said, "I heard of your fame some time ago, so that your opportune arrival at this insignificant spot fills me with entire satisfaction."
Lin Chong replied, "This insignificant person has heard of your fame in all quarters, and everybody respects you. Because I have been banished as a criminal I did not expect to meet you but I have been extremely fortunate." After having been much pressed Lin Chong sat down in the guest's seat, and the two constables sat down near him. We need not say anything here about the other horsemen who had taken their horses to the stables at the back of the house.
Squire Chai Jin ordered the servants to bring wine, and they brought it in with meat, cakes, and a peck of unboiled rice on the top of which were ten strings of cash. When he saw this Chai Jin in an apologetic tone said that the servants were not aware that he was entertaining a Drill Instructor, and that was why they had brought such small quantities of things. He then told the servants to take them away, and bring the best of fruit, and wine, and kill a sheep at once.
Lin Chong rose, and expressed his thanks, and requested Chai Jin not to go to such trouble as what they had brought was quite ample.
Chai Jin objected to this, as the visit of a Drill Instructor was such a rare event that he could not treat it lightly.
The servants carried out his instructions, and soon brought in the better wine, and fruit, and Chai Jin then poured out three cups of wine for Lin Chong. After Lin Chong had drunk the wine, and expressed his thanks, Chai Jin asked to be excused as he wished to retire and take off his bow, and his quiver full of arrows. He asked the two constables to drink wine with Lin Chong while he was away. Upon returning he sat down as the host and Lin Chong again sat in the guest's seat, with the two constables behind him.
They discussed matters relating to heroes and were not aware that evening was drawing nigh. On the table were spread all kinds of food, fruit, and delicacies of the sea. Chai Jin poured out the wine three times, and then sat down, and told the servants to bring in the soup. They had just eaten the soup, and drunk about seven cups of wine each, when a village rustic entered, and said the Drill Instructor had arrived.
Chai Jin told the servant to go and request him to come, and sit down at the table with them. When the Drill Instructor entered, Lin Chong saw that he was not wearing his cap straight, and was strutting like a bully. He thought that the man must be the athletic teacher for Chai Jin so he rose, bowed, and after calling attention by saying "mu," he said, "Lin Chong salutes with all respect."
The man took no notice of Lin Chong, and did not return his salute.
Lin Chong dared not raise his head.
Chai Jin pointing to Lin Chong said to the Drill Instructor Hong, "This gentleman is Lin Chong, Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guards at the Eastern Capital, and I want you to make his acquaintance."
Upon hearing this Lin Chong again saluted Drill Instructor Hong, and the latter did not wish to bow so he only said, "You need not salute me. Get up."
When Chai Jin saw and heard this he was annoyed.
Lin Chong however saluted again twice, and then got up and requested Hong to be seated. Without returning this compliment Hong simply sat down in the chief guest seat. This further annoyed Chai Jin. Lin Chong had to take his seat in the lower position and the two constables also sat down.
Drill Instructor Hong asked Chai, "Why do you treat a banished soldier with such great respect?"
Chai Jin said, "This gentleman is Drill Instructor of the Imperial Guards so how can you despise him?"
"Sir," said Hong, "I know that you like to exercise with a cudgel, and that is why when these army men arrive they always say they can also exercise with the cudgel. They all say that they are Drill Instructors and so cheat you into giving them wine, rice, food, and money. Why do you always believe that they are speaking the truth?"
Lin Chong upon hearing this suppressed his desire to speak. Chai Jin said, "It is not anybody who can recognize ability by appearances and so we cannot treat him lightly."
Drill Instructor Hong did not like Chai Jin suggesting that he could not recognize ability by appearance so he jumped up, and said, "I have no faith in him! If he will have a bout with me with the cudgels then I shall be able to say whether he is a genuine Drill Instructor."
Chai Jin laughed and said that that was a fine idea. He then asked Lin Chong whether he agreed to the proposal. But Lin Chong declined the offer. After thinking the matter over Drill Instructor Hong came to the conclusion that Lin Chong was afraid, and also was perhaps unable to fence. So he decided to provoke Lin Chong to fence with him.
Chai Jin wanted to see Lin Chong display his ability and also to see him beat Hong and so close the latter's mouth. So he said to the servants, "Bring the wine, and we will wait till the moon rises." After they had drunk about seven cups of wine the moon rose and it was then as bright as daylight in the hall where they were drinking.
Chai Jin got up, and said, "Now you two Drill Instructors just have a trial with the cudgels."
Lin Chong saw that Hong was teaching Chai Jin to drill with the cudgels so he thought that Chai Jin would not like it if he knocked his drill teacher down.
Chai Jin saw that Lin Chong was in a quandary so he said, "Drill Instructor Hong has not been coming to my house for very long. No one has fought with him here, so you must not refuse to do so. I want to see which of you two is the best man." Chai Jin said this because he thought that perhaps Lin Chong would not do his best out of consideration for his feelings in the matter.
Lin Chong felt more satisfied when he heard Chai Jin explain the position in this way. Hong got up, and called out, "Come on! Come on! Come on! I will have a bout with you."
So all three adjourned to an open space outside, and the servants brought a bundle of cudgels and placed them on the ground.
Drill Instructor Hong took off his clothes, and tucked up his short underskirt in his belt. He then dragged a cudgel out of the bundle, and raised it above his head. He again called out, "Come on! Come on! Come on!"
Chai Jin said, "Now, Lin, let me see what you can do."
Lin Chong asked Chai Jin not to laugh at him. He then picked up a cudgel, and said, "Master, please give me a lesson."
At this Hong was so angry that he would have liked to swallow Lin Chong at one gulp.
Lin Chong raised his cudgel above his head and brought it down with a blow in "Shandong style." At the same time Hong brought his cudgel down in a horizontal sweeping motion. The two men fought about five bouts in the moonlight, and then Lin Chong suddenly jumped clear of the cudgel, and called out for a rest.
Chai Jin asked why he was not using all his ability.
Lin Chong said, "I have lost."
Chai Jin said, "I have not seen any display of skill so how can you be defeated?"
Lin Chong said, "But I am wearing this cangue so I must lose."
Chai Jin said, "Ah! I had quite overlooked that." He laughed loudly and said, "That is soon remedied." He then told the servants to bring ten taels of silver. He also told the two constables to take off the cangue, and he would be entirely responsible for it should there be any inquiry at the prison the following day. He then gave the two constables the ten taels of silver.
The two constables saw that Chai Jin had such a splendid appearance that they did not care to oppose his will. They were also not afraid of Lin Chong running away so they took off the cangue.
Chai Jin was pleased and said, "Now you two Drill Instructors can try again."
Drill Instructor Hong thought that Lin Chong was weak in his use of the cudgel so he despised him. He raised his cudgel, and waited for an opportunity of using it.
Chai Jin called out, "Wait for a moment." He then instructed the servants to bring an ingot of silver which they did immediately and set it before him. It weighed twenty-five taels. He then said, "You two Drill Instructors can now continue your practice. I have here an ingot of silver which I will give to the winner." He purposely put the ingot of silver on the ground so that Lin Chong seeing it would exert all his skill in fencing.
Drill Instructor Hong was very jealous that Lin Chong had come there. He wanted the money but was afraid that he might be defeated and lose his reputation. But he raised his cudgel above his head in readiness to strike downwards.
Lin Chong thought that Chai Jin wanted him to win. He took his cudgel, and held it horizontally in readiness to repel a downward stroke of his opponent.
Drill Instructor Hong again shouted out, "Come on! Come on! Come on!" and so saying, he brought down his cudgel. But Lin Chong avoided the blow by taking a step back. Hong raised his cudgel again, and taking a step forward again struck at Lin Chong. Again he missed, and Lin Chong now saw that Hong was not placing his feet in the best position, so he quickly raised his cudgel, and making a sweeping horizontal motion struck Hong on his ankle just as the latter tried to move away. Hong fell down, and his cudgel also lay on the ground.
Chai Jin was much pleased to see this, and told the servants to bring the wine. The onlookers all laughed when they saw Drill Instructor Hong fall down. As Hong did not get up, they came forward and raised him up. Hong was so extremely ashamed of himself that he just walked away.
Chai Jin took Lin Chong by the hand, and lead him into the hall to drink wine. He then told the servants to bring the ingot of silver, and give it to Lin Chong but the latter declined to receive it. But after being much pressed he agreed to take it.
After that Lin Chong stayed with Chai Jin for several days, and was well treated with wine and food. But after seven days the constables were urging Lin Chong to depart so Chai Jin prepared a feast for their final leave taking, and wrote a letter. He said, "The Prefect at Cangzhou is a friend of mine, and I am on intimate terms with the superintendent of the jail there. So you can present this letter to them, and they will treat you well." He then gave Lin Chong another ingot of silver. He also gave each of the constables five taels of silver.

The following day soon after breakfast Chai Jin ordered men to carry the three men's baggage. Lin Chong put the cangue on again and bid goodbye to Squire Chai Jin. The latter accompanied them as far as the gate of the village, and there said to Lin Chong, "After a few days I will send a man with some winter clothing for you."
Lin Chong expressed his thanks, and said, "How can I ever repay you?"
The three men then departed, and reached Cangzhou about noon the same day. The porters who had carried the baggage were sent back. The official dispatch was presented and the official took Lin Chong to the magistrate. The latter then sealed an order confining Lin Chong to the prison, and also a reply to Kaifeng which was handed to the two constables to take back.
At the jail Lin Chong was placed by himself in a cell where he awaited inspection. A great number of the prisoners came to his room to talk with him. They said, "The head jailer at this place is an awful fellow, and demands money and things from the prisoners. If you give him your money and things he will treat you well. But if you do not give him money he will confine you in a hole in the ground and he will be absolutely indifferent whether you live or die. If you give him money he will not beat you with the bamboo, and if you say you are ill the punishment will be postponed. If you do not give him money he will beat you until you are almost dead."
Lin Chong said, "Brothers, thanks for your information. But if he asks for money how much should I give him."
The prisoners said, "It will be best if you give both the head jailer and the prison superintendent five taels of silver each."
Just as they were saying this the head jailer came and said, "Where is that soldier who has been banished?"
Lin Chong replied, "I am the man."
As the head jailer did not see Lin Chong get his money ready he changed his countenance, and cursed him saying, "You banished thief! Why don't you kneel when you see me instead of replying in that way. Do you know what trouble you have brought about at the Eastern Capital? Now you are still so proud to me. I see that you are a banished thief with all your face wrinkled with starvation, and that you will never have good luck during the remainder of your life. You are a stupid prisoner whom beating and torture could not kill! But your bones will soon be in my hands, and then I will grind them to powder, and chop up your body. It won't be long before you get your deserts!"
This abuse made Lin Chong so frightened that he did not even raise his head or reply. The prisoners listened to it all, and then went away. Lin Chong waited until he had finished saying this and then took out five taels of silver, and smiling said, "Elder brother, and head jailer, I offer you this trifling present."
The head jailer said, "Is this to be divided between me and the superintendent?"
Lin Chong said, "That is for you, and I will also trouble you to give the superintendent this ten taels of silver."
The head jailer laughed and said, "Drill Instructor Lin, I have heard of your good name. You are really a fine fellow. I think that Marshal Gao Qiu, wishes to injure you. But although you are in trouble now, you will certainly have luck after this. Having heard of your great name and now judging by your appearance I am sure that you are not an average person, and soon you must become an official."
Lin Chong laughed, "Well, I will look forward for your assistance." The head jailer said, "But you need not worry." Lin Chong then took out the two letters he had received from Chai Jin, and said, "Elder brother, may I trouble you to send these two letters for me."
The head jailer said, "As you have letters from Chai Jin you need not be anxious. A letter like this is worth an ingot of gold. I will take it for you with pleasure. And when the superintendent comes, and orders a hundred blows with the bamboo for you, you must say that you were sick on the way here, and have not quite recovered yet. I shall be there, and offer excuses, and so deceive the people who are not in on the secret."
Lin Chong said, "Many thanks for your advice."
This head jailer took the silver and the letters, and left the cell.
Lin Chong heaved a sigh and said, "Money can move even the gods. That is a true saying, as without money there is always a difficulty."
The head jailer took the silver, and gave five taels to the superintendent. He also presented the letter and said, "This man, Lin Chong, is a fine fellow, and has brought this letter from His Excellency Chai Jin who speaks highly of him. He was falsely accused by Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard, who had him banished to this place. It was only a slight offence."
The superintendent said, "As he has brought this letter from Squire Chai Jin we must look after him well. Bring him here to see me."
Lin Chong was sitting in silence in his cell, when the head jailer returned and told him that the superintendent wanted to see him, and check his name off. He was taken to the hall where the superintendent spoke to him, "The Emperor Taizu issued a law that anybody who was banished to this place should receive one hundred blows with the bamboo. You have just arrived so I must administer that punishment." He then told his guard to put the prisoner on the ground.
Lin Chong said, "On the way I caught a severe cold, and have not quite recovered yet. I request that the punishment be postponed."
The head jailer said, "This man certainly is sick, and I suggest that you take pity of him."
The superintendent said, "As he is sick we will not beat him now but wait until he is better."
The head jailer said, "The man who attends to the Heavenly Kings Temple has been there quite a long time and I suggest that Lin Chong should supersede him."
The superintendent wrote an order accordingly, and Lin Chong was taken to his cell to get his baggage, and then taken to the shrine where he took over his duties.
The head jailer said that he had done his best for Lin Chong. "This job is the lightest in the prison, and all that you have to do is to sweep the floor, and burn incense. You must see that none of the other prisoners are spared from early morning till late at night. People who have no references and assistance as you have are confined to the prison, and whether they want to live or die makes no difference."
Lin Chong said that he was much obliged for the help. He then gave the head jailer three more taels of silver, and asked him to take off his cangue. The head jailer said he would attend to that, and put the matter before the superintendent. Upon his return he took off the cangue. So Lin Chong stayed by himself at the Heavenly Kings Temple and everyday swept the floor and burnt incense. The first fifty days soon passed over without him noticing the time. The superintendent and the head jailer became quite friendly to Lin Chong, and allowed him great liberty.
Chai Jin sent winter clothing and also money for Lin Chong. The other prisoners also received money from Lin Chong.
One day about 10 A.M. Lin Chong was strolling outside the prison when he heard someone behind him call out, "What are you doing here, Drill Instructor Lin?" Turning round he saw a man.

Lin Chong nearly lost his life.
First in fire, and then in snow.

010

Lin Chong Seeks Refuge Shelters from the Snowstorm in the Mountain Spirit Temple & alleviates his plight; Captain Lu Qian Sets Fire to the Fodder Depot stores alight

Lin Chong was strolling along, when someone behind him called his name. He turned around and saw the tavern waiter Li Xiao-er. When they first became acquainted in the Eastern Capital, Lin had helped him financially several times. Later, Xiao-er stole money from the tavern keeper and was arrested. He was going to be sent to the prefect but Lin Chong spoke up in his behalf, and he did not have to stand trial. Lin also paid back the money for him and he was released. Although Xiao-er could no longer find work in the capital, thanks to the travelling expenses which Lin gave him, he was able to seek employment elsewhere. Today, unexpectedly, they met again in Cangzhou.
"What are you doing here, Brother Xiao-er?" asked Lin Chong.
Xiao-er kowtowed and replied, "After you saved me, benefactor, and gave me travelling money, I looked everywhere for a job but in vain. Finally, I wandered into Cangzhou. Here, a tavern keeper named Wang took me on as his assistant. Because I was a hard worker and could make tasty dishes and sauces, the customers praised me and business improved. The tavern keeper had a daughter, and he gave her to me in marriage and adopted me into his household. Now, both he and my mother-in-law are dead. Only my wife and I are left. We run a tavern in front of the garrison. I was just passing by on my way to collect some bills. What are you doing here, benefactor?"
Lin pointed to the mark on his face. "Because I crossed the will of Marshal Gao, he conspired against me and had me convicted and exiled to this place. At present, I look after the garrison prison temple. I don't know what they'll do with me in the future. I never expected to meet you here."
Xiao-er brought Lin Chong to his home, invited him to be seated, and called his wife in to greet him. Both husband and wife said happily. "We have no close relatives. Your coming here today, benefactor, is like a gift from heaven!"
"I'm an exile," said Lin. "Won't associating with me sully your name?"
"How can you talk like that?" said Xiao-er. "Everyone knows your excellent reputation. Be sure to bring all your washing and mending to my wife."
He entertained Lin Chong with food and drink and that night saw him back to the garrison temple. The following morning, he came again to invite Lin to his home.
From then on, Xiao-er and Lin called on each other frequently. Xiao-er often sent tea or soup to Lin in the garrison. Moved by the couple's respect and devotion, Lin gave them money from time to time to use in their business.
To skip the idle chatter, time passed quickly. Winter came. All of Lin Chong's padded winter garments were stitched and mended by Xiao-er's wife. One day, while Xiao-er was cooking in the entry, a man slipped in and sat down inside at one of the tables. Then another fellow furtively entered. The first man was an army officer, by the looks of him. The second seemed more like an attendant. He also hurried in and sat down.
Xiao-er went up to them. "Wine?" he queried.
The officer handed Xiao-er an ounce of silver. "Take this on account. Bring us three or four jugs of good wine. When our guests come, serve some food and tidbits. You choose the dishes. You needn't ask me."
"You've invited guests, sir?"
"I must trouble you to go to the garrison prison and invite the warden and the head keeper here for a chat. If they question you, just say: 'A gentleman requests that you come and discuss certain matters. He is looking forward to your arrival.' "
Xiao-er assented and left. At the garrison, he first relayed the request to the head keeper then, together, they extended the invitation to the warden, after which all three went to the tavern. The gentleman, the warden and the head keeper exchanged greetings.
"We haven't met before," said the warden. "May we ask your name, sir?"
"I have a letter of introduction here that I will give you shortly," replied the man. "But first let's have some wine."
Xiao-er quickly opened the jugs and served the food. The gentleman called for a ceremonial tray of wine goblets. After filling and handing them out, he invited his guests to be seated. Xiao-er dashed back and forth like a shuttle, serving without cease. The gentleman's attendant took care of the warming of the wine. A dozen rounds were drunk, more tidbits to go with the wine were ordered.
"My attendant will warm the wine," the gentleman said to Xiao-er. "You needn't come unless we call you. We want to talk privately."
Xiao-er said: "Very well, sir," and left the room. Outside the door, he conferred with his wife.
"There's something fishy about those two."
"What do you mean?"
"They've both got Eastern Capital accents and neither of them knows the warden. When I went in with those tidbits just now, I heard the head keeper murmur something about 'Marshal Gao.' Wasn't he the one who harmed Instructor Lin? I'll stay here at the door and keep an eye on them. You go and listen on the other side of the partition wall."
"Why not bring Instructor Lin here from the garrison and see if he recognizes them?"
"You don't know what a terrible temper he has. He's liable to commit murder and burn the place down. If I called him and that gentleman turned out to be the Captain Lu he mentioned the other day, Lin would never let him escape alive. If anything happened here, you and I would be involved. You'd better go and listen. We'll decide what to do later."
"Very well," said the wife. She went and listened for a time. Then she returned and said: "They're whispering with their heads together and I couldn't hear much. But I saw that fellow who looks like an officer take something wrapped in a white cloth from his attendant and give it to the warden and head keeper. Maybe there's money in it. I heard the head keeper say: 'Leave everything to us. We'll finish him off, come what may.' "
Just then, from the inner room a voice shouted: "Bring the soup." Xiao-er hastened to comply. As he entered, he saw that the warden had a letter in his hand. Xiao-er served the soup, then brought some more dishes of food.
The feast continued for another hour. After the bill was paid, the warden and head keeper departed first. The other two, heads stealthily lowered, then also left.
Shortly afterwards, Lin Chong entered the tavern. "Brother Xiao-er," he said, "I hope you're prospering."
"Please sit down, benefactor," Xiao-er begged hastily. "I was just about to look for you. I must tell you something very important."
"What is it?" asked Lin Chong.
Xiao-er led him to the inner room, invited him to be seated, and told him all about his recent customers. "I don't know who these fellows are," he said in conclusion, "but I don't trust them. I'm afraid they want to harm you, benefactor."
"What do they look like?" asked Lin.
"One is of average build, fair, clean shaven, about thirty or so. The other fellow isn't very tall either. He has a ruddy complexion."
Startled, Lin Chong cried, "That man of thirty must be Captain Lu Qian! The filthy thief, how dare he come here to harm me! If I get hold of him I'll smash him to a jelly!"
"The main thing is to be on your guard," said Xiao-er. " 'Take care not to choke when you eat, or trip when you walk,' as the old saying goes."
Lin Chong left Xiao-er's home in a towering rage. On the street, he bought a sharp dagger. Carrying it on his person, he made a search of all the streets and lanes. Xiao-er and his wife were in a cold sweat.
At daybreak the following morning, Lin rose, washed his face and rinsed his mouth, then took up the dagger and again prowled through all the streets and lanes both in the city and on the outskirts. He patrolled all day, even searching the prison and the garrison but nothing was stirring.
Returning to Xiao-er's place, he said: "Nothing happened today either."
"Benefactor," said Xiao-er, "let's hope it stays that way! But remain on your guard."
Lin went back to the garrison prison temple, where he spent the night. He walked the streets for four or five days, without success. His temper gradually began to cool.
On the sixth day, the warden summoned Lin Chong into his hall and said: "You've been here for some time now. For the sake of Lord Chai's prestige, we must improve your lot. Fifteen //outside the city's East Gate is a large army fodder depot. Every month you can collect fees from the people delivering the fodder. An old army man is in charge. I've decided to give you the job and have him replace you in the garrison prison temple. Out at the depot you'll be able to earn a little spending money. Go there with the head keeper and take over."
"I'll do that, sir," said Lin.
He first left the garrison and went directly to Xiao-er's house. Lin told the couple the news.
"Today, the warden is sending me to take charge of the army fodder depot. What do you think?"
"It's a better place than the garrison prison temple," replied Xiao-er. "You can earn some regular fees out there. Usually, no one gets that post without paying a bribe."
"Not only haven't they harmed me but they've given me this good job instead. I don't know what to make of it."
"Why be suspicious, benefactor? As long as nothing happens, that's fine. The only trouble is you'll be living quite far from us. After a while, I'll come and see you, when I have time." Xiao-er pressed Lin Chong to join him in several rounds of drinks.
To make a long story short, the two separated and Lin Chong returned to the garrison prison temple. He packed his belongings, put his dagger in his belt, took up a spear and set out with the head keeper for the fodder depot.
It was a bitterly cold winter day. The sky was overcast, and they walked in the teeth of a rising wind amid thickly swirling snowflakes. Since there was no place along the road to buy drinks, Lin and the keeper soon reached the depot.
Surrounded by an earthen wall, the depot had a gate with two doors. They pushed them open and entered the compound. They saw a thatched building of seven or eight sections that was serving as a storehouse for fodder. All around were piles of hay. In the centre stood a small thatched shack. Inside, they found the old soldier huddled over a fire.
"This is Lin Chong," the head keeper said to him. "The warden has sent him to replace you. You are to go back to take care of the garrison prison temple. You can hand over your duties."
The old soldier gave Lin Chong the keys and said: "The stuff in the store-house is under official seal. And those haystacks there are all numbered."
He took Lin around and counted the stacks, then brought him back to the shack and gathered his belongings. As he was leaving, he said: "I'll give you my brazier, my pot, my bowls and my dishes."
"I have such things in the temple too," said Lin. "You can have mine."
The old soldier pointed to a gourd bottle hanging on the wall. He said: "If you want to buy wine, there's a little market-place two or three //east down the road." Then he and the head keeper departed for the prison.
As to Lin Chong, he placed his bundle and bedding on the bed and sat down to replenish the fire in the earthen brazier. There was some charcoal in a corner of the room, and Lin used a few sticks of them. He looked around the shack. It was very dilapidated and shook with every gust of wind.
"How can I pass the winter here?" thought Lin. "When the storm stops I must bring a mason out from the city to repair this place."
Although he hugged the fire, he still felt cold. "The old soldier said there was a little market-place two //from here," he recalled. "Why don't I go and buy some wine?"
He took some money from his bundle, tied the gourd bottle to the end of his spear, covered the brazier, put on his broad-brimmed felt hat, took the keys and shut the door of the shack behind him. Coming through the compound gate, he closed and locket it. Then, carrying the keys, he headed east. The snow-covered ground was a mass of tiny white jade flakes. Lin Chong trudged forward with the north wind on his back. It was snowing very hard.

He had gone less than half a //when he observed an ancient temple. Lin Chong pressed his palms together before his forehead and bowed. "May the gods protect me. I must come here one of these days and burn some paper money in sacrifice."
Lin continued on his way. Ahead, he saw a cluster of houses. He halted, and peered through the storm. The buildings were enclosed by a fence. A clump of broom straw hanging outside one of them indicated that this was a tavern. Lin went inside.
"Where are you from, sir?" the host asked.
"Do you recognize this gourd bottle?" Lin Chong countered.
The man looked at it and said: "It belongs to the old soldier at the fodder depot."
"That's right," said Lin.
"So you're the new custodian," said the host. "Please be seated, brother. It's a bitterly cold day. Let me treat you to a few goblets, by way of welcome."
He served a platter of sliced beef, heated a pot of wine and invited Lin to help himself. Lin bought some more beef, drank a few cups, then had the gourd filled with wine. He wrapped up the two orders of beef, left a few pieces of silver, tied the gourd bottle to the end of his spear and placed the beef inside his shirt.
"Thanks for your trouble," said Lin. He went out through the fence gate and started back against the wind. Now that night had come, the snow was falling harder than ever.
Plodding through the snow in the teeth of the north wind, Lin Chong hurried back to the fodder depot. When he unlocked the doors and entered the compound, he uttered a cry of dismay. Actually, the gods who see everything and protect the good and virtuous were saving Lin Chong's life with that snowstorm. The thatched shack had collapsed under the weight of the snow.
"What am I going to do?" Lin wondered.
He put his spear and gourd down in the snow. Worried that the embers in the brazier might set the place on fire, he pulled open a section of the wall of the fallen shack, pushed himself halfway in and felt around. But the embers had been extinguished by the melted snow. Lin groped around on the bed till he found his quilt and pulled it out, emerging again into the dark night.
"I've no place to build a fire," he pondered. "How am I going to manage?" Then he remembered the ancient temple, half a //down the road. "I can spend the night there," he thought. "When daylight comes, I'll decide what to do."
He rolled up his quilt, shouldered his spear with the wine gourd dangling from one end, closed the compound gate once more, locked it, and proceeded to the temple. Entering, he shut the door and propped against it a big stone which he had noticed lying to one side. He walked further into the temple and saw on a platform an idol of a mountain spirit with golden armor, flanked by a Nether Region judge and a small demon, one on each side. In a corner was a pile of paper. Lin Chong inspected the whole temple but could find neither occupants nor anyone in charge.
Lin placed his spear and gourd bottle on the pile of paper and untied his quilt. He removed his broad-brimmed felt hat, shook the snow from his clothes and peeled off his white tunic which was half soaked, then put it together with his hat on the altar table. He covered himself to the waist with the quilt and drank from the gourd bottle from time to time, helping the cold wine down with slices of the beef he had been carrying.
Suddenly, he heard a loud crackling outside. He leaped to his feet and peered through a vent in the wall. The fodder depot was in flames and burning fiercely. Lin grabbed his spear. He was about to open the door and dash to the fire when he heard men's voices. Lin leaned against the door and listened. The footsteps of three men came directly to the temple.
The men pushed the temple door but the big stone held it fast and they couldn't open it. They stood under the eaves watching the fire.
"Not a bad plan, eh?" one of them said.
"We're much indebted to the warden and to you, Head Keeper," someone replied. "When I return to the capital and report to the marshal, he undoubtedly will make you both big officials. Now Drill Instructor Zhang has no excuse to refuse."
"We've taken care of Lin Chong properly this time," said a third. "Young Master Gao is sure to recover."
"We tried to arrange the match three or four times," said a voice. "We told that lout Zhang: 'Your son-in-law is dead,' but he wouldn't give in. Young Master Gao's ailment kept getting worse. And so the marshal sent us specially to beg you two gentlemen to help. Today, we've succeeded at last."
"I climbed over the wall and set a score of haystacks afire. I'd like to see him get away!"
"The depot is almost completely destroyed."
"Even if he escapes with his life, burning down a military fodder depot is crime punishable by death."
"Let's go back to the city."
"Wait a little longer. If we bring a couple of his bones with us to the capital, the marshal and the Young Master will praise us for doing the job thoroughly."
Lin Chong recognized them by their voices. One was the head keeper, another was Captain Lu Qian, the third was Fu An.
"Heaven took pity on me," thought Lin. "If that thatched shack hadn't collapsed, I'd have been roasted to death by these villains!"
Softly, he pulled the stone away from the door. Clutching his spear, Lin Chong pushed the door open. "Where do you think you're going, knaves!" he roared.
The three, who had just been leaving, froze, too shocked to move.
Lin raise his arm and speared the head keeper to the ground.
"Spare me!" cried Captain Lu, weak with terror.
Fu An had run only a score of paces when Lin Chong caught up. With one thrust, Lin plunged the spear into his back, and he also fell.
Lin turned. He saw Captain Lu starting to flee. Before Lu had gone three paces, Lin Chong shouted: "Halt, treacherous thief!" He grabbed Lu by the front of his tunic and threw him flat on his back in the snow.
Lin jabbed his spear into the ground, put one foot on Lu's chest, whipped out his dagger and held it against the captain's face.
"Filthy wretch," he grated. "I never wronged you. How can you have injured me so? Truly, 'Killing can be forgiven but never deception!' "
"This wasn't my idea," Lu pleaded. "The marshal ordered me to do it! I didn't dare refuse!"
"Treacherous knave," cried Lin. "We were friends since childhood, yet today you come to destroy me! How can you excuse yourself? Have a taste of this knife!"
He ripped open Lu's clothes, stabbed the blade into his heart and twisted. Blood spurted everywhere. Lin tore out his heart and liver.
He saw the head keeper struggling to his feet to run. Lin seized him in a flash. "Now I know what an evil scoundrel you are," he shouted. "Take that!" He cut off the keeper's head and tied it to the end of his spear.
Next, he went back to Fu An and Lu Qian and cut off their heads too. He put away his knife, tied the three heads together by the hair, carried them into the temple and placed them on the altar in front of the mountain spirit idol. Then he put on his white tunic, tied his waist sash, clapped the broad-brimmed felt hat on his head and finished off the cold wine in the gourd bottle.
Lin tossed his quilt and the bottle aside, took up his spear, left the temple and started east. He had gone only four or five //when he saw people from a neighbouring village hastening with water buckets and pikes to put out the blaze.
"Hurry and save the place," Lin Chong called to them. "I'm going to report the fire to the officials!"
Spear in hand, he walked on rapidly.
The snow fell more heavily. For two watches Lin Chong walked eastward. He shivered in the relentless cold. He was now far from the fodder depot. Across the snowy spaces in a sparse grove of trees he saw a small house with a thatched roof, weighed down by a thick mantle of snow. Firelight gleamed through cracks in the wall. Lin approached the house and pushed open the door. An old vassal and four or five young ones sat huddled around an open hearth where sticks of wood were burning brightly. Lin walked over to them.
"Greetings. I'm on a mission for the garrison prison. The snow has soaked my clothes. I'd like to dry them by your fire, if I may."
"Go ahead," said the old vassal. "We don't mind."
Lin toasted his damp clothes until they were somewhat drier. He noticed warming by the embers a large jug from which the fragrance of wine was rising.
"I have some small silver on me," he said. "Could you let me have a little of that wine?"
"We take turns every night guarding the grain bins," the old vassal said. "It's already the fourth watch, and very cold. We don't have enough wine for ourselves. How can we give you any? Forget it."
"Only two or three bowls to ward off the chill."
"Persistent, aren't you? I said no!"
The aroma of the wine sharpened Lin's thirst. "It can't be helped," he insisted. "You'll have to give me some."
The vassals all turned on him. "We're nice enough to let you dry your clothes by our fire and you want our wine," they said. "Get out of here! If you don't we'll tie you up!"
Lin grew angry. "Surly louts," he cried. With the end of his spear he flicked a burning stick in the old vassal's face and, again with his spear, stirred the flames so high that they singed the old man's whiskers. Everyone jumped up in alarm. Lin belabored them with his spear. The old vassal hurriedly departed. The others were paralyzed with fright. Lin drove them out with blows of the spear shaft.
"They've all gone," he said. "Now I can enjoy this wine!"
There were two coconut ladles on the clay platform bed. With one of these he began scooping up and drinking the brew. Soon only half remained. Lin took his spear and walked unsteadily through the door. He staggered along for nearly a //: A gust of wind knocked him down beside a ravine. In vain he tried to struggle to his feet. Once a drunkard falls, he can't get up. Lin Chong lay stupefied in the snow. The vassals, leading over twenty others armed with spears and clubs, came rushing back to the thatched house. Lin was gone. They followed his trail until they found him collapsed in the snow, his spear lying to one side. "So here you are," they cried. They seized and bound him. By the fifth watch, they had brought him to another place. And because he went to this place, thousands of boats fore and aft sailed into battle on the lakes; 100 and more heroes arrayed themselves in ranks left and right in the stronghold in the marsh. Truly, to hear of the slaughter and tragedy freezes the heart and chills the bones!

As Lin Chong was taking a stroll that day he suddenly heard someone call his name. Turning to look, he saw it was Young Li, a waiter whom he had once helped out when he was in the Eastern Capital. Young Li had been apprehended for foolishly stealing some money from the landlord of the inn where he worked; he would have been sentenced and punished, had not Lin Chong interceded for him, and got him off. Lin Chong also paid back the money on his behalf and obtained his release. Young Li could not then stay in the capital, so Lin Chong gave him some money for his travel expenses and he went to seek refuge elsewhere. Now he suddenly turned up here.
"What are you doing here, Young Li?" Lin Chong asked.
After prostrating himself, Li told his story: "After you saved me, sir, and treated me so nice, I went all round the place but no one wanted to give me a job. Eventually, I don't know how, I found myself here in Cangzhou, and got myself taken on as waiter at an inn that belonged to a Mr. Wang. Seeing as how I worked hard, served the dishes nicely and could run up some tasty sauces, the customers were all happy, and business was pretty good. This landlord had a daughter, and he decided to marry her to me. A little while back both my in-laws died, so now there's only me and the wife. We've opened a little teahouse just opposite the fortress. I was just on my way to collect some money I'm owed, when I saw you, sir. What brings you here?"
Lin Chong pointed to the tattoo on his face and said: "I got into some trouble with Marshal Gao. I was sentenced and banished here. For the time being I've been made guardian of the Temple of the Heavenly Prince but I can't say what the future will bring. What a surprise to meet you here!"
Young Li invited Lin Chong home and made him sit down while he called his wife to come and pay her respects. The couple were delighted: "We're all alone here now, just the two of us," they said. "To have you here, well, it's like a gift from heaven."
"But I'm a convict," Lin Chong said. "I don't want to give you a bad name."
Young Li scoffed at this: "Everyone knows who you are. Don't talk like that! You must bring us all your washing and mending."
Li entertained Lin Chong most hospitably that day, and it was evening when he escorted him back to the Temple of the Heavenly Prince. The next day he came again with gifts, and from then on Lin Chong was a frequent visitor at Li's teashop, while Li often sent soup up to the fortress for Lin Chong. And in return for all the honour they did him, Lin Chong made them gifts of silver so that they could add to their capital.
But enough of these details, let us return to our main concern. Time passed rapidly, and soon winter was at hand. Li's wife had aired and mended all Lin Chong's padded winter clothing. Then one day, as Li was preparing some dishes at the entrance to his shop, a stranger sidled in and sat down. Soon after, a second man slipped in. Li watched carefully. The first man was dressed like an officer; the second, who looked like a messenger, also seated himself. Li entered and asked: "Can I bring you some wine?" Immediately the man took out a tael of silver and gave it to him, saying: "Put that on your counter, and then get out three or four measures of your best; when my guests arrive just serve the usual fruit and small dishes, and don't ask any questions."
"Where are your guests, then?" Li asked.
"I shall trouble you to go to the fortress and tell the prison Warden and the head gaoler I'd like a word with them. If they ask, just tell them there's a gentleman who wants to see them to discuss some business. He requests their presence."
Accordingly Young Li went to the fortress, where he spoke to the gaoler first, and then proceeded to the Warden's residence to tell the Warden. When they entered the wineshop the officer and the other two greeted each other politely. "I don't think I have the honour, sir," the Warden said. "May I ask your name?"
The stranger replied: "I have a letter for you, in a moment you shall know all. But first, some wine!"
Li hurriedly served the wine, and brought the dishes to go with it. The officer ordered a large cup, initiated the drinking, and then asked his guests to be seated. There was only Li to serve them and they kept him pretty busy. The man who accompanied the officer asked for boiling water so he could warm the wine himself. After ten cups or so, they ordered more food to be brought and placed on the table. Then the officer said to Li: "My servant will warm the wine. Don't come unless I call you. We have important matters to discuss."
Li made himself scarce. But just outside the door, he called his wife and said: "These two men look suspicious to me."
"What do you mean, suspicious?" said his wife.
"They talk like people from the capital. They didn't know the Warden before. Then when I was taking in the dishes, I heard that gaoler mention the name of Grand Marshal Gao. Do you suppose they could have come here for the purpose of doing Instructor Lin some mischief? I've got to wait here by the door in case they call me. But you go and put your ear to the partition to see if you can hear anything."
"Do you think you ought to go up to the fortress and tell Instructor Lin? Maybe he knows them," said his wife.
"Don't be silly," Li said. "Instructor Lin's a very excitable man. It wouldn't take much to set him off, killing and burning. Suppose I get him to come and see, and it turns out to be that Lu Qian or whatever he's called, that he was telling us about the other day, do you think he'd let it rest there? And if anything happened, the two of us would be involved. Just go and listen. We'll decide what to do afterwards."
"Right," said his wife. She went and listened for two hours. When she returned, she said: "They're all talking in whispers. I couldn't really hear anything."
But at this moment they were able to observe the military-looking gentleman reach across and take from his servant something wrapped in a handkerchief that he presented to the Warden and the head gaoler. It looked as if it might be gold. They heard the head gaoler say, "Leave it to us. Come what may, we'll dispose of him." Then there was a shout from within: "More hot water!" Li hurried in to get the pot, and saw the Warden was holding a letter. After changing the water, he took them some more dishes. They went on eating and drinking for another hour or so, then they paid and left, the Warden and the gaoler going first, and then the other two, who kept their heads lowered.
Not long after this, Lin Chong appeared at the teahouse and said: "How's business, Young Li?"
Young Li said hurriedly: "Come in and sit down, sir. I was just coming to look for you. I've something urgent to tell you."
There's a poem about this:

The plotters' evil plans shake heaven's gates,
Their whispered words throughout the Empire post.
How can it be? Do these blank walls have ears?
The secret's now known to every wandering ghost!

"Well, what is this urgent news?" Lin Chong asked. Li asked him to come and sit inside and then said: "We've just had some suspicious-looking characters from the capital come in. They invited the Warden and the head gaoler here, and they were drinking together for hours. We heard the gaoler say something about 'Grand Marshal Gao,' so I was worried. My wife listened too, for ages but even by straining her ears she couldn't catch what they were saying. But in the end we heard the gaoler say, 'Leave it all to us; come what may, we'll dispose of him.' Those two handed over a bag of gold to the Warden and the gaoler; then they all drank some more and then they all left. I don't know who they were but I was pretty disturbed, I can tell you. I'm afraid they may intend you some harm, sir."
"What did they look like?" Lin Chong asked.
"One was smallish, thick-set, very white, no beard or moustache, about thirty years old. The one with him was also quite small, with a purplish complexion."
Lin Chong let out a cry. "That thirty-year-old one is Lu Qian. The dirty bastard, so he's got the nerve to follow me here! Just let me get my hands on him, I'll grind his bones to paste!"
"Just keep your eyes skinned, sir, that's all you need do," said Li. "Don't you know the proverb, watch out for choking when you eat, tripping's the problem when you walk?"
But Lin Chong left Li's in a fury. First he went out and bought a very sharp dagger which he secreted on his person. Then he mounted a search, combing every street and alley. Li and his wife were in a cold sweat. But when evening came, nothing had happened. Next day Lin Chong was up at dawn, and after washing and rinsing his mouth, took his dagger and set off again to spend the day searching every side-street and back-alley of Cangzhou, within and without the walls. But he found nothing, neither there nor in the prison fortress itself. Later when he dropped in on Li, he told him, "I drew a blank again today."
"Let's hope it stays that way, sir. Just be alert, that's all."
Lin Chong returned to the Temple of the Heavenly Prince for the night. He continued searching for four or five days but then having found nothing he began to calm down.

On the sixth day, the Warden sent for Lin Chong and said: "You've been here quite a while, and despite our regard for Mr. Chai, we still haven't done anything about promoting you. Now there's a big army depot, five miles from the east gate. Every month there are deliveries of grain there, and there's a commission to be had from it. At present an old soldier is in charge but I'm sending you there now, and the old soldier will replace you at the Temple of the Heavenly Prince. You'll be able to make some money for yourself down there. The head gaoler will escort you to your new post."
"Very good, sir," said Lin Chong. Before leaving the fortress, he called on Li and his wife. "Today the Warden told me I am to take over the army depot," he told them. "What do you think it means?"
"That job's as good as the one you have at the Temple of the Heavenly Prince," Li said. "Whenever grain or provisions are delivered, you ought to get a kickback. Generally you'd have to pay quite a lot to get that job."
"They don't threaten me, they even find me a good job, whatever is going on?"
"I think you should relax, sir," said Li. "So long as there's no trouble, all seems to be well. The only thing is, you'll be a long way away. But after a while I'll come and see you, when I've a free moment." He got some wine and invited Lin Chong.
To be brief, the two bade each other goodbye and Lin Chong returned to the Temple of the Heavenly Prince to collect his things. He did not forget the dagger, and he also took a spear. Then with the gaoler he left the fortress and set off for the army depot. It was in the depths of winter. Red clouds filled the sky, a bitter wind was blowing and soon snow began to fall, the flakes eddying down till the earth was blanketed:
An icy murk holds the world in thrall. Heaven's white missives fall ever thicker and faster. In a moment everywhere's a pathless waste; in no time at all a thousand peaks can have vanished without trace. World of silver, world of white jade, where the traveller may think to be gazing on Mount Kunlun. If it goes on snowing till midnight, even those high passes will be rendered a level plain.
Together Lin Chong and the gaoler went forward. There was nowhere even to buy wine. Soon they reached the depot. It was surrounded by a yellow mud wall, with a big two-leaved gate. They pushed this open and found inside seven or eight storerooms or granaries with thatched roofs, while all around were stacks of hay for horses. In the midst of all this were two thatched huts. Inside one of these they found the old soldier, crouching over a brazier. The gaoler addressed him: "The Warden has sent Lin Chong here to replace you. You're to take over as guard at the Temple of the Heavenly Prince. You can hand over to him right now."
The old man took his keys and showed Lin Chong around: "Everything here in the granary has the official seal on it. These stacks of hay, now, they're all numbered," he explained. After checking all the numbers, he took Lin Chong back inside the hut. He collected his bags, and then said: "I'll let you have everything else, the stove, the pots, the bowls and dishes."
"I left the same kind of stuff in the Temple of the Heavenly Prince," said Lin Chong. "You're welcome to use it."
Before leaving, the old man pointed to a gourd which was hanging on the wall. "If you want to buy wine, there's a little place down the road, just go out of the hut and walk a mile or so east." Then he went with the gaoler back to the fortress.
As for Lin Chong, he threw his bundle and his bedding down on the bed, and sat down to make up the fire. There was a pile of charcoal in a corner of the hut and he took some pieces to replenish the brazier. He raised his eyes to survey his quarters. The hut was in a pitiful state of neglect, and with the wind howling outside it was all swaying and creaking. "How am I going to spend the whole winter here?" he asked himself. "As soon as it stops snowing I'll go to town and get a mason to come and repair it." He huddled closer to the fire but he was still freezing. Then he remembered something. "According to the old soldier there's a hamlet just a mile from here. Why don't I go and get myself some wine?" He got some change from his bundle, tied the gourd to the end of his spear, covered the fire, put on his felt hat, and went out, not forgetting to take the keys. He bolted the door of the hut. The main gate he also bolted, locking both halves. Taking the keys with him he set off at a steady pace towards the east. The snow scrunched under his feet like precious stones. As far as possible, he kept his back to the north wind as he went, for the storm was at its height. He had barely gone a quarter of a mile when he saw an ancient temple ahead. He lowered his head respectfully and murmured: "Guardian spirits protect me! In a few days I will come and burn some paper money here." A little further on he caught sight of a group of people and stopped to look. There was a bamboo hedge, and over the top of it you could see the straw bundle, sign of an inn. Lin Chong went straight in.
"Where have you come from, sir?" the innkeeper asked.
"Do you recognize this gourd?" Lin Chong said.
"It belongs to that old soldier who's caretaker over at the depot," the man answered.
"It used to," said Lin Chong.
"If you're the caretaker there now, you'd better sit down," the man said. "It's freezing weather. You need a cup or two and then you won't feel the wind so bad." He went and cut a plate of boiled beef, and warmed some wine that he offered to Lin Chong. The latter ate and drank, and then ordered more beef and more wine for himself. Then he had the gourd filled, picked up two pieces of beef, and deposited a handful of silver on the table. He tied the gourd to his spear again, and thrust the meat inside the front of his robe. "Thanks for your trouble," he said, and out he went. Once beyond the hedge, he had to face the same bitter wind for the return journey. With night approaching, the snow was falling even more thickly. In the old days there was a scholar who made a song about that dreadful snow:

Fierce wind sweeps the wilderness,
It's snowing like crazy:
Cotton tufts, candy floss, some pieces
Big as a basket.
Its weight has almost flattened
That hovel among the bamboos.
But in the rich man's mansion, why, it's nothing:
Red-hot braziers in animal shapes,
Soft cotton clothes and padded coats.
See him holding plum blossom,
Singing patriotic songs.
Not a thought for the poor,
He lives at peace with the world,
The man whose skin is thick,
Humming his odes.

Lin Chong trudged on through the snow in the teeth of the north wind, pressing forward till he arrived at the door of the depot. When he had unlocked it and entered, he let out a cry of dismay — though actually, who can doubt that Heaven is just and watches over the righteous, for it was that very snowstorm which saved his life! The two huts had collapsed under the weight of the snow. "What am I going to do?" he wondered to himself. He stuck his spear, with the gourd attached to it, into the snow. Fearing there might still be some embers burning in the brazier, he pushed aside the broken wall, and stuck his head and shoulders inside to feel around. The coals in the brazier had all been extinguished by the melting snow. He felt about on top of the bed but only managed to pull out his quilt. When he had succeeded in extricating himself, it was already completely dark. "I've nowhere even to make a fire," he thought. "What can I do?"
Then he remembered the old temple, just a few hundred yards down the road. That would provide some shelter. "I'll go there for tonight," he thought. "Then tomorrow I can think of something." He rolled up his quilt, took the spear with the gourd, closed the door again and locked it, and headed for the temple.
Entering the temple, he closed the door. Beside it there was a large stone. This he rolled across and leaned against the door. Then he looked about him. On the dais there was a statue of the Spirit of the Mountain, in golden armour, flanked by the Judge of Hell and a small demon. Beside these was a pile of paper offerings. A thorough inspection revealed no monks and no custodian. He stuck his spear and the gourd into the ground among the pile of paper and unfolded his quilt. He removed his felt hat and shook the snow from his clothing. He took off his outer tunic of white cotton which he found to be partly soaked. He put this together with his hat on the altar. He wrapped the lower half of his body in the quilt, and taking up the gourd began to drink the cold wine, accompanying it with the beef which he took from inside his robe.
While he was eating, a sudden cacophony of popping and banging started up outside. He leapt up and went to look out through a crack in the wall. A fire had broken out over in the granaries that were crackling and blazing fiercely:

Snow chokes a fire, hay feeds the flames;
Fanned by a breeze, surprise! from snow spring burning brands.
Can snow, when the fiery dragon leaps and prances,
Still thickly swirl? When the white stuff flies
How can the flames blaze higher and higher?
The sun, you'd say, has brought his glistening steeds
To pasture here, or else the scarlet bird
Banished from the southern sky has built its nest.
How can disaster rise from nothing thus?
It's such a sight to make the bravest man
Forget his name, the evillest turn tail.

When Lin Chong, taking his spear, was about to open the door and rush out to fight the fire, he heard voices outside. He remained hidden behind the door and listened. From the footsteps, three men were approaching the temple. The door was pushed but the stone held it. They pushed and pushed but to no avail. The three then stood under the temple eaves and watched the fire. One of them said: "Wasn't it a good plan?" Someone answered: "You and the warden, head gaoler, have shown true diligence! When we return to the capital I shall speak to the Marshal, and I guarantee that you gentlemen will all be given important posts! This really does away with Instructor Zhang's reasons for refusing!"
"Yes, this time we've settled Lin Chong's hash," said one of the others. "The Marshal's son is definitely going to recover now!"
"That Instructor Zhang, damn him!" said the other voice, "three or four times I've gone to tell him his son-in-law is dead, and he refused to believe it, that's why young Gao has just been going from bad to worse. But when the Marshal sent us here to enlist your help in this matter, I never dreamed we'd bring it to such a rapid conclusion."
"I just climbed the wall and lit a dozen or so fires all over the place among the granaries, he hadn't a hope of getting out."
"The whole place will be burnt down."
"Even if he did escape, burning down the military stores is a capital offence."
"We'd better get back to the town."
"Let's just have one more look. If we can pick up one or two bones to take back to the capital, the Marshal and his son will say we've really done a good job."
Lin Chong recognized the voices: one was the gaoler, one was Lieutenant Lu Qian, and the third was Fu An. "Heaven indeed was merciful," he thought. "If the roof had not fallen in, I would undoubtedly have been roasted alive by these scoundrels." Very carefully he pushed the stone aside. He grasped his spear, and pushing the temple door with his left hand, leapt out, shouting: "You're not going to get away with this, you swine!" The three men would have fled but terror gripped them and they found themselves quite unable to move. Lin Chong raised his arm and thrust, transfixing first of all the gaoler. Lieutenant Lu was bleating, "For mercy's sake!" but fear paralysed him too. Fu An tried to run for it but he had not gone ten paces when Lin Chong caught him with a single thrust through the heart and he fell to the ground. Lin Chong turned back to Lu Qian, who had taken perhaps three or four steps. "Where do you think you're going, traitor?" Lin Chong shouted, hitting him in the chest. He fell in the snow, and with a second thrust Lin Chong pinned him to the ground. Planting his foot on the man's chest, he took out his dagger and waved it in front of Lu Qian's face, shouting: "I never did you the slightest harm, you murderer. Why did you seek my destruction? Don't you know the saying, 'murder can be forgiven but treachery never'."
"You can't blame me," Lu Qian gasped. "I was under the Marshal's orders, I didn't dare disobey."
"You scum!" Lin Chong bellowed. "You and I grew up together, and now you come seeking my life. How can you tell me not to blame you? Here, take this!" Tearing the clothing from Lu's breast, he sliced it open with his dagger. Then, as the blood gushed everywhere, he thrust in his hand and tore out the heart and liver. He turned in time to see that the gaoler had crawled to his feet and was trying to get away. Lin Chong pounced on him, shouting, "Now you've shown what you really are, take this!" and struck off his head that he stuck on the end of his spear. Then he went back and cut off the heads of Fu An and Lu Qian as well. He put away his dagger and after knotting the hair of the three heads together went into the temple and placed them on the altar before the image of the Mountain Spirit. Then he put on his tunic, did up his sash, donned his felt hat, and finished off the cold wine in the gourd. He discarded his quilt and the gourd and taking up his spear left the temple and headed east. He had not gone much more than a mile when he met a crowd of villagers coming with buckets and pikes to fight the fire. Lin Chong said to them, "Quick, go and deal with it, I'm going to inform the authorities." And he hurried off, spear in hand.

All is according to Heaven's decree;
Their treachery doesn't succeed, you see.
Without the storm and the village liquor,
No doubt but he'd have been burnt to a cinder.
In the dark they followed the evil command,
But divine help that night was at hand.
With death so close, still coming off best,
Surely the hero's life is blessed!

With the snow falling more and more thickly Lin Chong marched eastwards half the night. Lightly dressed as he was, he had little protection against the freezing cold. Eventually he surveyed the snow-covered landscape and judged he had put a good distance between himself and the depot. Ahead of him, amidst a cluster of sparse trees in the distance, he spied a few thatched cottages, their roofs laden with snow. Light shone through the cracks in their dilapidated walls. Lin Chong approached one of these houses and pushed open the door. An old farmer was sitting inside, with four or five younger men around him hugging the fire which was blazing merrily in the hearth. Lin Chong walked right in and said: "Greetings, everybody. I'm from the prison fortress. My clothing is wet through with the snow. Would you allow me to dry it at your fire? I should be most grateful."
"You're welcome to," they said. "It's no problem."
Lin Chong dried his wet clothing by the fire. When it was nearly dry, he noticed a bottle warming beside the hearth, giving off an enticing aroma of wine.
"I've some money here," he said. "Would you consider selling me some wine?"
The old villager said: "Every night we take turns to guard the grain bins. It's only the fourth watch and it's a really cold night. We've only got this little drop, how can there be enough for you as well? Not a hope!"
"But just two or three little bowls would do me, just to keep the cold out," Lin Chong insisted.
"You just stop bothering us," the old man said.
The smell of the wine had really aroused Lin Chong's thirst. "It's no good," he said. "You'll have to give me some."
Everyone now said, "Look, we did you a favour and let you dry your clothes by the fire. And now you want to take our wine? Get out of here. If you don't, we'll have to strap you up."
Lin Chong was angered. "These are uncivil rogues," he said to himself, and with the end of his spear he stirred the burning embers of the fire till they flew up in the old man's face. He went on poking about with his spear till he managed to singe the old man's beard. All the peasants leapt to their feet. Lin Chong began to belabor them with the shaft of his spear. The old man fled first; the others seemed too shocked to move, and it was only after Lin Chong had tickled them with his spear that they too took to their heels.
"Well," said Lin Chong to himself, "they've all gone. That leaves me to enjoy the wine." On the earthen platform that functioned as a couch he found two coconut ladles. He poured the wine into one of these and drank, till half the wine was gone. Then he picked up his spear and walked out of the door. He staggered and stumbled along with a most uneven gait. Before he had gone half a mile, a gust of wind bowled him over, and he rolled into a gully from which he had no power to raise himself. When a drunk falls down he generally fails to get up. Lin Chong was drunk, so there he remained, lying helpless in the snow.
Now the peasants had gone to fetch reinforcements, and with twenty or so others, armed with spears, they rushed back to the cottage. Finding Lin Chong gone, they followed his footprints till they came upon him lying in the gully, his spear abandoned on one side. Together they seized and bound him and shortly before dawn took him to a certain place. And what place was that? Well, thereby hangs a tale. And with it goes the reason why in Duckweed Marsh the armoured sampans and vessels of war are to gather in their thousands, and warriors and heroes are drawn up in serried ranks in the stronghold of the rivers and lakes, and

The odour of death strikes cold to the heart;
The breath of slaughter chills the bones.

One day Lin Chong was taking a stroll when he heard someone behind him calling out, and upon turning round he recognized the man as Li Xiao-er, who used to be a waiter in an inn at the Eastern Capital. While there Lin Chong treated him well. Afterwards this waiter stole money belonging to the proprietor of the inn for which he was arrested. But Lin Chong intervened, and begged that the boy not be sent to the yamen, and gave money to make up the loss. As the waiter could not stay in the Eastern Capital Lin Chong gave him money to go to some other place. It was quite accidental that he met Lin Chong on that day.
"Li Xiao-er, what are you doing here?"
Li Xiao-er saluted and replied, "After you had assisted me I travelled in many directions without meeting with any assistance and happened to come to Cangzhou where I met a man named Wang, who was proprietor of an inn here, and he employed me as a waiter. I was very good at preparing food, and made such delicious dishes that the visitors appreciated them and this led to a successful business. I married the daughter of the proprietor, and when the latter and his wife died I was in sole charge, and opened a restaurant just opposite the barracks. I happen to meet you as I return from collecting some bills, and wish to inquire what you are doing here."
Lin Chong pointed to his face, and said, "I incurred the enmity of Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guard, who plotted against me, and had me tried, branded, and then banished to this place. I have been appointed to look after the Heavenly Kings Temple but I cannot say what I may do next. I did not expect to meet you here."
Li Xiao-er asked Lin Chong to come and sit down in his home. Upon arrival there the former introduced his wife who saluted, and expressed her pleasure in meeting her husband's benefactor.

Li Xiao-er said, "We have no relatives here so that for our benefactor to visit us today is just like a gift from heaven."
"I am a criminal," said Lin Chong, "and I am afraid that my visit may disgrace you in the eyes of your neighbours."
"Don't talk like that because everybody is aware of your fame. We shall be very pleased to wash and mend your clothes."
They all had dinner and wine together, and in the evening Lin Chong went back to the temple. After that he went very often to Li Xiao-er's home, and the latter often sent soup and tea to the temple for him. He however always paid them with money, because these two treated him so well.
The time quickly passed in this way until it was winter. Li Xiao-er's wife always washed and repaired Lin Chong's cotton gowns and jackets.
One day as Li Xiao-er was preparing a meal, two men entered his restaurant, and sat down. One of them was wearing a military uniform, and was accompanied by a soldier. Li Xiao-er asked them whether they wanted any wine, and the officer took out an tael of silver and said, "Put this money in your till, and bring us three or four bottles of wine. When our guests arrive I do not want you to ask questions but just bring us fruit, vegetables, and wine."
Li Xiao-er asked, "Who will be your guests?"
The officer replied, "I must trouble you to go to the jail, and request the superintendent and the head jailer to come here to discuss a matter with me." Li Xiao-er agreed to do this, and went straightway to the jail, and very soon returned with the two men.
Upon meeting, the superintendent of the jail said that he was not aware of having met the officer before, and asked for his name.
The officer replied that he had a letter which would explain matters but suggested that they should first have a drink.
Li Xiao-er opened the bottles of wine, and placed vegetables, fruit, and wine on the table. The officer poured out the wine, and offered it to the guests, and they then all sat down. Li Xiao-er bustled about as busy as a shuttle in a loom. The soldier who was with the officer asked Li to bring some hot water, so that he could warm the wine himself. But after they had drunk about ten cups of wine they again summoned Li Xiao-er to bring some more wine. The officer also told him that they would keep the wine warm themselves, and that he need not come again unless summoned, as they had some private business to discuss. Li Xiao-er therefore went to the door, and talked with his wife. He told her that the two men who had just arrived were not quite straightforward.
His wife asked what had given him that impression.
Li Xiao-er said, "According their pronunciation these men are evidently from the Eastern Capital but the superintendent has not met them before. And when I served them with wine I heard the officer mention the name of Marshal Gao Qiu. I therefore think that their business has something to do with Lin Chong. So I will stand at the door here, and watch them while you go behind the partition where they sit and listen to their conversation."
His wife said, "You had better go to the jail, and tell Lin Chong to come here, and see whether he knows the officer."
Li Xiao-er said, "You do not know that Lin Chong is very quick-tempered, and he might want to kill the man, or burn the place down. And if it is that officer Lu Qian whom he told us about a few days ago how could he keep quiet? If there was any row we should be implicated. So you go and listen, and afterwards we will decide what to do."
His wife agreed to this, and went off to listen. After a while she returned and said, "Those four men are exchanging confidential whispers so that I cannot make out what they are talking about. But the officer took a bundle and handed it to the superintendent. That might be some silver or gold. The superintendent then said, 'I will be responsible for this affair, and see that he is killed.'"
Just then the men called out for more soup. Li Xiao-er hurried forward and supplied fresh soup and rice. While doing this he saw that the superintendent had a letter in his hand. When the bills had been settled the superintendent and the head jailer departed, and the officer and his soldier soon followed suit.
Very soon afterwards Lin Chong entered the restaurant, and asked Li Xiao-er how business had been during the last few days. Li Xiao-er asked him to sit down as he had a very important matter to speak to him about. He said, "Just now an officer has arrived from the Eastern Capital who does not appear to be straight, and he invited the jail superintendent and head jailer to have wine with him here. While they were here I heard the officer mention the name of Marshal Gao and that made me suspicious, and I told my wife to listen behind the partition. But they whispered in each others' ears so much that my wife could not hear what they said. But she did hear the superintendent of the jail say that he would be responsible and would see that the man was killed. The officer also handed a bundle of silver or gold to the jail superintendent and head jailer, and after drinking some more wine they departed. Do you know who the officer is? I suspect and am also afraid that this will result in some trouble for you."
Lin Chong asked what the officer's appearance was like.
"He is a man of short build, has a fair complexion, no mustache, and looks about thirty years of age. The soldier with him is also short of stature but has a swarthy complexion."
Lin Chong upon hearing this was startled. "That officer is certainly Lu Qian, and that mean rascal has come here to injure me. But should I meet him I will beat his bones and flesh into pulp."
"But you must be on your guard against him. Have you not heard that ancient saying, 'When eating beware of belching; when walking beware of falling'?"
Lin Chong was very angry, went to the street and bought a dagger which he hid on his person, and searched for that officer in all the streets and alleys.
Both Li Xiao-er and his wife were quite alarmed but that evening nothing happened. But the next morning Lin Chong rose very early, and after washing and cleaning his teeth, took his dagger, and again searched for Lu Qian in all the lanes and alleyways both inside and outside of Cangzhou city. All was quiet inside the jail.
Lin Chong spoke to Li Xiao-er, "Nothing has happened today."
Li Xiao-er said, "My benefactor, we hope that things will remain like this but you must still be extremely careful."
Lin Chong returned to the Heavenly Kings Temple for the night. During the next five days he continued his search for Lu Qian without success, and his keenness for revenge gradually disappeared.
On the sixth day the superintendent summoned Lin Chong to come to the place where the roll of prisoners was generally called, and said to him, "You have been here a long time but we have not promoted you in spite of the influence of Squire Chai Jin. About five //outside the Eastern Gate there is a forage depot for the army. Every month we receive hay and fodder. There is an old soldier there who manages the depot, and you can exchange duties with him, and perhaps make some extra money for yourself. You can go with the head jailer, and take over the new duty."
Lin Chong replied that he would go. He then left the prison, and went to Li Xiao-er's place. Where he asked them what they thought of the new arrangement.
Li Xiao-er said that the new job was much better than looking after the temple, as he could make money. And previously anybody who got that position had to bribe the superintendent.
"But instead of injuring me he is giving me a better job. I cannot understand this move."
Li Xiao-er said, "Well, you need not be suspicious, because if there is no trouble it will be very fine. That place is a long way from here but when I have time I will go and see you." He got some wine, and offered it to Lin Chong. When they separated Lin Chong went back to the Heavenly Kings Temple, packed up his bundle, and took his dagger and a long spear. He then took leave of the superintendent, and departed with the head jailer, for the forage depot. The weather was extremely cold with a clouded sky. A cold wind was blowing from the north and snow was falling heavily. On the way there was no inn where they could stop for a drink of wine, and they soon reached the depot. There was a mud wall running round the inclosure, and a large gate with two leaves. Pushing the gate open they saw inside about eight sheds for beans, etc., many stacks of hay on all sides, and two rooms for the caretaker. When they came to the caretaker's rooms they found the old soldier warming his hands at the fire.
The head jailer said, "The superintendent has sent this man Lin Chong to take over your duties, and you are to perform his duties at the Heavenly Kings Temple. So you can hand over the place immediately."
The old soldier took the keys, and said to Lin Chong, "The officials have sealed up the doors of the sheds containing the fodder but you had better count the number of stacks of hay." After doing this they returned to the living quarters. The old soldier then got his baggage together, and when leaving he said, "I will lend you the stove, the rice boiler, the cups and saucers."
Lin Chong said he had such things at the Heavenly Kings Temple, and if he liked he could use them.
The old soldier pointed to a gourd on the wall, and said, "Should you want to buy some wine you can take that to a small village or market about a //from here in an easterly direction." He then departed with the head jailer.
Lin Chong put the baggage away, and spread his quilts on the bed. At the back of the room was some firewood and charcoal so he put some on the stove which was standing close to his bed. Upon lying down and looking at the ceiling he noticed that there were many holes through which the wind was blowing strongly.
He soliloquized, "I cannot stay here all winter with the roof like that, so when it is fine I will go into the town, and get a bricklayer to come and repair the roof." After a little time he felt cold so he remembered what the old soldier had told him, and decided to go to the village and buy some wine. He took some silver from his bag, picked up his spear and the gourd for the wine and put a cover on the fire. He put on his felt cap, and locked the doors. Then carrying the keys with him he went along the road towards the east. The snow lay deep on the ground like masses of beautiful white jade, and as there was a strong north wind blowing he walked sideways with his back half to the wind. The snow was falling fast, and he had not gone more than a quarter of a //when he saw an old temple at the side of the road. He entered and bowing his head to the image he said, "Protect me, O ye gods, and later I will burn paper money for you." He then resumed his journey, and soon came to a number of houses. He saw a bamboo fence with a signboard of a wine shop sticking outside. He entered the wine shop, and the proprietor spoke to him. "Where are you from?"
"Do you recognize this gourd?"
The proprietor said that it belonged to the old soldier at the fodder depot.
Lin Chong admitted it. "Since you are the keeper of the fodder compound please take a seat," said the proprietor. "And as the weather is very cold, you had better have three cups of wine on my account as you are a newcomer." He brought forward a kettle of hot wine, and also cut up a plateful of beef, and requested him to dine.
Lin Chong took out some silver and with it bought his gourd full of wine, and placed the beef away in his breast, and expressed his thanks for their kind treatment. He then left the inn, and faced the strong, cold wind. He saw that the snow was falling more heavily than before. He trudged through the snow, heading into the cold north wind, and hurried to the fodder depot where he unlocked the door, and entered his miserable quarters.
The gods in heaven protect good and just men, and they no doubt saved the life of Lin Chong by this heavy fall of snow that by its weight had broken down the grass hut where he was going to sleep. When he saw this he wondered what he must do. He was afraid that the stove might ignite the debris so putting his lance and gourd down on the snow he parted the grass and looked underneath. Creeping inside he found that the fire had been extinguished by the snow. He then felt around for the bed, and dragged away the cotton quilt. Withdrawing his body from the wreckage he looked around and as it was quite dark and he had no place to make a fire he wondered what he must do. He remembered however that there was the old temple a few hundred yards down the road where he could shelter. So he decided to go and sleep there for the night, and arrange matters the following day. He rolled up the quilt, and carrying the gourd of wine on the lance over his shoulder he locked the gate again, and left for the temple. Upon entering the temple he closed the door, and placed a large stone against it. Looking round he saw an image of the "Mountain Spirit" covered with gilt armor, attended by a judge of the afterlife, and a small demon on each side. On one side was a large pile of loose paper, and there was evidently nobody in charge. Placing his spear and the gourd of wine on the heap of paper, he unrolled his quilt, and shaked the snow off his clothes. His felt cap and outer gown were very wet so he took them off, and placed them on the altar. He then lay down with the quilt covering half his body, and drank the wine, and ate the meat which he had brought with him.
While lying there he heard a sound of crackling outside so he jumped up and peeping through a hole in the window he saw that the fodder depot was all in flames. He went to get his spear with the object of going to put out the fire when he heard some men outside talking. Hiding behind the door he found that there were three men who were coming to the temple. They pushed at the door but could not open it on account of the large stone he had placed there. So they stood under the eaves of the temple watching the fire, and one man spoke. "Is not this a good plan?"
Another man remarked, "Both of you, the superintendent and the head jailer certainly arranged the matter very well, and when I get back to the Eastern Capital, and report it to the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, you two will certainly be promoted. Then Drill Instructor Zhang will have no ground for further objection to the marriage."
Another man said, "Lin Chong has certainly been caught in our trap this time. Master Gao will soon be cured of his sickness now!"
Another man said, "A man was sent four or five times to plead with Drill Instructor Zhang, and said that his son-in-law Lin Chong was dead. But Zhang would not agree to let his daughter remarry. As Master Gao only got worse Marshal Gao Qiu ordered us to do this business, and we did not expect to get it finished so soon."
Another man said, "I went inside the fence and lit about ten stacks of hay on every side, so that he could not get out."
Another man said, "It is nearly all burnt down now."
Lin Chong listening heard another man say: "Even if Lin Chong escapes he will have to answer a serious charge of allowing a big depot full of army fodder to be burnt."
The other man said, "Let us go back to the town."
A man said, "It will be better if we wait until the fire is out, and then we can go and get one or two of his bones, and then when we report the matter to Marshal Gao Qiu and also Master Gao, they will see that we did the work thoroughly."
Lin Chong knew by listening that one of the men was the head jailer, and the others were Lu Qian and Fu An. He thought, "Heaven has had pity on Lin Chong! If that straw hut had not fallen down I would certainly have been burnt to death." He then quietly removed the stone from the door, and holding his spear in one hand he opened the door with his left hand, and shouted out, "Where are you thieves going?"
The three men wanted to get away at once but they were so startled that they could not move. Lin Chong stabbed the head jailer with his spear. Lu Qian called out, "Spare my life!" but he was so frightened out of his wits that he could not move either hand or foot. Fu An ran about ten steps but Lin Chong caught him up and stabbed him in the back. He turned round, and saw that Lu Qian had walked away a few steps. He shouted at him, "You villain! Where are you going?" He seized Lu Qian, and threw him on the ground. He then stuck his spear in the ground, and planted his foot on Lu Qian's breast. He then drew his sword, and lay it across Lu Qian's face. He shouted, "You villain! Previously I had no hatred of you so why did you try to injure me?" An old saying says, "Murder may be excused sometimes but generally no excuse can be allowed."
Lu Qian said, "This was not my affair. I am only carrying out the order of the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, and dared not disobey."
Lin Chong abused him, "You villain! I have been a friend of yours since we were children, and yet you come now to kill me, although you say it is not your business. I will give you a taste of my sword." He opened Lu Qian's dress, and made a big wound in his breast—the blood rushing out in all directions. He then plucked out his heart. Turning his head he noticed that the head jailer had got up, and was getting away. Lin Chong pushed him down, and shouted, "You are a vile fellow! I will also give you a taste of my sword!" He then cut off his head and stuck it to the end of his spear. He then cut off the heads of Lu Qian and Fu An, and tying the hair in one knot took all three heads into the temple, and placed them on the altar. He then put on his gown, and cap, and drank the wine from the gourd. Then picking up his spear he left the temple going east. After walking about a //he came to a village where the men were getting hooks and buckets of water to go and put out the fire. Lin Chong said to them, "You had better hurry up if you are going to put out the fire. I am going to report the matter to the officials." He then proceeded on his way. The snow was still falling heavily. After walking for about an hour his body was very cold. Looking round he saw that the flames of the fodder depot were now a long way off. Where he had stopped was a dense forest and among the trees were a number of straw huts covered with heavy snow. Through the cracks gleams of light were streaming. He walked towards the huts, and pushing open the door of one, he saw inside an old farmer, and about five farm labourers sitting in a circle round a glaring fire warming their hands. He entered and standing facing the old farmer, he said, "Gentlemen, I salute you. I am employed at the fodder depot belonging to the prison, and as my clothes are wet through I request that you allow me to dry them at your fire."
"You can dry them if you like," said the farmer.
As Lin Chong was drying his clothes he saw at the side of the fire a jar that was being warmed, and from which came the aroma of wine. So he told them that he had some silver, and wished to buy some of their wine.
The farmer said, "We take turns during the night in guarding the rice bin, and we each take a drink of the wine as it is so cold. It is now about 4 A.M., and as there won't be enough for us how can we let you have some? There is no chance of you getting any."
"Just sell me only two or three cups of wine to keep out the cold."
The farmer said, "Don't be so greedy!"
But Lin Chong could not withstand the aroma of the wine so he said, "There is no other way. I must have some."
All the men replied, "We have been kind enough to let you dry your clothes, and now you want to drink our wine. Get off at once, and if you don't go we shall have to tie you up."
Upon hearing this, Lin Chong became angry, and said that they were very unreasonable. He then took his spear, and putting it under a piece of wood in the fire he flicked the wood into the face of the old farmer burning his mustache. He then scattered the remains of the fire. The farm labourers jumped up, and the farmer ran outside. Lin Chong thrust about him with his spear, and the labourers ran away but not before they had been beaten with the spear.
Lin Chong soliloquized, "So they have all gone! Now, you sir can make merry with the wine." Above the bed were two ladles so taking one he poured out half of the wine, and drank it off. Then picking up his spear he left the hut. But he had drunk too much, and staggered about in all directions. After walking a short distance he came to a ravine where the bitterly cold wind brought him down. It is generally the case that drunken men once fallen cannot get up again, and Lin Chong lay in the snow in his drunken sleep.
The farm labourers had the assistance of more than twenty men but upon reaching the straw hut they could not find Lin Chong. So they followed his footprints in the snow, and so came to the place where he was lying in the snow with his spear at his side. They tied him up with ropes, and then carried him away to another place. Afterwards, it happened that many thousands of armed boats were arranged in close order in a pool of water surrounded by high reeds, and in the middle of the pool was a fortress occupied by over 100 valiant heroes.

Malice harboured deadly dim;
Chilled to the marrow in the bones.

011

Zhu Gui Shoots a Whistling Signal Arrow from the Lakeside Pavilion Arbour as a sign; Lin Chong Arrives & Climbs Mount Liang Marsh in the Snowy Night During a Heavy Snowstorm

The night Panther Head Lin Chong fell drunk in the snow and was unable to rise, the vassals bound him with ropes and brought him to a manor. Another vassal came out and said: "Our lord is still asleep. Let's hang him up below the entry tower." At dawn, Lin awakened, quite sober. He looked around him. It certainly was a large manor.
"Who has dared to suspend me here?" He shouted.
Vassals grabbed sticks and came out of the gate-house. "You've got the nerve to complain!"
The old vassal whose whiskers had been singed said: "Don't bother talking to him. Just drub him! We can question him when our lord gets up."
Swarming around Lin Chong, the vassals flailed him with their sticks. He couldn't escape. "Beat away!" he cried. "I'll make you regret this!"
Another vassal approached and said: "The lord is coming."
Lin hazily saw an official-looking man, hands clasped behind his back, emerge from a building and descend from the porch.
"Who are you beating there?" the man called.
"We caught this rice thief last night," the vassals replied.

The man walked over and recognized Lin Chong. He quickly ordered the vassals to desist and untied Lin's bonds.
"What are you doing tied up here, Drill Instructor?" he asked.
On hearing this, the vassals all withdrew.
Standing before Lin Chong was none other than Chai Jin. "Save me, Excellency!" Lin beseeched.
"Why have these villagers been humiliating you?"
"It's a long story."
The two went inside and sat down. Lin recounted his adventures in detail, starting with the burning of the fodder depot.
"What bad luck you've had, brother," said Chai Jin. "But our meeting today is Heaven-sent. You needn't worry. This place is my eastern manor. Stay a while, then we'll decide what to do."
He ordered a vassal to bring fresh clothes and, when Lin had changed completely, invited him into a heated room and wined and dined him. Lin remained in the eastern manor for another six or seven days. Of that we'll say no more.

Let us speak rather of Cangzhou, where the warden of the garrison prison presented an accusation against Lin Chong for the murder of the head keeper, Captain Lu Qian and Fu An, and for burning down the army fodder depot. The prefect was astonished. He immediately issued an order for Lin Chong's arrest, and sent police to post pictures of him in every village and town, inn and shop, plus notices offering three thousand strings of cash for his apprehension. The hotness of the pursuit caused a stir among the local people.
Lin, in the eastern manor, was on pins and needles when he heard about it. He said to Chai Jin: "You'd better not keep me here, Excellency. They're making a house to house search. If they find me in the manor, you'll be implicated, and that's no good. Let me impose on your chivalry and generosity and borrow a little travelling money. I'll find another refuge. If I live I'll repay you with my complete devotion."
"Since you insist on leaving, brother, I have a place to suggest. I'll give you a letter of introduction. How will that be?"
"That's very kind of you. Where is this place?"
"It's called Liangshan Marsh, in Jizhou Prefecture, Shandong Province. The area is about eight hundred li in circumference, and includes the Water-Girt Fortress and the Liao-er Lowlands. Three bold men have set up a stronghold there. The first is Wang Lun the White-Clad Scholar. The second is Skyscraper Du Qian. The third is Song Wan, Guardian of the Clouds. They've formed a band of seven or eight hundred and rob and pillage. Many who have committed capital crimes find shelter among them. I'm on very good terms with the three leaders. We frequently exchange letters. Suppose I write an introduction recommending that you join them?"
"Fine if that's what you think best. I'm very grateful."
"The trouble is Cangzhou is plastered with notices for your arrest, and two army officers are checking travellers at the city gate, and that's the way you have to go." Chai Jin lowered his head in thought. Then he looked up. "I have an idea. We'll escort you."
"I'll never forget you kindness," said Lin Chong.
Chai Jin sent a vassal ahead through the city gate with Lin's luggage. Then he gathered a troop of twenty or thirty horsemen, armed with bows and arrows, carrying falcons and accompanied by hunting dogs, and all gaily set forth, with Lin Chong also mounted, in their midst. The army officers at the city gate had been to Chai Jin's manor before having been appointed to this post and knew him well.
When the band of hunters arrived, they rose from their seats atop the gate-tower and called: "Out for sport, Excellency?"
Chai Jin politely dismounted. "What are you two doing here?"
"The prefect has posted notices for the arrest of the criminal Lin Chong. We've been ordered to question every traveller who passes through this gate."
"I have Lin Chong right here in my troop," Chai Jin said with a laugh. "Don't you recognize him?"
The army officers chuckled. "Your Excellency is very familiar with the law. You'd never willingly slip him out. Please mount."
"You trust me that much?" Chai Jin smiled. "If we get any game, I'll present you with some on the way back." He bid the officers farewell, got on his horse, and the troop trotted through the gate.
They rode about fifteen li to where the vassal was waiting. Chai Jin told Lin Chong to dismount, remove his hunter's garb and put on his own clothes that the vassal had brought. Lin tied his sword to his waist, put on his red-tasseled felt hat, shouldered his pack, took his halberd in hand, bid Chai Jin a respectful farewell, and marched off down the road.
Chai Jin and his men mounted their horses and went hunting. Not until evening did they finally come back through the gate. They gave the officers some game and returned to the manor. Of this we'll say no more.
Lin Chong walked for over ten days. At dusk, heavy clouds gathered in the winter sky and the wind began to blow. Thick snowflakes drifted down as far as the eye could see. Lin pressed on. It was turning very cold.
Towards evening he saw in the distance beside a lake a wine shop almost completely submerged in the snow. Lin hurried towards it, raised the reed curtain and entered. He beat the snow from his clothes and looked around. There were plenty of seats. He selected a place and sat down. He leaned his halberd against the wall, removed his pack, hung up his felt hat and sword. A waiter came over.
"How much wine, sir?"
"Two measures, for a start."
The waiter drew two measures from a cask and placed the wine on the table.
"Anything to go with the wine?" Lin asked.
"We've got raw and cooked beef, fat goose and crisp fried chicken."
"Cut me two catties of cooked beef."
The waiter soon returned with a platter of beef, several vegetable dishes and a large bowl into which he poured the wine. Lin finished three or four bowls. He noticed a man walk to the door and look at the snow, his hands clasped behind his back.
"Who is that fellow, drinking?" the man asked the waiter.
The man was wearing a warm hat with a long peak, a sable-lined jacket and deerskin boots. Tall, stalwart, with cheekbones like fists, he was adorned with a mustache and goatee. He continued watching the snow.
Lin Chong summoned the waiter to pour more wine. "Have a bowl with me," he suggested. The waiter did so.
"How far is it from here to Liangshan Marsh?" queried Lin.
"Only a few li but you must go by water. There's no way to get there by land. You have to take a boat."
"Find one for me, then."
"Where would I find a boat in this snowstorm and at this time of night?"
"I'll pay you well. Find me a boat and ferry me across."
"There isn't any place to ask."
"A fine state of affairs!" Lin thought to himself. He drank a few more bowls of wine. "Once I was a drill instructor in the capital," he brooded. "I strolled and drank at will in every street and mart. Who would have thought that thief Gao Qiu would have reduced me to this condition, the mark of a criminal on my face, exiled here! I can't go home, no place is safe. How lonely I am!"
He told the waiter to bring him a brush-pen and ink. Drunk and depressed, he wrote these lines on the whitewashed wall:

Chivalrous is Lin Chong,
The most loyal of men,
Renowned among the gallant,
He'll lead heroes of the land.
By tragedy set adrift,
He's suffered many setbacks;
But when he has his way,
Mount Tai will bow before him!

Lin threw down the pen and drank. The man in the sable jacket walked up and grabbed him around the waist, exclaiming: "You've got your nerve! In Cangzhou you committed a capital crime, and here you are! Three thousand strings of cash are offered for your capture. What do you say to that?"
"Who do you think I am?"
"Aren't you Lin Chong?"
"My name is Zhang."
The man laughed. "Rot. You wrote your name on the wall, and the golden print is on your face. You can't lie your way out of it!"
"Are you really planning to turn me in?"
Again the man laughed. "What for? Come, we'll talk in private." He led Lin to a room in the rear overlooking the water and told the waiter to light the lamp. Lin and he bowed to each other and sat down on opposite sides of the table.
"I heard you asking for a boat to go to Liangshan Marsh, brother," said the man. "That's an outlaws' mountain stronghold. Why do you want to go there?"
"To be frank, the police are hot on my heels, and I've no place to hide. I've come to join the band on the mountain."
"In that case you need an introduction."
"I have one from a friend in Henghai County, Cangzhou Prefecture."
"You don't mean the Small Whirlwind Chai Jin?"
"How did you know?"
"He's on very good terms with the leaders of the mountain stronghold. They write to each other often." The man explained that when Wang Lun was on the run, he and Du Qian had been given shelter by Chai Jin. They lived in his manor for some time, and he gave them silver for travelling expenses when they left. They were very grateful.
"You are one of them and I didn't know," Lin exclaimed. "I 'had eyes and didn't recognize Mount Taishan!' Please tell me your name." He bowed politely.
The man returned the bow. "This humble person is the lookout for Chieftain Wang. I am called Zhu Gui. I come originally from Yishui County in Yizhou Prefecture. Among the fraternity I'm known as the Dry-Land Crocodile. In the guise of running this wine shop my job is to observe the movements of merchants and travellers. I let the stronghold know if they are carrying anything of value. When you asked about Liangshan Marsh I thought I'd better find out more about you. Then you wrote you name on the wall, and I remembered people from the capital telling of your gallantry. I never thought we'd meet here today. Since Lord Chai has written an introduction, Chieftain Wang is sure to welcome a man of your splendid reputation."
Zhu Gui feasted Lin with a meal of fish and meat and wine and delicacies. They ate and drank in the waterside room till half the night was gone.
"How can I find a boat to ferry me across?" Lin Chong asked.
"There are boats here, brother," said Zhu Gui. "Don't worry about that. First get some rest. Then, please rise at the fifth watch and come here. I'll go with you ."
Both men retired to their respective rooms. Zhu Gui woke Lin at the fifth watch. They washed and rinsed their mouths, downed four or five cups of wine and ate some meat. The sky was still not yet light.
Zhu Gui opened a window of the waterside room. He fitted a whistling arrow to a magpie-decorated bow and let fly towards a creek in a thicket of reeds on the other side of a cove.
"Why have you done that?" asked Lin.
"That was a signal arrow to the mountain stronghold. A boat will come soon now."
Not long after, from the reeds opposite a fast boat appeared, sculled by three or four men. It stopped beneath the waterside room. Lin collected his weapons and luggage and Zhu Gui conducted him to the craft. The boatmen propelled the vessel across the lake to the Shore of Golden Sands. There Lin Chong and Zhu Gui disembarked. One of the men went with them and carried Lin's things. The others took the boat back to the creek.
Zhu and Lin began climbing. Huge trees flanked the trail. Halfway up the mountain was a pavilion. A turn beyond that and they saw a large fortified pass. Before it were racks of spears and swords and bows and lances. On all sides were logs and boulders for rolling down the hill against invaders. Brigands went on ahead to announce them, then Lin and Zhu entered the pass.
They walked between two rows of pennants and battle insignia, and crossed two narrow defiles before coming to the gate of the stronghold itself. On every side were high mountains, with magnificent passes lying in between, together forming a powerful enclosure. In the centre was a mirror-smooth plain, about four thousand feet in circumference. The main gate of the stronghold faced the pass. Other buildings stood in wings to left and right.
Zhu Gui led Lin Chong to Righteous Fraternity Hall. A bold fellow sat in an armchair in the middle. This was the White-Clad Scholar Wang Lun. The man in the armchair to his left was Skyscraper Du Qian. In an armchair to his right sat Song Wan, Guardian of the Clouds. The two travellers came forward and hailed the brigands respectfully, with Lin Chong standing by Zhu Gui's side.
"This is Lin Chong the Panther Head," said Zhu Gui, "drill instructor in the capital's Mighty Imperial Guards. Because Marshal Gao decided to ruin Him, he was marked as a criminal and exiled to Cangzhou. There, the army fodder depot he was put in charge of was burned down and, in a struggle, he killed three men. He took refuge with Lord Chai, and they formed strong respect for each other. His Excellency has written a letter of introduction for him to join our company."
Lin Chong presented his letter. Wang Lun opened and read it, and asked Lin to be seated in a fourth armchair, and Zhu Gui in a fifth. He ordered a man to bring wine, and all drank three rounds.
"Lord Chai is well, I hope?"
"He hunts and relaxes in the outskirts of the town everyday."
Wang Lun fell silent. "I'm a scholar who failed in the civil service examinations," he thought. "In a fury I came here with Du Qian and turned bandit. Later, Song Wan joined us, and we formed this big company. I'm not particularly able, and Du Qian and Song Wan have only ordinary skill at arms. This fellow was a drill instructor in the Imperial Guards. He must be an excellent military man. If we accept him and he sees what duds we are, he'll probably want to take over, and we won't be able to stop him. I'd better just be a little rude, make some excuse and send him back down the mountain. That will avoid any trouble. It's not very courteous to Chai Jin, in view of all his kindness but that can't be helped."
He ordered more wine and food and laid a feast for Lin Chong. Together, all ate and drank. When they had finished, on Wang Lun's instructions one of the men brought a platter bearing fifty ounces of white silver and two bolts of fine silk and placed them before Lin. Wang Lun rose.
"Lord Chai has sent a letter recommending that you, Drill Instructor, join our humble band. But unfortunately we have little grain, our buildings are in poor condition, our forces are small. It wouldn't be right if we impeded your career. We offer these paltry gifts in the hope that you won't scorn them. Forgive us and seek a place in some big stronghold."
"Permit me to reply, three chieftains," said Lin Chong. "I have come from afar to place myself under your famed command. I seek, relying on the prestige of Lord Chai, to join your company. Though I have no talents, I hope you will accept me. I have no other desire than to pledge you my life. Nothing would make me happier. I want no silver or gifts. Please understand me."
"Our place is small. How could we give you a suitable position? Please excuse us."
Zhu Gui intervened. "Forgive me for speaking up, elder brothers," he said. "Although our stronghold is short of grain, we can obtain more from villages and towns near and far. There is plenty of wood in the mountains and by the streams, enough to build a thousand new houses if need be. This man has brought an introduction from Lord Chai. How can we tell him to go? This stronghold owes Chai a great deal. It would be very embarrassing if he heard that we refused. What's more, Lin Chong is a man of much skill. He would be a big asset to us."
Du Qian agreed. "What does it matter if we add one more?" he said. "Chai will be offended if we don't keep him. He'll think us ungrateful. We owe him so much. How can we send away a man he introduces?"
Song Wan also put in a word to Wang Lun. "For His Excellency's sake, we must let Lin Chong join as one of our stronghold's leaders. Otherwise, the whole fraternity of gallant men will despise us for our lack of chivalry."
"But don't you realize, brothers," Wang Lun argued, "although he's committed a capital crime in Cangzhou, we don't know much about him. What if he's come to spy on us?"
"I want to join you because I'm a condemned man," said Lin. "Why should you suspect me?"
"Very well, then," said Wang Lun. "Since you really wish to become one of us, you'll have to present a membership certificate."

"I can read and write pretty well. If you'll give me paper and pen I'll write one out."
Zhu Gui laughed. "You don't understand, Drill Instructor. We demand a membership certificate from any bold man who wants to join our band. That means you have to go down the mountain, kill a man, and bring us his head to prove yourself. That's what we call a 'membership certificate.' "
"That won't be hard. I'll go down and wait. I'm only afraid that no one will come along."
"I give you three days," said Wang Lun. "If you bring the membership certificate in that time, we'll accept you. If you don't, you'll have to excuse us."
Lin Chong agreed to the chieftain's terms.
After the meeting Zhu Gui went down the mountain and returned to his wine shop. Lin Chong took his weapons and luggage and followed one of the bandits to the guest house, where he spent the night.
He rose early the next morning. After breakfast he tied on his sword, picked up his halberd and had one of the bandits lead him down the mountain. They crossed the lake in a boat and chose a secluded place beside a path to wait for travellers. All day they waited but by dusk not a single traveller had come their way. Lin gloomily again crossed the water with the bandit and returned to the stronghold.
"Have you got your membership certificate?" Wang Lun asked.
"No, "said Lin. "No one came today."
"If you don't bring one tomorrow your chances of staying here are slim."
Lin Chong didn't reply. He went unhappily to his room, had something to eat, and retired for the night.
The next day he got up as the sky was turning light, breakfasted with the bandit, took his weapons and proceeded down the trail.
"Let's try the path on the south side of the mountain today," the bandit suggested.
They crossed the lake and waited in the forest. No one appeared until noon, when a band of over three hundred began marching by. Lin didn't dare move. He just watched them go. Hours passed and the shadows lengthened but there were no more travellers.
"What miserable luck," Lin said to the bandit. "Two whole days and we haven't seen a single man travelling alone. What am I going to do?"
"Don't worry, brother," the bandit consoled him. "Tomorrow's another day. I'll take you to wait by the eastern trail."
Again they crossed back to the stronghold.
"Your membership certificate?" asked Wang Lun.
Lin Chong could only sigh. The bandit chieftain laughed.
"So you failed again. I gave you three days. Two of them have already gone. If you don't get one tomorrow, there's no need for us to meet again. Just stroll down the mountain and find another place to stay."
Lin returned to his room, very depressed. "Who would have thought that scoundrel Gao Qiu would have hurt me so badly," he sighed. "I've ended up here in my wanderings, unfavoured by both Heaven and Earth. What a wretched fate!"
So passed the night. He rose the following morning at daybreak, had a bite to eat, tied up his pack and put it in a corner of the room. Then he attached his sword, took his halberd, and went down the mountain with his bandit companion and ferried across to the road on the eastern side.
"If I don't get a membership certificate today, I'll have to seek another place of refuge," said Lin.
The two concealed themselves in a grove beside the eastern path. No one had come by the time the sun was directly overhead. The last remnants of snow clouds had been swept away and the sky was a brilliant blue.
"It seems I'm out of luck again," said Lin. "I might as well go back while it's still early, pick up my luggage and start looking for another place."
"Over there!" the bandit said softly, pointing. "Someone's coming!"
"At last!" Lin exclaimed.
He saw a man walking towards them in the distance along the foot of the mountain. When he came close, Lin leaped out with a flourish of his halberd. "Aiya!" exclaimed the man. He cast down his laden carrying-pole, turned and fled. Lin gave chase but the fellow was much too fast. He quickly vanished behind a rise.
"Did you ever see such luck!" Lin fumed. "Three days I wait, and when one finally comes, I let him get away!"
"Although you didn't kill anyone, that stuff he's left here ought to earn you some more time," said the bandit.
"Take it up the mountain. I'll wait here a bit longer."
Not long after the bandit had departed with the carrying-pole and its load, Lin saw a big fellow coming round the bend. "Heaven is merciful," he murmured. The man carried a halberd, and he was in a raging fury. "Filthy rogues," he bellowed. "Where have you taken my luggage? Wait until I catch you varlets! I'll teach you to tweak the tiger's whiskers!" In great bounds, he came flying down the trail. Lin Chong strode forward to meet him. Because this man battled Lin Chong, a wind-stirring white-browed tiger was added to Liangshan Marsh, and several golden-eyed chasm-leaping wild beasts joined the water-girt stronghold.

Now when Lin Chong collapsed in a drunken stupor in the snow, and was unable to get to his feet again, he was caught by the villagers, who bound him and carried him off to a manor house. Then a retainer appeared and said, "The master's not awake yet. You'd better go and string that fellow up in the gate-house."
By the time it was beginning to get light, Lin Chong had sobered up. He looked about him and saw that he was in a fine house. "Who had the effrontery to hang me up like this?" he yelled. One of the retainers heard this outcry and came out, peeled staff in hand: "Who told you to open your trap?" he shouted. The old man whose beard had been singed said: "Don't ask, just beat him. We'll question him properly when the master wakes up."
So a group of them set about Lin Chong. Resistance was impossible, all he could do was cry. "Stop it! Hear what I have to say first."
At this point a servant appeared and said: "The master's coming." Lin Chong saw an official-looking figure approaching with hands clasped behind his back. When he reached the gallery, this gentleman said: "Who is that you're beating?"
"It's a thief we caught last night stealing rice," they said.
Soon the gentleman was close enough to recognize Lin Chong, whereupon he immediately ordered the servants to stand back while he undid the bonds himself. "Instructor, why have they hung you up here?" he said. Seeing this, the retainers made themselves scarce.
When Lin Chong realized that it was none other than Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind, he said: "Your Honour, help me please!"
"How did you get here, Instructor, and why have my people done you this injury?"
"It's quite a story!" Lin Chong replied.
The two of them went to sit inside, and Lin Chong recounted in full the business of the depot burning down.
"Things really seem to be set against you, my friend," Chai Jin said. "But now your luck has turned. This is my eastern manor. You can stay here a while, and we'll discuss what to do later."
He told servants to bring a new set of clothes and made Lin Chong change all his outer garments. Then he took him to a warm room and treated him to a banquet. Lin Chong stayed about a week at Chai Jin's. Of this no more.
Meanwhile in Cangzhou the prison Warden reported that Lin Chong had murdered the head gaoler, and also Lieutenant Lu Qian and Fu An, and set fire to the army stores. The Governor of Cangzhou was horrified. He immediately issued a warrant for Lin Chong's arrest. Bailiffs and police were ordered out to search every town and village, every wayside inn and local shop, and Lin Chong's picture was posted up all over the place. A reward of three thousand strings of cash was announced for the capture of the criminal Lin Chong. The hunt was pursued with such vigour that people were talking about it everywhere.
News of this commotion reached the ears of Lin Chong in Mr. Chai's eastern manor. He waited anxiously for Chai Jin to return, and then said: "Had you, sir, not so generously allowed me to stay here, they would have captured me for sure, because they are searching every house. My fear is that if they should come here to search the manor, you would be implicated that is the last thing I should wish. Now if I could presume further on your nobility and generosity to request a loan for my travel expenses, I will go to seek asylum elsewhere. For the rest of my life, assuming I survive, I shall count myself indebted to you."
"If you are determined to leave, brother, I can suggest somewhere for you to go," Chai Jin said. "I shall prepare a letter for you to take with you." This is how it was:

The hero each way meets obstruction,
Barred is his path to fame;
But thanks to Chai Jin's introduction,
In the Marshes he'll make his name.

"With this help of yours I am confident I shall find a safe place," Lin Chong said. "May I ask where it is I should go?"
"In Jizhou district of Shandong," said Chai Jin, "there is a great marshland known as the Marshes of Mount Liang. It is at least a hundred leagues around, and included within it are the Place of Many Meanderings and Duckweed Marsh. Three bold men have recently established themselves there. Their leader is called Wang Lun, the Failed Scholar, the second is Du Qian, the Skyscraper, and the third is Song Wan, the Door-god in the Clouds. They've assembled an army of seven or eight hundred men and are engaging in banditry. Many important criminals have gone to them and have found refuge, that's to say, they've been admitted to the company. I have close relations with all three leaders, we frequently correspond. Now, I will write a letter for you. What do you say? Are you prepared to join them?"
"What can I say but thank you for taking such trouble on my behalf?"
"The only problem is that the authorities have put up 'Wanted' notices everywhere in Cangzhou. Two officers have been posted at the city gates to check travellers, and that's the way we have to go." Chai Jin remained plunged in thought for a moment. Then he said, "I have it. I know how we'll get you through."
"I shall be forever in your debt," Lin Chong said.
The same day Chai Jin sent one of his people with Lin Chong's bundle to go through the checkpoint and wait for them some way beyond. He then had some twenty or thirty horses saddled, and with bows and arrows, pennants and spears, carrying falcons and followed by a pack of hounds, off they rode in a small troop. Lin Chong was concealed in their midst. Together they rode up to the checkpoint. The two army officers in charge there recognized Mr. Chai. They both knew Chai Jin well because prior to taking up these duties they had visited his house. They rose to greet him and said: "So you're off for some sport, Mr. Chai!"
Chai Jin dismounted and said: "What are you two doing here?"
"The Governor of Cangzhou has put up a 'Wanted' notice and pictures for the arrest of the convict Lin Chong. We have been ordered to set up a checkpoint here and question all travellers before letting them through."
Chai Jin began to joke with them. "Lin Chong?" he exclaimed. "Why, there he is among this party of mine, can't you see him?"
They laughed. "You understand the law, Mr. Chai, we know you wouldn't aid a criminal to escape," said one of them. He motioned Chai Jin to mount again. "Please, we don't want to detain you, sir."
"Thank you," Chai Jin said. "In that case when we return in a little while I must remember to bring some game for you."
The troop departed, riding through the gate and continuing for five miles or so till they came to the place where the servant who had been sent on ahead was waiting. Chai Jin bade Lin Chong dismount and change out of his hunting clothes, putting on his own clothes which had been brought by the servant. Lin Chong buckled on his sword, donned his red-tasselled felt hat, shouldered his bundle, grasped his halberd, bade Chai Jin farewell and set off down the road. As for Chai Jin and his party, they turned to their hunting, and when they returned at night via the same gate they presented the officers with some game. After this they went home. We say no more of them.
Meanwhile Lin Chong had travelled ten days or so since parting from Chai Jin. It was the end of winter: the sky was shrouded in black clouds and a bitter north wind was blowing. Soon the air was full of whirling snowflakes. Before he had covered another six or seven miles, the whole land was white. There is a composition on this subject by the old Jin poet, Wanyan Liang: it describes a big snowfall and the desolate air of the countryside:
Heaven moved to anger upturns a silver sea and scatters strings of pearls; everywhere strange flowers floating down, until the valleys are level with the peaks. The white tiger raves and the glistening unicorn rampages, pulling apart the ropes of pearls. The jade dragon in a drunken frenzy sheds his scales till the whole sky's a-swirl. Think now of the poor traveller stuck in distant passes, of banners floundering in a sea of white. Everything's the colour of spears and lances, the light is like flashing swords and javelins, a desolate air pervades the camp. Now heroes bold as tigers and pards, and their intrepid followers, must make their battle plans. They stake all on a final throw: then there's nothing but the sky's vault, vast and empty.
Anyway, Lin Chong pressed on over the snow-covered ground. The weather was getting colder and colder, and night was drawing near, when he spied an inn nestling between a stream and a lake, its roof weighted with snow:
The cottage is a dazzling white, the reeds a glossy green; a dozen old trees with knotted branches stand beside it. The three or four windows are closely shuttered. The sparse thorn hedge looks as if it's had its face painted; the yellow mud wall seems coated in white lead. Like a thousand pussy-willow flowers, snowflakes drift about the door, like a myriad goose-feathers they dance around the inn sign.
The moment he set eyes on it, Lin Chong hastened towards the inn. He thrust aside the curtain and, politely stooping, entered. When he looked about him he saw there were plenty of seats. Having chosen a place, he rested his halberd against the wall and unburdened himself of his pack, took off his hat and unbuckled his sword.
"How much wine would you like, sir?" asked the waiter, approaching.
"Bring me two measures, to start with," Lin Chong replied.
The waiter measured out the wine and set it on the table.
"Have you something to eat with it?" Lin Chong asked.
"There's beef, raw or roast, some nice fat goose, or fried chicken," the waiter said.
"Carve me two catties of roast beef, then."
The waiter was back in a moment with a big plate of beef and several dishes of vegetables which he arranged on the table, together with a big bowl that he filled with wine. When Lin Chong had drunk three or four bowls, a man appeared and walked to the door, where he stood with his hands behind his back staring out at the snow.
"Who's that you've got drinking over there?" the newcomer was heard to ask the waiter. Lin Chong inspected him. He was warmly dressed in a soft peaked cap, a sable coat, and deerskin boots. He was a big man, with a broad face, cheekbones that stuck out like fists and a pale moustache and beard. There he stood, watching the snow.
When Lin Chong called the waiter over to pour for him again, he said: "Will you join me in a bowl, waiter?"
The waiter drank a bowl and Lin Chong said: "How far are we from the Marshes of Mount Liang?"
"If you want to go to Mount Liang, it's no great distance but you've got to go by water, there's no road. So to get there you need a boat to carry you across."
"Can you find a boat for me?" Lin Chong asked.
"In this snow, and nearly night as well, where am I going to find a boat?"
"I'd pay you extra," Lin Chong said, "if you can find me a boat to ferry me across."
"There's nowhere to get one," the waiter said.
Lin Chong considered his situation. "What am I going to do?" he thought. After drinking several more bowls of wine he was seized by melancholy. "When I was an instructor in the capital, I had all the streets and markets to wander in everyday, drinking and enjoying myself. Who would have thought that now I would be brought to such a state by that scoundrel Marshal Gao? That I'd be tattooed as a criminal, sentenced and banished, leaving me with a home that I can't go to, a country I can't enter. So now I have to bear this loneliness." Such were the thoughts that ran through his mind, until, overcome by his feelings, he asked the waiter to bring him inkstone and brush; inspired by the wine he wrote an eight-line poem on the whitewashed wall:

Lin Chong is he who makes this plaint.
Once honoured throughout the world he went.
All brave men then knew his name,
For in the capital he'd won great fame.
Now from the court he wanders far
And ill luck has eclipsed his star.
But fate will at last his state revise;
And higher than Mount Tai he'll rise.

Throwing down the brush, he drank again. As he did so, the man in the fur coat came over and seized him by the waist, saying: "Well, you're a bold one and no mistake! Here you sit, when everyone knows you committed a major crime in Cangzhou. The police have put a reward of three thousand strings of cash on your head and what do you propose to do?"
"Who do you imagine I am?" Lin Chong said.
"Why, Leopard's Head Lin Chong, of course!"
"My name's Zhang," said Lin Chong.
The other grinned and said: "Come off it. There's your name on the wall over there, and your face is tattooed with the golden seal, what's the use of pretending?"
"So you really want to take me?"
"Take you? Why should I want to do that? Come inside with me. I'd like to have a word with you inside."

The man released his grip and Lin Chong followed him to the back where there was a little pavilion over the water. The other ordered the waiter to light lamps. The two men exchanged courtesies, and sat down facing each other.
"I heard you just now asking the way to Mount Liang," the stranger said, "and inquiring about a boat. That's a bandit's strong-hold, why do you want to go there?"
"I'll tell you the truth," Lin Chong said. "The police are hot on my heels, there's nowhere else I'm safe, I want to be admitted to their company. That's why."
"That's as may be," said the other, "but I'm afraid, my friend, that you can't join them without a recommendation."
"A certain friend in Cangzhou has given me just such a recommendation," said Lin Chong.
"It wouldn't be Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind, would it?" said the other.
"How did you know?" said Lin Chong.
"Mr. Chai is a close friend of the leaders'. Letters often pass between them. Once upon a time, when Wang Lun was unsuccessful in the civil service examination, he and Du Qian went and sought refuge with Chai Jin, and spent quite a long time in his house. When they were leaving he gave them a sum for their travel expenses. For this reason they feel they're indebted to him."
Hearing all this detailed information, Lin Chong prostrated himself and said: "I must be blind. I couldn't see what was staring me in the face. Please tell me your name."
The other hurriedly returned the courtesy and said: "I'm what you might call the eyes and ears of Wang Lun. My name is Zhu, Zhu Gui, and I come from Yishui in Yizhou. Among the rivers and lakes fraternity I'm known as 'The Dry Land Crocodile.' I was sent by them up there on the mountain to open an inn here. The inn's a front. My job is to keep watch for any travellers and merchants who pass by. If there's any who are wealthy, I go and report it to them. But solitary travellers, those who've got nothing worth bothering with, I let them pass on. If they've got something, say just a trifling affair, I drug their wine but if it's more serious we finish them off, and then the lean meat goes to make pemmican and the fat's melted down for lamp oil. But you, my friend, when you kept asking the way to Mount Liang, I thought it best not to start anything. Then I saw you write your name on the wall. I'd heard about you, from someone who came here from the capital, only of course I never expected to meet you here like this. Since you've a letter of recommendation from Chai Jin, and your name is known far and wide, chief Wang is bound to value your services."
He then ordered meat and fish, wine and some special dishes to feast Lin Chong. The two of them sat drinking half the night in the pavilion over the water.
"Then how can I get a boat to take me across?" Lin Chong asked.
"Don't worry," Zhu Gui said. "I've got my own boat. But you rest here tonight. Tomorrow we'll get up early, before dawn, and go together."
They both went to rest. Just before dawn Zhu Gui woke Lin Chong. They washed and rinsed their mouths, and then took a few cups of wine and some food. It was still dark when Zhu Gui opened the window of the pavilion, took up a bow painted with magpies, fitted a whistling arrow to the string and fixing his sights on a patch of reeds and bulrushes on the opposite bank, shot it off.
"What does that mean?" Lin Chong asked.
"It's the signal agreed with them up there," said the other. "Wait a bit and a boat will come."
Soon three or four men were seen to emerge from the reed-beds opposite sculling a boat which rapidly drew near. When it reached the pavilion, Lin Chong picked up his weapons and his bundle and Zhu Gui helped him into the boat. The scullers set to work again and drove the boat across the lake till they reached the landing at Golden Sands. Lin Chong looked about him. Now he was truly in the Marshes of Mount Liang with its hundred-league circumference, and a lonely place it was indeed!
On one side the mountains spread like a great wave, on another the water extends to the horizon. A mass of reedbeds could hide vast companies of sabres and lances, a forest of stunted trees could conceal armies of swords and spears. Beside the canals are found deer's antlers, and even whole skeletons. All the bowls and spoons in the stronghold are carved out of the bone. The skin is stripped off corpses to cover the battle-drums. Human hair is plaited to make reins and bridles. To impede the progress of government troops there are countless dead-end channels. To protect the bandits there are mountain ranges and forests. Pebbles are piled in huge mounds, spears and darts stacked up like a forest. A deadly air pervades the gilt pavilion, and a mortal chill invests the Assembly Hall of the Heroes.
When they reached the Golden Sands Landing, Zhu Gui and Lin Chong leapt ashore. One of the men carried Lin Chong's things and the two set off up the mountain, while the other men took the boat back to a creek to hide it. This bank was thickly forested. Halfway up the mountain there was a pavilion. Beyond this, they came to a narrow defile, at the mouth of which weapons of every description were laid out, with piles of logs all around and ballista stones for catapulting. The bandit accompanying them went ahead to report their arrival. In the pass itself they found the banners and insignia of the troops. They had to negotiate two more such defiles before they came to the actual gates of the mountain stronghold. This stronghold was thus secure from all sides, surrounded as it was by high mountains, the only access through three narrow defiles. In the centre was an area flat as a mirror, measuring over a hundred yards. The main gate faced the mountain. It was flanked by other lesser buildings.
Zhu Gui took Lin Chong to the main assembly hall where they found Wang Lun, the Failed Scholar, sitting on the throne, with Du Qian, the Skyscraper on his left and Song Wan on his right. The new arrivals stepped forward and saluted. Lin Chong stood a little to one side while Zhu Gui introduced him: "This is Instructor Lin Chong, instructor of the eight hundred thousand imperial guards in the capital, otherwise known as Leopard's Head. Through Marshal Gao's machinations he was branded and exiled to Cangzhou. There, when the army depot burnt down, he unfortunately killed three people and later took refuge in Mr. Chai's house. Mr. Chai holds him in high esteem and has written a letter recommending him to us."
Lin Chong produced the letter and handed it to Wang Lun, who after perusing it invited Lin Chong to take the fourth place, while Zhu Gui took the fifth. Wine was then ordered and they drank three times. Wang Lun asked how things went with Chai Jin.
"He enjoys life," Lin Chong answered. "He rides out into the country each day to hunt."
After a few more questions, Wang Lun paused to reflect. "I never made it in the civil service examinations," he said to himself. "I had such awful bloody luck I was persuaded I'd do better to join with Du Qian and set up camp here. Later Song Wan came along and we put together this company. I'm not what you'd call a military genius, and Du Qian and Song Wan also have their limits. Now, all of a sudden, this character appears, and it turns out he's an ex-instructor of the imperial guard, obviously an experienced soldier. What happens once he catches on to our methods? Obviously he's going to want to take over. How will we ever be able to cope with him? Rude or not, it's surely best to find some pretext for kicking him out. If we can send him back down the mountain, it'll save us much trouble in the future. The only problem is that it'll look a bit discourteous to Chai Jin, after all the kindness he has shown us in the past. Never mind though, we'd best ignore that for the moment." It was a case of:

His constant plan's to keep good men at bay,
If a hero comes, he's not allowed to stay.
Envy's what rules this chieftain's heart, 'tis plain,
And Lin Chong only seeks to serve in vain.

Wang Lun now ordered his men to bring more wine and food and organized a banquet in Lin Chong's honour. The company feasted and drank. Then Wang Lun ordered fifty taels of silver to be brought on a dish and two rolls of silk. Rising to his feet, he said: "Instructor, Mr. Chai recommends you and asks us to admit you to our company. It is really most unfortunate that our supplies here are so inadequate, our buildings in such disrepair, and our forces so far below their proper strength. I fear that it would, in the long run, be against your interests and I should not like to feel responsible. Here are some meagre gifts which I beg you not to reject. I sincerely hope that you will find a worthier refuge elsewhere and not hold this against us."
Lin Chong then rose and said: "Allow me to reply thus to the three chiefs of this stronghold: I have travelled a long way and, as they say, 'searched for the master far and wide.' Relying on Mr. Chai's reputation I made bold to present myself here. Although I have no talent, I beg you to accept me. I shall be eternally grateful and I can truly say that nothing could make me happier. It was not for silver that I came to you. I beg you to let me stay."
Wang Lun said: "But our place is too small. How can we receive you adequately? Please excuse us."
At this point Zhu Gui intervened. "Forgive me, brothers," he said disapprovingly, "but I must speak my mind. Maybe your provisions here are not so ample but there are villages and towns where you can go to get more. In these mountains and marshes timber is plentiful, there's enough to build any number of houses, that's not a problem. This gentleman is recommended by Mr. Chai, how can you send him away? What's more, Mr. Chai has gone out of his way to be helpful to us. If later he should hear that we refuse to accept this gentleman, it would look very bad. The Instructor is a man of true worth. I'm sure he will give us proof of it."
Du Qian added his weight to this: "Just one more won't upset things. If we don't let him stay, Mr. Chai will be offended when he hears about it. He'll consider us ungrateful. Mr. Chai has done us so many favours in the past. Now he sends someone to us are we to reject him, are we to throw him out?"
Song Wan was of the same opinion: "For Mr. Chai's sake we really ought to admit him as another leader here. Otherwise it will make us look mean-spirited. The brethren of the rivers and lakes will despise us."
"But none of you have thought carefully enough," Wang Lun said. "Even if he has committed some serious crime in Cangzhou, we don't know what his real intentions are. Suppose he's come here to spy on us? What then?"
"I face the death penalty," Lin Chong said, "that's why I've come here. How can my motives be cause for suspicion?"
"In that case," Wang Lun said, "if you sincerely want to join us, we'll need the pledge."
"All right," said Lin Chong. "I can write. Just bring me a brush and ink and I'll write it out."
"No, Instructor, you misunderstand," said Zhu Gui with a laugh. "When you join a company of outlaws, the pledge means going down the mountain, killing someone and bringing back his head. It shows you mean business. That's what we call 'providing the pledge'."
"That's all right too," said Lin Chong. "I don't mind going down the mountain and waiting. Only I'm afraid no one may come."
"We'll give you a time-limit of three days," Wang Lun said. "If within three days you provide us with the pledge, we'll take you. If you don't, we'll have to ask you to excuse us."
Lin Chong accepted but he was in low spirits when he retired to rest. Here's how it was:

Such a depression is hard to fix;
He hates Wang Lun and his low-down tricks.
Down the mountain, he'll have to go:
What head he'll bring back, he doesn't know.

After the party broke up, Zhu Gui said goodbye and went back to look after his inn. Lin Chong collected his things and one of the brigands showed him to the guest-room where he was to spend the night. Next morning he was up early and after breakfasting took up his sword and his halberd. He summoned one of the brigands who guided him down the mountain and ferried him across the water. Then he posted himself beside a small isolated trail waiting for some traveller to appear. From dawn to dusk, he waited the whole day but not a single traveller passed that way. With a heavy heart Lin Chong accompanied the brigand across the water and back to the mountain retreat.
"Where is the pledge?" Wang Lun asked him.
"No one passed today, so I couldn't get it," Lin Chong explained.
"If you don't get it tomorrow, it looks as if you won't be able to stay here," said Wang Lun.
Lin Chong said nothing but he was not pleased. He retired to his room and had them bring him some food, then slept. Next day he was up early again, breakfasted with the brigands and then took his weapons and descended the mountain.
"Today let's try the track on the south side of the mountain," his guide suggested. They found a wood and lay in wait there but no one passed by. Then about noon a large party of travellers appeared, more than three hundred of them. Lin Chong could not undertake anything against so many and had to let them pass. He continued to wait but night began to fall and still there was no sign of any other traveller. "What rotten luck I have," he said to his companion. "I've waited here two days, and no traveller has passed by on his own. What am I going to do?"
"Don't give up," the man said. "You've still got another day. Tomorrow we'll try the trail to the east."
Lin Chong went back that evening as before, and Wang Lun remarked, "Looks like you haven't got it today either. I gave you three days. This is the second. If you still haven't got it tomorrow, you needn't bother about saying goodbye, I shall expect you just to take yourself off."
Lin Chong retired to his room with a heavy heart. He raised his eyes to heaven that night and sighed deeply: "I never thought I'd be brought to such a pass by that bastard Gao-the-Ball. And now heaven and earth seem against me and fate opposes me in everything," he said to himself.
Next day he rose at first light, and ordered some breakfast. Then he tied his bundle and left it in the room. Grasping his sword and his halberd he descended the mountain and crossed the water once more with his guide and headed for the mountain road to the east. "If I don't manage to get that pledge today," he thought to himself, "I'll just have to go and seek refuge somewhere else."
Arriving at a wood on the road that passed under the mountain, the two hid themselves and settled down to wait. The sun reached its zenith but still there was no sign of anyone. The rough weather of previous days was gone and the sky was fine and clear. Gripping his halberd, Lin Chong said to his companion: "There's obviously nothing doing here. Wouldn't it be better now, while there's still plenty of daylight left, to go and try somewhere else?"
But just as he spoke the bandit pointed and said: "Wait! Isn't that someone coming?"
Lin Chong gave an oath. There was indeed a man, far away still, making his way down the mountain towards them. Lin Chong waited till he was quite close, then he leapt out with his halberd at the ready. But when the man saw him, he gave a cry of dismay, threw down what he was carrying, turned and fled. Lin Chong gave chase but there was no chance of catching him. The man shot off up the mountain and disappeared.
"Look what luck I have!" Lin Chong groaned. "It's the third day, and now when someone comes, he gets away."
The bandit said: "Even if you haven't managed to kill someone, this baggage of his is full of valuables; maybe that will do instead."
"You take it up to the stronghold then," Lin Chong said. "I shall go on waiting."
No sooner had the bandit departed with the booty, than a tall man came into view, heading down the mountain. Lin Chong said: "Heaven has not forgotten me after all!"
The stranger brandished his halberd and roared in a voice like thunder: "You scum, you gallows-fodder, what have you done with my baggage? I'm going to get you for this, you villains. I'll teach you to pull the tiger's whiskers!" With this he bounded towards Lin Chong. Lin Chong advanced to meet this ferocious charge.
Had not this stranger come to do battle with Lin Chong, how would we have seen:

A brood of white-browed tigers arise in the Marshes of Mount Liang,
In the lake-land stronghold those golden-eyed river-jumpers at play?

While the "Leopard's Head" Lin Chong was drunk he lay down in the snow, and being unable to rise was seized and bound by the farm labourers, and carried to a courtyard. A farm labourer came out of the yard and said to them, "Our master has not got up yet so you had better hang this man up by his hands under the tower at the gate. By daybreak, Lin Chong had recovered from his drunkenness. Looking round he realized that he was in the yard of a big farm. He shouted out, "Who has dared to hang me up in this way?"
A farm labourer hearing him shouting came from inside the gateway, with a stick and spoke in a loud voice to him, "So your spirit is still unbroken?"
The farmer whose mustache had been singed also came on the scene and said, "Don't ask him; just beat him! When our master gets up he will cross-examine him minutely." The farm labourer beat him accordingly. Lin Chong had to submit to this beating but he said, "Never mind this! I have something to say to you."
Just then another farm labourer came on the scene, and said that the master was coming. Lin Chong saw him strolling with his hands behind his back, and upon arriving at the veranda he heard him say, "Whom are you beating?"
The farm labourers replied, "Last night we arrested this man who was stealing our rice!"
The gentleman approaching recognized Lin Chong. He immediately told the labourers to go away, and releasing him asked, "Drill Instructor, how is it that you were hung up here"
The farm labourers all retired.
Lin Chong recognized Chai Jin the "Small Whirlwind," and immediately said, "Sir, please save me!"
Chai Jin said, "Drill Instructor, why have you allowed these villagers to disgrace you, and bring you here?"
Lin Chong said, "That is hard to explain in a few words."
The two men went inside and sat down. Lin Chong then related in detail what had happened at the forage depot.
After listening to this Chai Jin said, "Elder brother, you have been unfortunate. But today Heaven has taken pity and made all straight again, so that you need not worry any more. This is my eastern estate. You can rest here for a few days, and then we will discuss your affairs again." He then told a labourer to bring a new suit of clothes for Lin Chong, and also to set out wine and food in the room which had a fire in it, as he would ask Lin Chong to dine with him. Lin Chong stayed at that place for about a week but we need not say anything more about that.
The superintendent of the prison at Cangzhou reported to his superior officer that Lin Chong had killed the head jailer, Lu Qian, and Fu An, and had set fire to the army fodder depot. Upon hearing of this the magistrate was upset, and immediately issued an order to every district and village that all lower officials were to do their best to arrest Lin Chong. Full particulars were to be given and a full description of Lin Chong was to be placarded in every village and inn on the roads, and a reward of three thousand strings of cash was to be given to any person who gave information leading to his arrest. They were also to make a strict inquiry and search for Lin Chong in every house in their districts.
When Lin Chong heard of these measures being taken he was so afraid that he felt as though he was sitting on a carpet full of needles. He waited until Squire Chai Jin returned to that estate, and then spoke to him. "I know that you do not want me to go but I really must depart as these officials are making careful inquiries, and a strict search for me from house to house. Should they come to your house you will, most certainly be implicated. As I am aware of your liberal-mindedness I beg you to lend me some money to cover my traveling expenses, and I will go and hide in some other place. Should I not die I will certainly recompense you, and serve you in any capacity." Chai Jin said, "As you, elder brother, wish to go I will write a letter, and you can take it to a place I know of. How will that do?"
"As you Squire," said Lin Chong, "will assist me in that way I will go and live in that place. But I do not know where you want me to go."
"It is a village surrounded by water, called Liangshan Marsh with a fortress in the centre called Wanzi Fortress and also Liao-er Hollow. The village has a circumference of over eight hundred //: Just now there are three fine fellows living there. The chief is Wang Lun nicknamed 'White Clothes Scholar'; the second man is Du Qian nicknamed 'Sky Feeler,' and the third man is Song Wan nicknamed 'Guardian in the Clouds.' Those men have about eight hundred brigands who plunder the people. Most of them are men who are wanted by the officials for some serious crime or other, and they have fled to that place as a refuge. The three leaders just mentioned are fine men, and as I am intimate with them, they frequently send me letters. I will write a letter for you to take there, and you can join their band. How will that do?"
"If it is as you say," said Lin Chong, "it will do very well."
Squire Chai Jin said, "The officials have posted two military officers at the pass to cross-examine all persons who leave or enter Cangzhou, and have posted up the notice about you there where you will have to go." Chai Jin bowed his head in thought, and then continued, "But I have a plan to enable you to pass them."

Lin Chong said, "If you assist me in this matter I shall never forget your benevolence."
The squire instructed a servant to take Lin Chong's bundle beyond the barrier erected on the road, and wait there for him. He then summoned about thirty horsemen arrayed in their hunting dress; carrying bows, arrows, flags, and spears; with falcons on their arms, and hunting dogs in leash. He placed Lin Chong in the middle of the company. They all mounted, and left together for the barrier. Upon arrival there the military officers recognized Chai Jin and his men. These officers had been to Chai Jin's estate before they were commissioned. They now got up from their seats and asked, "Sir, are you going to have some sport again?"
Chai Jin dismounted and asked them, "What are you doing here?"
They replied, "The Prefect of Cangzhou has issued an order, that the criminal Lin Chong must be arrested, and we have been specially appointed to watch this place. We have to closely question all travellers and merchants who pass this way before letting them pass."
Chai Jin laughed and said, "I am smuggling Lin Chong through among this company of men, so why don't you recognize him?"
The officers laughed. "Your Excellency knows the law so well that you would not do any smuggling. Please, sir, mount your horse again."
Chai Jin again laughed and said, "That being the case I will get along, and should I kill some game I will make you a present of it." So bidding them adieu Chai Jin and also his followers mounted their horses, and rode off. After riding about five //they came to the place where the farm labourer was waiting for them with Lin Chong's bundle. Chai Jin told Lin Chong to dismount; take off the hunting dress and put on his own clothes that the farm labourer had brought along. This he did, then buckled on his sword, put on his felt cap with the red tassel, shouldered his bundle, and holding his halberd in his hand, he saluted Chai Jin, and departed.
The hunters then mounted their horses, and after the day's sport they presented some of the game to the officers, and then returned to their village.
Upon leaving Chai Jin, Lin Chong travelled for about ten days. It was almost the end of the winter, and there were heavy clouds in the sky. A cold north wind was blowing that scattered snowflakes over the countryside. He plodded along through the snow without stopping anywhere. One very cold day when it was just getting dark, he saw in the distance an inn almost buried in the deep snow. It was close to a lake and on the bank of a stream. Upon arriving there he lifted the reed curtain hanging over the door, and hurriedly entered. Looking round he saw that there were many tables and stools. He took his seat, leant his halberd against a table, hung up his sword, set down his bundle and took off his felt cap. A waiter came forward and asked him how much wine he wanted. Lin Chong ordered two jars of wine. The waiter brought and placed them on the table. Lin Chong then inquired what food he could have. The waiter said they had beef both cooked and raw; a fat goose; and a tender chicken. Lin Chong ordered three jin of beef for a beginning. The waiter very soon brought this in on a big tray with several kinds of vegetables. While Lin Chong was drinking about four bowls of wine he noticed a man walking about with his hands behind his back, and occasionally going to the door to look at the falling snow. Presently the man asked the waiter who the other man was who was drinking wine. Lin Chong saw that he wore a fur cap with a deep rim; a rich gown lined with sable; his boots were made of deer skin, and were neatly made; he was tall, and had a commanding appearance; he had prominent cheek bones, a mustache, and a small beard.
Lin Chong called for some more wine, and upon it being served he asked the waiter to have a bowl of wine with him. After the waiter had drunk his wine Lin Chong asked him how far it was to Liangshan Marsh. The waiter said that although it was only about a //away there was only one way and that was by water. Lin Chong asked him if he could get a boat for him. The waiter said that as there was so much snow, and also it was getting dark he could not find a boat that day.
"If you can find me a boat at once I will give you plenty of money," said Lin Chong.
The waiter said that there was no place there where he could find a boat.
Lin Chong wondered what he must do under these circumstances. But after drinking a few cups of wine he became more perplexed. Previously when he was Drill Instructor at the Eastern Capital he had drunk wine and had a good time but who would have thought that Gao Qiu would injure and brand him, and then force him into his present predicament. "I am," he thought, "a castaway; although I have a family I cannot go home; a country and yet cannot visit it. It is enough to break one's heart." Being so much chagrined he asked the waiter to bring a pen and ink, and wrote a poem on the white wall:

Justice he loved; loyalty his glory,
For these his fame was sung;
And everywhere they knew the hero,
The man of deeds, Lin Chong.
But now he sails on a sea of trouble,
Drifts like a reed—and where?
But powerful east of Mountain Tai,
With luck, he'll rule there.

This written he put down the pen, and had another drink. As he was drinking, the man with the fur-lined gown came forward and embraced him saying, "What a brave man! You committed a great crime at Cangzhou, and yet you come here! The officials have offered a reward of three thousand strings of cash for your arrest so what is your object now?"
"Do you know me then?" asked Lin Chong.
"Are you not Lin Chong, the 'Leopard's Head'?"
Lin Chong said, "My name is Zhang."
The man laughed at this, and said, "You need not talk so absurdly. You have just written your name on the wall, and also your face is branded so that it is quite clear who you are."
"So are you really going to arrest me?" asked Lin Chong.
The man again laughed and said, "Why should I arrest you?" He then requested Lin Chong to come with him to an arbour at the back of the inn, where he told the waiter to take a lamp and some wine. Upon arrival there he gave him respectful salutation, and then they sat down face to face.
The man said, "I just heard you inquiring about the road to Liangshan Marsh, and about engaging a boat. That is a stronghold of some robbers, so why are you going there?"
"I will tell you all about it," said Lin Chong. "The police are doing their utmost to capture me, and as I have no safe place to go to, I am going to join the band of the fine fellows at that mountain stronghold."
"As matters are like this," said the man, "there will certainly be a man who will recommend you to the robbers."
Lin Chong said, "A friend of mine at Cangzhou in the Henghai County has given me an introduction."
"Perhaps he is Chai Jin, the 'Small Whirlwind'?"
"How do you know that?"
"Chai Jin is on friendly terms with the chief of the bandits at the mountain stronghold, and correspondence has been continually passing between them," said the man. "Previously when Wang Lun failed to pass an examination he went with Du Qian to Chai Jin's house, and lived there for several days. When they left Chai Jin gave them money to cover their traveling expenses, and so they are beholden to him."
Upon hearing this Lin Chong saluted, and said, "Although I have eyes I do not recognize your eminence. I request your name."
The man again saluted before replying, "I am an agent of the robber chief Wang. My name is Zhu Gui but the robbers call me 'Dry Land Crocodile.' My native place is Yishui County in Yizhou Prefecture. I had an order from the mountain stronghold to open a wine shop here so that I could spy and listen to the conversation of the merchants and others who pass this way. If I hear of any valuables I go and report them to the headquarters on the mountain. If the traveller has no valuable I let him go. But if he has money I either hypnotize him or kill him outright, then cut up the flesh and salt it, and boil the fat into oil for use in the lamps. I heard you inquiring the road to Liangshan Marsh so I did not treat you in that way. Also I saw you write your name on the wall, and I had heard of you as a great hero from the men who had passed this way from the Eastern Capital but I had not expected to meet you. An introduction from Squire Chai Jin combined with your wide-spread reputation will insure you having a responsible position under our chief Wang." He then prepared some fish, meat, and other food, and entertained Lin Chong. Both of them sat in the arbour at the side of the lake drinking and eating until midnight.
Lin Chong asked whether they could get a boat to take them across. Zhu Gui assured him that he could get a boat, and he need not worry. They could stay there until daybreak, and then depart. So they both went to their rooms for a sleep.
At daybreak Zhu Gui called Lin Chong, and after washing they had their breakfast consisting of wine and meat. It was not yet very bright. Zhu Gui opened the windows of the arbour, and taking a bow decorated with magpies, he shot an arrow that had a whistle attached, across the water to a spot where the reeds were flat with the ground.
Lin Chong asked what was the purpose of shooting the arrow.
"That is a signal to the stronghold," said Zhu Gui. "A boat will be sent very soon."
In a short time they saw about five bandits in a boat emerge from the reeds on the other side, and they quickly rowed the boat across to the arbour. Lin Chong picked up his baggage and weapons, and was conducted on to the boat by Zhu Gui. The bandits rowed the boat across to the other side, and brought it to the Jinsha Bank. Upon touching the bank Zhu Gui conducted Lin Chong ashore. The robbers carried Lin Chong's baggage and weapons, and the party started off to ascend a hill that was there. On both sides of the road Lin Chong noticed that there were large trees of enormous girth, and halfway up the hill they passed an arbour which was lavishly gilded. Upon turning a corner they came to a barrier where there were arranged many spears, broad swords, two edged swords, halberds, bows, crossbows, short spears, and all around were round logs, and bowlders for rolling down the hill against an ascending foe. The bandits went inside to report their arrival. The two men, Zhu Gui and Lin Chong, entered the stronghold, and advanced between two rows of armed bandits who had their flag flying. After passing through two more barriers they came to the gate of the stronghold. Lin Chong saw that there was a drilling ground as flat as a looking-glass and with a circumference of about 1,958 yards and surrounding the spot on all sides were lofty, majestic cliffs. On two sides were small buildings, and in front was the principal entrance. Zhu Gui conducted Lin Chong to the Assembly Hall where in the principal seat was Wang Lun, at his right hand sat Du Qian the "Sky Feeler," and on his left sat Song Wan.
Zhu Gui and Lin Chong both stepped forward, saluted and called out "nuo" to attract attention, and the latter took up his position slightly at one side and behind Zhu Gui, who introduced him, "This is Drill Instructor Lin Chong of the Imperial Guards from the Eastern Capital, commonly known as 'Leopard's Head.' Because of the enmity of Marshal Gao Qiu, he was branded and banished to Cangzhou, and while there the army fodder depot in his charge was burnt down. Because he had killed three men he fled to Squire Chai Jin, with whom he is on very friendly terms. The latter has written a letter of introduction for you."
Lin Chong took the letter out of his breast pocket, and handed it to Wang Lun who requested him to be seated on the fourth chair, and Zhu Gui to be seated on the fifth chair. Wang Lun then ordered wine to be brought, and after they had drunk three cups each he asked about the health of Squire Chai Jin.
Lin Chong replied that Chai went hunting everyday.
After asking the question Wang Lun thought of the time when he was only a poor scholar, and being without luck, he had come there with Du Qian to join the bandits. Afterwards they had been joined by Song Wan, with many men and horses. He had no special ability, and Du Qian and Song Wan had only common military skill. This man had been a Drill Instructor and he must have great military skill. If they admitted him he would soon see their weakness, and take advantage of it, and in case of a fight how could they overcome him? Should they decline to receive him he would be angry. But if they offered excuse, then he would go away and they would avoid any trouble. But that would look as though they had forgotten the kind treatment they had from Squire Chai Jin. However under the present circumstances they could not allow him to stay here. He therefore told his followers to prepare a feast, and invited Lin Chong to take part in it. All the five men dined together, and when they had finished Wang Lun told the servants to bring a tray with fifty taels of silver, and two rolls of coarse silk cloth. Upon their arrival he stood up and said: "Squire Chai has written us a letter introducing you, and recommending that you should join our band but unfortunately we are short of rations, and the rooms are in disorder; our followers are very few; and I am afraid that your prospect would be spoiled by staying here. We hope you will not laugh at our small presents or be offended but we hope that you will be able to find a bigger stronghold than this where you can stay."
Lin Chong replied, "I request you to listen to what I have to say now. I heard of your great reputation over three hundred //away, and I have come a long distance to find a refuge under your roof. Relying on the influence of Squire Chai I fled to your stronghold to join your band. Although I have no ability I hope that you will allow me to stay here as without flattering I can say that I am willing to die in case of danger. I did not come here for money, and therefore I hope the chief will take my request into favourable consideration."
"This is only a small place, and we cannot afford to keep you here," said Wang Lun. "Don't think we have any other reason."
Zhu Gui remonstrated with Wang Lun, "Elder brother, please allow me to speak on this matter. If our supply of food is small we can borrow some from the neighbouring villages and distant market towns; as for dwelling, there is enough timber on this mountain and the surrounding land to build a thousand houses. This man has come here with an introduction from Squire Chai so how can we ask him to go to another place? Moreover Squire Chai previously treated us well, so if we do not receive this man here it will look bad. This man has great skill, and will use it to our advantage."
Du Qian said, "I do not think that it is right to say that the admittance of this one man will be too much for our stronghold? But I say that if we do not receive this man, Squire Chai will be offended and will think that we are very ungrateful. As he helped us so much in the past how can we turn this man away?"
Song Wan offered his advice, "In view of the great influence of Squire Chai I suggest that we keep Lin Chong here, and make him one of our leaders. On the other hand, if we do not employ him all the other outlaws like ourselves will laugh at our lack of gratitude."
"You are overlooking something," said Wang Lun. "Although this man committed a great crime at Cangzhou but you do not know yet what his real intention was in coming here. If he has bad intentions what will you do?"
Lin Chong said, "I fled to this place to join your band because I had committed a crime. Why do you suspect me?"
"It that case, if you really want to join us, you should present a 'membership application,' said Wang Lun.
"I know something about writing 'characters,'" said Lin Chong, "please let me have ink and paper to write it out."
"Drill Instructor," said Zhu Gui, "you do not understand. When anybody joins our band, he must present an application. That means that he must go down the mountain and kill a man. Then when he returns and presents a man's head, the chief will be satisfied. That is what we call 'presenting an application.'"
Lin Chong said, "That won't be difficult, and I will go at once, and get it done. But I am afraid it will be some time before anyone comes along."
Wang Lun said, "Very well, I will allow you three days, and if you present your application in that time you can join us but if you fail to do so then do not blame me if I don't admit you."
Lin Chong agreed to these conditions. He then went with the bandits to his quarters, and slept there that night. During the night Zhu Gui departed and went down the mountain to his inn.
The following morning Lin Chong got up early, and after breakfast, buckled on his short sword, and took his halberd in his hand. He then summoned one of the bandits to show him the way down the mountain, and crossing the lake by boat, he hid himself at a lonely spot on the road waiting for someone to pass. He waited there from early morning till late at night without a single individual passing that way. He was very disappointed at this but summoning the bandit they both returned to the mountain stronghold.
Upon reaching the stronghold Wang Lun asked where the "membership application" was.
Lin Chong replied that not a single person had passed him that day so that he had not been able to get a head.
Wang Lun said that if he did not get a head the next day it would be awkward.
Lin Chong did not reply to this as he was so depressed. He went and had his meals and then went to bed.
The following morning he again summoned the bandit to go with him down the mountain.
The bandit suggested that they should go to the southern road that day. They did this, and hid in the forest on that road. About noon a large party of about three hundred people passed but as they all kept close together Lin Chong dared not attack anyone of them. He still kept looking out but not another person passed that way.
Lin Chong spoke to his bandit companion, "How unlucky I am! Here I have been watching for two days, and no single person has passed me."
"Elder brother, never mind," said the bandit. "There is still one more day left, and tomorrow I will go with you to the eastern road."
When they got back at the stronghold Wang Lun asked where the head was. Lin Chong dared not reply but simply heaved a sigh.
"I suppose you have not got one today," said Wang Lun laughingly, "I gave you three days but two have already passed without any result. If you don't get one tomorrow you need not try to see me but instead you must leave the mountain at once."
Lin Chong withdrew to his quarters in a very melancholy frame of mind. Gazing towards heaven he sighed as he thought how that thief Gao Qiu had ill-treated him, and how both gods and men had not given him the least assistance. Really he had had very bad luck.
The following day after breakfast he packed up his things in a bundle, and left them in his room. Then picking up his weapons he departed with his bandit companion and went down the mountain and across the lake to the eastern road. He said to the bandit, "If I do not get a head today I then have to go and find another place where I can get a peaceful living." They hid in a forest there until noon without anyone passing. The snow had ceased falling, and it was a very bright clear day. Lin Chong picking up his weapons spoke to his companion, "I see that I am again unfortunate. I think I had better get my bundle, and set out for another place before it gets dark."
His companion pointed with his finger and said, 'Fine! But is not that a man coming?"
Lin Chong looked in the direction pointed out, and said that he felt ashamed. In the distance he saw a man coming along by the foot of the mountain. He waited until the man got near and then taking his halberd he struck it against the ground, and jumped out of the shade of the forest. The man upon seeing Lin Chong exclaimed "Ai Ya," threw down his load, and ran away. Lin Chong ran after him but could not catch up to him. The man disappeared round the shoulder of the hill. Lin Chong spoke to his bandit companion who had followed him, "You see what bad luck I have! After waiting for three days the man who turns up runs away."
The bandit replied, "Although you cannot kill the man you can seize the bundle of valuables he has left behind instead."
"You can carry the baggage up the mountain but I will wait here for a little time more."
A short time after the bandit had departed with the booty Lin Chong saw a tall man again coming along the road. Lin Chong said to himself, "Now Heaven is assisting me."
The man was armed with a long bladed halberd, and upon getting near and seeing Lin Chong he shouted in a very loud voice, "You thief! I shall murder every bandit I can get hold of. Where is my baggage? I am going to arrest you as you have 'pulled the tiger's whiskers.'" So saying he sprang forward, and Lin Chong noticing his extremely fierce expression, advanced to encounter him. The fighting of this man with Lin Chong resulted, as we shall see, in an addition to Liangshan Marsh.

At Liangshan Marsh tigers bold and fierce,
At Water Margin beasts with glaring eyes.

012

Lin Chong Becomes a Bandit at Liangshan Marsh & joins the outlaws take him on board; Yang Zhi Sells His Sword in the Eastern Capital at Kaifeng

Lin Chong saw that the man wore a broad-brimmed felt hat from Fanyang with a red tassel on top, a white silk tunic bound at the waist by a broad band of vertical stitches, leggings of alternate strips of black and white, deerskin socks, and short hairy cowhide boots. A sword at his waist, a halberd in his hand, he was tall and had a large blue birthmark on his face and sparse reddish whiskers. The felt hat was pushed far back on his shoulders, his chest was exposed, a knotted bandanna covered his head.
Halberd in hand he shouted: "You dirty robber! Where have you taken my luggage and valuables?"
Lin Chong irately refused to answer. Eyes glaring, mustache bristling, he rushed forward, grasping his halberd, to give battle. The snow clouds were gone, the sky had cleared. Thin ice coated the edges of the stream. On the bank the two attacked each other with murderous fury. They fought for thirty rounds, with neither being the gainer, then hacked away for another dozen.
Just as the struggle was reaching its climax, high on the mountain a voice rang out: "Stop fighting, brave fellows!"
Lin Chong leaped from the combat circle, and he and his opponent stayed their hands. Down the mountain came the White-Clad Scholar Wang Lun, accompanied by Du Qian, Song Wan and many of the bandits. At the foot of the slope they got into boats and crossed the lake.
"Beautiful technique, both of you," Wang Lun commended. "This is our brother Lin Chong, known as Panther Head. And you, sir, with the blue face? Would you tell us your name?"
"I'm called Yang Zhi. I am descended from three generations of generals, the grandson of Duke Yang Linggong. Yet here I am, wandering around Guanxi. When I was younger, I passed the military examination, and was appointed an aide in the palace. When Longevity Hill was being built, the Taoist Emperor sent ten of us aides to Lake Taihu to collect grotesque rock formations and coloured stones and bring them back to the capital to decorate the hill.
"I never knew my luck was so bad. On the return trip, when we were crossing the Yellow River, my boat capsized and the rocks I was transporting were sunk. I didn't dare report back to the capital, and I ran away. Recently, I heard that I was pardoned, and I was on my way to the Eastern Capital with money and valuables. I intended to spend some in the Council of Military Affairs to see whether I could arrange another position for myself. The peasant I hired was carrying them on a shoulder-pole when your men snatched them away. I hope you'll return them to me."
"Aren't you also called the Blue-Faced Brute?" asked Wang Lun.
"That is correct."
"So that's who you are! We'd be very pleased if you came to our stronghold for a few cups of wine. We'll return your belongings there. What do you say?"
"Since you know me, why not just return my luggage? That'll be just as good as inviting me to drink."
"I was in the Eastern Capital a few years ago, sitting for an examination, and I heard of your fame. Today, I've been fortunate enough to meet you. How can I let you leave empty-handed? Please rest a while in our stronghold. That's all I ask."
Yang Zhi went with Wang Lun and the others across the lake and climbed to the fortress on the top of the mountain. Zhu Gui was also summoned to come up the mountain and meet him, and all gathered in Righteous Fraternity Hall. On the left, in four armchairs, sat Wang Lun, Du Qian, Song Wan and Zhu Gui. There were two armchairs on the right, the first for Yang Zhi, the second for Lin Chong. When all were seated, Wang Lun ordered a feast of mutton and wine in Yang Zhi's honour. Of that we need say no more.
To dispense with idle chatter, when the assembled diners had drunk several cups, Wang Lun said to himself: "If we keep only Lin Chong here, it won't be to our advantage. Why not put on a show of kindness and keep Yang Zhi as well? Then we can play one off against the other."
He pointed at Lin and said to Yang: "This brother was a drill instructor in the Mighty Imperial Guards in the Eastern Capital. He's known as Panther Head Lin Chong. Marshal Gao can't abide good people. He framed Lin Chong, had him tattooed with the mark of a criminal and exiled him to Cangzhou. There, Lin ran into trouble again. He, too, has just come here. I don't want to detain you if you're set on going to the capital to try and get yourself a new position. I myself found I had no choice but to give up civil affairs and become an outlaw here in the hills. You have committed a crime. Although you're been pardoned, you'll never attain your former rank, especially since that rogue Gao Qiu now holds military authority. Do you think he'll forgive you? You'd do better to stay on in our small stronghold, sharing our loot and wine and meat, and be an outlaw like the rest of us. How does that strike you?"
"It's very considerate of you leaders. But I have a relative in the Eastern Capital who was implicated in my case, and I haven't thanked him yet for his help. I still think I'd better go. I hope you'll return my luggage. If you won't, I'll just have to leave without it."
Wang Lun laughed. "Of course we won't force you, if you don't want to remain. Please set your mind at ease. Spend the night. You can go tomorrow morning."
Yang Zhi was very pleased. They drank late into the second watch, then all retired. The next morning, farewell toasts were drunk to Yang Zhi. After breakfast the chieftains directed a bandit to carry Yang's belongings. They went with him down the mountain as far as the beginning of the trail and bid him farewell. The bandit ferried him across the lake and took him to the road. Yang departed and the outlaws returned to the stronghold.
Only then did Wang Lun agree to let Lin Chong occupy the fourth armchair, and Zhu Gui the fifth. From then on, these five bold fellows of Liangshan Marsh pillaged and plundered together. Of that we'll say no more.

Yang Zhi set out down the road. He found a peasant to carry his luggage, and told the bandit to go back. After a number of days, Yang Zhi arrived in the Eastern Capital. He took quarters in an inn, paid off the peasant, removed his weapons, and ordered food and drink. A few days later, he sent someone to the Council of Military Affairs with money and gifts to try, by dispensing largesse high and low, to get himself reinstated as palace aide. It cost him a lot but finally he was granted an interviews with Marshal Gao.
Gao read all the documents concerning his case. "Ten of you aides were sent to transport grotesque rock. Nine delivered their cargo. Only you, you clod, lost yours," the marshal said angrily. "You didn't even report back. Instead you ran away. We couldn't get our hands on you for a long time. Now you want a job again? You may have been pardoned but you still have a criminal record. We can't use you!" He scrawled a refusal on Yang's application, and had him expelled from the Imperial Guards headquarters.
Dejectedly, Yang returned to the inn. "Wang Lun was right," he thought. "It's just that I didn't want to sully the family name. I hoped for a chance to distinguish myself with spear and sword in a border post, to win honours for my wife and opportunities for my sons, and reflect glory on my ancestors. I never expected to get such a rebuff! Poisonous cruel Marshal Gao!"
Yang was quite depressed. A few more days at the inn and his money was gone. "What am I going to do?" Yang fretted. "I'll have to sell the ancestral sword which has never left my side. There is no other way out. I should be able to get a couple of thousand for it. That will keep me in expense money till I find a place for myself."
The same day he tied a few strands of grass to the sword, showing that it was for sale, and took it to the market-place. But though he stood all morning on Horse Fair Avenue, no one asked about the sword. Around noon he went to the busy Tianhanzhou Bridge area to try his luck there.
He hadn't been waiting long when people on both sides of the square suddenly began running away and hiding in lanes near the river. "Hide, quickly!" they yelled, as they fled in panic. "The tiger is coming!"
"Nonsense," said Yang. "What would a tiger be doing in the middle of a prosperous city?" He remained where he was. Then he saw a hulking swarthy fellow staggering half-drunk in his direction. He recognized the notorious rowdy Niu Er, known throughout the city as the Hairless Tiger. A trouble-making, rioting bully, he had been arrested several times but Kaifeng Prefecture seemed unable to control him. Whenever he appeared, everybody got out of his way.
Now he lumbered up to Yang and took the sword from his hand. "How much do you want for this?"
"Three thousand strings of cash for a precious ancestral blade."
"All that money for this shitty thing! For thirty coppers I can buy a knife that will slice meat and cut bean-curd. What's so good about your sword? What's precious about it?"
"This isn't one of those iron blades they sell in the shops. This is a rare weapon."
"How so?"
"First," it can cut copper and pierce iron without curling the edge. Second, it can slice a tuft of hair blown against it. Third, it can kill a man and come away clean."
"Would you really dare cut copper coins?"
"Bring them out and I'll show you."
Niu Er went to a pepper shop near the bridge and returned with twenty three-cent pieces. He piled these on the bridge railing and said to Yang: "If you can cut through these, man, I'll give you three thousand strings of cash."
Though people were afraid to come close, many of them watched from a distance.
"Nothing to it," said Yang. He rolled up his sleeves, grasped the sword fi and took aim. With one downward chop he cleaved the pile of coins neatly in two. The watchers set up a cheer.
"Quit that bloody racket!" growled Niu Er. "What did you say the second thing was?" he asked Yang.
"Take a tuft of hair and just blow it against the blade. It will cut right through it."
"I don't believe you!" The bully pulled a few hairs from his head and handed them to Yang. "Go on, blow, I want to see."
Yang held the hairs in his left hand and blew them with one hard puff against the sword edge. Two halves of the tuft floated to the ground. A loud cheer broke from the crowd. More and more people were gathering.
"What was the third thing?" Niu Er asked.
"Kill a man without staining the blade."
"How can you do that?"
"When you hack a man with this sword there's not a drop of blood on it. That's how sharp it is."
"I don't believe it! Kill a man and show me."
"Here, in the imperial city? Who would dare? I'll kill a dog for you instead."
"You said a man, not a dog!"
"If you don't want the sword, forget it. Quit pestering me."
"Let me see it!"
"Haven't you anything better to do? Don't provoke me."
"Kill me, if you dare!"
"You're never wronged me, we're not enemies. I've proven my claim twice. Why should I kill you?"
Niu Er grasped Yang Zhi's arm. "You must sell me that sword!"
"If you want to buy it, where's your money?"
"I don't have any!"
"What are you holding me for, then?"
"I want that sword!"
"You can't have it!"
"Stab me, if you're so brave!"
Yang angrily pushed him away. Niu Er fell to the ground. He clambered to his feet and butted Yang in the chest.
"Neighbours, you're my witness," Yang shouted. "I'm selling my sword because I need money. This knave is trying to snatch it away, and now he's struck me!"
But the watchers were all afraid of Niu Er. No one dared come forward to make peace.
"So I struck you," cried Niu Er. "Suppose I beat you to death? What of it!" He swung his right fist in a wild punch. Yang dodged and chopped a furious blow at Niu Er's forehead. The scoundrel collapsed. Yang closed in and finished him with two thrusts in the chest. Blood gushed copiously, and Niu Er lay dead.
"I've killed the wretch," Yang exclaimed. "I don't want to implicate you but the man is dead. Please come with me to the authorities and be my witness."
The neighbours quickly rallied round and accompanied Yang to the Kaifeng prefectural office. They all presented themselves and knelt where the prefect was holding court. Yang laid the sword before him.
"I was formerly an aide in the palace but because I lost a cargo of grotesque and coloured stones, I was dismissed. Now, I have no money, and I took my sword on the street to sell it. The rascal Niu Er grabbed for it and started to punch me. I killed him in a moment of rage. These neighbours all saw what happened."
Many spoke on his behalf.
"Since he has come forward voluntarily," said the prefect, "let him be spared the preliminary beating." He ordered that a long cangue be fitted around Yang Zhi's neck, and that two inspectors and a forensic expert take Yang and his witnesses back to the Tianhanzhou Bridge for an examination at the scene of the crime.
The prefect drew the appropriate documents.
After the witnesses submitted formal statements in writing they were released under guarantees to produce themselves whenever the court summoned. Yang Zhi was locked up in the jail for condemned prisoners.
The guards and keepers were sympathetic when they heard that he had killed Niu Er the Hairless Tiger. They didn't demand money from him and treated him well. People who lived near the bridge said he had rid them of a scourge. All chipped in and raised some silver. They had Yang Zhi's meals sent in and dispensed money gifts among his jailers high and low.
The prosecutor considered him a good man who had removed a nuisance from the streets of the capital and had confessed of his own volition. No one had petitioned for justice for Niu Er. And so the charges against Yang were made much milder. He was interrogated a number of times, and finally convicted of "involuntary manslaughter during a fight."
He served a term of sixty days. Then, on the recommendation of the prosecutor, he was brought before the prefect, who ordered that the cangue be removed, and that Yang be given twenty strokes and tattooed with the "golden print" of the criminal, and be exiled to the garrison in Daming, the Northern Capital. The sword was impounded by the court.
Documents were drawn and two escorts appointed. Who should they be but Zhang Long and Zhao Hu. A seven-and-a-half-catty cangue was fastened around Yang Zhi's neck, final instructions given to the escorts, and the three set out.
When they neared the Tianhanzhou Bridge several of the larger shopkeepers, who had raised a special fund, invited them to a tavern for food and wine, and gave the escorts some silver. "Yang Zhi is a good man who's rid the people of a menace," they said. "Please take good care of him on the road to the Northern Capital."
"We know that without you telling us," said the guards. "Don't worry."
Yang thanked his hosts, who gave him the rest of the silver for his travelling expenses, and all went their separate ways.
The former palace aide returned to the inn where he had been living, paid his food and rent bill, collected his clothing and luggage, and treated his escorts to food and wine. He had a doctor apply salve to the wounds from his beating, then took to the road with his guards.
They travelled towards the Northern Capital, a single marker every five li; a double marker every ten. In the big county and prefectural towns, Yang bought food and drink for Zhang Long and Zhao Hu. They spent the nights in hostels, walking again at the break of day. Before long they reached the Northern Capital, and put up at an inn.
The governor of Daming, the Northern Capital, had jurisdiction over both military and civilian affairs. He was very powerful. His name was Liang Zhongshu, and he was the son-in-law of Cai Jing, the Premier in the Eastern Capital. That day was the ninth of the second lunar month, and Liang was holding court. The two escorts entered with Yang Zhi and presented the documents from Kaifeng Prefecture. Liang read them. He had met Yang in the Eastern Capital. Now he questioned him closely, and Yang related how Marshal Gao had refused to reinstate him, how he tried to sell his sword when his money was gone, and his killing of Niu Er. Liang ordered his attendants to remove the cangue, and said he would keep Yang Zhi in his service. He issued a receipt for the prisoner and sent the two escorts back to the Eastern Capital. Of them we'll say no more.
Yang attended Governor Liang in his mansion from morning till night. Liang was impressed with his diligence. He wanted to make him a lieutenant and give him a regular monthly wage. But he thought the other army men would be against it. So he ordered that a military tourney be held among all junior and senior officers at the training field outside the East Gate.
That night Liang summoned Yang to him and said: "I'm thinking of making you a lieutenant with a fixed salary. How good are you with weapons?"
"I attained my original position by passing arms tests. In the palace I was a military aide. I'm familiar with all eighteen forms of the fighting arts. The news that Your Excellency is willing to raise me dispels the dark clouds and lets the sunlight through. If I can make the slightest advance, I shall serve you with the devotion of a horse that is saddled and bridled!"
Liang was delighted. He presented Yang with a set of armor. That night nothing more transpired.
The next morning there was a gentle breeze and the sun was warm. It was the middle of the second lunar month. After breakfast, Liang took Yang with him and they mounted. Escorted by troops front and rear, they proceeded through the East Gate. On the training field, officers and men and many officials were arrayed to greet the governor's arrival. Liang got off his horse at the reviewing pavilion, and took his seat on a silver filagreed chair. Military officers stood to the left and right of him in two rows. Fierce-looking commanders watched from front and rear, and on all sides. On a central platform were two famous generals; Li Cheng, known as the King of the Skies, and Wen Da, known as the Mighty Sword. Either could single-handed defeat ten thousand of the foe, and they commanded great hosts of men and horses. Now both came forward and hailed Liang respectfully.
A yellow flag rose over the generals' platform, and on either side fifty golden drums boomed in thunderous cadence. Three fanfares on the trumpets were followed by three flourishes on the thunder drums. An absolute silence fell on the training field. Over the generals' stand rose a plain white flag. Five companies quickly massed before it in formation. Then above the generals' platform a red signal flag fluttered in the wind. Again the thundering drums rolled, and the five companies broke into two battle formations, weapons at the ready.
The white flag waved. Two lines of cavalry trotted neatly to the fore and reined in their horses.
Liang sent down an order for Lieutenant Zhou Jin to present himself. Lieutenant Zhou, in the right formation, spurred his horse and cantered to the pavilion. He jumped from his mount, stabbed his lance into the ground, and hailed the governor in a ringing voice.
"Let the lieutenant display his military skill," Liang directed.
Zhou grasped his lance and vaulted back into the saddle. He put his horse through its paces in front of the reviewing stand, wheeling left and right while performing several figures with his lance. The watchers shouted their approval.
"Call Yang Zhi, the military stalwart who was transferred here from the Eastern Capital," said Liang.
Yang circled to the front of the pavilion and hailed the governor.

"I know that you formerly were a military aide in the palace in the Eastern Capital, and were exiled here for committing a crime," said Liang. "Today robbers and bandits rampage freely. Our country needs strong men. Dare you joust with Zhou Jin? If you can defeat him, I'll give you his position."
"Since Your Excellency is so benevolent, I cannot refuse."
Liang directed that Yang be given a battle charger, and that the armorer supply him with weapons. Then he ordered Yang Zhi to don his armor, mount and vie with Zhou Jin.
Yang went to the rear of the pavilion and put on the armor he had been given the night before, buckled it tight, set a helmet on his head, took bow and arrows, sword and lance, mounted his horse and cantered out.
Liang called: "Let Yang Zhi and Zhou Jin first vie with lances."
"How dare he cross lances with me," Zhou Jin said angrily. "An exiled criminal!" Little did he know how his words infuriated Yang, who came to do him battle. In this tourney, Yang Zhi won top honours and became tamed throughout the army. But who was the person this contest caused to appear?

Lin Chong looked and saw that the stranger wore a felt hat in the Fanyang style with a red tassel on top, and a white cotton surcoat bound at the waist with a silk belt, black and white leggings, deerskin socks and buffalo-hide boots, still with the hairs on. A sword hung from his waist and he carried a halberd. He was immensely tall. His face was adorned with a great blue birthmark, and he had thin reddish whiskers. He had pushed the hat back till it rested on his shoulders, and bared his breast. His head was covered by a soft knotted scarf.
This giant now brandished his halberd and shouted furiously: "What have you done with my baggage and my valuables, you dirty thief?"
Lin Chong was in no mood for niceties. He made no answer but glared ferociously, and his tiger's moustache bristled with indignation. He raised his halberd and advanced to confront the giant. The snowstorm had abated by this time and the clouds had thinned and scattered. There was a thin strip of ice along the river bank, and it was here that the two of them set about each other with murderous intent. The fight raged to and fro but even after thirty or so assaults, there was nothing to choose between them.
Another ten assaults, and just as a climax must surely be approaching, a voice rang out on the mountain: "Hold, put up your weapons!"
Immediately Lin Chong leapt back out of the circle of combat. Both men stayed their hands and looked towards the mountain. Wang Lun, Du Qian and Song Wan were descending, accompanied by a number of troops. When they had crossed the water, Wang Lun said: "You're both good, your technique's bloody marvellous, in fact. Now this is our friend, Leopard's Head Lin Chong. So you there, with the blue face, who are you? Do us the favour of telling us your name."
The giant replied: "I am descended from three generations of warriors, and I'm a grandson of Duke Yang Ling. My name's Yang Zhi. I've been here in Guanxi for quite a while now but when I was younger I passed the military examinations and served as a commander of the palace guard. When Emperor Hui Zong was building the Marvellous Mountain,[1] he sent ten of us commanders to Lake Tai to supervise the convoys of precious plants and stones on their journey to the capital. It was my misfortune that after I had escorted my convoy safely to the Yellow River, a sudden storm arose and capsized the boat, resulting in the loss of the entire cargo of plants and stones. This made it impossible for me to return to my duties in the capital. I was forced to seek refuge elsewhere. Recently an amnesty was announced, so I collected a quantity of silver and valuables and I was just on my way back to the capital, to report to the military tribunal and see if I can set my affairs in order. I employed a peasant to carry my baggage, and now you have seized it. I'd like to know if you're prepared to return it."
"You're not by any chance the gentleman they call the Blue-Faced Beast are you?" Wang Lun asked.
"Indeed I am," the giant replied.
"If you're Commander Yang, then we must invite you to our mountain fortress to share a few cups of wine with us. That will provide the opportunity for returning your things."
"Since you know me, friends, why not just return the baggage? I'd like that better than any invitation!"
"But Commander, I've heard so much about you — you see, I once had the privilege of going to the capital for the civil service examinations. Now I've had the fortune to meet you, how can I let you go without a celebration? I beg you to come to the mountain retreat, if only for a little while; you can't deny me this."
The upshot of it all was that Yang Zhi went with Wang Lun and the rest, crossing the water and ascending the mountain. They also sent for Zhu Gui to join them. They gathered in the Hall of the Heroes, where Wang Lun and his companions took the four chairs on the left, while Yang Zhi sat on the right, with Lin Chong next to him. A sheep was killed, wine was produced and a feast was laid on in Yang Zhi's honour. We needn't dwell on this. The main thing was that while several cups were downed Wang Lun had been pursuing his own thoughts: "If we let Lin Chong stay it's a dead certainty we're going to have problems. Why not put on the appearance of friendliness and ask Yang Zhi to stay too? The two of them will balance each other out." Accordingly he introduced Lin to Yang Zhi as follows: "This gentleman is Leopard's Head Lin Chong, former instructor of the palace guard in the capital. Because that bastard Marshal Gao can't bear the sight of a good man, he was sentenced and banished to Cangzhou, and now he's got into some more trouble there that is why he's just come to us. You say, Commander, that you want to go back to serving in the capital. Don't think I'm trying to involve you — as you see, I had to exchange the pen for the sword and now I'm an outlaw — but you, too, didn't you commit a serious crime? Even if there's an amnesty, I very much doubt if you'll get your old job back, especially when there's a rogue like Gao-the-Ball in charge of military affairs. I can't see him pardoning you. Wouldn't you do better to stay and throw in your lot with us? We share the loot, there's no shortage of food and drink, we're a loyal band. What say you, Commander?"
Yang Zhi replied: "I thank you all sincerely for your offer. But I have a relative in the capital who stuck his neck out for me. I haven't had a chance to thank him yet. So I still want to go, and I hope you will agree to return my baggage to me. If not, I'll just go as I am, empty-handed."
"Of course if you don't want to stay how could we force you to join us?" said Wang Lun pleasantly. "For tonight, though, you must please stay and rest here. You can leave first thing in the morning."
Yang Zhi was greatly relieved. They went on drinking and the night was well advanced before they parted and went to bed.
The next day they were all up early, to wish Yang Zhi a speedy journey and drink a cup of wine with him. After breakfasting, they appointed one of their men to act as bearer to Yang Zhi and set off to accompany him themselves as far as the highway that they reached after crossing the water. Here they bade Yang Zhi farewell and returned to the mountain stronghold. Wang Lun now assigned Lin Chong the fourth place, and Zhu Gui the fifth and henceforth the five of them pursued their life of banditry from their mountain base. We shall leave them to it.
Once on the highway, Yang Zhi soon found a peasant to carry his baggage and dismissed the bandit. After travelling a number of days, he reached the capital. The first thing he did there was find an inn to put up at. The peasant was paid and sent away. Yang Zhi went to his room and disposed of his baggage, putting aside his halberd and sword and handing the waiter some loose change to go and fetch food and wine. Some days later, he sent someone to test the waters at the military tribunal, and bring his case to people's attention. To this end he employed all the cash and valuables he had brought with him, distributing gifts to high and low, all in the hope of getting back his old position at the palace. He had exhausted considerable sums before finally his petition was received and he was granted an interview with Grand Marshal Gao. When he appeared before the Marshal, Gao-le-Bel had been looking through his dossier. "There were ten of you," he bawled, "sent to escort the convoys of precious plants and rocks. Nine of them returned safely to the capital and handed over the goods. But you, damn your eyes, you lost your convoy and what's more, you didn't even come to report the matter. We've been after you for a long time without being able to lay hands on you. And now you turn up here asking to have your old job back. Well, there may be an amnesty but it's not going to do you any good." With that he took a brush and crossed the petition through and through, after which he had Yang Zhi unceremoniously thrown out.
Yang Zhi returned despondently to the inn. "Wang Lun's advice was obviously quite right," he thought to himself. "But I bear an honourable name, and I didn't want to disgrace what I inherited from my parents. It was my hope to do great things, to win glory with sword and halberd and store up wealth and name for my descendants, as well as honouring my ancestors. I didn't expect a blow like this. Marshal Gao, you poisonous reptile! How you persecute me!" Thus ran his thoughts.
He remained some days more at the inn, till his funds were entirely gone. It was a case of:
The precious convoy went astray,
Malice seems to have won the day.
Better than to seek power at court
Is live in the wilds where men aren't bought.
"Well, what do I do now?" he wondered. "I've nothing left of value but this fine blade, a family heirloom which has never left my side till now. It seems there's nothing else for it: I shall have to sell my sword in the market. I should get a thousand cash or more that will allow me to leave and seek my fortune elsewhere."
That same day he took the sword and wrapped it in straw, to show it was for sale, and went to the market to sell it. He went to Horse-market Street, and stood there four hours but no buyers came. At noon he moved to the Bridge of the Milky Way which was very busy. He had not been there long when he noticed people on all sides were running to hide in the little lanes and alleys. There was great confusion but he heard people shouting: "Quick, let's get out of here. The Wild Animal is coming!"
"That's strange!" Yang Zhi thought. "This is the centre of a fine city, how can there be a wild animal here?" But as he stood there watching, he saw in the distance a huge swarthy ruffian of awesome appearance, staggering drunkenly towards him. Yang Zhi did not like the look of him at all:
The lines of his face are shifting as a ghost's but his body has an entirely human solidity. It's as if a gnarled tree with tangled branches has been turned into a body with arms and legs. Or as if a rotten old stump has transformed itself into an ogre. The whole body is covered in rough skin like a shark's. The whole head and face are matted with tightly curling spirals of hair. He sticks his chest out mulishly and his forehead is furrowed by three obstinate lines.
This character was in fact well-known in the capital. He was a drunken good-for-nothing whom everyone called "The Ox." He used to rampage through the streets at will, running amok, creating havoc, and even the police and the courts were unable to keep him in check. That's why everyone used to hide when they saw him coming.
Well, this "Ox" charged up to Yang Zhi and grabbed the sword. "How much do you want for this, then?" he asked.
"This fine blade is a family heirloom," Yang Zhi said. "I'm asking three thousand for it."
"What, that much for a bloody sword? I can get a knife in the market for thirty, and it'll do to cut meat or bean-curd. What's so special about yours? Why d'you call it a 'fine blade'?"
"This is not just your ordinary soft-steel blade, you can't buy it in a shop. It's tempered steel."
"What does that mean, tempered steel?" the Ox asked.
"One, you can cut through copper or iron with it and you won't turn the edge. Two, blow a hair onto it and it'll cut the hair in two. Three, it will kill a man without a trace of blood."
"You'd really cut copper and iron with it?" said the Ox.
"Bring me some and I'll show you."
The Ox went off and found a perfume and spices shop under the bridge, where he procured twenty triple coins that he piled up on the parapet of the bridge. "There you are," he said to Yang Zhi. "If you can cut clean through that, I'll give you the three thousand cash." There was quite a crowd of spectators by now, though they didn't dare to approach; they preferred to watch from afar.
"No problem at all," said Yang Zhi, and rolling up his sleeves he grasped the sword, took aim, and cut the pile of copper neatly in two with a single blow. A gasp went up from the crowd.
"What the hell are they oohing and ahing about?" growled the Ox. "What was that second thing you said?"
"If you blow a hair onto it, it will cut it in two. Just take a few hairs and blow them against the blade. It will cut them neatly."
"Don't believe you," said the Ox. He pulled out some of his own hair and handed it to Yang Zhi saying: "You do the blowing and I'll watch."
Yang Zhi took the hairs in his left hand and placed them on the blade and blew hard. The hairs were cut in two and the halves floated down to the ground. The crowd gasped again. More and more people were gathering.
"All right, what was the third thing?" the Ox asked.
"It will kill a man without a trace of blood."
"How can you kill a man without blood?"
"If you kill a man with one blow of this sword you won't see a drop of blood because it's so sharp."
"Don't believe you," said the Ox. "Go on, kill a man so I can see."
"How can I kill someone in the middle of the imperial city? If you don't believe me, find a dog and I'll kill it for you."
"You said it will kill a man, you didn't say anything about a dog," the Ox objected.
"If you don't want to buy it don't buy it. You're beginning to annoy me."
"Give it here."
"Watch your step! What have I done to provoke you?"
"You'd dare to kill me?"
"I've no quarrel with you, past or present. If you don't want it, someone else will. Why would I want to kill you, without any reason?"
The Ox gripped Yang Zhi's arm tightly and said: "But I want to buy your sword."
"If you want to buy it, let's see the colour of your money."
"I haven't got any money."
"In that case, you'd better take your hands off me."
"I want your sword."
"You're not going to have it."
"If you're so brave, let's see what you can do to me."
Yang Zhi lost his patience. He struck out and sent the Ox flying. The Ox staggered to his feet and tried to rush Yang Zhi.
"Be my witness, neighbours," Yang Zhi cried out. "I came here to sell this sword, because I've no money for my travel expenses, and this good-for-nothing tried to steal the sword and assaulted me."
But the bystanders were too scared of the Ox and no one dared to speak up.
"Assaulted you, did I?" said the Ox. "Then I might as well finish you off." And with this he drew back his right arm and aimed a mighty blow. Yang Zhi leapt aside, quick as lightning, drew his sword and slashed in fury at the Ox's forehead. The Ox crashed to the ground. Yang Zhi leapt on him and thrust the sword twice more into his breast. Blood flooded over the ground and the Ox expired on the spot.
"I've killed the stupid bastard," Yang Zhi shouted. "Friends, I don't mean to implicate you but since he's dead, you'd better all come with me to report it to the police."
The bystanders crowded round Yang Zhi and escorted him to the Kaifeng Magistracy. The court happened to be in session, and Yang Zhi, still holding the sword and surrounded by inhabitants of the district, was shown into the Governor's presence. He knelt down, holding out the sword in front of him, and made his declaration: "I am a former commander of the palace guard, because I had the misfortune to lose a convoy of precious plants and stones I was relieved of my duties, I am bankrupt and I wanted to sell this sword. I was suddenly attacked by a worthless scoundrel known as the Ox who punched me and wanted to take my sword by force. I lost my patience and killed him. These good neighbours can vouch for the truth of this."
The witnesses all spoke up and testified in Yang Zhi's favour.
"Since you have voluntarily given yourself up," the Governor said, "you will be spared the preliminary beating."
A cangue was imposed, and two policemen escorted Yang Zhi, together with an investigating officer and the crowd of witnesses, to the place of the crime to verify the facts. A report was drawn up, the witnesses, after making their statements, were released on bail, the court acted on the evidence immediately and Yang Zhi was thrown into the death cell.
Now when Yang Zhi landed in that gaol, all the warders, the turnkeys and other officers, hearing that he had killed that public enemy, the Ox, regarded him as a hero. They made no demands for money but rather, showed him the utmost consideration. The people from the neighbourhood of the Bridge of the Milky Way, seeing that Yang Zhi had rid the streets of a public menace, got up a collection for him and amassed quite an amount of silver. They took him food, and tipped every officer in the gaol, from the highest to the lowest. The investigating magistrate also considered Yang Zhi a capital fellow, because he had rid the city streets of a scourge, and since no plea was forthcoming from the Ox's family, he couched the accusation in the most favourable terms possible: after a perfunctory interrogation it was established that there had been a scuffle, a disturbance, resulting in blows, and an accidental death.
After the obligatory sixty days, the court's findings were presented to the Governor. Yang Zhi was summoned, the cangue was removed, he was given twenty strokes, the tattooer was called in to affix the two golden seals, and Yang Zhi was banished to the Northern Capital, Daming, where he was to serve in the garrison. His valuable sword was impounded.
When the order had been written out, two officers were appointed as his escort. They turned out to be Zhang the Dragon, and Zhao the Tiger. A seven-and-a-half-catty cangue was imposed and sealed, and the two officers were instructed to watch him carefully during the journey. The people from the Bridge of the Milky Way who had made their collection waited for him and invited him, together with his guards, to an inn. They handed out silver and exhorted the guards as follows: "Remember that Yang Zhi is a good man, who rid the people of a menace; now you're on the way to the Northern Capital, we trust you will look after him." Zhang and Zhao said: "We are well aware that he is a good man, there's no need to tell us all this but anyway, don't worry, we'll take good care of him." Yang Zhi thanked everyone. The remaining silver was set aside for Yang Zhi's travel expenses. The crowd went their ways.
Then, we are told, Yang Zhi and the guards went back to Yang Zhi's hotel, where he paid for his bed and board, and collected the clothes and baggage he had left there. He ordered food and wine for the two officers and sent for a surgeon to make up a salve that could be applied to the wounds he received from the beating. After this they took to the road, heading north towards Daming and maintaining a steady pace. Whenever they came to a town of any size Yang Zhi bought wine and meat and invited the two guards to join him. They stayed at an inn every night, and set out again at dawn, along the national highway. In a few days they reached the Northern Capital. Entering the city, they sought out an inn to put up at.
Now in those days the Governor of Daming District, or the Northern Capital, had considerable powers: wearing his military hat he commanded the garrison, and with his civilian hat on he governed the civilian population. He was Liang Zhongshu, also known to his family as Shijie. He was a son-in-law of the imperial adviser Cai Jing.
It was now the ninth day of the second month, and the Governor was sitting in the audience hall when the two guards escorted Yang Zhi into his presence. They delivered the letter from the Kaifeng magistrate. Governor Liang read it. He happened to have met Yang Zhi previously in the Eastern Capital, and of course wanted to know exactly what had happened. So Yang Zhi told him how Marshal Gao had refused to reinstate him, how he had exhausted his funds and tried to sell his sword in the street, and how this had led to his killing the Ox. All this he recounted in due order. Governor Liang greatly relished the account. He ordered the cangue removed and retained Yang Zhi for his personal service. A receipt for the prisoner was signed and delivered to the guards who returned to the Eastern Capital. Of them we say no more.

Yang Zhi from now on served the Governor with diligence and alacrity. His industriousness and attention to detail impressed the Governor so much that the latter determined to promote him. The Governor's idea was to give him a commission in the army as ensign, with the corresponding emoluments but he was afraid this might meet resistance from his subordinates. He therefore instructed his military council to instruct all officers of whatsoever rank to assemble the following day on the training ground outside the Eastern Gate for military manoeuvres and jousts. That same evening he called Yang Zhi and told him: "I intend to make you an ensign in my army, on full pay but I'd like you first to tell me about your military qualifications."

"I passed the military examinations," Yang Zhi said, "and reached the rank of commander of the palace guard. I have studied the eighteen martial arts since I was a child. If you give me this opportunity, it will really be like sunshine after a storm. Give me just one inch of opportunity and I will serve you like an obedient horse."

The Governor was pleased with this answer, and made him the gift of a suit of armour.

Nothing more of importance happened that evening. The next day turned out warm and sunny — it was just the middle of the second month. After breakfasting, Governor Liang rode with Yang Zhi, surrounded by his bodyguard, to the Eastern Gate. At the training ground they found all the troops and a considerable number of officials already waiting. The Governor dismounted and ascended the tribune and took his seat on a silver chair in the centre. To right and left of him his officials and military commanders were lined up in order of rank, from general down to standard-bearer. He was guarded front and rear by an imposing group of officers. Also on the platform were two senior generals: these were Li Cheng, known as the Heavenly Prince, and Wen Da, known as "Swordsman Wen," each capable of facing ten thousand enemies. They now pressed forward at the head of a bevy of cavalrymen and sang out a resounding salute to the Governor, thrice repeated.

But already a yellow flag was floating over the tribune. Some thirty or forty gilded drums, deployed on all sides, began to beat in unison, and trumpets and bugles rang out three times. There was a triple roll from the kettle-drums, and then the whole assembly fell silent.

A white flag was now run up over the tribune and five troops of soldiers formed in front of it, with perfect dressing. At a wave of the red signal flag on the platform the drums rolled again and five hundred men divided into two opposing bodies, their officers presenting arms. Another signal from the white flag and the two troops of cavalry wheeled towards the stand, and came to a sudden halt as each man reined in his horse.

The Governor gave an order for the ensign, Zhou Jin, to report to him. Zhou Jin galloped forward from the right-hand troop and halted before the tribune. He dismounted, stuck his weapon in the ground, and thundered out a salute.

Governor Liang said: "Let the ensign give us a demonstration of his skill and prowess in the martial arts."

Zhou Jin promptly sprang onto his horse, weapon in hand, and proceeded to wheel and manoeuvre in front of the stand, with virtuoso flourishes of his weapon. The spectators applauded.

Then the Governor gave another order: "Call the exiled commander from the capital, Yang Zhi!"

Yang Zhi halted in front of the tribune and saluted.

"Yang Zhi," the Governor said, "I know that you are a former commander of the palace guard and that you were banished here for a crime. At present many bandits and robbers are preying on the land and the country has great need of brave men. Are you prepared to test your military skill against that of Zhou Jin? If you can defeat him, I will promote you to his position."

Yang Zhi replied: "Whatever you order, I will obey."

Governor Liang commanded that Yang Zhi be provided with a cavalry horse, and that the quartermaster should equip him with all the necessary arms. Yang Zhi was to prepare himself and then do battle with Zhou Jin on horseback. Yang Zhi retired behind the tribune to don the armour he had been given. When he had tied on the breastplate, put on a hood, and taken up bow, arrows, sword and a long lance, he mounted and rode forth. The Governor said, "Let Yang Zhi and Zhou Jin first test their skill with lances."

Zhou Jin was fuming. "Am I to joust with a convict, does this jailbird dare to measure lances with me?"

Who would have expected that Yang Zhi's misfortunes would have brought him thus into conflict with Zhou Jin? However, without this trial things would have been different and how should we have seen Yang Zhi's name echoed among the ranks of the brave, top honours for the whole army awarded to him alone?

LIN CHONG noticed that the man was wearing a felt hat, with a red tassel on top; a white silk fighting gown; a loose sash; a pair of trousers with the bottom wrapped round with blue and white bands of cloth (like puttees). His socks were of deerskin, and his boots were of undressed cowhide. He had a halberd in his hand, and a sword in his belt. He was over six feet high, and his face was covered with blue spots. His mustache and scanty side whiskers were of brown colour; his felt cap was hanging down his back by the strings; his loose clothes were displaying his broad breast; and wrapped around his head was a small turban. Pointing his halberd at Lin Chong he spoke in a loud voice, "You thief! Where is my baggage?"

As Lin Chong was not in a good temper he did not reply but glared at his adversary, and turned up the corners of his mustache. He grasped his halberd, and advanced to fight with the man. Just at that time the weather was clear and bright, with no clouds in the sky.

These men in their bloodthirsty struggle trampled down the snow on the bank of a small stream at that spot.

They had about thirty bouts, without either side winning or losing. They went on and had about ten more combats when they heard on the hillside a loud voice saying, "These two fine fellows, you need not fight any more."

Upon hearing this Lin Chong leapt to one side out of the ring as an indication that he had stopped fighting. The two men looking up the hillside saw there Wang Lun, the "White Clothes Scholar," Du Qian, Song Wan, and many other bandits. They descended the hill, and crossed the lake by boats. Upon their arrival Wang Lun said, "You two, good fellows, are expert with the halberd. Quite marvelous! This is my younger brother, Lin Chong, 'Leopard's Head.' Who are you, the blue marked face? What is your name?"

The man replied, "I am the grandson of Marquis Yang Linggong, and my father and his grandfather were generals. My name is Yang Zhi, and I am now wandering about 'west of the pass.' While young I passed a test for my military skill and had a small position in the Imperial Guard. The Emperor decided to build a palace on Mount Wansui, and deputed ten of us lieutenants to get the marble from a quarry near the Taihu Lake, near Suzhou, and convey it to the Eastern Capital. I did not expect bad luck but in conveying the marble along the Yellow River a strong wind overturned the boat and the valuable cargo was all lost. I was afraid to go back to my post, and ran away to hide myself in some other place. Since then, however, I have been pardoned. So I got together some money and presents for the officials of the Grand Council at the capital, to try to regain my position. In passing this place I hired a farm labourer to carry my baggage, and did not expect that I should lose it like this. Are you now going to give it back?"

"Is not your nickname 'Blue Faced Brute,'" inquired Wang Lun.

"That is so."

"As that is the case," said Wang Lun, "please come to our stronghold, and after a few cups of wine I will return your baggage."

"You are a fine fellow," said Yang Zhi, "and as you know me I think it will be better if you give me my baggage, and never mind about the wine."

"When I sat for the examinations at the Eastern Capital a number of years ago," said Wang Lun, "I then heard of your fame. It is very opportune for us to meet here today, so how can I let you depart without entertaining you? Please come to our mountain stronghold just for a little chat. I really have no other intention."

Yang Zhi agreed to this, and thereupon they all crossed the lake, and ascended the hill to the stronghold. Zhu Gui at the inn was summoned to the stronghold for an interview. They all gathered together in the Assembly Hall. On the left were four seats for Wang Lun, Du Qian, Song Wan, and Zhu Gui, and on the other side were seats for Yang Zhi and Lin Chong. When they were all seated Wang Lun ordered a sheep to be killed, some wine to be prepared, and made arrangements for a banquet to entertain the guests.

While they were dining Wang Lun thought the situation over, and saw that if they kept only Lin Chong, he would discover their weakness. But on the other hand if they got Yang Zhi to stay he would be able to keep Lin Chong in order. So pointing to Lin Chong he said to Yang Zhi, "This our younger brother is Lin Chong, nicknamed 'Leopard's Head,' who previously was Drill Instructor in the Imperial Guards but the Marshal Gao Qiu, did not like him, and banished him to Cangzhou. There was some further trouble at that place so that he has just arrived here. You are a lieutenant and are on your way to the capital to get a position. I do not intend to ask you to join us but will simply point out that previously I sat for the civil service examination but afterwards became a brigand. Although you have been pardoned you will still be regarded as an offender, and therefore you will have a difficulty in getting back your previous post. Moreover, Gao Qiu is still in office so it is unlikely that he will be willing to give you a position. So would it not be better for you to stay here, and becoming a hero, share with us the silver, gold, wine, and meats? Do you not think this is a better plan?"

"I am much obliged to you for your kind invitation," said Yang Zhi, "but I have a relative at the capital, who was blamed for my offence, and I have never been able to thank him for his part in the affair. Today I must really go on my way to see him, so I hope that you will let me have my baggage at once. If you do not give it to me then I must depart empty-handed."

Wang Lun laughed at this, and said, "You say you will not stay, so how can I use force and compel you to join our band? I must ask you to rest here for the night at least, and depart tomorrow."

Yang Zhi was much pleased with this settlement, and after drinking wine together until about ten o'clock they each went to their separate rooms to sleep.

The following day they were up very early, and after breakfast the bandit chief detailed a man to carry the baggage, and accompany Yang Zhi down the mountain. All the leaders went down the mountain; across the lake, and put Yang Zhi on the road again where they bade him adieu, and then returned to their stronghold.

Wang Lun told Lin Chong that he would take thereafter the fourth seat, and Zhu Gui, the fifth.

Now we will not go into the question of the fighting and looting of these five leaders and their bandits on Liangshan Marsh.

Yang Zhi soon found a man to carry his baggage, and then dismissed the bandit soldier who went back to the stronghold on the hill. Within a few days he reached the Eastern Capital. Finding an inn he stopped there. He duly paid the countryman for carrying his baggage, and dismissed him. Taking off his sword and putting his baggage in a room, he gave the waiter a little money to go and buy some wine and meat for him.

After a few days he requested a man to go to the Grand Council, and make some arrangement for his case to be reconsidered. He also took the silver and gold articles, and sent them to the higher and lower officials with a request that he should be reinstated with his rank of lieutenant. When he had expended all his presents an order came instructing him to call and see the Marshal Gao Qiu . Upon Yang Zhi's arriving at the headquarters, Gao Qiu looked at his official record and was very angry. He spoke in a loud voice, "I see from this record that ten lieutenants were deputed to bring marble but nine executed the work, and you were the only one who lost a cargo. You did not even come and report the loss but instead ran away to avoid being arrested! Although you were pardoned of this serious offence, yet I cannot give you a commission in the army again." He then made his mark on the record and gave an order that Yang Zhi be driven away.

That hero left the headquarters in a very melancholy frame of mind. Upon arriving at his inn he thought matters over, and saw that Wang Lun was quite right in the advice he had given him. But as his family had a clean record, he could not join their band and disgrace his parents.

He hoped that he might by meritorious service at some distant frontier again establish a good reputation for himself, and even add to the luster of his ancestors, and make it better for his descendants. He did not, however, expect this rebuff. "Marshal Gao! How malicious you are! How cruel!" He was in a state of mental agony for some time.

He stayed at the inn for a few days until all his money was spent. Then he wondered what he must do. His ancestors had bequeathed him the best of swords which he had always carried with him. But now that he was in difficulty he had to go on the street and try to sell this sword for several hundred strings of cash. That would enable him to get away to some other place. So he tied some grass to the sword to indicate that it was for sale, and went out. He went to the Horse Market Street, and stood there for a long time, without any inquiry being made. In the afternoon he removed to the Tianhanzhou Bridge where there was more traffic. When he had been standing there a short time he noticed that the men on both sides of the bridge ran off to hide in the alleyways near the bridge. While Yang Zhi was looking on at this confusion he heard some men say, "Hide quickly! The 'Big Tiger' is coming!"

Yang Zhi said, "How strange! This is the capital, and yet there is a 'Big Tiger' here!" Looking along the street he noticed in the distance a big black man coming who was evidently half drunk as he staggered along. Yang Zhi then remembered that he had previously heard that in the capital there was a bully called Niu Er whose nickname was "Hairless Tiger." He had the reputation of always making rows and fighting on the streets. He had been before many magistrates but even the Prefect had not been able to make him submissive, and therefore when he came on the street everybody ran away to hide until he had passed. On this occasion he hurried up to Yang Zhi and took the sword out of the latter's hand. He asked, "How much do you want for this sword?"

Yang Zhi informed him that it was an excellent sword and an heirloom but he was willing to sell it for three thousand strings of cash.

"What sword is this that you want so much money for?" asked Niu Er. "I can buy a good sword for thirty cash which will cut up meat and bean curd. What is there about this sword that will justify you in calling it an excellent sword?"

"This sword," said Yang Zhi, "is not for use in an inn cutting up meat but is an excellent sword."

"But why do you call it an excellent sword?" asked Niu Er again.

Yang Zhi said, "This sword will cut through copper or iron without the edge being blunted, and again if you blow a hair against the edge the hair will be cut in half, and yet again if you kill a man there will be no blood left on the blade."

Niu Er asked, "But dare you cut copper with it?"

Yang Zhi said, "If you bring some cash here then you can see whether it will cut or not."

Niu Er went to a peppermint shop at the side of the bridge and demanded twenty copper coins valued at three cash each. He put these on the stone railing of the bridge and said to Yang Zhi: "If you can cut those in half I will give you three thousand strings of cash for the sword."

The people did not dare to come and see what was taking place but they stood around in the distance looking on.

Yang Zhi said, "That will easily be done." He took the sword and taking a careful steady aim he cut the coppers in half with one stroke. The crowd seeing what he had done applauded.

Niu Er said, "What are you people applauding for?" He then turned to Yang Zhi and asked him what was the second thing that the sword could do.

Yang Zhi said that if be got several hairs, and put them on the edge of the sword, and then blew, the hairs would be entirely cut in half.

Niu Er did not believe this but he pulled some hair from his own head, handed them to Yang Zhi and said, "You blow, and I will watch."

Yang Zhi taking the hair in his left hand, put it against the edge of the sword and with his blowing very hard the hair fell to the ground cut in half. The crowd had increased in size and applauded this.

Niu Er asked, "What was the third thing this sword can do?"

Yang Zhi said, "If a man is killed there is no sign of blood on the blade."

Niu Er asked, "How can that be?"

Yang Zhi said, "It cuts so quickly that the blood has no time to get on the blade."

Niu Er said, "I don't believe that. But you just kill a man, and I will see whether that will happen."

Yang Zhi said, "This is the Imperial city so how dare I kill a man here? But as you do not believe what I say, then get a dog and I will kill it, and you will then see what happens."

"Your claim was to kill a man, and you did not say anything about a dog."

Yang Zhi said, "I suppose you don't really want to buy. But why are you wasting my time by such remarks?"

"Let me have a look at the sword," said Niu Er.

Yang Zhi replied, "You are still talking without coming to the point. I did not ask you to come here to buy the sword, and I am not a person with whom you can pick a quarrel."

"Very well," said Niu Er, "perhaps you had better kill me!"

"I had no quarrel with you before," said Yang Zhi, "and now our bargaining has been fruitless, so why should I kill you?"

Niu Er took hold of Yang Zhi and said, "I most certainly want to buy your sword."

"If you want to buy then bring the money," said Yang Zhi

"I have no money," said Niu Er.

"As you are without money why do you hold me like this?"

"Because I want your sword."

"Then I won't give it to you."

"As you are a brave man you may give me a cut with the sword," said Niu Er in a provocative voice.

Yang Zhi became angry at this, and pushed Niu Er down on the ground. Niu Er got up and butted his head against Yang Zhi's breast.

Yang Zhi then addressed the surrounding crowd, "Neighbours, you have witnessed what has happened. I have no money, and want to sell this sword. This bully is determined to have it and has assaulted me, and wants to fight."

The neighbours were all afraid of Niu Er, and therefore nobody stepped forward to mediate in the quarrel.

Niu Er shouted, "You say that I have assaulted you, so if I do hit you it won't matter, I suppose." So saying he lifted up his right hand to strike Yang Zhi. But Yang Zhi drew back, seized his sword, and thrust the point of it into the neck of Niu Er who fell down. Yang Zhi stepped forward, and thrust his sword twice into the breast of Niu Er. The blood gushed out, and the latter was soon dead.

Yang Zhi spoke to the crowd of people, "I have killed this rascal, and I do not want any of you to be blamed for it. As he is quite dead now I want you to come with me to the yamen, and report voluntarily as to how it was done."

The bystanders came forward, and accompanied Yang Zhi to the yamen to give evidence. Upon arrival they found that the Prefect was in the court so they all crowded in and knelt down. Yang Zhi placed the sword before the Prefect, and said, "I was previously a lieutenant in the Imperial Guard but was dismissed owing to having lost a cargo of marble. As I had no money I took my sword to the street with the object of selling it. While I was there a blackguard named Niu Er came and tried to take the sword from me by force and also assaulted me. Because of this I got angry, and killed him. All these men saw what happened."

The bystanders confirmed this statement with many details.

The Prefect said that as Yang Zhi had come forward and confessed the crime he would not inflict the usual punishment of beating with the bamboo. He then instructed the coroner with two assistants to go and hold a post-mortem examination of the body. A cangue was put on Yang Zhi who, with all the bystanders, departed with the coroner to the Tianhanzhou Bridge. Upon their arrival a careful examination of the body took place, and after having recorded the inquisition they returned to the yamen where the evidence of the bystanders was recorded, and duly attested by them. They were then released by bail and Yang Zhi was sent to prison.

In the prison the superintendent, jailers, and turnkeys did not ask Yang Zhi to give them money this time but instead they took pity on him, and treated him well, because they heard that he had killed for the people the "Hairless Tiger," Niu Er. Moreover the neighbours near the Tianhanzhou Bridge collected money; some of which they gave to Yang Zhi, and with another part they purchased food and sent it to him, and another part was given to the prison officials with a request that they should treat Yang Zhi well. The magistrate who considered the case saw that Yang Zhi was a good man, and had rid the capital of a great bully. As no relatives or mourners had come forward from Niu Er's family, the judge decided to give a very light sentence. At several cross-examinations Yang Zhi besides confessing the crime, made it clear that he had done it unintentionally, and in a fit of temper. After keeping Yang Zhi in prison for sixty days without anything further turning up, the judge reported to the Prefect that the prisoner Yang Zhi had been given twenty blows with the bamboo, the cangue had been removed, he had been branded on both sides of his face and he recommended that he be banished to the Northern Capital, Daming Prefecture. The sword was ordered to be confiscated.

The Prefect thereupon issued an order that two aides, named Zhang Long and Zhao Hu, were to escort Yang Zhi, and that the prisoner was to have only a light cangue weighing ten pounds.
The wealthy people in the neighbourhood of the Tianhanzhou Bridge collected money to present to Yang Zhi, and then waited there for him and his escort to pass. Upon their arrival they were asked to adjourn to an inn for some food and wine. There they presented some silver to the escort, and said, "We think that Yang Zhi is a good man, and has rescued us from much danger and trouble, and we therefore hope that you will look after him well on the road to Daming."
Chang Long and Zhao Hu said, "We are already aware that he is a good man so you need not give us any orders and may rest assured that we will treat him well."
After the people had also given Yang Zhi plenty of money to cover his traveling expenses they all departed.
Yang Zhi then got his escort to take him to the inn where he had previously stayed, and there he invited them to take food and wine with him. He paid the money owing for the room he had occupied, got together his clothes and also bought some plasters which he applied to the sores left on him as a result of the bamboo he had been beaten with. All three then started off on the road towards Daming Prefecture. On the road there was a single stone every five li, and two stones every ten li. At every town and city Yang Zhi bought meat and wine which he asked his escort also to partake of. They walked during the day, and slept at inns for the night. In a short time they duly reached Daming. Upon arriving there they found an inn at which they stayed. At that time the commander-in-chief had his headquarters at the Northern Capital (Daming) where he had great power, and authority as he not only controlled the army but in addition governed the people.
The commander in chief was Grand Secretary Liang, the son-in-law of the Prime Minister Cai Jing.
It was the nineth day of the second lunar month when the escort arrived with Yang Zhi, and they delivered the report to that commander-in-chief who was at the headquarters at that time. Now it happened that Grand Secretary Liang had known Yang Zhi at the time he was stationed in the Eastern Capital. Upon reading the report he at once asked how it had happened that he had left the army.
Yang Zhi explained how he had been dismissed from the army by Marshal Gao, and how he had spent all his money in bribing officers to get him reinstated. How he had tried to sell his sword on the street, and during a fit of temper had killed Niu Er. He told him every detail of his affairs.
When Grand Secretary Liang heard it all he was much pleased. He gave orders for the cangue to be removed, and that Yang Zhi was to be employed at headquarters. The reply for the Eastern Capital was sent off by the escort.
At Liang's headquarters Yang Zhi was very diligent and attentive at his duties. The commander-in-chief noticed this, and decided to give him a commission in the army with a salary attached to it. But as he was afraid of some opposition to this from the other officers he issued a general order that all ranks should proceed to the drill ground outside the East Gate (two li from the city) where there would be a general parade and inspection of the troops.
On the evening of the same day when he issued this order Grand Secretary Liang sent for Yang Zhi to come and see him. Upon his arrival he spoke to him: "I have thought of giving you a commission in the army with a suitable salary. But I do not know what training or skill you have in military matters."
"I previously passed a military examination, and obtained a commission. I, in fact, learned the eighteen military arts when I was quite young. I am much obliged to you for your mentioning this, and this seems to me as the emerging of the sun from among the clouds. Should I be promoted I shall be only too glad if I had the opportunity of doing some services to you."
Grand Secretary Liang was much pleased upon hearing this, and presented him with an officer's uniform and armor.
The following day was the middle of the second month, and the weather was warm with a little breeze. After breakfast Grand Secretary Liang and Yang Zhi mounted their horses, and with a bodyguard both in front and behind proceeded outside the East Gate. Upon their arrival at the parade ground, the large number of troops and officers stood to attention. They proceeded to the inspection platform where they dismounted, and Grand Secretary Liang took his seat in a chair ornamented with silver. On either side of him stood the officers: staff officers, drill masters, generals, commanders, adjutant-generals, captains, and lieutenants. Before and behind were numerous minor officers. Near his chair stood his two chief Generals Li Cheng nicknamed "Li, the King of Heaven," and Wen Da nicknamed "Wen, the Great Sword." These two were the most skilled in the military arts. They led their foot and cavalry troops before the platform for inspection, and they all saluted Liang by calling out "nuo" three times. A yellow flag was floating over the platform, and on both sides were about fifty drums and trumpets which kept up a rhythm of sounds three times each alternately. Everything else was very quiet. A large white flag was then unfurled on the platform, and all the troops stood to attention upon seeing this. A red signaling flag was next unfurled, and the drums and trumpets burst forth to draw attention to it, and immediately five hundred soldiers wheeled round into two sections, holding their swords in their hands.
A small white signaling flag was next waved, and all the officers on horseback assembled in front of the platform, and there reined their steeds in. Grand Secretary Liang summoned Lieutenant Zhou Jin, and that officer galloped forward, dismounted in front of the platform, stuck his spear in the ground, stood to attention, and at the same moment replied in a loud voice "nuo."
Grand Secretary Liang then told him to go through his fencing drill. Upon hearing this order Lieutenant Zhou Jin took his spear, mounted, and went through a display of cavalry horsemanship and sword drill in front of the platform, and was applauded by the troops.
Grand Secretary Liang then summoned Yang Zhi, and upon that officer's arrival he spoke to him: "Yang Zhi, I know that previously you were an officer at the Eastern Capital but have been banished here because of some fault. Just now the bandits are giving a lot of trouble, and the government must employ men to suppress them. Now are you willing to have a bout with Zhou Jin so that I can see your skill and whether you are suitable for a commission? If you defeat Zhou Jin you can have his rank and duties."
"As you, my benefactor, ask me to do this I must do it," said Yang Zhi.
Grand Secretary Liang then gave orders for a mail suit of armor, suitable arms, and a horse to be placed at Yang Zhi's disposal, while he was fencing with Zhou Jin. Yang Zhi went to the rear of the platform, and put on the armor and helmet which had been presented to him the night previously. He took a bow, an arrow, and with a sword at his side, and a spear in his hand, he mounted a horse and rode forth. Grand Secretary Liang then gave orders that Yang Zhi and Zhou Jin must fence first with spears only. Upon hearing this Zhou Jin was angry, and said, "This banished criminal! He dares to fence with me!" Who could know that Yang Zhi was also extremely angry at having to fence with Zhou Jin.

At the tourney, Yang Zhi was famous,
Soon in army none so dangerous.

013

The Blue-Faced Brute Suo Chao the Hasty Battles in the Northern Capital by taking part in the Military Sports & shows his battle skills; the Urgent Vanguard Vies for Honours & Strives for Merit on the Training Field at the Parade Ground & Yang Zhi gives the people of Damming some thrills

Zhou Jin and Yang Zhi sat their chargers beneath the pennants, ready to enter the field and joust with lances.
"Wait!" shouted General Wen Da. He crossed to the pavilion and addressed himself to Governor Liang. "Although we don't know which of these two is more skilled, Your Honour," he said, "the point of a lance is merciless, meant only for destroying robbers and brigands. These are men of our own army, and they may be hurt. A slight wound can cripple, a heavy wound can kill. It would have a bad effect on our forces. I suggest that the lance tips be removed and the ends bound in felt and dabbed in lime. Let each of the mounted men wear black tunics when they fight. The man with the most white spots loses."
"An excellent idea," said Liang. He issued an appropriate order. The two contestants went to the rear of the pavilion, where the points of their lances were taken off. The ends were wrapped so thickly that they became knobs of felt. Each then donned a black tunic, dabbed his lance-head in a bucket of lime, mounted, and rode out onto the field.
Lance erect, Zhou Jin kicked his horse and cantered towards Yang Zhi. The former military aide slapped his mount and advanced to give battle, twirling his weapon. Back and forth they clashed, to and fro, wheeling, circling, man against man, horse against horse. They fought forty or fifty rounds. Zhou Jin was dappled white, as if spattered with bean-curd in nearly fifty places. Yang had only one white spot, over his left shoulder blade.
Liang was delighted. He shouted for Zhou Jin to mount the pavilion. "My predecessor made you a lieutenant," he said. "But after seeing the way you fight I don't consider you fit to lead troops into battle—and as a lieutenant, no less! Let Yang Zhi take this man's place!"
General Li Cheng entered the pavilion. "Zhou Jin isn't very good with lances," he admitted, "but he's a fine mounted archer. It wouldn't be right to demote him. You'd only affect morale. Why not let him and Yang Zhi contend with bows and arrows?"
The governor nodded. "Well said." He issued the order.
Zhou and Yang stabbed their lances into the ground and were given bows and arrows. Yang took his bow from its sheath, strung it, jumped on his horse, cantered up to the pavilion, and reined in. He rose in his stirrups and bowed.
"Excellency, an arrow in flight knows no mercy. It can cause a grievous wound. Please issue your instructions."
"When warriors fight, who thinks of wounds? Even if death results, there will be no consequences."
Yang returned to the battle arena. On Li Cheng's directions each contestant was issued a shield which he attached to his arm.
"You shoot three arrows at me, first," Yang proposed. "Then I'll shoot three at you."
Zhou Jin wanted nothing more than to put an arrow through him. But Yang, an experienced army officer, was sure he could deal with his tricks, and was not perturbed.
A blue flag waved over the generals' platform. Yang slapped his horse and cantered south. Zhou raced after him. He tied his reins to the pommel, grasped the bow in his left hand and fitted an arrow with his right. Zhou stretched the bow to its utmost and let fly at Yang's back. The instant he heard the twang, Yang ducked down well over his stirrups, and the arrow sailed harmlessly past.
Flurried, Zhou hastily drew a second arrow from the quiver, fitted it to the bow, aimed, and sent it winging towards the back of his rival. This time Yang didn't dodge but merely tapped the speeding arrow with the end of his bow and knocked it clattering to the sward.
Zhou was frantic. By then Yang had reached the end of the field. He spun his mount around and came galloping back in the direction of the pavilion. Zhou checked his horse quickly, turned and gave chase. Eight racing hoofs, like smashing plates and crashing gongs, churned up the green turf with the fury of a typhoon.
Zhou set a third arrow to his bowstring. With all his might he pulled the weapon to the full, his eyes glaring at the centre of Yang's back, and again let fly.
Yang turned at the sound and snatched the arrow in mid-air. Then he trotted up to the pavilion and tossed Zhou's arrow to the ground.
Governor Liang was entranced. He ordered Yang to shoot three arrows at Zhou. Again the blue flag waved. Zhou cast his bow and arrows aside, grasped the shield firmly in his hand and rode south. Yang straightened up in the saddle, clapped his mount with his heels and drummed after.
First, he sprang an empty bowstring. Hearing the sound behind him, Zhou twisted around and raised his shield. But there was nothing.
"That rogue is good with lances but he can't shoot," thought Zhou. "I'll wait till he makes his second false shot and demand that he forfeit the match. I'll be proclaimed the winner."
Zhou's mount by then had reached the far southern end of the field. It turned and started back towards the pavilion. Yang's horse followed, while Yang drew an arrow from his quiver and fitted it to the bow.
"If I hit him in the middle of the back. I'll kill him," he mused. "He's not my enemy. I'll tag him in a spot that's not fatal."
His left arm extended as if holding up Mount Taishan, his right arm bent as if cradling a baby, Yang stretched the bow and string into a full moon. Quicker than it takes to say, the arrow streaked like a comet into Zhou's left shoulder. He tumbled to the ground. His horse galloped behind the pavilion. Officers and men hurried forward to help him.
Liang was very pleased. He ordered that a warrant immediately be issued giving Yang Zhi the position held by Zhou Lin. Overjoyed, Yang dismounted and presented himself in the pavilion to express his thanks and receive his appointment. But a man on the left side of the stairs suddenly came up and intervened.
"Not so fast!" he exclaimed. "You'll have to joust with me, first!"
Yang looked at him. He was a towering fellow with a round face, large ears, a big, thick-lipped mouth, bristling side-whiskers and an imposing bearing.
The man strode up to the governor and hailed him respectfully. "Zhou Jin has been ill and hasn't fully recovered his spirits. That's why he lost to Yang Zhi," he explained. "Though I'm not very talented I'd like to pit my skill against Yang's. If he can gain the slightest advantage of me, never mind about Zhou Jin's position, I'll yield him mine, with never a word of complaint till the end of my days!"
Liang saw that it was none other than Suo Chao, a captain in the guards regiment of Daming Prefecture. Suo's temper was as explosive as a pinch of salt in the flames, and he was eager to win glory for his country, always plunging first into the fray. And so he was known as the Urgent Vanguard.
Li Cheng came down from the generals' platform and presented himself before the pavilion. "Yang Zhi was a military aide in the palace, Excellency," he said. "Naturally, he is skilled with weapons. We should have known Zhou Jin is no match for him. Now, with Captain Suo there can be a real contest."
Liang thought to himself: "I want to raise Yang Zhi in rank but my officers are against it. If he can defeat Suo Chao they'll have nothing more to say. It will silence them for good."
He summoned Yang before him. "Will you joust with Suo Chao?"
"I could not refuse, since that is Your Excellency's wish."
"Good. Change your gear behind the pavilion. Tie your armor on well." He instructed the armorer to provide suitable weapons, and added: "Let him use my battle charger." To Yang Zhi said: "Be careful. This is no ordinary match."
Yang thanked him, and went to change his equipment.
Li Cheng gave his instructions to Suo Chao. "You're in a special position," he said. "Zhou Jin was your protege. He lost. If that should happen to you, it would be a reflection on the entire Daming officer corps. I'm lending you an experienced battle charger and a set of armor. Be careful. Let nothing tarnish your valor."
Suo Chao thanked him, and went to get ready.
Liang rose and walked out to the stairs. Attendants brought his silver filagreed armchair and placed it before the moon terrace railing. Liang sat down. Officers stood respectfully in lines to his left and right. They directed that the three-tiered parasol of tea-coloured silk topped by a golden gourd be opened behind him.
At a signal from the generals' platform a red flag waved, golden drums on either side thundered, and cannon boomed from each of the two formations upon the field. Suo Chao galloped out and waited behind the pennant-bedecked gate. Yang Zhi also emerged from one of the formations and rode swiftly to the rear of the gate, where he reined in.
Now, a yellow flag fluttered over the generals' stand, and the drums again thundered. Both formations raised a mighty shout. Then a hush fell on the field as gongs sounded and a pure white flag was broken out. None of the watchers breathed a sound. They stood in absolute silence.
Above the generals' stand a blue flag rose. For the third time the war-drums sounded. The pennanted gate of the left formation swung open. Bells tinkled, and Captain Suo Chao entered the arena and checked his horse. Weapons in hand, he was a heroic figure! On his head was a lion helmet of pure steel, with a long red tassel dangling behind. He wore a coat of iron mail, bound at the waist by a gold-plated girdle with an animal's face. Plates of bronze protected his chest and back. Overall was a pink cape with circular designs, fastened at the neck by cords of green wool. His feet were shod in open lattice-strip leather boots. A bow hanging from his left shoulder, a quiver of arrows hanging from his right, he held a golden axe at the level in his right hand as he sat astride General Li's battle-tested pure white charger.
Then the gate of the right formation opened. Bells rang, and Yang Zhi, lance in hand, rode forth. In the combat area he checked his mount and levelled his lance. A bold warrior! The helmet of steel on his head gleamed like frost in the sunlight, trailing behind it a blue tassel. Yang wore chain mail of petal and leaf pattern. A woolen sash held the garment in place. Animal-face plates, front and back, gave added protection. Over his shoulders a white floral-designed cape was draped. Purple wool cords tied it at his neck. On his feet were thick-soled brown leather boots. A leather-handled bow and a quiver of arrows with wedge-shaped heads hung from his shoulders. In his hand was a steel-inlaid lance of pure iron. He rode Governor Liang's flame-coloured charger, a horse as swift as the wind.
The officers on both sides murmured their admiration. Although their skill had yet to be displayed, the two presented a striking picture. A flag officer, riding due south and bearing a gold-spangled banner with the word "Order," cantered up and said: "An order from His Excellency. He wants you each to do his best. Any slackness will be punished. The winner will be handsomely rewarded."
The two combatants galloped to the centre of the field and turned to face each other, weapons raised. Suo Chao charged Yang Zhi furiously, swinging his axe. Yang, equally militant, twisting his lance, pressed forward to meet him. They clashed in the centre of the field before the generals' stand. Each exerted his utmost skill. Back and forth, to and fro, four arms flailing, eight hoofs flying, the battle raged for more than fifty rounds with no sign of a winner.
Liang watched from the moon terrace in a daze. The officers on either side of him cheered without cease. On the grounds soldiers marvelled to one another. "We've been in the army for years and have been in many battles but never have we seen warriors like these!"
Li Cheng and Wen Da, on the generals' stand, kept yelling: "Well done!"
Wen Da was worried that one of them would be wounded. He instructed the flag officer to ride out with his "Order" banner and separate them. Gongs suddenly sounded on the generals' stand. But Yang and Suo were both eager to win glory. Neither would desist.
The flag officer galloped up, shouting: "Stop, good warriors! His Excellency wants to issue an order!"
Only then did the two contestants lower their weapons and subside on their mounts. They cantered back to their original starting points and halted by their respective pennanted gates, facing Governor Liang, awaiting his command.
Li Cheng and Wen Da came down from the generals' stand and proceeded to the moon terrace. "Excellency," they said to Liang, "such skill as those two display should be made full use of!"
Very pleased, Liang directed that the combatants be summoned. The flag officer transmitted the order and Yang and Suo rode up to the pavilion and dismounted. A soldier relieved them of their weapons. They entered the pavilion and bowed.
Liang presented each with a silver ingot and a set of fine clothes, and bestowed on them the rank of major. He directed that commission documents be drawn, as of that day.
Suo and Yang bowed and expressed their thanks. They left the pavilion, bearing their gifts, removed their combat equipment and changed their clothes. They then returned to the pavilion and thanked the assembled officers. Liang ordered the two to pay respects to each other and join the majors.
The massed soldiers withdrew, banners waving, preceded by the golden drums, beating out the victory roll. Liang, in the company of his senior and junior officers, remained in the pavilion for a feast.
When the sun was sinking in the west, the dining ended. Liang mounted his horse and started back to his residence escorted by his officers. In the van, side by side, rode the two new majors, their heads garlanded with red flowers.
The street was lined with joyous crowds, young and old, as the entourage entered the city's East Gate. "What are you so merry about?" Liang demanded, from his horse. "Are you presuming to laugh at me?"
Several old men knelt and replied: "We were born and raised in Daming, the Northern Capital but in all our years we never saw such jousting! We were out at the field, watching those two bold fellows. Who wouldn't be happy to see such skill!"
Liang was very pleased. He returned to his residence. His officers went their respective ways. Suo Chao's friends gave a drinking party to celebrate his appointment. Yang Zhi, a new-comer, didn't know anybody, and retired, alone, to his quarters. From then on, he served Liang diligently. Of that we need say no more.
We'll dispense with idle chatter and come to the point. Liang became very fond of Yang Zhi after the tourney at the training field outside the East Gate, and they were together everyday. Yang received an additional monthly stipend. Gradually, he developed friends. Suo Chao respected him for his ability and strength.
Time fleeted by. It was the end of spring and the approach of summer, the fifth day of the fifth lunar month, a festival day. Liang and his wife, Lady Cai, were celebrating it at a family dinner in the rear salon. After several toasts and two courses, Lady Cai asked a question.
"Today Your Excellency is a commander-in-chief and holds an important post in the government. Where does this honour and high rank come from?"
"Since childhood I have always studied. I've learned history and the classics," Liang replied. "But I'm a man of feeling—of course I know how much I owe your noble father in the Eastern Capital. I can never thank him enough for his help."
"That being so, how could you forget his birthday?"
"I remember it perfectly. It's the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month. I've already sent out stewards with one hundred thousand strings of cash to buy ornaments of gold and precious stones to present as birthday gifts. They've been gone a month and have bought up nine-tenths of what I want. When everything is ready, I'll have the gifts delivered.
"Only one thing is troubling me. Last year, the trinkets and gold ornaments and jewels which I dispatched as gifts were snatched by robbers on the road. All those valuables gone, and we still haven't caught the bandits! Who should I choose to deliver them this time?"
"You have plenty of officers at your disposal. Just pick a man you can trust."
"We have another forty or fifty days yet. There'll be time enough for that when I've got all our gifts ready. Don't worry, madam. I'll know what to do." Their feasting continued from midday till the second watch. Then all withdrew.

*

A new magistrate was appointed to Yuncheng, a county seat in Jizhou Prefecture in the province of Shandong. His family name was Shi, his given name was Wenbin. Officers sat to the left and right one day when he was holding court, and he called before him the sheriff and his two constables. One known as the "infantry constable," the other the "cavalry constable." The first commanded twenty pikemen and twenty foot soldiers. Under the second were twenty mounted archers and twenty foot soldiers.

Zhu Tong, the cavalry constable, was very tall, with a long luxuriant beard. His face was brown as a chestnut, his eyes bright as stars, like Guan Gong of old. Known throughout the county as Beautiful Beard, he came from a wealthy family. He was a chivalrous, generous man and had many friends among the gallant fraternity. He was also well skilled in the use of weapons.

The infantry constable was called Lei Heng. A tall man with a ruddy complexion and a fan beard fringing his face, he was extremely strong and agile. In a running jump he could clear a chasm twenty to thirty feet wide, and was known as Winged Tiger. Originally a blacksmith, he later opened a grain mill, a slaughter-house for cattle, and a gambling den. Although chivalrous, he was also rather narrow-hearted. But he, too, was proficient in arms.

Their main job was catching robbers. When the magistrate summoned them, they hailed him respectfully and awaited his orders.

"Since taking office," he said, "I have learned that bandits in Liangshan Marsh—which is in the watery region under our jurisdiction as part of Jizhou Prefecture—have been pillaging the land and fighting our soldiers. They rampage in every hamlet and village, and are quite a large force. I've called you two because I want you, without fear of hardship, to take some men and go out, one group through the West Gate and one through the East, and patrol. Arrest all the robbers and bring them in but don't disturb the villagers. On a hilltop past the village of East Bank is a big red-leafed tree. It's the only one around. Each of you must bring back a few of those leaves to prove you have patrolled that far. If you don't, I'll know you are lying and will punish you severely."

The constables returned to their stations, mustered their men, and set forth.

Lei Heng marched through the East Gate with twenty foot soldiers. They searched several villages and the surrounding countryside, and finally came to the hill beyond East Bank. They picked some of the red leaves and started back for the village. Before they had gone more than two or three //; they noticed that the door of the Lingguan Temple that they we're passing, was open.

"The temple has no custodian but the door isn't shut," said Lei Heng. "Could there be some bad person inside? We'd better take a look."

He and his men lit torches and went in. There, lying on the altar table was a big fellow, stark naked and fast asleep. The weather was hot, and he had peeled off his tattered garments and rolled them up to serve as a pillow beneath his head. He was snoring peacefully.

"Remarkable!" said Lei Heng. "Our magistrate must be psychic! Here's a robber in East Bank, sure enough!" He shouted an order.

The twenty soldiers all piled on. Although the big fellow fought strenuously, they soon had his hands trussed behind him. They pulled him out of the temple and marched him to the manor of the ward chief.

And because they took him there, three or four heroes met in East Bank Village, and treasures worth a hundred thousand strings of cash were sought in Yuncheng County. Truly, heavenly spirits from the sky gathered and earthly fiends among men convened. Where did Lei Heng escort that fellow they had nabbed?

So then, when Zhou Jin and Yang Zhi had reined in their horses beneath the banners and the tourney was just about to commence, General Wen Da suddenly cried out: "Wait!" He made his way to the front of the tribune and addressed Governor Liang: "Your Excellency, these two men are about to make trial of their skill at arms. Although we do not know which one of them will carry the day, we do know that lances and swords are unfeeling things, whose best entertainment is killing robbers and dispatching bandits. This contest is an internal affair, touching only our own army, yet it may lead to injury or wounds. What that means is disablement at best; at worst it means loss of life. Neither is in the interests of the army. May it please Your Excellency to order that the spearheads be wrapped in cloth and dipped in lime. Then let the two horsemen wear black clothing. When they thrust with their lances, the one who receives the most white spots shall be deemed the loser."

"An excellent proposal," said the Governor, and gave orders for it to be carried out.

The two contestants accordingly rode to the back of the tribune, where they removed the blades of their lances and wrapped the ends in cloth, to form rounded bulbs. They donned black tunics and dipped the ends of the lances in a bucket of lime. Then they mounted again and rode out in front of the troops.

Zhou Jin now spurred his horse, lowered his lance, and charged at Yang Zhi. The latter slapped his horse and steadied his weapon and made for his opponent. Before the assembled army the two of them thrust and parried again and again, circling and wheeling as if sculpted from a single block; and while the riders hacked away, the horses also strove against each other. After some forty or fifty assaults, Zhou Jin looked as if he had been splashed with soya paste; he was striped and spotted with white in forty or fifty places. As for Yang Zhi, all he had was a single spot of white on his left shoulder.

Delighted with the result, Governor Liang ordered Zhou Jin to report to the tribune. He surveyed the marks and said: "My predecessor promoted you to ensign. But from the evidence of your skill in combat, you would fare ill on any expedition against the barbarians. You evidently lack the quality demanded by your rank." He then ordered Yang Zhi to take over this man's appointment.

But General Li Cheng stepped before him and said: "Your Excellency, Zhou Jin is unfamiliar with jousting; archery and riding are his strong points. If he is dismissed from his post without good reason, it could be damaging to the army's morale. Would it not be right for the two to compete in archery?"

"Very well," said the Governor, and ordered that it be done.

On receiving the order, both men abandoned their lances and fetched out bow and arrows. Yang Zhi took the long bow from its case, and strung it carefully. Holding the bow in one hand he leapt onto his horse and galloped to the front of the tribune, where he halted, very upright in the saddle, bowed and said: "Your Excellency, when arrows fly, it's a serious business and someone may get hurt. I request your instructions."

Governor Liang said: "When soldiers compete, they should not take wounds into account. Think not of death but only of doing your best."

Having learnt the Governor's wishes, Yang Zhi returned to his position in front of the army. General Li Cheng ordered the two contestants to be given each a shield, to hang from his shoulders. Then Yang Zhi said: "You shoot first, three arrows; then I will shoot three." When he heard this, Zhou Jin could hardly wait to put an arrow through his rival, settling the score with a single shot. But Yang Zhi was a skilled and experienced soldier and he guessed what Zhou Jin would do, it didn't bother him a bit. Here's something about the archery contest:

One stalks the high hills and shoots a tiger,
One in a strong wind can split a willow twig.
When the bow's full bent, hares and foxes die;
The osprey's brought to earth when arrows fly.
If their art's compared, there's judgement on the spot;
They show their skill and the crowd applauds each shot.
One gives his horse its head, he won't be caught;
The other ducks, and each shot comes to naught.
Win or lose, it'll be over in a trice;
Life or death but one throw of the dice.

The green flag was now flourished on the tribune and Yang Zhi slapped his horse and galloped off towards the south. Zhou Jin spurred in pursuit. He looped the reins round the pommel of his saddle, took the bow in his left hand, fitted an arrow to it with his right, slowly took aim at Yang Zhi's back, and loosed the shaft. Yang Zhi heard the snap of the bowstring behind him and with lightning speed protected himself by squatting in the stirrups. The arrow found only empty air. When he saw that his first shot had missed, Zhou Jin was worried. He hastily took a second arrow from his quiver and fitted it to the bowstring. Yang Zhi was still close, so he aimed at his back again and fired. Yang Zhi heard the second arrow coming but he did not repeat the same trick. As the arrow sped towards him he took his bow and with a slight flick caused the arrow to strike it and dribble to the ground. When he saw the second shot had missed, Zhou Jin was still more anxious. By this time Yang Zhi had nearly reached the end of the field. He wheeled his horse suddenly and began galloping back towards the tribune. Seeing this, Zhou Jin reined in his horse, and then set off again in pursuit. Eight hooves hammered the turf, with a sound like upturned cups and falling gongs; the contestants swept onward like a tempestuous wind.

Zhou Jin now took his third arrow, fitted it to the bowstring and slowly bent the bow, employing all the strength in his body. His eyes were glued to Yang Zhi's back as he let fly this final shaft. Again Yang Zhi heard the string snap. He twisted in the saddle, stretched out his arm and caught the arrow in mid-flight. Reining in his horse right in front of the tribune, he flung Zhou Jin's arrow upon the ground.

Governor Liang was delighted. He commanded Yang Zhi to shoot his three arrows now, and the green flag was flourished on the platform. Zhou Jin threw away his bow, grasped his shield, and spurred his horse towards the south. Yang Zhi merely sat up straight in the saddle and gave his horse a kick; off it shot in pursuit. The first time Yang Zhi drew his bow there was no arrow in it. When Zhou Jin heard the snap of the string he twisted to one side and raised his shield to catch the arrow. But it met nothing. "The fellow can only joust, he's no archer," Zhou Jin thought to himself. "As soon as he's missed with the second arrow, I'll give a shout to stop him, and they'll declare me the winner." His horse had now reached the end of the field, and he turned and galloped back towards the tribune. Yang Zhi's horse also turned. Yang Zhi took an arrow from his quiver and fitted it to the bow. But he was thinking, "If I aim at his heart, that'll be the end of him. There's no quarrel between us. I'd better aim at some spot which isn't vital." His left hand was as steady as if it had to support Mount Tai, his right hand as gentle as if it were holding a baby; he bent the bow till it was round as the full moon and the arrow sped towards its target like a shooting star — it's slow in the telling but happens in a flash: the very first shot transfixed Zhou Jin's left shoulder. Taken completely by surprise, Zhou Jin span round in the saddle and fell from his horse. The riderless horse galloped on past the tribune and disappeared behind it. The watching soldiers rushed forward to help Zhou Jin.

Governor Liang was delighted. He ordered the army quarter-master to bring writing materials and signed an order confirming Yang Zhi's appointment in place of Zhou Jin. The triumphant Yang Zhi dismounted and marched up to the tribune to thank the Governor.

Suddenly there was a shout from below the steps on the left hand side. "Don't be in such a hurry, I want to fight you first."

The speaker was a tall man, over six feet, and had a round face with big ears, a wide mouth and thick lips. His cheeks were adorned with a handsome growth of hair, his bearing was dignified, his manner imposing. After shouting out a salute to the Governor, he said: "Zhou Jin has been sick and is not fully recovered, that is why he lost to Yang Zhi. I request permission to try my humble skills in warlike competition with Yang Zhi. Should he obtain but the slightest advantage over me, let me be the one he replaces, and not Zhou Jin. I will bear no grudge."

Governor Liang immediately recognized the speaker as Suo Chao, standard-bearer of the Daming garrison. Because of his quick temper and tendency to blow up, his readiness to quarrel for honour's sake and to be always first into battle, this officer was known as Suo Chao the Hasty or "The Front-Runner." When Li Cheng heard what Suo Chao had to say he too presented himself in front of the tribune and said: "Your Excellency, if this Yang Zhi was once a commander of the palace guard, he has to be a good soldier, and Zhou Jin is naturally no match for him. Let him measure his skill now with Captain Suo, and then we will really see what he is worth."

The Governor thought about this: "All I want is to promote Yang Zhi," he told himself, "but obviously the army isn't going to accept it easily. If he succeeds in defeating Suo Chao, they can't object, they won't have a leg to stand on." He called Yang Zhi over and said: "What do you say to a contest with Suo Chao?"

"If it is your wish, of course I will obey," Yang Zhi replied.

"All right then, go to the back of the tribune and change your equipment. Prepare yourself carefully." The Governor ordered the stores master to provide Yang Zhi with the necessary arms, and then said: "Bring out my own war-horse for Yang Zhi to ride." To Yang Zhi he said, "Be very careful, don't underestimate him."

Yang Zhi thanked the Governor and went to arm himself.

Meanwhile Li Cheng had a word in private with Suo Chao. "I know you are without equal. But Zhou Jin, who learnt from you, has already been beaten. If you are careless, you'll have the whole garrison of Daming laughing at you. I have an experienced war-horse and a breast-plate which I will let you have. Just be careful and don't let your resolve weaken."

After thanking him, Suo Chao also went to arm himself.

Governor Liang stood up and moved to the front of the tribune. Immediately bearers moved his silver chair forward till it was close to the balustrade. He sat down again, with his aides spread out on either side in two ranks. A bearer was called to open behind the Governor's back a three-branched umbrella of tea-coloured muslin with a gourd-shaped silver boss. An order rang out on the platform and the red flag was run up, while on either side the gilt drums began to beat in unison. From the ranks of the two armies on the practice ground cannon spoke. At the sound of the cannon, Suo Chao galloped through the ranks and halted under the flags at the gate. Yang Zhi also galloped out and halted to the rear of the gate. A yellow flag was displayed on the tribune, and the drums rolled again. An expectant gasp went up from the watching armies, then all was silent; the onlookers scarce dared to breathe. Again the drums and gongs, as a pure white flag was raised. Now the armies stood in total silence, not a movement, not a whisper.

Finally, on the platform, the blue flag was waved while drums and gongs sounded a third time. Then beneath the flag-decked gate the ranks of the army on the left opened and to the tinkling of bells and gongs Suo Chao rode forth. When he was between the two armies, he made his horse pirouette. Brandishing his weapons, he looked the very picture of a hero. On his head he wore a steel helmet on which a lion was depicted, with a red tassel hanging down the back of his neck; he had a coat of iron mail, a gold belt decorated with animal heads, breast and back-plates of burnished bronze; a red surcoat with roundels of flower embroidery and a collar of green velvet went on top, and on his feet were riding boots with crossed leather laces. A bow was slung over his left shoulder, a quiver of arrows on the right. He carried a gilt battle-axe at the slant. He was riding General Li's snow-white charger, tried and tested in battle. What a horse it was!

Its colour was like Venus, the blazing planet, or like the white-browed tiger of the Southern Mountains. Its coat was glossy like the white jade unicorn of the Northern Seas. It could charge through lines of troops, and jump rivers, it liked nothing better than the sound of war-drums, it had the temperament of a hero. It could bear a great weight, travel vast distances, and still it could rear and prance, it must have been the dragon's messenger. Wu Xiang's bay horse was no match for it: it surpassed even the jade white steed of the Lord of Qin.

Then the ranks opened on the right, under the flag-decked gate, and to the sound of bells and gongs Yang Zhi rode out, carrying his lance at the ready. He reined his horse in front of the army, and rested his lance. What a brave and martial sight! The helmet he wore was of polished steel and glittered like sunlight on frost. A blue tassel dangled from it. His armour was made of plates shaped like elm leaves and inscribed with cherry. His belt was of red velvet and bordered the armour; breast-plate and back-plate were decorated with animal heads. He had a surcoat of white linen embroidered with flowers and a floating purple sash. His boots were of yellow leather, with a double sole. His bow had a leather sheath and there was a plentiful supply of wedge-shaped arrows. In his hand a lance made from a single piece of steel. The horse Yang Zhi rode was Governor Liang's chestnut steed, a tireless beast and swift as the wind. And what a horse that was!

Its mane was a rippling flame, its tail bright-hued as the dawn. Its whole body seemed painted with a generous palette. The pricked ears resembled two red leaves. Cantering beside the red fort at daybreak its hooves exploded like four winter stars; galloping along the bund at dusk they were like coals shot from the fire. There's no point in comparing it with any other, not even the Northern Lord's fabled courser or Shou Ting's red streaker.

A gasp went up from the ranks on either side. Though none knew what the outcome would be, the preliminary spectacle was magnificent.

Then the flag officer on the southern side of the field rode out with a banner bearing the word "order" embroidered in gold. "His Excellency bids you both to give of your best," he commanded. "Weakness or failure will be punished severely. The winner will receive great honour."

Acknowledging the order, both riders spurred their horses to the centre of the field.

Now as the two horses sped towards each other, the two warriors raised their weapons at exactly the same moment. Suo Chao furiously whirled his mighty battle-axe as he galloped towards the encounter. Yang Zhi, in a display of mighty prowess, brandished his stupendous lance and rushed to meet him. There, in the centre of the field, directly in front of the tribune, the two engaged, each employing every ounce of strength and skill. Back and forth and back and forth the contest rages, four arms striking this way and that, while the eight hooves of the horses hammer the turf.

After more than 50. assaults, still there was no victor. On the dais, the Governor watched spellbound, while the troops on either side applauded ceaselessly. Soldiers looked at each other and said: "We have served many years and seen many campaigns but we've never seen such a combat as this, between two such daring opponents!" Generals Li and Wen, up on the tribune, never ceased in their shouts of "Bravo!"

Finally General Wen was struck by a fear that one of the contestants might wound the other. He hurriedly summoned the flag officer and told him to display the "order" flag. Gongs immediately rang out on the tribune. But Yang Zhi and Suo Chao had ranged far afield, and each was determined to win. They had no thought of turning their horses. In the end the signal officer had to chase after them and shout: "Put up your arms, both of you, it's the Governor's order."

Now at last they rested their weapons and reined in their horses, then galloped back to their corners under the banners, where they remained with their eyes turned towards the Governor, awaiting his pleasure.

Generals Li and Wen now came down from the command platform and stood directly in front of the Governor to say: "Your Excellency, both men are equal in strength, we need them both."

Governor Liang was pleased with this and summoned Yang Zhi and Suo Chao to him. The flag officer conveyed the order and the two men rode over towards the tribune and dismounted. A corporal received their weapons and they went to stand before the Governor with bowed heads, awaiting his orders. Governor Liang called for two ingots of silver and two sets of clothes that he presented in recognition of their prowess. Then he ordered the provost-marshal to promote them both to the rank of major with immediate effect, making out the commissions at once and incorporating the officers in the Governor's personal staff. They each thanked him and prostrated themselves, and then retired with their gifts. Yang Zhi put down his lance and his bow, and took off his helmet and armour, and changed his clothes. Suo Chao also went to take off his armour and don a padded robe. Then they returned to the tribune to thank all the military personnel. The Governor made them also greet each other courteously, following which they went to occupy the places corresponding to their rank. Drums now beat in the ranks as if in celebration of a victory, after which the troops dispersed, the drummers leading the way. A great feast was held on the practice ground, with the participation of Governor Liang, the army, and officials of all ranks.

As the sun went down in a blaze of red in the west, the feasting came to an end. Then the Governor mounted his horse and the officials escorted him back to his residence. The cavalcade was headed by the two newly appointed officers, with the rest riding behind them. They were garlanded with red flowers. When they rode through the Eastern Gate the populace turned out to watch, old greybeards and tiny children included.

"What are you all grinning at?" the Governor asked, surveying the crowd from his horse.

A group of old men in the crowd knelt and said: "We were born and raised here in the Northern Capital but never have we seen such feats of arms as we witnessed today. After the contest that we watched today on the training ground, how could our hearts not be glad?"

The Governor was delighted with this answer. He returned to his residence and the accompanying officials dispersed.

Suo Chao went to celebrate with a group of comrades in arms, while Yang Zhi, who was a newcomer, without friends in the capital, went to rest at the Governor's. It goes without saying that he performed his new duties with zeal and vigour.

But all this is not to the point, so let us pass on to what is really important. After the contest on the training ground outside the Eastern Gate, Governor Liang became very attached to Yang Zhi, and wanted him by his side from dawn to dusk. And now that Yang Zhi was on full pay, everyone began to know him. Even Suo Chao recognized that his ability was outstanding, and accorded him the greatest respect.

Imperceptibly the days slipped by, spring turned to summer and the Dragon Boat Festival arrived, the fifth day of the fifth month. The Governor and his wife, Madam Cai were celebrating the festival privately at home:

There are plants in tubs to provide delightful greenery, and scarlet pomegranates in pots. The curtain is of crystal, the bamboo blinds are rolled up and an opulent screen displays a painting of peacocks. There's calamus wine in carved jade beakers: the lady fills the glowing cups. There are heaps of corn and piles of silver: the lady proffers the green jade plate. Cooked dishes of every kind are provided and fresh fruit of the season. While bamboo fans waft cooling air, sweet harmonies and gentle chords are played. Shaking their perfumed sleeves, a bevy of dancers show off their steps.

After several cups of wine and two sets of dishes, Madam Cai suddenly said: "Since that first advancement, my dear, you have become a major figure and obtained top postings from the government. Have you forgotten to what you owe all this success?"

"Well, I was a studious boy, and I worked hard at the classics. But of course, I'm not made of wood, I know how much I owe to your father. His patronage has given me all I enjoy, and my gratitude is boundless."

"Then, if you acknowledge your debt to my father, how is it that you have forgotten his birthday?"

"It's on the fifteenth of the sixth month, how could I forget that? I've already got people out collecting a treasure worth a hundred thousand cash. I am going to send it for the Preceptor's birthday. My people have been working on it for a month now and it's very nearly complete. In just a few days it will all be organized, and I'll be sending it. There's only one problem. Last year when I bought all those ornaments and valuables and sent them off to the capital, they hadn't got halfway before they were stolen by robbers. All that expense went for nothing. And the robbers still have not been caught. So now this year who can I send with the convoy?"

"You seem to have plenty of military men in your entourage," said Madam Cai. "You just have to pick someone you can really trust."

"Well, there's still another forty or fifty days. We'd better wait till the gift is fully assembled. It'll be time enough then to choose who to send with it. Anyway, don't you worry your head about it. I've got it all in hand."

This intimate banquet lasted from midday till after nine o'clock! But enough of that.

Now we must turn to the district of Yuncheng in the province of Jizhou in Shandong. A new Magistrate had just been appointed here. His name was Shi Wenbin. One day, when the court was in session and he was sitting with his officials and police drawn up on either side of him, he called for the commissioner in charge of bandit suppression, and two police sergeants in the same branch. These two sergeants, who were under the orders of the commissioner, were known as the infantry sergeant and the cavalry sergeant. The cavalry sergeant was in command of twenty mounted archers and twenty foot soldiers; the infantry sergeant had twenty pikemen and twenty foot soldiers. The cavalry sergeant was Zhu Tong. He was a giant of a man, with a resplendent beard. His face was as red as a date and his gaze was piercing; he could have been a model for the God of War. Throughout the region he was known as "The Beard." He had been a wealthy man but being honest and open-handed he had struck up friendships with many of the rivers and lakes fraternity and had become an expert in martial arts. The infantry sergeant was Lei Heng, who was of medium stature, with a bronzed face and a fan-shaped beard. He was exceptionally strong and could leap a gap of several yards, so everyone called him "The Flying Tiger." He had once been the local blacksmith. After that he had started a mill, then a butcher's shop, and then a gaming house. Though a man of honour, he had a certain streak of meanness. But he was also a martial arts expert.

Zhu Tong and Lei Heng were both specialized in the capture of bandits. When the Magistrate called for them that day, they saluted and waited for their instructions. "Since I took office," the Magistrate said, "it has been brought to my attention that in the marshy area of Mount Liang, within the jurisdiction of Jizhou, there is a band of robbers who commit disturbances and robberies and obstruct the forces of law and order. I fear in fact that every village and district is likely to suffer from the depredations of these bandits, because they have considerable armies at their disposal. This is why I have called you. I want you to go out on patrol. You are not to waste time thinking up objections, you must leave at once, taking with you a suitable body of men. You are to go separately, one leaving by the west gate and one by the east. If you find robbers, arrest them and bring them in. But do not cause trouble among the villagers. I have heard that near East Riverside that is in the mountains, there is a group of trees with red leaves which are not to be found anywhere else. I want you to pick some of these leaves and bring them back to show me, as proof that you have patrolled that far. If you don't bring back the red leaves I shall assume you have not taken my orders seriously and you will be severely punished."

Having received their instructions, the two sergeants went to collect their men and set out separately on patrol.

We shall not follow Zhu Tong, as he leads his patrol out by the west gate but accompany Lei Heng, as he leads twenty men out of the east gate that same evening, and proceeds to search the villages round about and all the surrounding countryside. Returning, they came to the district of East Riverside, where they broke off to pick the red leaves before entering the village. Not more than a mile further on they passed the Temple of the Heavenly Official, where it was observed that the door of the main hall was not properly shut. "No sign of any guardian and the door not shut," said Lei Heng, "maybe some malefactor is lurking inside. We'd better take a look."

Holding torches, the men went inside to look. There, asleep on the altar, stark naked, was a large man. The weather was hot and he had simply taken off all his tattered clothes and rolled them into a bundle to make a pillow for his head. So there he was, snoring away on the altar.

When Lei Heng saw this he said: "It's amazing. Our Governor must be clairvoyant. There really and truly are robbers here in East Riverside, just like he said!" He gave a shout, and before the individual could put up any resistance, twenty men had thrown themselves upon him, bound him, and dragged him to the door of the temple. The intention was to march him off to the manor house in the village.

Supposing they had taken him somewhere else, things would have turned out quite differently, and it would not have been the case that:

In East Riverside the heroes meeting one day
Make plans to seize a treasure on its way.

Truly this was to be a fateful meeting, a fruitful conjunction.

Yang Zhi and Zhou Jin were mounted on their horses but while waiting at the foot of the flagpole for the signal to start the staff officer Wen Da shouted out, "Wait a bit!" He then went to Grand Secretary Liang on the platform and said to him, "Sir, we do not yet know what skill these two men have in military sports but their arms are dangerous weapons suitable for killing thieves and exterminating bandits. I am afraid that today somebody may be seriously wounded—a slight blow might cripple a man for life whereas a serious blow might kill a man, and that would not be for the good of the army. So I beg to suggest that the spikes should be removed from the spears, and replaced by the felt. Then they should both wear black dress. The felt knobs on the spears should then be rubbed in lime dust so that they would leave a mark on the clothing for each hit, and the man who has the most white marks will be the loser."

"That is a sensible proposal," said the Grand Secretary Liang. Orders were given accordingly.

Upon receiving the order the two horsemen retired behind the platform, where the spikes were removed from their spears and replaced by the knobs of felt. They rubbed these knobs well with lime dust, and put on some black clothing. When this had been done they remounted, and rode round to the drill ground.

Zhou Jin urged his horse forward to fight with Yang Zhi, and the latter did the same. They both dashed past each other, returned again, backwards and forwards many times, thrusting and parrying as they passed. After about fifty of these passages at arms Zhou Jin had so many white spots on his clothes that he looked as though somebody had thrown bean curd at him whereas Yang Zhi had only one single white spot under his left shoulder.

Grand Secretary Liang was much pleased at this, and summoning Zhou Jin he spoke to him: "My predecessor gave you a commission as Lieutenant but I think your military skill is of poor quality as you have been beaten in this way. So how can you fight anywhere and continue to receive a Lieutenant's salary?" He then summoned Yang Zhi, and gave him the position of Zhou Jin.

Just then General Li Cheng arrived on the platform and reported to Grand Secretary Liang that Zhou Jin's use of the spear was very poor but as a mounted archer he was excellent. For that reason he must not be dismissed from his position, as the troops would be dissatisfied if that was done. Perhaps it would be better if Zhou Jin and Yang Zhi now contested as archers.

Grand Secretary Liang thought that a good idea, and gave instructions accordingly.

Upon receiving this order Zhou Jin and Yang Zhi both stuck their spears in the ground, and armed themselves with bows and arrows. Yang Zhi took the bow out of its case, adjusted the string, then raising it aloft he mounted his horse, and rode to the front of the platform where he saluted the Grand Secretary Liang by rising in his stirrups and said, "I am afraid, sir, that one of us may be wounded by an arrow, and I ask for your instructions in the matter."

Grand Secretary Liang said, "in military sports one should not display anxiety about wounds. If someone is killed by an arrow we shall not hold a court-martial."

Yang Zhi returned to the parade ground, and General Li Cheng then gave an order that each combatant should bear a rattan shield to protect his body from the arrows being shot.

Both combatants took a shield and hung it on his shoulder. Yang Zhi then told his opponent that he could have three shots at him, and he would follow with three shots.

Zhou Jin upon hearing this only wished that he could shoot an arrow that would go right through Yang Zhi's body.

On the other hand Yang Chin saw that Zhou Jin had no skill, and was not afraid of him.

Just then the purple signaling flag was waved from the platform, and Yang Zhi urged his horse forward, and rode towards the south side. Zhou Jin followed him, and dropped the reins on the saddle. With the bow in his left hand, he took an arrow in his right hand aimed at Yang Zhi's back and pulling the bow to its full extent and let fly the arrow.

Yang Zhi heard the twang of the bow string, and immediately swung his body down resting entirety on one stirrup. The arrow flew past without touching him. Upon seeing that the arrow had missed its mark Zhou Jin was very much upset. He immediately took a second arrow out of his quiver, fitted it to his bow, took a steady aim at Yang Zhi's back, and again let fly the arrow.

Yang Zhi heard the arrow flying through the air, and taking his bow, turned round, and parried the arrow by a stroke of his bow. The arrow turned several somersaults ere it reached the ground.

This made Zhou Jin more annoyed than ever. As Yang Zhi had now reached the extreme limit of the parade ground he wheeled his horse round, and galloped back to the platform. Zhou Jin also galloped back to the same spot, and there the two horses pranced about impatiently. Zhou Jin now took his third arrow from his quiver, fixed it carefully to the bowstring, and exerting his full strength, drew the bow to its full extent and shot the arrow again at Yang Zhi's back. But Yang Zhi again heard the twang of the bowstring, and turning round in his saddle he caught the arrow with his hand as it flew past him. Then urging his horse forward he galloped to the front of the inspection platform and there threw the arrow on the ground.

Upon seeing this feat of skill Grand Secretary Liang was much pleased, and gave an order that Yang Zhi must now shoot three arrows at Zhou Jin. The purple flag was again waved to signal that the sport was to continue.

Zhou Jin threw down his bow, and taking his shield in his hand he urged his horse forward, and rode towards the southern part of the parade ground. Yang Zhi stooping forward in his saddle, urged his horse in the same direction. He then drew the string of his bow, without placing an arrow there, and let the bowstring, go. Zhou Jin hearing the twang of the bowstring, turned round, and held his shield to protect his body but no arrow came. He thought that Yang Zhi might be good with a spear but evidently he could not even shoot an arrow. He continued his course, and decided that if the second attempt was also a failure he would shout out, and claim a win. As he had now reached the limit of the parade ground he wheeled round, and returned to the platform again. Upon seeing this Yang Zhi also wheeled his horse round, and returned to the same spot. By that time Yang Zhi had taken an arrow out of his quiver, and fitted it to his bowstring. He thought that if he shot the arrow at Zhou Jin's back he would probably kill him. As he had no enmity towards Zhou Jin he decided to shoot an arrow and hit him in some non-vital spot. In his left hand he held the bow as firmly as a mountain while in his right hand he held the arrow as lightly as though he carried a baby. So pulling his bowstring to its full extent until the bow was like a full moon in shape, he shot the arrow which flew with the speed of a falling star, and struck Zhou Jin's shoulder. This occurred much quicker than it takes us to describe it. Zhou Jin fell off his horse and the animal being free galloped off to the back of the inspection platform. A number of soldiers came forward to help Zhou Jin to get up.

Grand Secretary Liang was again much pleased at seeing this, and summoning his adjutant he dictated an order that Yang Zhi take the rank and position of Zhou Jin. Yang Zhi heard this but did not allow his feelings to be visible in his face. He dismounted and approaching the inspection platform saluted, and offered thanks for his promotion.

Just then however a man ascended the steps leading to the inspection platform on the left side, and called out, "You need not offer thanks for your promotion. I will have a couple of bouts with you."

Yang Zhi saw that the man was over seven feet in height; had a round face with large ears; a broad and square shaped mouth; with bushy side whiskers; a general austere, dignified, and handsome appearance. Coming before the Grand Secretary he called out, "Sir, Zhou Jin has evidently not quite recovered from a sickness, and not being in the best of health, has been defeated by Yang Zhi. Though I have no particular ability, yet I am quite willing to compete with Yang Zhi. If Yang Zhi defeats me even only slightly then I shall be quite willing to let him take my rank and position instead of Zhou Jin's. Even if he kills me it won't matter."

Grand Secretary Liang recognized the man as Captain Suo Chao of the headquarters at the Northern Capital, Daming. He had a fiery disposition, and would invariably fought for the honour of the state, and even killed men so that everybody called him "The Urgent Vanguard."

General Li Cheng upon hearing the man make this statement left the inspection platform, and going round to the front of it addressed the Grand Secretary, "Sir, Yang Zhi was previously an officer in the Imperial Guard and therefore it is only to be expected that his skill in military sports would be better than that of Zhou Jin. I think it would be a good idea if Yang Zhi now contested with Captain Suo, and then we should see exactly who is the better man."

Grand Secretary Liang thought the matter over. He certainly wished to give Yang Zhi an officer's commission but as so many were opposed to that, he would wait until Yang Zhi had defeated Suo Chao, so that nobody could then raise any objection even if Suo Chao was killed. So he summoned Yang Zhi and asked him, "Would you care to compete against Suo Chao in the military sports?"

Yang Zhi replied, "Sir, if you give me an order I must obey it."

Liang said, "In that case you had better go behind this platform, and put on your full armor. Also tell the armorer to accompany you and give you whatever you require in the way of accouterment. You can also take my warhorse, and ride it. Now, be careful, and do not treat your opponent too lightly."

Yang Zhi expressed his thanks, and retired to put on his armor, etc.

General Li Cheng went and spoke to Suo Chao, "You, of course, cannot be compared to anyone else. Zhou Jin was a pupil of yours but he has just been defeated by Yang Zhi. If you be also only slightly defeated by Yang Zhi he will make nothing of all the officers at Daming. I will lend you my superb war horse, and also a suit of armor. I hope that you will take care, as I do not want a man with your valor to be defeated."

Suo Chao thanked him, and then went off to dress.

Grand Secretary Liang got up, and walked to the front of the inspection platform near the railings, and there the attendants brought his chair. He also told the umbrella bearers to open there the large official umbrella made of brown gauze, with a silver button on top, and with three fringes round to make it cool on hot days, and they were to hold it aloft behind his chair. On both sides of him the officers took their positions in two ranks. He then instructed the officer in charge to wave the red flag as a signal that the sports were to proceed. The gongs and drums on both sides were beaten, so that they gave a low rolling sound like thunder. In the centre of the parade ground two cannons were fired off. Upon this signal Suo Chao galloped to the parade ground, and took up his position at the foot of the flagstaff near the cannons, surrounded by the soldiers on parade. Yang Zhi also galloped forward, and took his position behind the flag on the opposite side.

On the inspection platform the yellow flag was waved, and upon this all the drums again rolled, and the troops cheered. After that there was absolute silence. A gong was now sounded, and a white flag was hoisted up on a pole on the inspection platform. The officers stood to attention, and there was not a single word spoken after this. A purple flag was now waved on the platform, and the drums rolled again for the third and last time upon which Suo Chao left his position, and rode in front of the platform where he took his arms, and certainly gave the audience the impression that he was a valiant warrior. On his head he wore a steel helmet with a lion design on it, and a large red tassel hanging down at the back. His body was covered by armor in the form of iron leaves linked together; round his waist was a silk belt with a buckle with a tiger's head design in gold; on his breast and also on his back was a bronze protecting mirror; his outer garment was of red silk with a design of florid circles all over it; on each side there hung a green silk sash; his big riding boots had strips of leather on them in a slanting direction; a bow was at his left side, and a quiver with arrows on his right; in his hand was a large battle-axe; and he was riding the trained war horse, as white as snow, belonging to General Li Cheng.

From the other side Yang Zhi galloped to the front of the platform, where he reined in his horse, with a spear in his hand, and with a very bold appearance. He was wearing a fine steel helmet which glittered in the sun, and had a green tassel hanging down at the back; his armor was made up of iron in the form of plum blossoms and leaves of the elm tree all linked together; his silk sash was of red colour; on his breast and back were two protecting metal mirrors; his outer coat was of white silk; and holding it in position was a belt of purple silken texture—his small boots were of undyed leather; at his side was a bow, and also a quiver full of arrows; in his hands he carried a heavy steel spear, and he was riding the Grand Secretary's red war horse which was capable of galloping about three hundred li against the wind.

The troops and officers on both sides approved of both combatants in whispers, and although they did not yet exhibit their military skill, yet their grand majestic appearance had already made a bold impression.

On the south side of the parade ground an officer now waved a flag with the character "Ling" (command or order) in gold, and riding up on his horse called out, "His Excellency orders both of you to exercise great care. Whoever of you is defeated will have to suffer the punishment, and the one who wins will be handsomely rewarded."

The two combatants after receiving this order pressed their horses to the centre of the parade ground, where they passed each other backwards and forwards several times, holding their arms ready in their hands, and watching for a chance of dealing a serious blow. Suo Chao lost his temper and brandishing his battle-axe challenged Yang Zhi to fight. But Yang Zhi was not afraid of this, and holding his spear in both hands he also charged towards Suo Chao. They met in front of the inspection platform, and there they both used their utmost skill. Backwards and forwards they went; lunging, slashing, and parrying and each time they met there was a general whirl of their arms and the legs of their horses. After more than fifty bouts neither of them had either won or lost.

Grand Secretary Liang was lost in admiration as he watched this marvelous display. The officers kept up a general round of applause. Among the troops on parade there were general remarks passed to one another such as, "We have been in the army for many years, and taken part in several battles but we have never seen such a deadly conflict between such fine men." On the inspection platform the two Generals Li Cheng and Wen Da kept up an incessant comment, "Well done! Well done!" In fact Wen Da was so afraid that one of the two combatants would be seriously wounded that he gave the signaler an order to take the flag with the golden character "Ling" on it, and place it between the combatants as a signal that fighting was to cease. At the same time a gong on the inspection platform was sounded as a signal for the two men to stop fighting but they were both so keen on winning that they would not rein in their horses or leave the spot. As the gong had no effect the signaling officer rushed towards the combatants, and shouted out, "You two must take a rest now! This is His Excellency's order!"

Yang Zhi and Suo Chao upon hearing this both reined in their horses, and returned each to his respective flag to await further orders. The Generals Li Cheng and Wen Da came forward to the front of the platform, and addressed the Grand Secretary, "Sir, we think that the military skill of both these men is of high order, and their merit is worthy of reward."

Upon hearing this Grand Secretary Liang was much pleased, and immediately summoned Yang Zhi and Suo Chao. The signaling officer transmitted the order, and both combatants came to the front of the inspection platform, where they dismounted. Two soldiers received their weapons, and the two heroes then ascended the platform where they stood in a respectful attitude.

Grand Secretary Liang gave instructions that each was to receive an ingot of silver and two suits of clothing as presents, and then instructed his adjutant that both men were to receive the rank of Major, and that an order must be issued accordingly—their commission was to take effect from that day.

The two heroes expressed thanks to the Grand Secretary, received the gifts, and leaving the platform they divested themselves of their swords, bows, armor, and put on their ordinary clothes. They then returned to the platform, and saluted the assembled officers. They saluted each other according to the instructions of Liang who then informed them that they both had the rank of Major.

The troops marched off to the accompaniment of their drums.

Grand Secretary Liang invited all the officers to dine with him. They feasted together until dusk when Grand Secretary Liang and all the other officers departed on horseback, the two Majors riding in front with red silk flowers in their caps. Upon entering the East Gate the people stood on both sides of the road, and welcomed the cavalcade.

Grand Secretary Liang on his horse asked, "Why are you people so pleased at seeing this?"

The old men in the crowd responded, "We were born and bred at Daming and never before have we seen such splendid fellows as these two. Today we have seen them on the parade ground, and know that they are equally matched. So why should we not be glad?"

Grand Secretary Liang was very pleased at hearing this. Upon arrival at the headquarters all the officers dispersed.

The comrades of Suo Chao invited him to a banquet in celebration of his feat; but as Yang Zhi had only recently arrived he had no acquaintances who would invite him to a feast; he went to his quarters to sleep. Yang Zhi after this attended to his duties very diligently all day long but we need not say anything more about that.

We will now come to the point. After the affair at the military sports Grand Secretary Liang was fonder than ever of Yang Zhi, and they were always together.

As Yang Zhi had a monthly allowance, many persons wished to be friendly with him. Now Suo Chao had great respect for Yang Zhi because he knew that he had great military skill.

The time flew very quickly, and it was almost summer. Grand Secretary Liang and his wife Madame Liang were celebrating the Dragon Boat festival with a feast in the private apartments. When they had drunk several cups of wine, and partaken of two courses of food, Madame Liang said, "Sir, you are now commander-in-chief and control the army but where did this great success and rank come from?"

Grand Secretary Liang replied, "I have been a student of the classics and history ever since I was a boy. I am not blockhead, and how can I be unaware of your father's generosity? He assisted me a great deal, and I am very grateful to him."

His wife replied, "Sir, you are aware of my father's benevolence but why have you forgotten his birthday?"
Liang said, "I am well aware that your father's birthday is on the 15th day of the sixth month. A month ago I sent a man with one hundred thousand strings of cash to buy gold, pearls, and other valuables which I will send to your father as a birthday gift. That will shortly be all arranged, and then I will dispatch the presents. About that only one thing keeps me in hesitation. Last year I also bought many precious stones and jewellery and dispatched them to your father at the Eastern Capital but when about halfway there the escort was attacked by some brigands who took away the whole presents, and up to the present time the brigands have not been captured. Who is the best man to escort the presents this year?"
Madame Liang replied, "In your employ you have plenty of soldiers from whom you can select a reliable man."
Grand Secretary Liang said, "During the next month I will look round carefully and select a really reliable man whom I will intrust with that job. You need not worry any more about it, as I have a plan."
They feasted together up to about ten o'clock that evening but we need not pursue that matter any further.
At that time a new magistrate named Shi Wenbin had just been appointed to Yuncheng County at Jizhou Prefecture in Shandong province. Upon taking up his duties he at once summoned two inspectors and officers whose special work was suppression of banditry. One Inspector was in charge of mounted police consisting of twenty men armed with bows and arrows, and twenty local men. The other Inspector had twenty foot soldiers armed with spear, and also twenty local men.
The Inspector in charge of the mounted police was named Zhu Tong; he was over six feet in height; had a thick beard nearly two feet long; his face was fiery red; and he had piercing eyes. In appearance he resembled Guan Gong, the God of War very much, and he was well known everywhere as the "Beautiful Whiskers." Previously he was a very wealthy man, and being generous he had become friendly with all the leaders of bandits from whom he had acquired great ability in using arms.
The Inspector in charge of the other platoon was named Lei Heng; he was about five and a half feet tall; had a swarthy complexion; a broad fan-like beard; and great muscular strength. He could jump a distance of twenty feet, and was known everywhere as the "Winged Tiger." Previously he had been a blacksmith; then had changed his occupation and became a proprietor of rice grinding mills; a butcher; or even a gambler. He was sometimes a great defender of righteousness but he was not of a generous disposition. He was also versed in military skill.
These two inspectors were experts in suppressing brigandage. Now the magistrate summoned them to his yamen, and handing them his written order he said, "Since I took up my duties here I have learned a great deal of a large number of bandits at Liangshan Marsh, a village in this prefecture, who have not only robbed and looted but have even resisted capture by our troops. I am also afraid that there are other bandits in the various villages. So I want you two to face this difficult matter with our police force—one platoon to go out through the West Gate, and the other through the East Gate. If you find any bandits then arrest them and report the matter at once. In doing this, however, you must not disturb the people. I am aware that at Dongxi village there is a tree, on the top of a hill, with red leaves and there is no other tree like that at anywhere else. I want you to pluck some of those leaves, and upon your presenting them to me I shall know that you have been at that place. If you return without the red leaves I shall not accept any excuse but shall punish you severely."
The two inspectors took the order, and left the court. They called the rolls of their platoons, and then filed off according to the order.
We need not follow the platoon under inspector Zhu Tong which left by the West Gate. But the platoon of twenty soldiers under Inspector Lei Heng left by the East Gate, and duly reached the hill at Dongxi village where they plucked some of the red leaves, and then returned to the village. Leaving the village they came to the Lingguan Temple in about a li. Inspector Lei Heng noticed that the gate of the temple was open, and he wondered why this was since he knew there were no priests living there at the time. As he suspected some irregularity he decided to look inside. As it was almost dark they lit torches, and then entered the temple. There they found a big man sleeping on the altar table with naked body. He had made a pillow of a lot of torn clothing, and was snoring loudly.
"How strange! How strange!" Inspector Lei Heng said. "Our magistrate evidently knew that there have been some bandits at the Dongxi village." He then shouted in a loud voice, and awoke the man who attempted to get up but was seized by the soldiers and bound with ropes. They then all left the temple, and took their prisoner to the village chief.

4 brave men of Eastern Stream
Captured jewels with bold scheme;
As earthly spirits, they did their feat,
As heavenly gods, they came to meet.

014
Red-Haired Demon Lies & has a Drunken Sleep in Lingguan Temple; Boss Chao Gai the Heavenly King decides to adopt & Acknowledges a Nephew in East Bank Village & Administers Justice there

When Lei Heng entered Lingguan Temple he saw a big fellow sleeping on the altar. The soldiers rushed forward, tied him up, and dragged him outside. It was only about the fifth watch—the sun had not yet risen.
Lei Heng said: "Let's take the lout to the manor of Ward Chief Chao. We can get some breakfast there, then we'll turn him over to the county magistrate for questioning."
The company proceeded rapidly to the manor.
The ward chief of East Bank Village was surnamed Chao, his given name was Gai. Born of a well-to-do family native to these parts for many generations, Chao had always fought injustice and helped the needy. He liked nothing better than befriending gallant men, and put them up in his manor whenever they came to him, no matter what the circumstances. When they were ready to go, he gave them silver for travelling expenses. Extremely fond of play with weapons, Chao was very strong. He had never married and practised body-building exercises from morning till night.
Outside the East Gate of Yuncheng, the county seat, were two villages which the county administered. Separated by a large stream, one was called East Bank, the other West Bank. Formerly evil spirits had haunted West Bank. They lured people into the stream in broad daylight, lying in wait beneath the waters. No one could cope with them. One day a monk came by, and the villagers told him all about it. The monk pointed to a place, and instructed them to build a pagoda there of black stone; this would repress evil on the bank of the stream. The result was the spirits left the village of West Bank and moved over to East Bank.
When Chao Gai learned of this he was furious. He waded the stream, picked up the black stone pagoda, carried it across single-handed and deposited it on the East Bank. From then on he was famed as Chao Gai, the Tower-Shifting Heavenly King. He became the undisputed ruler of the village, and gallant men everywhere knew his name.
That morning Lei Heng and his soldiers took the big fellow to the manor and knocked on the gate. When the vassals learned who was calling, they reported to the ward chief. Chao Gai was still in bed but hearing that Constable Lei had come, he ordered that the gate be opened immediately. The vassals complied. The soldiers suspended the big fellow from a rafter in the gate house, then Lei Heng took ten or so of their leaders to a hall and sat down.
Chao Gai, who had left his bed to greet them, asked: "What business brings you here, Constable?"
"On orders of his honour the magistrate, Zhu Tong and I have led two patrols into the countryside to look for bandits," said Lei Heng. "Now we're tired and want to rest a while, so we've come to your manor. I hope we're not disturbing you."
"Not at all," replied Chao Gai. He told his vassals to prepare food and drink, and first to bring some tea. "Did you catch any thieves in our village?" he queried.
"Just now we discovered a big fellow sleeping in that Lingguan Temple out front. I could see he was no gentleman. He evidently got drunk and fell asleep there. So we tied him up, I was going to take him to the county magistrate straight away but in the first place it's too early, and in the second place I wanted to inform you, Ward Chief. In case the magistrate asks you about it in the future, you'll be able to answer. I have the prisoner hung up in your gate house."
Chao Gai made a mental note of this. "Thank you for telling me, Constable," he replied. A short time later, his vassals brought in wine and platters of food. Chao Gai said: "Talking out here is not very convenient. Let's sit inside." Ordering a vassal to light a lamp, he conducted Lei Heng to the porch of a rear building.
After they had both taken their places at a table—Chao Gai in the host's seat, Lei Heng in the guest's—a few vassals carried in platters of tidbits, while another poured the wine. Chao Gai ordered that wine also be given to the soldiers. The vassals led the soldiers to a covered walk and treated them as guests, serving large platters of meat and big bowls of wine. He urged them to eat their fill.
As he courteously plied the constable with food and drink, Chao Gai thought to himself: "What thief could he have caught in our village? I must have a look." He downed six or seven goblets of wine with Lei Heng, then summoned one of his stewards and said: "Keep the constable company. I'm going out to relieve myself. I'll be back shortly."
While the steward drank with Lei Heng, Chao Gai got a lantern and went directly to the main gate. None of the soldiers was around. All were inside, drinking. Chao Gai asked one of his vassals, who was guarding the gate: "That robber the constable caught—where have they got him tied?"
"He's locked in the gate house," said the vassal.
Chao Gai pushed open the door and looked. The fellow was suspended high above the floor. His body was a mass of swarthy flesh, his dangling legs were black and hairy, his feet were bare. Chao Gai shone his lantern on the man's face. It was ruddy and broad. On the side of his temple was a scarlet birthmark from which reddish-brown hair sprouted.
"Where are you from, young fellow?" Chao Gai asked him. "I haven't seen you in our village before."
"Your servant is a stranger from a distant district. I came to offer my services to a man but they've arrested me as a thief. I must get justice."
"Who did you want to join in this village?"
"A gallant man."
"His name?"
"He's called Ward Chief Chao."
"Why did you want to see him?"
"Chao Gai is famed everywhere as a champion of righteousness. There's a rare chance for riches I'd like to tell him about."
"Seek no further. I am Ward Chief Chao. If you want me to save you, pretend to recognize me as your mother's brother. In a little while when I come here to see off Constable Lei and his men call me 'uncle.' I will address you as 'nephew.' Just say that you were only four or five years old when you left here. That's why you didn't recognize me when you came again, looking for me."
"If you can rescue me, I'll be deeply grateful," said the young man. "Please help me, champion!"
Carrying his lantern, Chao Gai left the gate house. He again barred the door, then hurried back to the building in the rear.
"Forgive me for neglecting you," he said to Lei Heng.
"I'm putting you to too much trouble," the constable replied. "It's really not right."
They drank several cups of wine together. Soon light began shining in through the window.
"It's brightening in the east," said Lei Heng. "Your servant must take his leave. I have to sign in at the county office."
"You have your official duties, Constable. I dare not detain you. If business brings you to our humble village again, be sure to call on me."
"I certainly will pay my respects, Ward Chief. Please don't bother to see me off."
"At least let me escort you to the manor gate."
Chao Gai and Lei Heng emerged from the building. The soldiers, who had dined well, now took up their pikes and staves and proceeded to the gate house. There they let down the young man they had suspended and led him out through the door, his hands tied behind his back.
"He's a big fellow!" Chao Gai remarked.
"That rogue is the thief we caught in Lingguan Temple," said Lei Heng. Even before he had finished speaking, the young man shouted:
"Uncle, save me!"
Chao Gai pretended to peer at him. Then he cried: "Why, isn't that rascal Wang the Third?"
"Yes, it's me, uncle. Save me!"
Everyone was astonished. "Who is he?" Lei Heng asked Chao Gai. "How does he know you, Ward Chief?"
"He's my sister's son, Wang the Third! Why was the scamp resting in the temple? He lived here till he was four or five, then my sister and her husband moved to the Southern Capital. I didn't see him for ten years. He came again when he was about fifteen, accompanying a merchant from the city on a trip to buy dates. That was the last I saw of him. I've heard many people say the scoundrel is no good. What's he doing here? I'd never have recognized him if it weren't for that scarlet birthmark on the side of his temple!
"Little Third," he shouted at the young man, "why didn't you come to me directly? Why did you go into the village and steal?"
"But uncle, I didn't steal anything," the young fellow protested.
"If you're not a thief, why have they brought you here?" Chao Gai demanded. Snatching a staff from one of the soldiers, he belabored the young man about the head.
"Don't beat him," Lei Heng and the others urged. "Let's hear what he has to say."
"Uncle, don't be angry," said the young fellow. "Let me speak. Since the last time I came at the age of fifteen, ten years have gone by, isn't that so? Last night on the road I had one cup of wine too many. I didn't dare call on you drunk, so I went to the temple to sleep it off, first. How did I know they were going to nab me without a word? I'm not a thief."
Chao Gai again rushed at him with the staff. "Animal," he cried. "Instead of coming to me directly, you guzzled yourself full of yellow wine on the road. Couldn't you get all you want in my home? You've disgraced me!"
"Calm yourself, Ward Chief. Your nephew isn't a thief," Lei Heng said soothingly. "I got suspicious, finding a big fellow like him asleep in the temple. After all, I'd never seen him before. So I arrested him and brought him here. I would never have done it had I known he was your nephew."
Lei Heng ordered his soldiers to untie the young man and turn him over to the ward chief. They at once did so. "Please don't take it amiss," the constable pleaded. "Had I known he was your nephew, this wouldn't have happened. I hope you're not offended. We must go back, now."
"Just a moment, Constable," said Chao Gai. "Please come into my small manor. I've something to say."
Lei Heng returned with the ward chief to the hall. Chao Gai handed him ten ounces of silver. "Just a paltry gift, Constable," Chao Gai said. "Please don't scorn it for being so small."
"But you shouldn't be doing this."
"If you don't accept, I'll know you're displeased with me."
"Since you're so generous, Ward Chief, I can't refuse. Some day I'll show my gratitude."
Chao Gai instructed the young man to thank Lei Heng. Then he distributed pieces of silver among the soldiers and saw the company to the manor gate. Lei Heng bade the ward chief farewell and departed with his men.
Chao Gai took the young man to the rear building and gave him clothes and a hat. He asked his name and place of origin.
"Your servant's family name is Liu, my given name is Tang. My ancestral home is in East Luzhou Prefecture. Because of this scarlet birthmark on the side of my temple, since childhood I've been known as the Red-Haired Demon. I've made this trip especially to inform you of a rare chance for riches, brother Ward Chief. Last night I fell asleep, drunk, in the temple, and those oafs nabbed me and tied me up. Fortunately, today, I've met you at last. Please be seated, brother, and accept my four kowtows."
When the young man had completed his obeisances, Chao Gai said: "You say you have a rare chance to tell me about. What is it?"
"Ever since childhood, your servant has drifted about. I've been to many places and made friends with many gallant men. Though I've often heard them speak of you, brother, I never thought I'd have occasion to seek you out. I've also met men from east of the mountains and north of the river who've served under you, brother. That's why I'm willing to tell you this. If there are no outsiders around, I'd like to put the whole thing before you frankly."
"You can speak freely. Only my most trusted men are here."
"It's said that Governor Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital, has bought jewels and art objects worth a hundred thousand strings of cash to send to his father-in-law Cai the Premier in the Eastern Capital as birthday gifts. Last year he also sent birthday gifts of the same value. But they were seized by unknown persons along the way. To this day the robbers haven't been caught.
"This year Governor Liang has bought another hundred thousand strings worth of jewels and art objects. The route by which they'll be sent has already been chosen. They must be delivered before Cai's birthday on the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month. In my humble opinion these things were purchased with unclean money. There will be nothing wrong in taking them. We've only to work out a plan for capturing them along the way. Heaven knows it will be no crime!
"I've often heard that you're a real man, brother, and that you have a remarkable skill with weapons. Although I'm not very talented, I know a little about them myself. Not only can I deal with four or five men at a time but if I had my lance I wouldn't be afraid even if two thousand men on horseback came at me together! If you don't despise me, brother, I'm more than willing to lend a hand. What do you think of the idea?"
"Excellent! We must plan carefully. But you've just come, and you've been rather battered about. Why not rest a while in the guest-house? Let me give the matter some thought. We'll talk more about it later."
Chao Gai ordered a vassal to lead Liu Tang to the guest-house. The vassal did so, then went off.
"I certainly was having a hard time," Liu Tang thought to himself. "It's lucky Chao Gai was able to get me out of that scrape. That lout Lei Heng grabbed me for a thief and suspended me all night from a rafter! The villain can't have travelled very far. Why not take a weapon and go after him? I can knock those rascals down, bring Chao Gai back his silver, and work off some of my anger at the same time. A great idea!" Liu Tang came out of the house, snatched a halberd from the rack and left the manor. As he strode south, the sky was already light. Soon he could see the constable and his soldiers marching slowly ahead. Hurrying after them, Liu Tang cried: "Constable, stand where you are!"
Startled, Lei Heng turned to see Liu Tang advancing towards him rapidly, halberd in hand. Lei hastily took a halberd from one of his soldiers.
"What do you want, varlet?" he shouted.
"If you know what's good for you, you'll give me those ten ounces of silver! Then maybe I'll forgive you!"

"Your uncle presented me with that money. What is it to you? If it weren't for his sake, I'd end your knavish life! What gall to demand my silver!"
"I'm no thief but you suspended me from a rafter all night and swindled my uncle out of ten ounces of silver to boot! Return it to me, if you've got any sense, and I'll let you off. If you don't, I'll spill your blood on the spot!"
Furious, Lei Heng pointed his finger at Liu Tang and swore: "Worthless lying thief! You're a disgrace to your family! Impertinent dog!"
"Dirty extortioner of the people! You dare to curse me?"
"You're a bandit to the marrow of your bones! You're sure to implicate Chao Gai! You're a bandit, heart and liver! Don't think you can pull that sort of thing on me!"
"I'm going to settle with you once and for all!" Brandishing his halberd, the enraged Liu Tang charged towards Lei Heng.
The constable raised his own halberd with a laugh and strode forward to meet him. They clashed in the middle of the road and fought over fifty rounds, with neither vanquishing the other.
When the soldiers saw that Lei Heng couldn't defeat Liu Tang, they began closing in on the young man. But just then the fence gate of a nearby house opened and a man holding a length of chain in his hand emerged, crying: "You two bold men there—desist! I've been watching a long time. Rest a moment. I've something to say." He swung the chain between the contestants. Both lowered their halberds, jumped out of the combat circle, and waited.
The man had the appearance of a scholar. He wore a cylindrical-shaped hat that came down almost to his eyebrows, and a wide flaxen gown with a black border that was gathered at the waist by a tea-coloured sash. His feet were clad in white socks and silk shoes. His handsome and refined face was adorned with a long beard. This was Wu Yong the Wizard. He was also known as the Pedant. His Taoist appellation was Master Increasing Light. Since the earliest times his family had resided in this neighbourhood.
Chain in hand, Wu Yong pointed at Liu Tang and said: "Stay where you are, young man. Why are you fighting with the constable?"
Liu Tang glared at him. "None of your business, scholar!"
"I'll tell you why, Teacher," said Lei Heng. "Last night we caught this rogue sleeping naked in the Lingguan Temple and brought him toward Chief Chao's manor. When we discovered that he was the ward chief's nephew, we released him for his uncle's sake. The ward chief invited us to have some wine and presented me with a gift. Unknown to his uncle, this scoundrel chased after us and demanded that I return the gift to him. How do you like that for nerve?"
"I've known Chao Gai ever since we were children," Wu Yong thought to himself. "He's often discussed his private affairs with me, and I'm familiar with all of his relatives. But I've never heard of this nephew. Besides, he's the wrong age. There's something fishy here. I've got to stop this fight, first. Then I can question him.
"Don't be so stubborn, big fellow," he said to the young man. "Your uncle and I are close friends. I know that he's on good terms with this constable. If you take back the little gift he's given him, it will make your uncle look bad. Have some respect for me. I'll talk this over with your uncle later."
"Scholar, you don't know the facts," said Liu Tang. "My uncle didn't give it willingly. The rogue squeezed that silver out of him! If he doesn't return it to me, I swear I'm not going back!"
"I'll return it only if the ward chief himself asks for it," said Lei Heng. "I won't give it to you!"
"You slandered me and said I was a thief! You extorted my uncle's silver. How dare you refuse to return it!"
"It's not your silver! I won't return it! I won't! I won't!"
"You'll have to ask this halberd in my hand whether you'll return it or not!"
"You two have already fought for a long time without either of you winning," said Wu Yong. "How much longer do you intend to fight?"
"If he doesn't return that silver, I'll fight him until only one of us is left alive!" cried Liu Tang.
"If I were afraid of you, I could have had one of my soldiers help me," Lei Heng shouted angrily. "But I'm too much of a man for that! I'm going to knock you head over heels all by myself!"
Liu Tang thumped his chest furiously. "Let's see you do it!" He came at him.
The constable also advanced, brandishing his arms and stamping his feet. Both men were spoiling to resume the fight. Wu Yong thrust himself between them but his admonitions were in vain. Liu Tang waved his halberd, just waiting for a chance to attack. Lei Heng, cursing the young fellow for ten thousand kinds of a thief, also held his halberd at the ready.
It was then that the soldiers exclaimed: "Here comes the ward chief."
Liu Tang turned and looked. He saw Chao Gai, his unfastened tunic draped over his shoulders, running down the road. "Behave yourself, you young whelp!" shouted Chao Gai.
Wu Yong laughed. "Thank Heaven the ward chief has come. He's the only one who can stop them."
Chao Gai rushed up, panting, "Why are you two fighting?"
"Your nephew chased after me, halberd in hand, and demanded my silver," replied Lei Heng. "I told him I'd only give it back to you, as it was none of his business. He fought me fifty rounds, then this teacher came and stopped us."
"That young animal!" said Chao Gai. "I didn't know anything about it. For my sake, Constable, please continue on your way. I'll call on you another day and make my apologies."
"I knew the young rascal was talking rot," said Lei Heng. "I didn't take him seriously. I'm sorry you've had to come all this distance." He bade the ward chief farewell and departed. We'll say no more of him.
Then Wu Yong confided to Chao Gai: "It's lucky you arrived when you did, or something serious might have happened. That nephew of yours is remarkable. A splendid fighter! I was watching from inside the fence. The famed halberd artist Lei Heng couldn't touch him. He was on the defensive all the time. If they had gone another few rounds, he surely would have lost his life. That's why I hurried out to stop them. Where is your nephew from? I've never seen him at your manor."
"I was just about to send a messenger to invite you over to my humble home for a talk when I noticed that Liu Tang was gone and a halberd missing from the rack," said Chao Gai. "A little cowherd told me he had seen a big fellow, carrying a halberd, running south. I hastily followed. Fortunately, you had already stopped the fight. Please come to my humble manor. There's a matter on which I need your advice."
Wu Yong first returned to his quarters and hung up the chain in his study. He said to his landlord: "When my students come, say that their teacher is busy today. Tell them they can take the day off." He closed his door and locked it, then proceeded with Chao Gai and Liu Tang to the ward chief's manor.
Chao Gai led them directly to an inner room in the rear building, where they took appropriate seats as host and guests.
"Ward Chief, who is this person?" Wu Yong asked.
"A bold fellow in the fraternity of gallant men, Liu Tang, from a family in East Luzhou Prefecture. He came especially to inform me of a rare chance for riches. Last night he fell asleep, drunk, in the Lingguan Temple, and Lei Heng nabbed him and brought him here. I pretended he was my nephew, and was able to save him. He told me that Governor Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital, has bought jewels and art objects worth a hundred thousand strings of cash to send to his father-in-law—Cai the Premier in the Eastern Capital. They will soon be passing this way. He thought since they were purchased with unclean money, there will be nothing wrong in taking them.
"His proposal happens to coincide with a dream I had last night. I dreamed the seven stars of the Big Dipper had settled on the ridge of my roof. Another small star just above the handle turned into a streak of light. I thought to myself: To have stars shining right on your own house—that must be an auspicious sign! I intended to invite you over this morning, Teacher, and ask you what I should do."
Wu Yong smiled. "I thought there was something odd about the sudden appearance of brother Liu, and was able to guess seven- or eight-tenths of what was up. His proposal is excellent but there's only one thing—with too many people involved, we can't succeed; with too few, we're bound to fail. Though you have many vassals here, not one of them is suitable. But can just the three of us accomplish our aim? Even though you, Ward Chief, and you, brother Liu, are remarkable people, the answer is no. What we need is seven or eight gallant men. More than that would be no use."
"Could that be the meaning of the number of stars in my dream?" asked Chao Gai.
"Brother's dream was no ordinary one," replied Wu Yong. "Can it be that north of here there are people who can help us?" Frowning he pondered for several moments. Then he understood. "There are, there are!" he exclaimed.
"If you know some courageous men you can trust, Teacher," said Chao Gai, "invite them to join us and put this thing through."
Wu Yong placed two fingers together and calmly spoke a few words. And as a result, in East Bank righteous men became bold robbers, in Stone Tablet Village fishing boats became vessels of war. Truly, their commander could speak of all things in heaven and on earth, and turn up the rivers and roil the seas. What men did Wu Yong the Wizard recommend?

Remember how Lei Heng had found that big fellow sleeping on the altar in the Temple of the Heavenly Official? and Lei Heng's men had pounced on him and trussed him up?
It was early still, before dawn, as they left the temple.
"We'll take this fellow with us to Boss Chao's, and see if we can get something to eat, before we take him back for interrogation," Lei Heng said. So off they all went to Boss Chao's.
This Boss Chao of East Riverside was a gentleman called Chao Gai, who was from a rich family of that neighbourhood, and was famous for his generosity and love of justice. It was his pleasure to seek the company of brave men, and whoever came to him for help, under whatever circumstances, was invited to stay and on leaving was provided by Chao Gai with silver to help him on his way. Chao Gai was a lover of fencing with sword or staff, and was of a strong, athletic build. He had never married so was able to devote the best part of his time to training and developing his physique.
Now in the administrative district of Yuncheng, beyond the east gate, there were two villages, East Riverside and West Riverside, separated only by a broad stream. West Riverside had once been plagued by spirits which used to bewitch people so that they fell in the river, in broad daylight — they simply couldn't save themselves. Then one day a monk passed that way. Having learnt the story with all its details from the villagers, he indicated a spot where he advised them to place a small shrine, fashioned out of blue stone. With this shrine in place on the river bank, the spirits of West Riverside all transferred themselves to East Riverside. When Chao Gai learnt of this, he was so angry he crossed the river and with his own hands carried that blue shrine back to East Riverside. For this reason people nicknamed him "The Pagoda-Lifter." Chao Gai's word was law in this village, and his name was well-known among the fraternity of the rivers and lakes.
That morning Lei Heng and his men, leading their prisoner, arrived at Chao Gai's and knocked on the door. The servants, having asked what they wanted, went to tell Chao Gai. Chao Gai was not up yet but when he heard it was Sergeant Lei, he quickly told them to open the door. The first thing the soldiers did when they were let in was to hang their captive up in the gatehouse. Lei Heng and a dozen or so of his men went to sit in the thatched hall. Chao Gai, when he had risen, received them and asked: "What business is it brings you to these parts, Sergeant?"
"I've been sent by the Governor, sir," said Lei Heng. "Zhu Tong and me, we've been told to go with our men and search the whole area for robbers. We've had an exhausting march, and we're in need of a rest, so we took the liberty of coming to see you. I hope we're not inconveniencing you."
"Of course not," said Chao Gai. He called his servants to organize some food and wine, starting with a soup. "And have you come across any robbers in my district?" he asked.
"As it happens," said Lei Heng, "when we were passing the Temple of the Heavenly Official we found a suspicious character sleeping inside. I could see he was not a reliable type. No doubt he got drunk, and that's why he fell asleep there. So we tied him up, and naturally we're going to cart him off to the magistracy but, well, firstly it's a bit early in the day, and secondly I thought it only right Your Honour should know, just in case our respected Magistrate should ask you something about it later on, so you'll know what to tell him, you see. For the time being we've hung the fellow up in your gatehouse."
Chao Gai took good note. "I am grateful to you, Sergeant, for informing me of this," he said.
The next moment the servants appeared with choice food and drink, and Chao Gai announced: "It's not very convenient here for talking, we'd better go inside and sit down." He told the servants to light lamps and candles in the room, and ushered the sergeant in. Wine was poured. Chao Gai took the host's place and Lei Heng the honoured guest's. The servants brought various dishes of fruit and vegetables to accompany the wine. While the wine was being served, Chao Gai remembered to order wine for Lei Heng's men, whom the servants showed into a reception room below the gallery where they were regaled with quantities of food and drink.
While Chao Gai urged Lei Heng to drink, he was thinking to himself "Who can this thief be who has managed to get himself caught in my village? I think I'd better go and have a look myself." So after five or six cups he called one of his assistants and said: "Stay here and keep the sergeant company a minute, while I go and wash my hands."
The assistant did as instructed and Chao Gai went to get a lantern and then made his way to the gatehouse to investigate. Lei Heng's men had all gone to drink wine and there was no one outside. Chao Gai asked the gatekeeper: "Where is he, this thief the sergeant brought along?"
"He's locked up inside," the man replied.
Chao Gai pushed open the door and saw the man strung up in there at a considerable height, a swarthy individual with a massive frame terminating in black hairy legs and bare feet. When Chao Gai shone the lantern on his face, it appeared broad and purplish with a red birthmark at the temple, sprouting brown hair.
Chao Gai hailed him: "You there, where are you from? I've never seen you before in my village."
"I'm a stranger, I'm not from these parts. I came here to look for a certain person but they mistook me for a thief and arrested me. I've a perfectly good explanation."
"Who is it you were looking for here?"
"A brave and just man."
"Does this brave and just man have a name?"
"He's called Boss Chao."
"And what business do you have with him?"
"He's famous for his courage and generosity. I've a scheme for getting rich I want to tell him about. That's why I'm here."
"All right. I am Boss Chao. If you want me to help you, you'd better pretend to recognize me as your maternal uncle. In a moment I'll be seeing Lei Heng off. You call me uncle and I'll recognize you as my nephew. I'll say you left here when you were just four or five years old and you haven't been back till now, that's why I didn't know you at first."
"If you get me out of this, I'll be forever grateful. Do, please, help me."
Chao Gai took up the lantern and left, closing the door care-fully behind him. He hurried back to the room where had left Lei Heng. "I fear I have been neglecting you," he said.
"No, no." Lei Heng said. "I have inconvenienced you, it is my fault."
After they had drunk a few more cups, the first gleams of day appeared in the window and Lei Heng said: "Day is dawning, I have to leave you and report for work at the office."
"I know you have work to do and I must not detain you," Chao Gai said. "But if duty brings you to our neighbourhood again, you must not fail to pay me a visit."
"If it is your wish, I shall certainly come to pay my respects. But please don't trouble to see me off now."
"Of course I will, at least as far as the gate."
They went out together. Lei Heng's men, who had eaten and drunk their fill, now took up their weapons and went to the gatehouse, where they released the prisoner and brought him out with his hands tied behind his back.
"That's a big fellow," said Chao Gai when he saw him.
"It's the robber we caught sleeping in the temple," Lei Heng began. But before he could finish, the prisoner began to shout: "Uncle, rescue me!"
Chao Gai looked at him hard, feigning surprise. "Why, can it be young Wang?" he said.
"Yes, yes, it's me. Rescue me, Uncle!"
All were amazed. "But who is he?" Lei Heng asked. "And how is it he knows you, Your Honour?"
"It's my nephew, young Wang. Whatever was he doing sleeping in the temple? He's my sister's boy, he lived here when he was small but then he left when he was about four years old because my sister and her family went to live in Nanjing. They must have stayed there, oh, a good ten years. He came back once with a merchant from the capital who was here on business, when he was about fifteen but since then I haven't seen him. Well, from what I've heard he hasn't turned out well at all, what's he been up to here? I didn't even recognize him at first. But for that red birthmark he has on the temple, I would never have known him."
Raising his voice, Chao Gai said: "Hey, you, young Wang, why didn't you come to see me? What do you mean by coming here to rob the people in my village?"
"Uncle," the prisoner replied indignantly, "I'm not a thief."
"If you're not a thief, how come you're under arrest?" So saying, he seized a truncheon from one of the soldiers and made as if to smash the young man's face in. Immediately Lei Heng and his men cried out: "Don't hit him, hear what he has to say."
"Uncle, don't be angry, let me explain. It's ten years since that last time I was here, remember, when I was fourteen or fifteen? Last night, when I was travelling, I had a bit too much to drink. I didn't dare come to see you in that condition, I thought I'd go and sleep it off in the temple first. I never dreamt they'd pick me up like that, without even asking what I was doing. Of course I'm not a thief."
Chao Gai lifted his arm again, as if about to strike. "You animal," he shouted. "You didn't come to see me. Instead you had to go and fill yourself up with yellow wine on the road! Couldn't you have waited till you got here? You'll make me die of shame!"
Lei Heng tried to calm him down: "Don't be angry with him, sir, your nephew is not a thief. It's just that, when we saw such a big fellow sleeping there in the temple, it seemed a bit suspicious. We'd never seen him before, and we didn't know who he really was. That's why we apprehended him and brought him here. Of course we'd never have done so if we'd known it was your nephew." He ordered his men to untie the prisoner at once and hand him over to Chao Gai. When they'd done this, Lei Heng said: "Please forgive me. Had I known it was your nephew we'd never have done this. It's really unpardonable. I think we should leave now."
"No, Sergeant, don't go yet. Please come inside a moment, I've something to say to you."
Lei Heng released the prisoner, and they all went back into the hall and Chao Gai got ten taels of stamped silver which he gave to Lei Heng, saying: "Please, Sergeant, do not despise this poor gift, I hope you won't be offended."
"But that's not necessary at all," Lei Heng said.
"If you don't take it, I shall feel insulted," said Chao Gai.
"Well, if you insist. I will accept it for the time being but I shall have to repay your generosity at the first opportunity."
Chao Gai told the young man to prostrate himself in gratitude to Lei Heng. Then he found some silver for all of Lei Heng's men. He escorted them to the gate, where Lei Heng took his leave.
Chao Gai now led the stranger to a room at the back where he found some clothes for him to change into and something to cover his head. Then he asked him who he was and where he hailed from.

"My name is Liu Tang, and I'm from Donglu. Because of this red birthmark I've got on my temple, they all call me 'The Red-Haired Devil.' I came here specially to give you something of great value. But yesterday when I got here it was late and I was drunk, so I went to sleep in the temple. How could I know those bastards would grab me and tie me up? Well, as they say, if people are destined to meet, a thousand miles is nothing, if not, you can be right on top of each other but it makes no difference. Anyway, now I've been lucky enough to find you. Just wait a minute, while I prostrate myself four times."
When this business was finished, Chao Gai asked: "You said you had something of great value to give me. Where is it?"
"Since I was little, I've always been a wanderer among the rivers and lakes. I've travelled many roads, and I always keep an eye out for brave men. So many times I've heard your name but I didn't dare think that one day I would meet you. In Shandong and Hebei I was told of so many smugglers who found refuge with you. That's what encouraged me to come here to speak to you. If you think no one can hear us who oughtn't to, I'll spill the beans."
"These are all people I trust," said Chao Gai. "You can speak freely."
"I have discovered that Governor Liang in the Northern Capital, Daming, has got together a treasure, pearls and precious stones and ornaments and suchlike, worth a hundred thousand, as a birthday present for his father-in-law, the Grand Preceptor Cai, at the Emperor's court. Another treasure just like it was sent last year but it was stolen on the way, no one knows by whom — they still haven't been caught. Sooner or later the convoy with this year's treasure is going to set off, in order to arrive for the birthday on the fifteenth of the sixth month. As I see it, this wealth is illegally acquired, so what's wrong with taking it? Why don't we work out a plan to steal it on the way? It won't be a crime in the eyes of heaven. I know your reputation as a man of honour and as a fighter. I'm nothing special but I know a bit about fighting too. I can deal with five or six men single-handed, I wouldn't be afraid even if a troop of cavalry came at me, so long as I had my lance. Anyway, if you'll accept it, that's the gift I'd like to make to you. What do you say?"
"It's brilliant! We'll have to work it all out. However, you've had a bit of a rough time getting here, you'd better go and rest for a while in the guest quarters, while I think it over. We'll discuss things later."
A servant took Liu Tang over to the guest quarters as instructed and left him there. "I had certainly got myself into some hot water there," Liu Tang thought to himself. "Lucky Chao Gai turned up and was able to get me out of it. That bloody lout Lei Heng, making out I was a thief and hanging me up all night! Incidentally, he can't have got far, why don't I get a stick and go after him? I'll knock those buggers down, get the silver and return it to Chao Gai! And I can work off some of my feelings at the same time, what a great idea!"
No sooner said than done. He went to the arms rack and equipped himself with a sabre. Then he rushed out of the gate and strode off southwards. It was broad daylight by now:
The Plough has begun to slant and light begins to spread from the sky's eastern edge while the blazing star declines towards the sea. The golden rooster has called three times, summoning ladies to their toilet. The neighing of horses urges merchants to commence their competitive activities. Several wisps of pink cloud trail across the blue heavens, as the sun's red disk rises above the mulberry tree.
The Red-Haired Devil had gone a couple of miles when he made out Lei Heng, marching along slowly at the head of his troop. Hurrying towards them he shouted: "Hey, you, Sergeant! Stop!"
It gave Lei Heng quite a shock. When he turned and saw Liu Tang rushing in his direction, waving his sabre, he hurriedly took a sabre from one of his men and shouted back: "What the bloody hell do you want?"
"Give me back that silver you've got, you cheat, and I'll let you off!"
"Your uncle gave it to me, what business is it of yours? If it wasn't for your uncle I'd finish you off! Asking for the silver back, you've got a nerve!"
"I'm no thief but you hung me up all night, and then extorted ten taels of silver from my uncle. You'll give it back, if you've any sense! I'll show you mercy if you do. If not, your blood will flow!"
Lei Heng lost patience. He pointed his finger at Liu Tang and roared: "You disgrace to your house and name! You idle good-for-nothing! How dare you speak to me like that!"
"You enemy of the people, you mangy cur! How dare you insult me!"
"Sod your eyes and sod your bones, what do you mean by trying to bring Chao Gai into it! Sod your heart and your soul, you can't carry on like that in front of me!"
"I shall settle your hash," shouted the enraged Liu Tang and rushed at Lei Heng, waving his sabre, whereupon Lei Heng gave a contemptuous laugh and taking a firm grip on his weapon, advanced to meet him. The two of them clashed right there on the road; over fifty assaults were delivered, in which neither proved the victor.
Lei Heng's men seeing that their commander was unable to get the upper hand, were on the point of joining in against Liu Tang, when suddenly the gate of a neighbouring compound opened and a man appeared wielding a pair of brass chains. "Would you two gentlemen stop fighting?" he shouted. "You've been at it a long time, I was watching. Take a break now, please, I wish to talk to you." And with that he shot out his chains to separate the two adversaries. They both put up their weapons, sprang back out of the circle of combat and stood stock-still.
The speaker was got up as a scholar. He had a tubular hat which fitted close down above the eyebrows, a loose canvas robe with black eyelets, held in at the waist by a tea-coloured belt, and dapper shoes and socks. As to his person, his eyebrows were strongly marked and his gaze penetrating, while a fine beard adorned his chin. This was none other than Wu Yong, the Beacon of Learning, also known as the Professor, and the Spreader of Enlightenment. His family had been in the district for generations. There's a composition of Linjiang Xian's that says some good things about him:
He's read a thousand classics and devoted his life to cultivating his powers. He's mastered many an artful strategy. He has the mind of a great leader, the heart of a heroic warrior. He could fool Zhuge Liang and get the better of Chen Ping.[1] He has tricks and schemes enough to scare demons. That's why they call him "The Professor"; that's what earned him his title, "The Beacon of Learning."
As he manipulated his chains, Wu Yong pointed at Liu Tang and said: "Cease now, you! What cause have you to fight with the sergeant?"
Liu Tang stared back and said: "That's no business of yours!"
"Professor, I'll explain," Lei Heng said. "We found this fellow last night, sleeping stark naked in the temple. We arrested him and took him along to the manor. But then it turned out that he's Mr. Chao's nephew. So for his uncle's sake we released him. Then Mr. Chao invited us to stay and drink and he made me a small gift. This scoundrel, unknown to his uncle, followed me here and asked for it back. It's an impertinence, don't you agree?"
Wu Yong thought: "I have known Chao Gai since childhood. If he has any kind of problem he talks it over with me. I know all his family and friends but this nephew I've never seen before. Besides, the age is all wrong. No, they must be up to something. What I must do is try and put a stop to this fight, and then go and ask Chao Gai." To Liu Tang he said: "Don't be obstinate, young man. Your uncle is a good friend of mine, and I know he is on good terms with this officer. If your uncle decides to make someone a gift, and you proceed to quarrel about it, you'll only embarrass your uncle. And you should show me some respect, too. I'll have a word with your uncle later."
"Excuse me, sir but you know nothing about it," Liu Tang said. "This wasn't just a free gift from my uncle, he was swindled. I swear I won't leave till this cheat gives back the money."
"I'll only give it back to Mr. Chao himself, assuming he comes and asks me for it," said Lei Heng. "I certainly won't give it to you!"
"You go around making false accusations and blackmailing people. Do you still refuse to give it back?"
"It's not your money. I won't give it to you, and that's that!"
"You won't? Well, just see what this sabre of mine has to say!"
"You've been fighting for hours," Wu Yong interjected, "and there's been no outcome. How long do you intend to go on for?"
"If he won't give the money back, it's got to be a fight to the death," Liu Tang said.
Lei Heng exploded: "Do you think I'm afraid of you? I'd call in my men to deal with you, only it might look as if I feared you. I shall have to cut you down myself!"
Liu Tang responded furiously, readying his weapon and shouting: "Who's afraid? Who's afraid?" Then he began to move in. At the same time, Lei Heng advanced, with whirling arms and stamping feet. Both men were bent on renewing the fight. Wu Yong stood on one side begging them to desist but to no avail. Liu Tang pointed his sabre, aiming to get in under his opponent's guard, while the latter poured out insults in a ceaseless flow and also took up a position of readiness. But just at this moment, the shout went up: "His Honour is here!"
Liu Tang turned to look. Chao Gai could be seen, hurrying up the road, still not fully dressed, with his robe unbuttoned in front. "You there, you unmannerly brute, stop this at once!" he was shouting.
Wu Yong laughed with relief. "Thank goodness Mr. Chao himself has come, that's the only thing that will put a stop to this fight."
Chao Gai arrived still panting. "What's he doing here, what's this all about?" he asked.
"Your nephew followed me here and wanted to take back the money you gave me by force of arms," Lei Heng said. "I said I wouldn't give it to him, I'd only give it back to you, and I told him it was none of his business. But he attacked me. We had fifty or so assaults before the Professor here intervened."
"The animal!" Chao Gai said. "I knew nothing at all about this. Please, Sergeant, forgive me and continue on your way, I will come to see you another day to present my excuses."
"I know the fellow is crazy," Lei Heng said, "and of course it is no fault of yours, sir. I am only sorry you had to be troubled." With this he took his leave, and we shall say no more of him.
Wu Yong now said to Chao Gai, "If you hadn't come, it might have been nasty. This nephew of yours is something quite out of the ordinary! He certainly knows how to fight. I was watching from my compound. Lei Heng has quite a reputation with the sabre but he could make no impression on him, the best he could do was block and parry. If they'd gone on a bit longer, Lei Heng would not have come out of it alive. That's why I thought I'd better step in. Where has he appeared from, this nephew of yours? I've never seen him before at the manor."
"I was going to ask you to be so kind as to come to my house so I could have a word with you," Chao Gai said. "I was just about to send someone when I noticed my nephew was not around and a sabre was missing from the arms rack. Then one of the cowherds said he had seen this big fellow armed with a sabre heading south in a hurry. I set out as fast as I could in pursuit. Luckily you had already restrained him. Please, let us both go to my house now, we need to do some thinking."
Wu Yong went first to his study and hung up his brass chains beside the bookcase. Then he instructed his landlord: "When the students come, tell them I have things to do today, they can have a day's holiday." There's a poem about this:
Skilled in books and arms alike,
His whirling chains can vanquish a pike;
He loves to talk of chivalry,
But he won't sit at home unprofitably.
Open the cage and the bird flies out;
The frogs, released, go hopping about.
And so when the teacher leaves in haste
Nothing's more to the students' taste.
Wu Yong closed the study door and locked it. Then the three of them went back to Chao Gai's.
Chao Gai invited them into an inner chamber, and they seated themselves according to the rules of precedence.
"All right, who is he?" Wu Yong asked.
"He's a gentleman of the rivers and lakes," said Chao Gai, "and his name is Liu Tang. His family are from Donglu. He came to find me because he's onto something of great value. He got drunk last night and went to sleep in the temple. He was arrested by Lei Heng and brought to the manor. I got him released by claiming him as my nephew. What he tells me is this: Governor Liang, Governor of Daming, the Northern Capital, has amassed a quantity of valuables worth a hundred thousand cash that he is sending to the Eastern Capital as a birthday present for his father-in-law — Madam Cai's father. At some time or another, the convoy will pass through here, and since it's a question of ill-gotten gains, why should it not be seized? Now what he told me corresponds exactly to a dream I had. Last night I dreamed the seven stars of the Plough stood right over my house and together with them there was another little star which vanished in a flash of bright light. I imagine that if the stars shine on my house it must signify something good. I had planned to come and ask you about it. What's your opinion?"
"I knew something was up the moment I saw young Liu here," exclaimed Wu Yong happily. "And I had guessed about seventy-five per cent of what it was about. It sounds an excellent scheme. There's just one thing: we don't want too many people in on it, yet it's impossible with too few. The servants here are no good, we can't use any of them. At the moment, then, there's only you, Liu Tang and myself, just the three of us to carry through this affair. Agreed that you and Liu Tang have exceptional qualities but it's still not enough. No, what we need for this is seven or eight good men and true, that would do the trick. But not more."
"Didn't I say that was just the number of stars in my dream?" exclaimed Chao Gai.
"Undoubtedly that was a most significant dream," said Wu Yong. "It surely suggests that there are others in the neighbourhood who will assist us." He thought for a long time, frowning with concentration. "I've got it!" he cried finally.
"If you know anyone reliable, then please go and ask them, so we can accomplish our design," said Chao Gai.
Without hurrying, Wu Yong raised one hand with the finger and thumb joined and proceeded to explain.
And as a result, in East Riverside good men became bandits, while in Stonetable fishing boats turned into warships. Truly it can be said that:

Gifted with speech that can the heavens beguile,
He makes the rivers seethe and the seas boil.

As we have said, when Lei Heng reached the Lingguan Temple he saw a big man sleeping on the altar table, whom the soldiers bound with ropes. Lei Heng said, "I will take this fellow to the village chief Chao, and ask for a meal there, and then will take him on to the county magistrate to be examined."
So the party came to the chief's village. The chief of the village was named Chao Gai, whose ancestors had been wealthy men. He was generous and hospitable, and was particularly fond of making friends with heroes from all parts of the empire. He offered hospitality to whomsoever came to his village, no matter of what character the strangers were, and if they wanted to leave they were given money and assistance. Chao Gai was very fond of exercising with the spear and cudgel, so that his body was very strong. He had no wife, and he spent all his time in developing his muscles. On the east side of Yuncheng County were two villages—Dongxi and Xixi and they were separated by a stream. Formerly at the Xixi village there were demons who decoyed men into the stream, and once there, there was no help for them. But one day a monk happened to pass that way, and the people of the village told him all about the demons. He selected a place, and told them to erect there a pagoda of gray stone, and it would protect them from the demons in the stream. When this had been done the demons went to the Dongxi Village, and Chao Gai was very angry about this. So he picked up the pagoda and carried it across the river. Because of this the people called him, Chao Gai, the "Heavenly King" who can carry a pagoda on the palm of his hand. He had great influence over those villages and was well known among the bandits.
On the day referred to Lei Heng, with his militia and their prisoner, arrived at the village and knocked at the gate. The gatekeepers heard this, and reported the matter to the village chief. At the time Chao Gai was still in bed but when he heard that Inspector Lei Heng had arrived he gave orders for the gate to be opened immediately. The gatekeepers did this, and the soldiers took the prisoner to the guardroom near the gate and tied him up there. Lei Heng took about ten of his best men, to the guest hall where they sat down.
When Chao Gai entered he received them with the usual inquiries, and then asked on what public business they had come there.
Lei Heng replied, "The magistrate gave orders to myself and Zhu Tong to take soldiers to the villages and arrest any bandits we found. We have travelled a good distance, and feeling tired we came to your village for a rest. I am afraid that we have disturbed the sweet dreams of the chief."
Chao Gai said that that did not matter. He then ordered the servants to prepare food and wine. He then asked whether Lei Heng had succeeded in arresting any brigand in that village.
Lei Heng replied, "I found a man at the Lingguan Temple, and as he appeared to be in a drunken sleep, and not of good character, I arrested him. I brought him here so that you might know all about the affair, as I was afraid that it would be inconvenient for you not to know of the matter when the county magistrate tries the case. He is now tied up in the guardroom near the gate."
Chao Gai bore this remark in mind and thanked him for reporting the matter. In a short time the servants brought in the food and wine. Chao Gai said, "This room is not a good place to discuss matters in, and therefore we had better go into a hall at the back of this." He then ordered the servants to light the lamps in another room, and requested the inspector to go and have a drink there.
On arrival there Chao Gai took his seat in the position of a host, while Lei Heng sat down as a guest. The servants brought in the fruit, wine, vegetables, and other food, and then stood at the side serving the wine. Chao Gai sent the servants with some wine for the soldiers. The servants did this, and also asked the soldiers to go to another room outside where the servant attended to their wants, bringing them a large tray of meat and a large bowl of wine.
While Chao Gai was pressing Lei Heng to take some wine he was thinking who the man could be who had been arrested, and how he could go to see who it was. When they had drunk about seven cups of wine Chao Gai summoned a steward, and told him to stay with the guest while he went to the toilet. Chao Gai then got a lamp, and going outside saw that there was no one about as all the soldiers had gone to drink wine. He went to the gatekeeper, and asked where the thief brought there by Inspector Lei Heng was tied up.
The gatekeeper said that the thief was imprisoned in the guardroom near the gate. Chao Gai went to the guardroom, and upon pushing open the door saw inside a man hanging from a great height. He saw that his flesh was dark, and also that his feet were bare, and were covered with black hair. Holding up his lamp he saw that his face was very broad and also discoloured. Near his temple was a red birthmark with black and yellow hair growing from it.
Chao Gai asked him, "Where do you come from? I have not seen you at this village before."
The man replied, "I came from a distant place to look for a man here, and was arrested as a thief but I can give a full explanation."
Chao Gai asked, "Whom did you come to find in this village?"
The man said, "I came here to find a hero."
"What was the name of the hero?"
The man replied that he had come to find a village chief called Chao.
"What business had you with him that you were trying to find him?"
The man replied, "He is famous everywhere as a hero. Just now I have a matter that may result in riches or influence, and that is what I want to talk with him about."
Chao Gai said, "You need not say anything more, I am the village chief, Chao Gai. The way I can help you, is that you recognize me when Inspector Lei Heng leaves here, as your maternal uncle and I will also recognize you as my nephew. You can say that you left here when you were only about five years old, and in returning to find me you forgot the place where I lived."
The man replied, "If in this matter you assist me I shall never forget your kindness. I request you to help me."
Chao Gai picked up the lantern, and leaving the guardroom, closed the door after him. Going to the room where Lei Heng was seated, he said to him, "I must apologize for leaving you alone so long."
Lei Heng politely replied, "I have not been right in giving you so much trouble."
They drank together several cups of wine before they saw the rays of early dawn entering through the window. Lei Heng then remarked that it was already dawn and that he must go as he had to report in the magistrate's yamen by dawn.

Chao Gai said, "As you are on official business I cannot of course detain you. But should you at any time have any business near this village I hope that you will pay me a visit."
Lei Heng said, "I will certainly pay you a visit but I request that you will not now accompany me."
Chao Gai said, "Very good, I will only go a short distance to the gate of this farm."
They both went outside. The soldiers had finished their wine and food, and now taking their spears and cudgels they went to the guardroom and released the prisoner, tied his hands behind his back, and then took him outside the gate. When Chao Gai saw the prisoner, he said, "What a big man!"
Lei Heng said, "This is the man who was arrested as a thief at the Lingguan Temple." He had hardly finished speaking when the prisoner called out, "Uncle! Save me."
Chao Gai pretended to look at him carefully, and shouted, "Hello! Can this be Wang the Third?"
The man replied, "I am. Uncle, save me!"
All the men were surprised. Lei Heng asked Chao Gai: "Who is this man? How is it that he recognizes you?"
Chao Gai said, "Oh! That is my nephew called Wang the Third. But how was it that he took rest in a temple? He is my sister's son, and previously lived here. When he was about five years old he went with his parents to Nanjing, and ten years later he paid us a visit here. A man from Nanjing came with him to buy some things but since that time I have not seen Wang the Third. From other men I heard that he had become a useless individual. But why has he come here now? At first I did not know him but now I recognize him because of the birthmark on his temple." Then turning to the prisoner he asked "Young Third! Why did you not come to see me in a straightforward way instead of arriving as a thief?"
The man replied, "Uncle, I am not a thief."
Chao Gai asked, "If you are not a thief, what were you arrested for?" Saying this he took a cudgel from a soldier and struck the man on his head and face.

Lei Heng urged Chao Gai not to beat the man but to wait and hear what he had to say.
The man said, "Uncle! Do not be angry but listen to me. When I came here I was only fifteen years old, and is that not ten years ago? Yesterday I drank much wine on the way, so that I was not in a condition to visit you. When these soldiers came to arrest me they did not ask me any questions. I am certainly not a thief."
Chao Gai again raised the cudgel to beat him, and reviled him; saying, "You beast! Instead of coming straightforwardly to visit me you indulged your vile appetite for the "yellow soup" (wine). If you had come to me would I not have given you wine to drink? What a disgrace!"
Lei Heng said, "Chief! Do not get angry. Your nephew may not be a thief. We saw him sleeping in a strange way in a temple, and as we did not know him we were suspicious, and arrested him. If we had known that he was your nephew we would not have arrested him." He then ordered his soldiers to untie the ropes, and deliver the prisoner to the chief. The soldiers did so, and released the prisoner. Lei Heng then spoke to Chao Gai, "You must not blame me. If I had known before that he is your nephew I would not have committed such a serious mistake. We must now go back to the town."
Chao Gai said, "Inspector, do not go yet. Please come inside as I have something to say to you."
They both then went into the guest's chamber where Chao Gai gave Lei Heng ten taels of silver, and then said, "Inspector, this is only a small present but I trust that you will accept it."
"There is no need for such things."
"If you do not accept it you must feel unsatisfied with it."
Lei Heng said, "As you are so generous, I will accept it but I will recompense you later on."
Chao Gai told the prisoner to salute Lei Heng; then he gave some money to the soldiers, and accompanied Lei Heng to the gate. Lei Heng saluted Chao Gai, and departed with his men.
Chao Gai took the prisoner into a room, and gave him clothes and a cap. He then asked him for his name, and where he came from.
The man said, "My name is Liu Tang, and I am a native of East Luzhou Prefecture. But people call me the "Red-Haired Demon" because of my birthmark. I came here to tell you about a matter of great importance. Yesterday evening I stayed in the temple and got drunk. I did not expect to be arrested by these men, and to be brought here as a prisoner. But fortunately today I am here. Elder brother, please be seated, and agree to receive my salute four times."
This being done Chao Gai said, "You now tell me where is the thing that will give me wealth and influence."
Liu Tang said, "Since I was a boy I have rambled about everywhere, and have been particularly fond of making friends with heroes. I always heard of your fame but never had a chance to come and see you. I also knew some merchants who did illegal buying and selling in both Shandong and Hebei provinces. I also heard that many of them sought refuge with you, and therefore I decided to mention this important matter to you and if there is no stranger here, I can now tell you everything."
Chao Gai said, "All the people here are my confidants so there is no need for any further delay in your speaking to me."
Liu Tang said, "I have heard that Grand Secretary Liang, the commander-in-chief at Daming, the Northern Capital, has bought gold articles, pearls, and other valuables to the value of one hundred thousand strings of cash that he will send to the Eastern Capital for presentation as a birthday gift to his father-in-law, Prime Minister Cai. Last year he also sent similar presents but they were stolen by bandits, and so far the culprits have not been arrested. It has not been fixed on what date this year's presents will be dispatched but they should reach their destination before the birthday which is the 15th day of the sixth month.
"I think this is ill-gotten money so why should we not take it? We had better think of some plan of seizing these presents on the road. Even if Heaven knows of the matter our act will not be regarded as a crime. I have heard of your fame, and think that your military training will insure success to the scheme. I have no skill but I know something of fighting. It is needless to mention only three or five men, because if there were two thousand mounted soldiers I would not be afraid of them even if I had only one spear. But if you think that my skill is not of much use, I shall be willing to assist you if you will take me. What do you think of the matter?"
Chao Gai said, "Bravo? We must discuss the matter. But I am afraid that you have experienced much suffering on your way here so better go to the guest chamber where you can rest, and tomorrow we will discuss the matter."
Chao Gai then ordered the servant to conduct Liu Tang to the guest chamber.
In the guest chamber Liu Tang meditated. "Why did I come here and so experience all this misery? If it had not been for the intervention of Chao Gai I should not have been released. I do not like Lei Heng who falsely accused me of being a thief, and caused me to be hung here for the night. As he cannot have gone very far I will get a stick, and pursue him. When I catch up to them I will knock them all down and get back the silver. This will avenge my wrong. This is an excellent plan!" He then went outside, and got a halberd out of the rack. Leaving by the gate he went along the southern road with big strides. The day was quite bright, and very soon he saw in the distance Lei Heng and his men, and soon caught up to them. Upon reaching them Liu Tang shouted out, "Hey, Inspector, you need not try to get away."
Lei Heng was surprised at hearing this, and turning round he saw Liu Tang armed with a halberd. He quickly took a halberd from one of his men, and shouted, "What are you following us for?"
Liu Tang said, "You understand the matter. You must give me those ten taels of silver, and then I won't attack you."
Lei Heng said, "The money was given to me by your uncle so what have you got to do with it? I would have certainly killed you but for your uncle. And yet you ask me for the money."
"I am not a thief, and yet you hanged me for one night," said Liu Tang. "You deceived my uncle of the ten taels of silver. You know this is the case, and you had better give me the money, then I will regard your past deeds with leniency. But if you do not give me the money I will spill some of your blood."
Lei Heng was very angry, and pointing at Liu Tang he cursed him saying, "You lying thief, who brings disgrace and ruin to your family. You have no decency but how dare you talk like this?"
Liu Tang replied, "You deceiver of the people with your vile skill. How dare you curse me?"
Lei Heng continued his cursing. "You are a wanton thief from your head to the soles of your feet! You are certainly implicating Chao Gai. You have a thief's disposition but this kind or thing I will not allow."
Liu Tang was also angry, and he shouted out, "I came here to give you a good hiding." He seized his halberd, and advanced towards Lei Heng. Lei Heng only laughed at him, and also advanced with his halberd. They met at the side of the road where they fought for a long time, without either getting an advantage. When the soldiers saw that Lei Heng had not defeated Liu Tang, they were on the point of coming to his assistance when a gate in a bamboo fence was opened, and a man came out carrying in his hand two copper wires. The man said, "You two are fine men, and must not fight any more. I have been watching you fight for a long time. You take a rest, and listen to what I have to say." So saying he placed the wires between the two men. The latter withdrew, and stood a little distance away from each other. They looked at the man, and saw that he was dressed as a scholar. He was wearing a cap low down on his brow; a large loose-fitting gown of hempen cloth with a black border; an official belt of the colour of tea; silk shoes, and clean socks. His eyebrows and eyes had an elegant appearance; his mustache was long and his face white. His name was Wu Yong, and his nickname was "Clever Star"; his fancy name was "The Inquisitive or Critical Student"; his Taoist name was "Much Brighter." His grandfather was a native of that place.
Taking the copper wires in his hand he pointed at Liu Tang and said, "You stop a bit! Why are you fighting with that inspector?"
Liu Tang looked closely at Wu Yong and said, "It has nothing to do with you, xiucai scholar."[59]
Lei Heng said, "You, sir, do not know. That fellow slept in a temple without wearing any clothes last night. I arrested him, and took him to the village of the village chief, Chao Gai. There we found that he was a nephew of Chao Gai, and I then released him because of what his uncle said. Chao Gai invited me to drink wine with him, and then presented me with some silver. This fellow evidently did not know about that, and came here to get the money back. Do you think that he is brave?"
Wu Yong meditated, "From my youth Chao Gai has been my friend and whenever he had any business he always discussed it with me first. I knew all his relatives but I have not met this nephew before. Moreover, this man seems too old to be Chao Gai's nephew, and that looks strange. So I will stop the fight and afterwards ask him about the matter." Wu Yong then spoke to the man, "You must not be insistent. Your uncle is a good friend of mine, and is also on friendly terms with this inspector. He has made a present to this inspector, and your demanding the return of it will cause your uncle to lose face. I will be responsible for this matter, and will speak to your uncle about it."
"Scholar, you do not understand," said Liu Tang. "My uncle did not willingly give the inspector this silver, and the latter deceived my uncle. If he does not give me the money I shall not go back."
"If chief Chao Gai, will come here himself I will hand him the money," said Lei Heng, "but I will not give it to you."
"You falsely accused me of being a thief," said Liu Tang, "and got money by false pretense, so why should you not return the money?"
Lei Heng replied, "Because it is not your money! I will not give it to you."
"As you will not give me the money," said Liu Tang, "then you had better ask the halberd in my hand whether it will agree to that procedure."
"You two men have been fighting for a long time," said Wu Yong, "without either of you losing or winning. So how long will it take you to finish the fighting?"
"As he will not give me the money," said Liu Tang, "I will risk my life, and one of us will die."
Lei Heng was very angry and said, "I am not afraid of you and I would not even order my soldiers to come and help me to fight with you. In any case I will certainly knock you down with my halberd."
Liu Tang was also angry upon hearing this, and slapping his chest he shouted, "I am not afraid of you! I am not afraid!" and at the same time advanced. Lei Heng also advanced, and both men were soon close together. But Wu Yong stepped between to stop the fight. Liu Tang tried to edge his way round Wu Yong, while Lei Heng continued to curse him as a thief. The soldiers however just then called out, "The chief is coming." Liu Tang turned round to look, and saw Chao Gai with his dress in loose disorder. Upon arriving there Chao Gai called out, "You beast! Do not act in such an impolite way."
Wu Yong laughed at this and said, "Sure enough the chief has arrived, and he is the only man who can settle this dispute."
When Chao Gai had regained his breath, he said, "Why are you two men fighting?"
"Your nephew took a halberd, and demanded that I should give him the money," said Lei Heng; "I told him that I would give you the money as it was not his business. He fought with me a long time. This scholar then intervened, and stopped the fight."
"What a beast!" said Chao Gai. "I did not know that he was doing this. Inspector, will you please go now, and by and by I will come to your home, and apologize."
Lei Heng said, "I knew that this man was making trouble, and I did not want to have anything to do with him. We have caused you much inconvenience in coming so far." He then took his departure.
Wu Yong said, "Sir, if you had not come here there would have been a big fight. This nephew of yours is a most extraordinary fellow. His military skill is quite good. I was inside the bamboo fence watching them fight. The Inspector Lei Heng used the halberd with great skill but could not win and had to defend himself from the thrusts and blows of his opponent. And I was afraid that Lei Heng might get killed, and so I intervened. But where does your nephew come from? I have never seen him before in the village."
Chao Gai said, "You had better come to my house where I can explain matters to you. I was just going to send a servant with a message for you, when I noticed that Liu Tang had gone, and that there was a halberd missing from the rack. A cowherd said that he had seen a big man taking a halberd from the rack and then going straight to the south road. I, therefore, immediately set out after him but before I arrived you had stopped the fighting. I beg that you will now come to my house where we can discuss matters."
Wu Yong took the copper wires, and placed them in the library of the house within the bamboo fence. He then spoke to the master of the house, "When my pupil comes please tell him that I have a little business to attend to, and he can have a holiday today." He then took the key and locked the door of the library.
He joined Chao Gai and Liu Tang, and they all went to the Dongxi village. Chao Gai invited them to enter a room at the back where they all sat down.
Wu Yong asked, "Chief, who is this man?"
"He is a good man named Liu Tang," said Chao Gai, "and he is a East Luzhou man. He has information about a promising enterprise and came here to tell me about it. Last night he was drunken, and slept in the Lingguan Temple where he was arrested by Lei Heng, and so brought to my village. I pretended to recognize him as a nephew of mine, and so he was released. He says that at Daming, the commander-in-chief, Grand Secretary Liang, has purchased one hundred thousand strings of cash worth of gold articles, pearls, and other valuables which he is sending to his father-in-law, Prime Minister Cai at the Eastern Capital. These valuables will pass this way. This wealth has been ill-gotten so do you think we might get it? His arrival seems to be the fulfillment of a dream. Last night I dreamt that the Northern Dipper of seven stars descended to my house. With it was a crowd of smaller stars which vanished leaving a track of light behind.
"I think this augurs some good fortune for my family. So now I would like to have your opinion of this affair."
Wu Yong laughed and said, "I thought that Liu Tang's arrival was very strange, and I suspected that there was something in it. Now it is a thing which neither too many nor too few men can do. At your homestead there are many visitors but not one of them may be used. But you, chief, the brother Liu, and myself cannot settle this matter ourselves, and in spite of your strength we must get some assistance. But we do not need more than seven or eight heroes with us."
Chao Gai said, "In my dream there were certainly only seven stars."
Wu Yong said, "This dream is very important. May it not mean that someone here will come to your assistance?" He then thought for a few minutes when a plan occurred to him and he called out, "I have got the man! I have him!"
Chao Gai said, "As you have found a reliable man we had better invite him to come here at once."
Wu Yong then slowly explained his plan, using his two forefingers to emphasize his remarks that would result in many heroes leaving Dongxi Village, and becoming brigands.

Justice seekers turn to highwaymen,
Warships are made of fishing boats;
Fine speeches running from versatile lips,
Lead bravoes at will by the nose.

Men were collected by Wu Yong, the Clever Star.

015

Inquisitive Scholar Wu Yong Persuades & Induces the 3 Ruan Brothers to Join & gets their ears; Gongsun Sheng Becomes 7th of the Righteous 7 Stars of the Dipper

"I have in mind three men," said Wu Yong, "gallant, unusually skilled with weapons, men who'd dare to go through fire and water who'd stand together to live or die. We must get them if our venture is to succeed."
"What do these three do?" asked Chao Gai. "What are their names, and where do they live?"
"They are brothers, and they live in the village of Stone Tablet near Liangshan Marsh in Jizhou Prefecture. They are fishermen, though they've also done a bit of smuggling in the marsh. Their family name is Ruan. Second Brother is known as Ferocious Giant. Fifth Brother is called Recklessly Rash. Seventh Brother is nicknamed the Devil Incarnate. I once lived in their village a number of years and I got to know them. Although they haven't had any education, they're very loyal to their friends, and are good bold fellows, so we became quite close. I haven't seen them in over two years. If we can get those three, our big project is a sure thing."
"I've heard of the three Ruan brothers but we've never met. Stone Tablet is only about a hundred //from here. Why not send someone to invite them for a talk?"
"They'd never come. I'd better go myself and use this slick tongue of mine to persuade them to join us."
"An excellent idea! When will you go?"
"There's no time to waste. If I leave tonight at the third watch I'll get there tomorrow before noon."
"Fine."
Chao Gai instructed a vassal to bring food and wine.
"I've been from the Northern Capital to the Eastern Capital but I don't know which route the birthday convoy will follow," said Wu Yong. "Could we trouble brother Liu to go to the Northern Capital soon and find out exactly when it will set forth and along what roads it will travel?"
"I'll leave tonight," said Liu Tang.
"Not so fast," said Wu Yong. "The birthday is on the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month. Today is only the beginning of the fifth. We've still got forty or fifty days. Wait till I come back from the Ruans.' Then brother Liu can go."
"Very well," said Chao Gai. "Brother Liu can stay here in my manor."
But enough of idle chatter. They drank for some time. At the third watch Wu Yong rose, washed, rinsed his mouth, had an early breakfast, concealed some silver on his person and put on his straw sandals. Chao Gai and Liu Tang saw him to the manor gate. Wu Yong travelled all night and arrived in Stone Tablet well before noon.
Since he knew the place, he didn't have to ask but went directly to the home of Second Brother. The mooring lines of a few small fishing boats were tied to a post near the water's edge. A torn net was drying on a spindly fence. Between the bank and the hill slope stood ten or so thatched cottages.
Wu Yong approached and called: "Is Second Brother at home?"

Second Brother Ruan at once came out, a torn towel cloth binding his head, and wearing old clothes. He was barefoot. When he saw Wu Yong he hastily hailed him respectfully.
"Teacher," he cried. "What good wind blows you here?"
"There is a small matter I've come specially to see Second Brother about."
"What is it? Tell me."
"It's been two years since I left this village. I am now a tutor in the home of a man of wealth. He is going to give a banquet and wants about a dozen golden carp of fourteen or fifteen catties each. I need your help."
Second Brother laughed. "Let's have a few cups of wine together first."
"That's why I've come!"
"There are a few taverns on the other side of the lake. I'll row you across."
"Good. I'd like to speak to Fifth Brother, too. Do you know whether he's home?"
"Let's go see."
They went down to the shore and untied one of the small boats from the post. Second Brother helped Wu Yong in, then took an oar that was lying beneath a tree and commenced sculling.
As they were moving out onto the lake, Second Brother suddenly waved his hand and called: "Ho, Seventh, have you seen Fifth?"
Only then did Wu Yong observe the small boat gliding out of the reeds. Seventh Brother was shaded from the sun by a black straw hat with a wide brim. He wore a checkered cloth vest and an apron of homespun. Still sculling, the younger man replied: "What do you want him for?"
"Seventh Brother," Wu Yong shouted, "I've come to talk with you three."
"Why, It's you, Teacher! Forgive me for not recognizing you. We haven't seen you in ages!"
"Come have a few drinks with Second Brother and me."
"I've been longing to drink with you, Teacher. It's just that I haven't had the chance."
One closely following the other, the two craft glided across the lake. Soon they arrived at a high bank surrounded by water, on which stood seven or eight thatched cottages.
"Mother," called Second Brother. "Is Fifth Brother at home?"
"Who knows where he is," the woman replied. "He doesn't fish but just gambles everyday till he hasn't a penny to his name. Now he's begged the hairpins from my head to bet them in his games."
Second Brother laughed and rowed away. Seventh Brother shouted from the boat behind: "I don't know why he always loses. His luck must be bad. And he's not the only one who doesn't win. I've been cleaned out, too."
Wu Yong thought: "That fits in with my plans perfectly."
The boats headed for Stone Tablet's market centre. After an hour or so, they came within sight of a single plank bridge. Beside it, a man carrying two strings of copper cash was untying a boat.
"It's Fifth Brother," Second Brother exclaimed.
A tattered bandanna tilted rakishly on his head, a pomegranate flower tucked behind his ear, Fifth Brother wore an old tunic open to reveal the blue panther tattooed on his chest. His plain trousers were tied at the waist by a checkered towel.
Wu Yong hailed him: "Fifth Brother, did you win?"
"Well, if it isn't Teacher! It's a good two years since we met. I've been watching your boats from the bridge."
"We went to your house first," Second Brother explained. "Mother said you'd gone into town to gamble. So we came here. Let's take Teacher to that tavern overlooking the water."
Fifth Brother untied his boat and jumped in. He grabbed his oar and, with one sweep, propelled it in line behind the other two.
Not long after, they arrived at a pavilion beside a cove of lotus flowers. They moored their craft and helped Wu Yong up the bank to the tavern. In a room facing the lake, they selected a red-lacquered table with red-lacquered benches.
"Please forgive the crudeness of us three brothers, Teacher," said Second Brother, "and sit at the head of the table."
"Oh, I couldn't do that," said Wu Yong.
"Then you sit there, brother, and let Teacher have the guest's seat," cried Seventh. "Fifth and I will sit down first."
"Seventh Brother is still impetuous," said Wu Yong.
The four took their places at the table, and ordered a bucket of wine. A waiter brought four large bowls, four pairs of chopsticks, and four vegetable dishes plus the wine bucket, and set them out on the table.
"Any meat to go with the wine?" asked Seventh.
"Beef from a freshly slaughtered ox," said the waiter. "Tender as sponge cake!"
"We'll have ten catties, cut in large slices," said Second.
"Don't laugh at our simple fare, Teacher," said Fifth. "We're not dining you properly."
"It's I who must beg forgiveness, for putting you to so much trouble."
"Please say no more about it," Second said. He told the waiter to pour the wine. By then two big platters of sliced meat had been placed on the table, and the Ruan brothers urged Wu Yong to try it.
He consumed several slices. When he could eat no more, his hosts tore into the remainder like ravening wolves and tigers, and demolished large quantities.
"What brings you here, Teacher?" Fifth finally asked.
"Teacher is now a tutor in a wealthy family," said Second. "He needs a dozen golden carp weighing about fifteen catties each, and he's made this trip specially to ask our help."
"Ordinarily, we could get you forty or fifty of that weight without any trouble, to say nothing of a dozen," said Seventh, "but today even ten-catty carp are hard to come by."
"You've travelled a long way, Teacher," said Fifth. "We might manage a dozen or so five- or six-catty carp."
"I've brought some silver. The price doesn't matter," said Wu Yong. "But I can't use small fish. They must be the fourteen- or fifteen-catty size."
"There's no place we can get them, Teacher," said Seventh. "We can't even guarantee the five- or six-catty kind Fifth has promised. It may take us several days. I've a bucket of small live fish in my boat. Let's eat some of those while we're here."
He went down to the boat and got the fish. They weighed a total of some six or seven catties. Seventh took them to the kitchen and cooked them himself. He brought them in three platters and placed them on the table.
"Try some of this, Teacher."
The four of them ate for a time. Gradually, the sky darkened.
"I can't talk openly in this tavern," thought Wu Yong. "I'll have to spend the night with one of them. We'll see what happens then."
"It's getting late," said Second. "Stay at my house tonight, Teacher. We can discuss this some more tomorrow."
"Coming here hasn't been easy for me," said Wu Yong, "but now, fortunately, we all are together. I can see you're not going to let me pay for this meal but I'll be spending the night at Second Brother's, and I've brought a little silver. Could I trouble you to buy a jug of wine and some meat in this tavern, and a brace of chickens in the village? Tonight, we'll get drunk together. How about it?"
"We can't let you pay, Teacher!" said Second. "We brothers will take care of it. Don't think we can't manage."
"This has to be my treat," said Wu Yong. "If you don't let me pay, I'm leaving."
"All right, Teacher, if you insist, we'll eat with you gladly," said Seventh. "We'll see about next time."
"Brother Seventh is straight and to the point," Wu Yong commended. He gave him an ounce of silver and told him to borrow a big jug from the tavern keeper and fill it with wine, and to buy also twenty catties of fresh and cooked beef and a couple of fat chickens.
"Take what I owe you out of that, too," said Second.
"Fine, fine," said the tavern keeper.
The four men left the tavern, went down to the boats, stored the meat and wine in the cabins, untied the mooring ropes and rowed to Second's house. In front of the door they stepped onto the bank and wound the ropes around the post, then took the meat and wine to the rear and sat down. Second called for a lamp. He was the only one of the three brothers who had a wife. Neither Fifth nor Seventh were married.
Host and guests sat in a rear pavilion overlooking the water. Seventh slaughtered the chickens and told his sister-in-law and the little boy she and Second had adopted to cook them. By the first watch, the wine and food were all on the table.
At Wu Yong's urging, he and the brothers drank several rounds. Again he raised the question of buying fish. "How is it you don't have the size I want in a big area like this?"
"To tell you the truth, Teacher, only Liangshan Marsh has fish that size," replied Second. "Our Stone Tablet Lake is small and narrow. It can't produce big carp."
"But it's not far from here to the marsh, and the two lakes are connected. Why not go there?"
Second breathed out heavily. "Don't ask!"
"Why do you sigh, brother?" Wu Yong queried.
"You don't know what's happened, Teacher," Fifth put in. "Our whole livelihood depends on Liangshan Marsh but we don't dare go."
"Surely the magistrate can't stop you from fishing in a place that size?"
"Magistrate! If he were the King of Hell himself he couldn't stop us!"
"Then why are you afraid to go?"
"You haven't heard? We'll explain."
"I haven't heard a thing."
"It's painful to relate," interjected Seventh, "but a gang of robbers has taken over the marsh, and they don't allow any fishing."
"I had no idea there were robbers there," said Wu Yong. "We haven't heard anything about it at my place."
"Their head is a man who failed in his civil service examinations," said Second. "His name is Wang Lun, and he's called the White-Clad Scholar. Second in command is Skyscraper Du Qian. Third is Guardian of the Clouds Song Wan. Below them is Zhu Gui, the Dry-Land Crocodile, who runs a tavern at the Lijia Entry as a blind for gathering information. He doesn't matter much. But now they've got a new lieutenant, a bold fellow who was a drill instructor in the Imperial Guards in the Eastern Capital—Panther Head Lin Chong. He's first rate with weapons. These men lead a band of six or seven hundred robbers who loot homes and waylay travellers. We haven't gone to the marsh to fish for over a year. They've sewed it up tight, and cut off our main source of income. It hurts us to even talk about it!"
"This is news to me," said Wu Yong. "Why don't the authorities come and capture them?"
"All the authorities know how to do is to disturb and hurt the people," said Fifth. "The first thing they do when they come into the countryside is to eat all the villagers' pigs and sheep and chickens and ducks. You have to pay them to get them to leave. A fat lot of use those knaves would be against the brigands! And as for the police, they wouldn't dare come. They'd shit in their pants if the authorities ordered them to arrest the robbers. They'd be scared to even look at one!"
"We can't catch any big fish, this way," said Second, "but at least we avoid paying taxes and doing forced labour."
"So," said Wu Yong. "Quite a happy life for those outlaws!"
"They fear neither Heaven nor Earth, nor the authorities, either," said Fifth. "Money, fine clothes, wine and meat—they share and share alike. Why shouldn't they be happy? We three brothers are wasting our talents. If only we could be like them!"
Wu Young was inwardly very pleased. "That fits in perfectly with my plans," he mused.
"Man lives only his given span, grass must die in autumn," said Seventh. "We spend our lives catching fish. If we could be like them for just one day, we would be content!"
"Who wants to be like them?" scoffed Wu Yong. "All they do is commit crimes punishable with fifty to seventy strokes of the bamboo. They're frittering away their valor. If they're caught and imprisoned, they've only themselves to blame."
"The authorities can't do anything about it. They're stupid blockheads," said Second. "Thousands of men who've committed towering crimes are wandering around free as air! We brothers are unhappy with our lot. We'd leave here gladly if we could find someone to lead us."
"We've often thought," said Fifth, "we're not less capable than others. But who recognizes our worth?"
"If there was someone who did, would you really be willing to go?" queried Wu Yong.
"We'd go through fire and water," Seventh assured him. "If we could be happy for a single day, we'd die smiling!"
"These three definitely have something in mind," thought Wu Yong. "I'll gradually draw them out."
He pressed the brothers to quaff another few rounds of wine.
"Would you have the courage to go into the marsh and capture those robbers?" he queried.
"Even if we could, who would we ask for the reward?" said Seventh. "Besides, gallant men everywhere would scorn us."
"I have a little idea," said Wu Yong. "If you're fed up with not being able to fish, why not join the outlaw gang?"
"We talked about that several times, Teacher," said Second. "But we've heard that the men under Wang Lun the White-Clad Scholar all say he's narrow and stingy. He doesn't make proper use of people. He gave Lin Chong, that Eastern Capital drill instructor, a hard time when he first arrived. Wang Lun is very fussy about who he takes on. Since that's the way things are, we've lost interest."
"It would be different if he was as big-hearted and as fond of us as you, Teacher," said Seventh.
"In that case we would have gone there long ago. If Wang Lun were like you, we wouldn't be here today," said Fifth. "We'd die for him without a qualm."
"I don't deserve such praise. In Shandong and Hebei today there are plenty of bold gallants you could join."
"No doubt there are," said Second. "But we brothers have never met them."
"What about Ward Chief Chao? Do you know him? He's right here in Yuncheng County, in East Bank."
"You mean Chao Gai, the Tower-Shifting Heavenly King?" said Fifth.
"That's the man."
"We know of him, of course," said Seventh. "But though we live only a hundred li away, we haven't been fortunate enough to meet him."
"How is that? Such a righteous, generous man."
"We've never had any reason to go to East Bank," said Second.
"These last few years I've been teaching in a village school near his manor," said Wu Yong. "I hear he's expecting a very valuable shipment. I've come specially to ask whether you'd be willing to join me in snatching it on the way."
"No," said Fifth. "Since he's a noble and charitable person, we wouldn't damage his affairs. The whole fraternity of gallant men would laugh at us."
"I didn't realize you brothers were so firmly principled. Your spirit is noble! I'll tell you the real story, if you're willing to help. I am now living in Chao's manor. Your fame has reached him, and he's sent me here to talk with you."
"We three are completely honest," said Second. "If the ward chief has sent you about some important private business where we can be of use, we pledge our help with our lives! On the dregs of this wine we swear it! May disaster strike us, may we die of horrible disease, if we speak false!"
Fifth and Seventh clapped their hands to the backs of their necks. "We sell this column of hot blood to the man who appreciates its worth," they exclaimed.
"I assure you I don't want to induce you to do anything bad," said Wu Yong. "This is something big! Cai, the Premier in the Eastern Capital, will celebrate his birthday on the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month. His son-in-law, Liang, the Governor of Daming, the Northern Capital, has spent a hundred thousand strings of cash on birthday gifts of gold and jewels. A brave fellow called Liu Tang just brought us the news. I've been asked to invite you to a conference, to plan how, with a few gallant men, we can waylay the convoy in some mountain hollow, take their misbegotten treasure! and enjoy ourselves for the rest of our lives. I had to pretend I wanted to buy fish so as to find a chance to invite you for a talk. Does the idea appeal to you?"
"Marvellous!" exclaimed Fifth. He turned to Seventh. "What did I tell you!"
Seventh leaped to his feet. "Just what I've been hoping for all my life! This scratches me where I itch! When do we start?"

"We'll leave for Ward Chief Chao's manor tomorrow at the fifth watch."
The three brothers were delighted.
The night passed. Early the next morning, the men rose and had breakfast. They gave a few words of instructions to their families and set out from Stone Tablet with Wu Yong for East Bank. They walked all day, and finally came in sight of Chao Manor. The ward chief and Liu Tang were waiting outside beneath a green locust tree. When Wu Yong led the three brothers forward, Chao and Liu greeted them warmly.
"The eminent Ruan brothers," cried the ward chief, "I see you're entirely deserving of your fame! Let's talk inside."
The six men entered the manor, went to a rear hall, and took their seats as host and guests. Wu Yong reported. Chao was extremely pleased. He instructed his vassals to slaughter a pig and a sheep and prepare sacrificial paper ingots.
Chao presented so noble a mien, he spoke so freely, that the three brothers were moved to say: "Our greatest pleasure is meeting gallant men, and here you were, all along! To think we might not have had the chance of meeting you if Wu Yong hadn't brought us here!" They were clearly overjoyed.
All ate and chatted half the night. At dawn the next day they rose and went to the rear hall. Laid out before it were gold paper coins and paper horses, incense and candles, the pig and sheep which had been cooked the previous night, and paper replicas of silver ingots. The others were happy to see that Chao was so sincere.
Together they made this solemn vow. "Governor Liang in the Northern Capital harms the people. With the money he has extorted from them he has bought gifts to send to Cai, the Premier in the Eastern Capital, on his birthday. This is evilly obtained wealth. If any of us six has any selfish intent, let Heaven and Earth obliterate him! May the gods be our witness!"
After taking their oath, they burned the paper money.
They ended the ceremony and drank. A vassal entered.
"There is a Taoist priest at the gate who wants to see the ward chief about a grain contribution."
"How can you be so tactless?" Chao berated him. "Can't you see I'm drinking here with guests? Give him four or five measures of rice and be done with it. Why bother me?"
"I've already offered him rice but he won't take it. He wants to see you."
"He probably thinks it's not enough. Give him two or three pecks. Tell him the ward chief is drinking with guests and has no time."
The vassal departed. A few minutes later her returned.
"I've offered the priest three pecks of rice but he refuses to leave. He says he's an honest Taoist, that he hasn't come for any handouts but to see you."
"You don't know how to talk to him. Tell him I have no time for him today, to come another time and I'll invite him to tea."
"I did that but the priest said: 'I haven't come for money or grain but because I've heard the ward chief is a man of chivalry. I'm very eager to meet him.' "
"What a nuisance you are! Why can't you take care of this! If he's still not satisfied with the amount of grain, give him three or four pecks more. Don't keep asking me about it. I'd see him if I weren't entertaining. Why not? But now, get rid of him, and don't trouble me again."
The vassal hadn't been gone very long, when an uproar was heard outside the manor gate. Another vassal rushed in and reported: "That priest is in a rage. He's knocked down ten of our fellows!"
Startled, Chao Gai hastily rose to his feet. "Excuse me a moment, brothers," he said. "I'd better see about this." He left the hall and went out to the gate.
There, under the green locust tree, a handsome, powerful but strange-looking priest was fighting off his attackers. "You don't know a good man when you see him!" he was shouting.
"Cool down, sir priest," Chao called. "You came asking for Ward Chief Chao, apparently wanting a contribution. They gave you rice. Why get into such a temper?"
The priest laughed. "I'm not interested in grain or money. A hundred thousand strings of cash means nothing to me. I'm seeking the ward chief because I've something to tell him. These churls wouldn't listen to reason, and began swearing at me. That's why I blew up."
"Do you know the ward chief?"
"I've heard of him. But we've never met."
"I am that humble person. What did you want to tell me, sir priest?"
"I beg your pardon, Ward Chief. Please accept my greetings."
"You're most courteous. Won't you come into the manor and have some tea?"
"Thank you very much."
The two entered the manor. When Wu Yong and the others saw the priest approaching, they quietly slipped out of sight.
Chao Gai led the priest to the rear hall. After sipping tea for a while, the priest said: "This isn't a good place to talk. Is there somewhere else we could go?"
The ward chief took him to a small room, and again they seated themselves as host and guest. "May I ask your name, sir, and where you are from?" queried Chao.
"My family name is Gongsun, my given name Sheng. In the Taoist order I am called Yi Qing—Single Purity. I was born in Jizhou Prefecture. Since childhood I have loved playing with weapons, and have become quite skilled in many of them, so people call me Gentleman Gongsun Sheng. I have also studied Taoist lore. Because I can summon the wind and bring the rain, ride the mists and drive the clouds, in the fraternity of gallant men I'm nicknamed Dragon in the Clouds. I have long known of the eminent Ward Chief Chao of East Bank, Yuncheng County but I've never had the good fortune of meeting you. In honour of making your acquaintance, and by way of introducing myself, I would like to present you with a hundred thousand strings of cash worth of gold and jewels. I wonder whether the Ward Chief would accept?"
Chao laughed. "You mean the shipment of birthday gifts from the Northern Capital?"
The priest was astonished. "How did you know?"
"I just guessed. I gather we're talking about the same thing?"
"A real treasure! This is too good an opportunity to miss. 'If you fail to take when you've got the chance, don't bemoan it later,' as the old saying goes. How does the idea strike you, Ward Chief?"
At that moment a man dashed into the room and grabbed Gongsun by the front of his robe. "A fine thing!" the man shouted. "You defy the laws of the emperor and the gods. How dare you hatch such schemes? I've been listening for a long time!" Gongsun's face turned the colour of clay. Truly, before his plan was formed, someone outside the window heard everything, and could have brought disaster down upon him. Who, after all, was the man who seized Gongsun?

Wu Yong, so the story tells, continued as follows: "Here is what I have been thinking: I know of three good men, brave and true, exceptionally talented in martial arts, the sort who'd go through fire or water for you, share life or death. If we can get them, we can certainly bring this affair to a satisfactory conclusion."
"Who are they? What are their names and where do they live?" said Chao Gai.
"They are three brothers and they live in Stonetable, a village near Mount Liang in Jizhou. Their official occupation is fishing but they also indulge in a little 'unofficial' business in the marshes. Their name is Ruan. There's Ruan the Second, also known as the Battle-God, Ruan the Fifth, known as Devil-may-care, and Ruan the Seventh, whom people call Yama,[1] and they're real brothers. I lived in the district for a while some years ago, that's how I know them; and I can say that, although they haven't much formal education, they're absolutely to be relied on as friends. Yes, they're splendid people and I used to spend a lot of time with them, though it's about two years now since last I saw them. If we can get those three, the matter is as good as settled."
"I have heard of these three Ruan brothers," said Chao Gai, "but I've never met them. Stonetable is less than thirty miles from here; why don't we send someone to ask them to come and discuss matters?"
"They won't come if we send just anyone. I'd better go myself. I shall use all my powers of persuasion to get them to join us."
"Good idea," said Chao Gai, delighted with this. "When can you go?"
"We shouldn't delay. I'll start tonight. I should be there by tomorrow morning."
"Excellent!" said Chao Gai, and he ordered the servants to arrange a banquet.
"I know the journey from the Northern Capital to the Eastern Capital," said Wu Yong. "The only thing is, we don't know which road the convoy is going to take. We'll have to trouble our young friend here — I'm sorry about the inconvenience — to go back tonight and make inquiries along the North Road to see if he can find out what day they are starting and which route they plan to use."
"I'll do it right away," Liu Tang said.
"No, wait a minute," said Wu Yong. "The birthday is the fifteenth of the sixth month. We're only at the beginning of the fifth month. There's still more than forty days left. Wait till I've been to talk to the Ruan brothers. There's no need to go till then."
"All right," said Chao Gai. "In the meantime young Liu will stay here with me."
Enough of this.
That day they ate and drank at their leisure, and the following night Wu Yong rose around midnight, washed and rinsed his mouth, breakfasted, got some money which he concealed about his person, and put on straw sandals. The other two saw him to the manor gate. Under cover of darkness, he set off for Stonetable. By noon the following day, he had arrived at his destination:
Richly forested hills stretching away into the blue distance: thick groves of mulberry, food for the silkworms. On all sides moving water surrounds the isolated village. Thin clumps of bamboo line the pathways. Thatched cottages stand on the edge of a gorge and there is a wood with old trees. On the outskirts a sign hangs high over the inn. Fishing boats are moored under the willows.
Since he knew the place, Wu Yong had no need to ask directions. On arriving in the village he went straight to the home of Ruan the Second. Stopping in front of the gate, he saw a number of small fishing boats moored to a dead tree, a broken fishing net spread out to dry in the sun, and ten or so thatched buildings nestling between the hillside and the water. He called out: "Is Ruan the Second at home?" Immediately Ruan the Second appeared, wearing a ragged cloth on his head, dressed in old clothes and without shoes:
Face round as a purse, jutting brows, a sensitive mouth; he's quick and expert in self-defence. His chest is covered with yellowish hair, his shoulders are like two transverse beams. His arms can exert a hundred kilos' pressure. His eyes give out a strong cold beam. This is no simple fisherman, you'd say but rather a Mars among men.
When he saw it was Wu Yong, Ruan the Second immediately shouted out a salute. "Professor! It's good to see you! What wind blows you here?"
"I have a little matter which I want to discuss with you," Wu Yong answered.
"What is it? You can speak openly."
"It's about two years, isn't it, since I left here? Well, now I'm engaged to a wealthy family as tutor and they are organizing a banquet. They need ten carp of fourteen or fifteen catties. That's the reason they've sent me here to see you."
Ruan the Second smiled in reply, and said, "We'll have a few cups together first, then we'll talk business."
"That's the other reason why I came, to have a drink with you."
"There are several inns on the other side of the lake. We'll row across."
"Good. I'd like to see Ruan the Fifth as well, do you think he's at home?"
"We can go and see."
They walked down to the lakeside and Ruan the Second untied one of the boats moored to the dead tree. He helped Wu Yong into the boat. Then he took an oar which was leaning against the roots of the tree and shoved off. Soon they were out in the middle of the lake. As he rowed, Ruan the Second suddenly gave a shout: "Hey, Seventh! Have you seen Fifth?" Wu Yong saw the reeds part and a small boat appeared. Here's what the man in it looked like:
His spotty face is marked with all manner of strange lumps and warts. His eyes are striking. His cheeks are covered by short whiskers of a yellowish tinge, his body is blackish as if made from iron, or you might even think it was cast in bronze. He seems like an earthly embodiment of the five planets. This is why men call him "Yama."
It was Ruan the Seventh in the boat. He was wearing a broad-brimmed black hat as protection from the sun and a check shirt held in at the waist by a cloth belt. As he rowed towards them, he shouted: "What do you want him for?"
"Hallo there, Seventh!" Wu Yong shouted back. "I've come to see you. I want to have a word with you all."
"Oh, Professor! I beg your pardon. What a long time it is since we saw you last!"
"Let's go and drink some wine together," Wu Yong replied.
"That's just what I was going to suggest. Why don't you come and see us more often?"
The two boats glided together over the lake, till quite soon they came to a place in the middle of the water where there were seven or eight thatched huts above a tall jetty. Ruan the Second called out: "Auntie, is Ruan the Fifth there?"
"Is it likely?" came the answer. "He doesn't even fish now, all day long he's off gambling. He goes on till he hasn't a penny left. And then he goes and takes my comb and loses that as well."
Ruan the Second gave a laugh and started to row again. Ruan the Seventh, in the boat behind, said: "I don't know why it is but Elder Brother loses all the time. He has real bad luck. And it's not only him. I always get fleeced too!"
"This plays right into my hands," Wu Yong thought to himself.
The two boats now set off for Stonetable. They rowed for a long time, till they saw a man holding two strings of copper cash, standing beside a bridge made from a single plank. He came down to meet the boats:
His hands are strong as iron bars, his eyes are like bells. Although there is some humour in his expression, his brow is stern. When calamity strikes he can overcome disasters. From a blow of his fist the lion quails, his kick is deadly as the cobra's bite. If it's someone to create havoc you need, he's the one. That's why men call him "Devil-may-care."
"There's Fifth Brother," said Ruan the Second. Ruan the Fifth wore a ragged cloth set awry on his head, a pomegranate flower stuck above his ear, an old tunic full of holes, through which you could see the blue tattoo on his chest representing a leopard, rolled up trousers and a check apron on top.
"Hey there!" Wu Yong shouted. "Ruan the Fifth! Have you won anything?"
"Why it's the Professor!" Ruan the Fifth exclaimed. "We haven't seen you for two years or more. I was watching you people for a long time, up there on the bridge."
"The Professor and I went to your house to look for you," said Ruan the Second. "Your old woman said you'd gone into town to gamble, so we came here. We're all going to the pavilion by the water to drink a few cups."
Ruan the Fifth quickly returned to the bridge and untied a small boat. He jumped in, seized the oars, and they all started rowing.
In a while the little flotilla reached a water-lily-filled creek at the foot of a pavilion. They helped Wu Yong out onto the bank. They entered the inn and chose a red-lacquered table close to the water. "Professor, you must take the place of honour," said Ruan the Second. "And please forgive our rough and ready manners."
"No, no, of course I won't sit there," said Wu Yong.
"Brother, you take the host's place and let the Professor be the honoured guest," said Ruan the Seventh. "Fifth Brother and I will sit down first."
"Ruan the Seventh isn't one to waste time!" said Wu Yong.
They all sat down and a jug of wine was ordered from the landlord. The waiter laid out four cups, four sets of chopsticks and four plates of assorted vegetables, and poured the wine.
"What have you got to eat?" asked Ruan the Second.
"There's some fresh buffalo," said the waiter. "The meat's as fat and tender as fruit cake."
"Bring us ten catties in good thick slices," Ruan the Second said.
"Professor, this is no way good enough for you but please don't despise our hospitality," said Ruan the Fifth.
"On the contrary, I'm giving you far too much trouble."
Ruan the Second said, "Absolutely not," and told the waiter to hurry up and pour the wine. Soon there were two plates of sliced buffalo meat on the table before them and the brothers pressed Wu Yong to eat. He took a few slices but that was enough for him. Immediately the three brothers fell on the food like wolves and tigers.
After a while, Ruan the Fifth spoke again: "May I inquire what your business is here, Professor?"
Ruan the Second said quickly: "The Professor is working as tutor in a rich man's family, at the moment. He's come to order ten carp that he wants to be fourteen or fifteen catties. That's what he's come to us for."
"Normally we'd have been able to get thirty of forty like that," said Ruan the Seventh, "not just ten. So even if you'd asked for more, we could have delivered the goods. But nowadays it's difficult to find even one of ten catties!"
"The Professor's come a long way," said Ruan the Fifth. "We must promise to find him ten carp of five or six catties."
"I've got plenty of money to pay for them," said Wu Yong. "I'll give you the price you ask. Only small ones just won't do. They've got to be fourteen or fifteen catties."
"Professor, there's nowhere we can get them. Even fish of five or six catties like Fifth Brother was talking about are hard to come by, and it might take days to get them. But, anyway, there's a bucket of whitebait in my boat. I'll get those and we'll eat them now." He went and got the fish, five or six catties in all, and took them to the kitchen to cook them himself. They made a good three plates that he brought and placed on the table. "I'm sorry it's not better but do please try some, Professor," he said.
So the four of them ate again, and continued eating for some time. Soon the daylight began to fade. Wu Yong thought to himself: "It's not very convenient to talk in this inn. They'll want me to stay the night, so I'll wait till then before I bring the matter up."

"It's getting dark now," said Ruan the Second. "Please stay the night with me, Professor, and we can come to an agreement tomorrow."
"It wasn't at all easy for me to get here," said Wu Yong, "and I'm very glad I was able to find you. I know you're not going to allow me to pay for this feast but if I'm to stay with Ruan the Second tonight, and seeing that I've some money with me, let me ask you to purchase a jug of wine here and some meat, and to procure a pair of chickens in the village, and we'll celebrate together this evening. What do you say?"
"We can't let you spend your money, Professor!" said Ruan the Second. "We shall arrange it ourselves but please don't be offended if we can't offer you very much."
"But I came here with the specific intention of inviting you," said Wu Yong. "If you don't accept, I shall have to leave."
"Since you put it like that, Professor, we'll accept dinner from you but after that, we'll see," said Ruan the Seventh.
"Ruan the Seventh comes straight to the point again," said Wu Yong, taking out some silver and handing it to him. The landlord, asked to provide a good supply of wine, produced a big pitcher and they also bought twenty catties of fresh roast beef and a pair of fat chickens.
"I'll pay for the wine together with the rest," Ruan the Second told the landlord. "That'll be perfectly all right," said the latter.
When they left the inn and got into their boats they stowed the provisions in the hold. They cast off and started rowing, heading straight for Ruan the Second's house. Arriving there, they jumped out onto the bank and tied the boats to the same dead tree as before. They carried the provisions up into an inner room and seated themselves. The lamps were lit.
Ruan the Second happened to be the only one of the three brothers who had started a family, Ruan the Fifth and Seventh being unmarried. So while they all sat there in a little pavilion over the water at the back of Ruan the Second's, Ruan the Seventh killed the chickens and asked his sister-in-law and their young lad to prepare them in the kitchen. Some time after seven o'clock the food and drink was on the table. Wu Yong gave them a few toasts and then raised the subject of fish again. "This is such a big lake you've got here, I just don't understand why there aren't any big fish."
"To tell you the truth, Professor, the big fish can only be found in the lake at Mount Liang, nowhere else. This Stonetable lake isn't big enough, it can't support really big fish."
"But we're not so far from Mount Liang, and the lakes are connected, why don't you go and try fishing there?"
Ruan the Second sighed. "Forget it!" he said.
"Why do you sigh like that?"
"Professor," said Ruan the Fifth, "you don't know what's been happening. The Mount Liang lake used to be our rice-bowl but now we daren't go there any more!"
"Surely you'd get away with fishing in a lake of that size, even if it is officially prohibited," said Wu Yong.
"Officially prohibited? Who cares about that?" said Ruan the Fifth. "The Prince of Hell wouldn't stop us fishing there if we had a mind to!"
"Well, if you're not worried about the authorities, what stops you from going there?"
"Obviously you don't know about it, so we'd better tell you," said Ruan the Fifth.
"I don't understand at all."
Ruan the Seventh started to explain: "The Mount Liang area is a disaster for us! Nowadays a band of robbers have taken it over, and they won't let anyone fish there."
"I didn't know about this. I wonder why I hadn't heard about there being robbers there now."
"The leader of that lot is a failed graduate called Wang Lun, or the Failed Scholar," said Ruan the Second. "The second-in- command is Du Qian, known as the Skyscraper, and the third is Song Wan, or the Door-god in the Clouds. Down at the bottom of the mountain there's another called Zhu Gui, the Dry Land Crocodile, who keeps an inn on the road to Leeside and whose job is to keep watch but he doesn't give us any trouble. And just recently they've been joined by a real hero, an ex-instructor of the palace guard in the Eastern Capital, a certain Leopard's Head Lin Chong, who's a tremendously good fighter. These bandits have put together an army of six or seven hundred and rampage around destroying houses and robbing cottages, way-laying and pillaging travellers. We haven't been there to fish for a year now. That lake is cut off, and we've lost a principal source of our livelihood. As you see, it's quite a story."
"I had no idea things had come to such a pass," Wu Yong said. "But why don't the authorities send out a force to capture them?"
"Well, the fact is that every time the troops stir themselves the people suffer still more. If there's the slightest rumour that the brigands have descended on a village, they come and take away honest people's pigs, sheep, chickens and geese to feed them- selves. And you have to pay them off to get rid of them! So what can we possibly do against the brigands? Those who are responsible for suppressing them, well you won't find them showing their faces round the villages. When their superiors order them out to arrest someone, they're so scared they shit themselves! The idea of meeting the enemy face to face certainly doesn't appeal to them!"
"Well, we don't catch any big fish, it's true," said Ruan the Second, "but at least we manage to avoid being taxed or conscripted."
"It sounds as if those rascals have a fine old time of it," said Wu Yong.
"They've nothing to fear from heaven or earth," said Ruan the Fifth, "least of all the police. They count their wealth in pounds and ounces, dress in the finest silks and satins, drink from a full pitcher and eat huge roasts, of course they have a fine time. But us three, we're only good for one thing. How can we imitate them?"
Secretly Wu Yong was thinking, "This really fits in with my plans."
Ruan the Seventh exclaimed: "Like they say, a blade of grass only lasts one season, a man has just one lifetime; we can still get by with fishing, true enough but if only we could get to live like them!"
"What do you want to be like them for? Don't forget that occupation of theirs is not just petty crime that can be paid for by fifty or sixty strokes of the cane. You could be throwing away your precious lives! And if you were taken, you'd have only yourselves to thank."
"At present the relevant authorities are absolutely useless," said Ruan the Second. "They're a bunch of imbeciles. People who commit major crimes, hundreds and thousands of times, get off scot-free. People like us are given no peace. If there was someone who wanted to take us along, we'd go with him like a shot!"
"I've often thought," began Ruan the Fifth, "that we three have talents that aren't inferior to other people's, only no one appreciates them!"
"If someone did know how to appreciate you, what would you do?" asked Wu Yong.
"If that were the case," said Ruan the Seventh, "we'd go through water, we'd go through fire with him! If some great enterprise were available to us, within our grasp for just one day, then we'd die happy!"
In his heart, Wu Yong rejoiced: "The idea has taken. Now I must gradually work them round."

Know now that evil takes a tortuous path;
Heaven sends a baleful planet down to earth.
And see how in times to come the Ruans three
Will share the convoy's ill-gained wealth as fee.

He urged them to drink two more cups, and then said: "Would you dare go to Mount Liang and capture the bandits?"
"Suppose we did," said Ruan the Seventh, "how could we go and ask for the reward? We'd be a laughing-stock among all the heroes of the rivers and lakes."
"Maybe I'm wrong," said Wu Yong, "but if you really can't bear to go on as fishermen, wouldn't it then be best to go and join the robbers?"
"Professor, if you only knew how many times we've considered that idea already!" said Ruan the Second. "But we've heard from his subordinates that Wang Lun is a mean and narrow-minded type. He's suspicious of others. When Lin Chong first went there it put him in a terrible state. The lousy bugger just doesn't take to newcomers. So seeing as that's the way it is, we didn't feel like trying."
Ruan the Seventh said: "If that lot were as generous as you, Professor, if they could only be friendly, then it would be fine."
"That's right," said Ruan the Fifth, "if they would show us the same kind of generous regard as you do, Professor, we'd have joined them long ago, we wouldn't have waited till today. And we'd willingly give our lives for them!"
"Oh, come, there's no need to talk of me," said Wu Yong. "These days there are such numbers of brave, generous-hearted gentlemen everywhere, in Shandong and in Hebei."
"Perhaps there are," said Ruan the Second, "but we haven't met them!"
"Mr. Chao, for instance, of East Riverside in Yuncheng, haven't you ever met him?"
"Would that be Chao Gai, whom they call the Pagoda-Lifter?" said Ruan the Fifth.
"The very same."
"Although it's only thirty miles from here, we only know him by reputation, unfortunately our paths have never crossed." said Ruan the Seventh.
"I'm amazed that you've never met him, he's such an upright and generous person." said Wu Yong.
"We've never had the chance to," said Ruan the Second, "because we never had any business in that area."
"I have worked for some years as village teacher near Chao Gai's estate. I heard recently that he is hoping to get his hands on an important treasure. That's what I came here to discuss with you. What do you say to the idea of laying an ambush and taking it from him ourselves?"
"Certainly not," said Ruan the Fifth. "When he's such an upright and generous man, if we put a spoke in his wheel we'd be universally condemned among the rivers and lakes."
Wu Yong said: "I was afraid you might not be so firm of purpose. But I see you are indeed full of thought for others and love of righteousness. So now I will be completely honest with you. If you think you would be willing to lend a hand, I will explain everything. I am living these days in Chao Gai's district, and when I told him your names he specifically charged me to come here and invite you for discussions."
"We really and truly are just as you see us," said Ruan the Second, "we would not try to deceive you. Can it really be that Mr. Chao has the intention of enlisting us in some important business of his, some personal venture? I can see you've gone to a lot of trouble on our behalf. If this business is on, I swear by the wine left in this jug we are ready to lay down our lives to help, may an ill fate befall us if we don't, may we be struck by plagues and death if we fail you!"
Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh both struck the backs of their necks with their hands and said: "Our hearts are eager to serve but we will only surrender them to a buyer who appreciates the goods!"
Wu Yong replied: "Listen, then, all of you, and don't think that I'm trying to trick you into something. This enterprise is something really big! On the fifteenth of the sixth month it's going to be the birthday of the imperial preceptor Cai. His daughter is married to Governor Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital, who is arranging to send his father-in-law a birthday gift of jewels and rare objects worth a hundred thousand. A gentleman named Liu Tang came specially to inform us of this. What we want now is for you to come and discuss with us the idea of getting together a group of bold spirits to lay an ambush in the mountains for this ill-gotten wealth. There's enough to make each of us happy for the rest of his days. I've been sent, under pretence of buying fish, to help us formulate a successful plan. What do you say?"
Ruan the Fifth said calmly, "Okay!", then he exclaimed: "There you are, Seventh Brother, what did I say?"
Ruan the Seventh jumped up and said: "It's just what I've always longed for! It's the answer to all my prayers! This is something which scratches where the itch is! When do we start?"
"Straight away if you like," said Wu Yong. "We'll rise at dawn tomorrow and go straight to Chao Gai's." The three Ruan brothers were in raptures. But as the poem says:

Why should the scholar want for more?
And surely fishing's a life without care?
But all because of those ill-gotten riches,
So many good men will flee to the Marshes.

The night passed. They rose early, breakfasted, and after giving instructions for the management of their homes, the three brothers together with Wu Yong left Stonetable and strode forth on the road to East Riverside. At the end of a day's journey they came in sight of Chao Gai's manor. There were Chao Gai and Liu Tang, waiting under a green sophora tree. Wu Yong brought the three Ruan brothers right to where the others were waiting, under the tree, and greetings were exchanged.
"Brothers Ruan, it's easy to see why your name has spread far and wide," Chao Gai exclaimed. "Please come inside and let us talk."
They all went to the inner hall and seated themselves according to the rules. Wu Yong repeated all that had passed between him and the brothers, to Chao Gai's great satisfaction. Chao Gai told his servants to kill pigs and sheep and prepare paper offerings. The Ruan brothers were greatly impressed with Chao Gai's commanding personality and his direct language. "We like to meet men of spirit," they said, contentedly, "and we've certainly found the right place, thanks to the Professor, without whom we'd have missed this opportunity." That night was spent in feasting and talk, and the next day at dawn they went to the hall at the back to arrange paper offerings, incense and candles, and to lay out pork and mutton from the night before. They were enor-mously pleased by Chao Gai's resolve and frankness, and each of them joined in vowing: "Governor Liang of Daming oppresses the people, extorting money and goods, in order to send a birthday present to his father-in-law, Preceptor Cai, at court. The wealth is obtained by unjustifiable means. If any one of us six should harbour any selfish design may heaven and earth swallow him up. Let our hearts be dedicated to heaven." Having sworn the oath, they all burnt paper offerings.
While the six of them were relaxing and drinking wine in the inner hall a servant came and announced: "There's a priest at the door, sir, who wishes to talk to you concerning alms."
"Don't be a fool," Chao Gai said. "You can see I've got guests. Just give him four or five litres of rice, what's the point in bothering me?"
"I gave him the rice, sir but he doesn't want it, he says he wants to talk to you."
"He obviously doesn't think it's enough. Give him two or three pounds more and say 'The master has guests today and hasn't got time to see you'."
The servant left, and was gone some time. But eventually he came back and said: "It's that priest. I've given him more rice but he still won't go away. He says he's the Master of the Pure Way and he hasn't come for money or rice but because he wants an interview with you, sir."
"Well answer him, you idiot. Tell him I really haven't got time today. Tell him to come back another day and I'll give him tea."
"That's what I told him but he said: 'I'm not after money or rice. I heard that your master is a good man, and it's him I want to see."
"You're no help at all, you moron! If it wasn't enough, all you've got to do is give him a pound or two more. Don't keep coming back to me. If I didn't have guests I'd go and deal with it myself, it's nothing to make such a fuss about. Just get rid of him and stop pestering me!"
When the servant had been gone for something like an hour, a great uproar arose at the manor gates, and another servant rushed into the room and said: "The priest is angry. He's knocked out a dozen people!"
Disturbed by this news, Chao Gai stood up hurriedly and said to his guests: "Please stay where you are. I'd better go and have a look myself."
At the front gate he found the Taoist, an immensely tall figure, with an imposing countenance and something strange about his manner, busily engaged in beating up the servants under the green sophora tree:
His hair is bound into a top-knot that then separates into two loose hanging strands. He wears a short brown robe, gathered at the waist with a multi-coloured silk sash. An old bronze sword grained like pine is slung over his back. His white feet are adorned with hemp sandals with many eyelets. In his cotton bag he carries a tortoiseshell fan. His eyebrows are slanting and his eyes almond-shaped. His mouth is surrounded by whiskers.
This gentleman was dealing out blows under the sophora tree, saying as he did so, "You people don't know who you're dealing with!" Chao Gai called out, "Calm yourself, Father! You came to see Chao Gai, presumably about alms but he's already given you rice, why are you making such a commotion?"
The priest smiled contemptuously. "I didn't come for food or money," he said. "Anyway, a hundred thousand cash would mean nothing to me. I came to see Chao Gai, I've something to tell him. But these mannerless yokels do nothing but insult me. It makes me mad!"
"Do you happen to know Chao Gai?" Chao Gai asked.
"I know of him," the other answered. "I haven't actually met him."
"Well, I am Chao Gai. What is it you want to tell me?"
"Excuse me for not recognizing you, and accept my humble greeting."
"You do me too much honour, Father. Allow me to offer you some tea in the manor."
"Many thanks."
They went inside. When Wu Yong saw the priest coming, he and Liu Tang and the three Ruan brothers made themselves scarce.
When Chao Gai offered the priest tea in an inner room the latter said: "This is not a good place for talking, isn't there anywhere else we could go?" So Chao Gai took him to a tiny pavilion, where they seated themselves formally, and Chao Gai asked, "May I presume to ask your name, Father? And where you are from?"
"I have a double-barrelled name," the priest replied. "I am Gongsun, and my original first name is just Sheng. But my religious name is Master of the Pure Way. I come from Jizhou. When I was young, in my village, I learnt to fight with the staff, and became a martial arts adept, so people sometimes call me 'Gongsun Sheng, the Master.' Then I studied Taoism, and learnt to call up wind and rain, and to ride the mists and clouds, so to all the rivers and lakes fraternity I am known as 'The Dragon-in-the-clouds.' I have long known of the famous Chao Gai of East Riverside, in Yuncheng but I hadn't as yet had the opportunity to make your acquaintance. Now, what I have to offer as a present by way of introduction is a treasure trove worth a hundred thousand in cash. Will you accept it?"
Chao Gai began to laugh. "This present you speak of, it wouldn't be that birthday convoy now under preparation in the north, would it?"
The priest was quite taken aback. "How did you know?" he said.
"I was just guessing. So I'm right, am I?"
"That treasure is something that shouldn't be missed. You know the old saying: 'If you don't take it when it's there, you'll regret it when it's gone.' Well, what do you say?"
But as they were speaking a man rushed into the room, clasped Gongsun Sheng to his breast and exclaimed: "Wonderful! The prince's law is clear but the ways of heaven are dark. Now, how do you dare to talk like this? I was listening and I heard it all!"
Gongsun Sheng turned deathly pale. Truly it seemed a case of:

An eavesdropper heard the half-formed plan;

Disaster struck ere the business began.

WU YONG, the "Inquisitive Scholar," said, "I think that there are three men who have such a brave disposition, and such fine military training that they would not be afraid of 'jumping into hot water, or walking through fire.' If we do not have them with us our matter will not succeed."

Chao Gai asked who the men were, and where they lived.

Wu Yong said, "They are three brothers who live at Shijie village, near Liangshan Marsh, in Jizhou. They are fishermen but previously were smugglers at Liangshan Marsh. Their name is Ruan, and the second one has the nickname 'Heavenly King Who Stands His Ground'; [60] the other is 'Ruan the Fifth' who has a nickname, 'Short Lived Second Brother' (the name of a demon); the third is 'Ruan the Seventh,' who is nicknamed 'Living King Yama.' [61] I lived at their village for several years some time ago. They were not scholars but were very generous and hospitable. They were fine fellows, and therefore I made their acquaintance. I have not seen them during the last two years but if we get them this big job can be well finished."

"I have heard of these three brothers," said Chao Gai but so far I have not met them. The village of Shijie is not quite thirty-six li from here, so how would it be if we send a man there to ask them to come here to discuss the matter with us?"

Wu Yong said, "If you send a man they will not come. I must go there myself, and you can depend on my 'three-inch pliable tongue' in inducing them to join our band."

Chao Gai was much pleased at this and said, "We accept your good advice but when can you go?"

"This matter must not be delayed, and therefore I will start tonight at midnight. I shall reach there before noon tomorrow."

Chao Gai said, "That is very fine." He then ordered the servants to bring in food and wine.

Wu Yong said, "I know the roads between the Northern and Eastern Capitals but I do not know by which way these birthday gifts will be dispatched. If it won't be inconvenient I suggest that our brother Liu Tang should go this night to the road for Northern Capital, and makes inquiries as to when the presents will be sent and by what route."

Liu Tang said, "I will go this evening."

Wu Yong said, "Wait a bit. The birthday of the Prime Minister is on the fifteenth day of the sixth month but now is only the beginning of the fifth month so that there are still about forty days before the birthday. You had better wait until the three brothers arrive here, and then brother Liu Tang can depart."

Chao Gai said, "All right. Brother Liu Tang will stay here."

We need not weary you with details of how they dined for a long while. At midnight Wu Yong washed; ate his breakfast; got some silver and put it in his pockets; and put on sandals. Then Chao Gai and Liu Tang accompanied Wu Yong to the gate, and the latter departed on his journey to the village of Shijie. He reached his destination before noon the next day. He knew the place, and therefore had no need to ask his way. Upon arriving there he went straight to the home of the brothers Ruan.

At the door of the house he saw many fishing boats moored to posts; the fishing nets were hanging on the rough bamboo fence to dry; between the water and the hill there were more than ten grass huts.

Wu Yong shouted out, "Is the second brother home?" A person came out of a hut in his bare feet, wearing a torn cap, and some old clothes. When he saw Wu Yong he saluted and said, "Why has the tutor come? What wind has blown you here?"

"I have been absent for nearly two years. Just now I am teaching at the house of a wealthy man who wants to give a big feast so I came to see whether you could supply about ten carp each weighing at fifteen jin."

Ruan the Second laughed and said, "Come and have a drink then we can discuss this matter."

"In coming here," said Wu Yong, "I had the idea that I could get a drink."

"There are several wine shops on the other side of the lake, so we will go there by boat."

"Very good," said Wu Yong. "But I should like to have a talk with your younger brother as well, if he is at home."

"We will go together and find him."

They then went to the side of the lake, untied one of the boats, and got on board. Taking a pole resting at the foot of a tree, they punted the boat through the reeds into the centre of the lake. Ruan the Second had been punting for some time when he raised his hand and shouted, "Seventh Brother, have you seen my younger brother?"

A boat issued from the reeds with Ruan the Seventh in it, wearing a black straw hat, a sleeveless coat made of cloth with a chessboard pattern; and a short skirt made of undyed yarn. As he rowed he shouted, "What do you want your younger brother for?"

Wu Yong shouted, "I came specially to have a talk with you three brothers."

Ruan the Seventh said, "Please forgive me for it is a long time since I saw you."

Wu Yong said, "I will go with you two brothers for a drink of wine."

Ruan the Seventh said, "I will go and have a drink with you because I have not seen you for a long time."

The two boats were then rowed into the centre of the lake where there was a small mound with about eight straw huts on it. Upon arriving there Ruan the Second called out, "Mother, is Fifth Brother there?"

His mother replied, "That I cannot say. He has not been fishing but has been gambling for several days instead, and has lost everything. He asked me to let him have my hairpins so that he could go and gamble again."

Ruan the Second laughed at this, and rowed his boat away. His brother in the boat behind said, "You do not know what he has done. He has lost at gambling, and evidently has had bad luck. You should not say that he has not won, because I have also gambled and lost everything."

Wu Yong thought this would suit his plans.

The two boats at last came to the side of the lake where there was the village of Shijie, and there close to a single plank bridge they saw a man who was carrying two strings of cash and was coming down to untie the rope that fastened his boat. Ruan the Second said that that was his brother. Wu Yong saw that Ruan the Fifth was wearing a battered cap, with a pomegranate flower under it; he was wearing an old shirt which was unbuttoned and displayed the figure of a leopard tattooed on his breast. In his belt he had placed his handkerchief made of cloth with a chessboard pattern.

Wu Yong called out, "Ruan the Fifth, have you won?"

Ruan the Fifth said, "Hello! Here you are, tutor but I have not seen you for nearly two years. I have been watching you from this bridge for a long time."

Ruan the Second said: "I went with our teacher to our home, and our mother said that you had gone to the village to gamble there, so we came along here to look for you. Come with us to the inn where we can have a drink together." Ruan the Fifth immediately got into his boat, untied the rope, and rowed his boat after the other two. The three boats were rowed across the lake to a booth where they were duly tied up in a lotus pond. The brothers assisted the tutor to the bank, and then took him into an inn built upon piles in the water, where there were a set of red varnished chairs and a table.

Ruan the Second said, "You must not be offended at our coarseness but we request you our tutor to take the seat of honour." Wu Yong declined the offer, and Ruan the Seventh said, "Elder brother, do you mind taking the seat as a host, and we will ask our tutor to take the seat as a guest. We two younger brothers will take our seats first."

Wu Yong said, "Seventh brother, you are indeed quick tempered." The four men then all sat down, and the waiter was told to bring the wine. The waiter arranged four wine cups on the table, four pairs of chopsticks, four plates of vegetables, and a flagon of wine on the table.

Ruan the Seventh asked the waiter what nice dish they had got. The waiter replied that they had lovely beef from a fat ox that had just been killed.

Ruan the Second told him to bring in about ten jin of beef.

Ruan the Fifth said, "Teacher, you must not laugh at us, because we have not much to offer you."

Wu Yong said, "On the other hand I must ask you to excuse me for giving much trouble to you."

Ruan the Second said, "Don't mention that!" He then told the waiter to be quick and bring the meat which was done at once. The brothers then pressed Wu Yong to drink several cups of wine, and meanwhile they ate their food like wolves and tigers.

After eating a while Ruan the Fifth asked, "What is the business that has brought you here?"

Ruan the Second said that Wu Yong was now teaching in a rich family and had come here to buy about ten large carp which have to weigh at fifteen jin each."

Ruan the Seventh said, "Generally we catch about fifty fish and ordinarily we could let you have more, not to say a dozen but just now we have not got even fifteen jin weight of fish."

"As you have come from a distance," said Ruan the Fifth, "we must catch for you about ten fish, and each of them to be weighed at six jin."

"I have brought money with me," said Wu Yong, "so you can tell me what the price is but I must have fish weighing about fifteen jin each."

"Teacher," said Ruan the Seventh, "there are no fish of that size anywhere. My fifth brother says we ought to catch about ten fish of six jin each but I am afraid we cannot even do that just now. So you must wait a few days, when we may have them. In my boat I have a tub of small living fish which we can get for a meal."

Ruan the Seventh then went to the boat, and brought back the tub of fish weighing about six jin altogether. He took them to the stove, cooked them, placed them in three trays and served them up. He invited Wu Yong to partake of the food without any ceremony. They all "fell to" and by the time they had finished eating the fish it was growing dark.

Wu Yong thought that that inn was not a suitable place to talk matters over, that night he must sleep at their homes, and there discuss matters.

"It is now getting dark," said Ruan the Second, "and we shall be pleased if you would come and sleep at our house. Tomorrow we can arrange matters."

"I have come from a long distance," said Wu Yong, "and it is very fortunate that I have met you all in this way. I see that I am not to be allowed to pay for this meal. I will stay at your house tonight but as I have some money I will buy a jar of wine and some meat, and perhaps in the village we can get a pair of chickens. So let us have a feast tonight, and get a drink."

"But we do not want you to spend money," said Ruan the Second, "and we will arrange that matter ourselves so you need not worry."

"I have come to invite you three gentlemen," said Wu Yong, "and if you do not allow me to pay the cost I must leave."

"In that case," said Ruan the Seventh, "we will allow you, our teacher, to have your own way."

"Our seventh brother, you are really very straightforward," said Wu Yong. He then took a tael of silver, and gave it to Ruan the Seventh. He asked the innkeeper to lend them a large jar, and fill it with wine, and make up twenty jin of beef, and a pair of chickens.

"I will pay you now for the wine we have just had," said Ruan the Second.

The innkeeper agreed to this proposal.

The four friends took the wine and meat and stowed it in the boat, then cast off the rope, and rowed to the house of Ruan the Second. Upon arriving there they tied the boat to a post, took the wine and meat into a room at the back of the house, and told the servants to light the lamps. Of the three brothers only Ruan the Second was married.

They all took their seats. Ruan the Seventh killed the chickens, and giving it to the wife of Ruan the Second told her to get the cook to prepare it for them. At about 8 P.M. all the food and wine was ready and was placed on the table. Wu Yong then invited the brothers to drink wine with him, and in order to introduce again the question of the fish he asked, "How is it that there are no large fish here, seeing that you have such a large lake?"

Ruan the Second replied, "We will not deceive you. The fact is that all the big fish are only found near Liangshan Marsh and as our lake is very small there are no big fish here."

"This lake is not far from Liangshan Marsh, and is connected by a stream. Why do you not go there to fish?"

Ruan the Second sighed and said, "Don't mention that!"

"But why do you sigh?" asked Wu Yong.

Ruan the Fifth interposed saying, "Teacher, you do not understand. Formerly even our clothes and food come from Liangshan Marsh but now we dare not go there."

"But surely the magistrate in this large county has not prohibited you from catching fresh fish?" said Wu Yong.

Ruan the Fifth said, "No official dares come here, and prohibits us from catching fresh fish, and even King Yama dares not do that."

"But if there is no prohibition," said Wu Yong, "why don't you go there?"

"Sir, you do not know all the circumstances of the case," said Ruan the Fifth, "but I will explain matters."

"As you have not told me so far," said Wu Yong, "of course I do not understand."

Ruan the Seventh interposed, "It is not easy to talk about this Liangshan Marsh. Recently a band of brigands have seized the island in the lake so we cannot catch fish there."

Wu Yong said, "I did not know that there are robbers there, and have never heard of such a state of affairs."

"The chief of the bandits," said Ruan the Second, "is a man who has failed to pass the examination as a recommended man (MA), and he is called Wang Lun, 'White Clothes Scholar'; and the second-in-command is Du Qian, 'Sky Feeler,' and the third in command is Song Wan, the 'Diamond in the Clouds,' there is also Zhu Gui, 'Dry Land Crocodile,' who has an inn at the Liji District entrance, where he acts as a spy and gathers information. Recently a man named Lin Chong, 'Leopard's Head,' has joined them from the Eastern Capital, and he is noted for his military skill. There are about seven hundred men in this gang of bandits, and they loot and rob in every direction. We have not been there fishing for quite a year. They are the terror of this district; and have deprived us of our food and clothing but this is not the whole of what they have done."

"I did not know that matters are like this," said Wu Yong. "Why does the magistrate not arrest them?"

"Whenever the officials act in those affairs," said Ruan the Fifth, "the people suffer for it. As soon as they come into the village they first seize the people's pigs, sheep, fowls, and geese, and eat them, and then demand money to cover the traveling expenses of their soldiers. Just now the officials do not know what to do, so how dare they come here? If the officials come here to arrest the bandits they would be so frightened that they would be rendered useless, and would not even dare to look for the bandits."

"Yet as we do not catch fish now," said Ruan the Second, "we can avoid their extortion."

"This being the case," said Wu Yong, "these thieves are indeed leading a happy life!"

"They fear neither Heaven, nor Earth, nor the officials," said Ruan the Fifth, "they weigh and divide among themselves the silver, gold, and silks they have looted. They have big jars of wine to drink, and large quantities of meat to eat so why should they not be happy? In vain we three brothers have skill; how can we compare with them?"

Upon hearing this, Wu Yong was much pleased and thought it would fit in well with his plans.

Ruan the Seventh said, "Man lives just a generation, and grass exists just for a year. We follow the livelihood of fishermen but if we learnt their ways of earning a living our life would not be so bad even a day."

"Why, should we follow these bandits!" said Wu Yong, "Is not their criminal way of living deserving of severe punishment, so what would be the advantage for you to throw aside your present respectability by joining them? If you were arrested by the soldiers it would be your own crime that would be tried."

"But the soldiers," said Ruan the Second, "do not know anything, and are a stupid lot. Although the bandits commit great crimes yet they are not punished. We are very much distressed on account of our poverty. If somebody would only assist us in this matter we would go and become bandits ourselves."

"I always come to the same conclusion," said Ruan the Fifth. "Our abilities are quite as good as other men's but nobody seems to be aware of it."

"If somebody knew of your ability," said Wu Yong, "would you then be willing to go?"

"If somebody knew of our ability," said Ruan the Seventh, "and asked us to go through water or fire we would not hesitate a moment in doing so. If we were only employed for a day and were killed, we should still die contented."

Wu Yong was highly delighted at this, and thought that the three brothers had ideas, and he could gradually induce them to fall in with his plans. He pressed them to drink more wine, and after they had drunk two cups he asked, "Are you three willing to go to Liangshan Marsh and arrest these bandits?"

"If we did that," said Ruan the Seventh, "where could we get the reward? If there was no reward the bandits would laugh at us."

"I am rather inexperienced," said Wu Yong, "but would it not be a good plan for you to go to that place and throw in your lot with the bandits seeing that you do not like to catch fish?"

"Teacher," said Ruan the Second, "you do not know we have even discussed that plan but we have heard that Wang Lun, 'White Clothes Scholar,' is regarded by his followers as a very narrow-minded man, and does not care to get many other men. Sometime ago Lin Chong from the Eastern Capital joined them at Liangshan Marsh and suffered much at his hand. Wang Lun would not forgive others and such being the case, we are disinclined to approach him."

"If they would treat us as generously you do," said Ruan the Seventh, "that would be nice."

"If Wang Lun were as friendly to us as you," said Ruan the Fifth, "we should have gone there a long time ago, and would not wait until now. We should even have been willing to die for him."

"I am not worth mentioning," said Wu Yong. "In both Shandong and Hebei provinces there are many brave heroes."

"There may be many brave heroes," said Ruan the Second, "but so far we have not met them."

"Do you know a man in this vicinity named Chao Gai, who is the chief of the Dongxi village, in Yuncheng County?" asked Wu Yong.

"Is he not the man known as the 'Heavenly King' or 'Pagoda Carrier'?" asked Ruan the Fifth.

"That is the man," said Wu Yong.

"Although he lives at a distance of only thirty-five li from here yet our fate has not allowed us to meet him even though we have heard of his fame," said Ruan the Seventh.

"As he is a man who distributes wealth in a good cause how is it that you have not tried to meet him?" asked Wu Yong.

"We have had no business at that place," said Ruan the Second, "and therefore we have not been able to meet him."

"For several years," said Wu Yong, "I have been teaching at a village close to his home. I have heard that just now he has a matter in hand which will bring in much wealth and that is really what I came here to discuss with you. How would it be if we intercepted this treasure, and took it ourselves?"

"We cannot do that," said Ruan the Fifth. "He is a man who distributes wealth in a good cause; we cannot intercept his treasure. Besides that, should the brave heroic bandits hear of it they would laugh at us."

"Before you said this," said Wu Yong, "I thought that you were not firm in purpose but now I see that you are really chivalrous and would treat your friends well. As you really are willing to assist me I will tell you the truth about this matter. Just now I am living at Chao Gai's home. The chief Chao Gai has heard of your fame, and specially instructed me to come here and discuss a matter with you."
"We three brothers," said Ruan the Second, "are quite straight, and have no fraction of falsity about us. I think Chao Gai must have an extremely secret and illegal affair in hand which requires our assistance and that is why he sent you here. If it is true that there is such business then let us take our oath with this remaining cup of wine that if we do not assist you with our utmost ability then let calamity fall upon us, disastrous disease attack us, and let us die an unnatural death."
Ruan the Fifth and also Ruan the Seventh patted their necks with their hands and the former said, "This warm blood we will offer to the one that appreciates us."
"You three brothers are here," said Wu Yong. "It is not I, who have any bad intention in inducing you. This matter is extremely important. The birthday of Prime Minister Cai at the court, is on the fifteenth day of the sixth month. His son-in-law is Grand Secretary Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital. Very soon the latter will dispatch presents of gold articles, pearls, and other valuables worth one hundred thousand strings of cash to his father-in-law on the birthday. A splendid fellow named Liu Tang has just come and reported this matter. They want you to go there and discuss with them the question of collecting men together who will go to some lonely pass in the mountains and there seize these ill-gotten gains so that everybody will enjoy a rich and happy life. Therefore they told me to come here under pretext of buying fish but really to request you to go there to discuss this affair. What do you think of the matter?"
"Ho! Ho!" said Ruan the Second, "Brother, did I not tell you that it would come?"
Ruan the Seventh jumped up and said, "We have hoped for this a long time, and today we get our desires fulfilled. Your words scratch us at the place that itches. But when shall we go?"
"As you are willing to go," said Wu Yong, "I propose that we start tomorrow morning about 5 A.M., and go to the village of Chao, the 'Heavenly King.'"
The three brothers were much pleased at this. They all went to bed. Early next morning they ate their breakfast, and after leaving instructions at their home, they departed on the road to Dongxi Village. In the afternoon they came in sight of the farmhouse of Chao Gai. In the distance they saw Chao Gai and Liu Tang waiting for them under a green ash tree. When they reached the tree Chao Gai expressed his pleasure at seeing them and said, "I previously heard of your fame but now I find that it is quite true. I request you to come inside my home to discuss matters." All the six then went into a room at the back of the farm where they took their seats according to their status.
Wu Yong explained all that had happened, and Chao Gai was much pleased and instructed his servants to kill and roast a pig and a sheep, and prepare some paper offerings for worship. The three brothers saw that Chao Gai's personal appearance was fair and noble and his conversation was free and easy, so they said, "We are fond of making friends with fine fellows but we never supposed that we can find them here. We should not have had the pleasure of meeting you today if it had not been for Wu Yong who brought us here." The brothers were exceedingly pleased. They ate their evening meal, and talked with their host until midnight.
The next morning when they got up they went again to the chamber at the back where the paper joss money, paper horses, incense, flowers, candles and lamps, the roasted pig and sheep; and other worshiping materials were ready. They were pleased to see that Chao Gai was so sincere. So they all took an oath saying, "Grand Secretary Liang at the Northern Capital has injured the people, and has used his ill-gotten gains to buy presents and send them to his father-in-law, Prime Minister Cai at the Eastern Capital as birthday presents. They certainly represent wealth unjustly obtained. If in our band of six men there be one who has a selfish purpose Heaven and Earth will exterminate him. May the gods take note of our vows." They then burnt the paper money, and had a feast. While eating and drinking a farm servant entered and said, "There is a man at the door begging for some rice."
Chao Gai said, "You do not know your own business. As I am drinking wine here with my guests you should have given him about a quart of rice, and not come here to ask me about it."
The servant said that he had offered him rice that he refused, as he wanted to speak to the chief himself.
Chao Gai said, "He must have not been satisfied. You go and offer him about three pecks of rice. Also tell him that the chief is entertaining some guests, and has no time to see him."
The servant went away but after some time returned and said, "I gave that man three pecks of rice but he still refuses to go away. He tells me that he is a Taoist and does not want either rice or money but begs to be allowed to see you."
"Cannot you give him a suitable reply?" said Chao Gai. "Tell him that I really have no time to see him today, and ask him to call again in a few days when I will talk with him."
"I have told him that already," said the servant, "but he says that he has not come to beg for rice or money; but has heard that you are a just man and that is why he requests an interview."
Chao Gai said, "You are giving me lots of trouble. You do not even help me to deal with this matter. If he is still unsatisfied with the rice you can give him about five pecks of rice, and yet you need not come here again to speak. Tell him that if there were no guests here I would have gone and spoken to him. You now go and send him away, and don't come here again to mention this matter."
The servant withdrew but after about an hour they heard a row outside of the front gate. Another servant rushed into the room and said, "That man has become angry, and has assaulted about ten of your servants."
Chao Gai was startled upon hearing this, and hurriedly rising said, "Will you gentlemen please remain seated. I will go and investigate this matter myself." Upon leaving the guest chamber, he went to the gate and there he saw a tall man about eight feet high, who had a very dignified but strange appearance. He was outside the gate near the ash tree, and as he struck the servants he said, "You do not recognize a good man."
"Do not be angry," said Chao Gai. "You came here to see Chao Gai, the chief, for perhaps some contributions. They have already given you rice so why do you feel so much provoked?"
The man laughed loudly and said, "I, a poor priest, did not come here for either wine, food, money, or rice. In my eye, one hundred thousand strings of cash seem to be quite an ordinary thing. I just came here to have a little talk with the chief. I cannot bear these villagers who had no decency, and abused me, and that was why I lost my temper."
"Do you know the chief?" asked Chao Gai.
"I have heard of his great reputation," said the man, "but so far I have not met him."
"I am the chief," said Chao Gai. "What do you want to speak to me about?"
The man looked closely at Chao Gai, and said, "Chief, do not blame me for this, and kindly allow a poor Taoist to kneel down to you."
"Do not be too polite," said Chao Gai, "come inside and have a drink of tea."
"Many thanks," said the man. They went into the house, and when Wu Yong and the three brothers saw him enter they withdrew from the room.
When Chao Gai and the man had drunk tea for a little time the latter said, "This is not a good place for us to discuss matters. Is there a better place where we can go?"
Chao Gai took him to a small room where they both sat down.
Chao Gai said, "May I venture to inquire as to your name and the place you come from?"
The man replied, "My family name is Gongsun, and my single personal name is Sheng. My Taoist religious name is Yi Qing (First in Purity). I am a Jizhou man. When I was young I practiced much with the cudgel and spear. I was very good at all kinds of military drill so that people called me Gongsun Sheng, the 'Big Brother.' I then studied the arts of Taoism so that I could command the wind and rain, ride on the mists and clouds. Everybody calls me 'Cloud Dragon.' I heard of your great reputation but had not the opportunity to meet you and pay my respects. Now there are gold articles, pearls, and other valuables worth a hundred thousand strings of cash, and I wish to give them to you as a present for introducing myself to you. I do not know if you will accept them or not."
Chao Gai laughed and asked, "Are not these birthday presents from the north?"
The man was startled at this and asked how he knew about them.
"I just guessed that," said Chao Gai. "Does it agree with your ideas?"
"This great riches," said Gongsun Sheng, "we must not let pass amiss. The ancients had a saying, 'If you do not take what you ought to take, you must not regret it afterwards.' Chief, what do you think about it?"
Just then, while they were talking, a man rushed into the room, and taking hold of Gongsun Sheng, he said, "Well! In the visible world there is the Emperor's law, in the invisible there is the gods', and now you discuss the matters like this. I have been listening to you for a long time." This interruption frightened Gongsun Sheng so much that his face became pale.

Plans in project will leak through walls,
Lonely walls may hide calamity.

016
Yang Zhi Escorts a Convoy of Precious Silver & Gold, insisting on his own style; Wu Yong Schemes a Ruse & Captures the Birthday Gifts by guile

The man who seized Gongsun Sheng was Wu Yong the Wizard. Chao Gai laughed. "Don't tease him, Teacher. Permit me to introduce you." The two exchanged bows.
"I have long known the fame of Gongsun Sheng among gallant men," said Wu Yong. "I didn't expect to have the pleasure of meeting you today."
"This savant is called Wu Yong the Wizard," said Chao Gai.
"In the chivalrous fraternity many have spoken of your illustrious name," said Gongsun. "Who would have thought I'd have the good fortune to meet you here in the ward chief's manor! Of course, thanks to his generosity and chivalry, bold men from all over call at his door."
"There are a few others inside I'd like you to meet," said Chao Gai. "Please come with me to the rear room." The three went in and the ward chief presented Liu Tang and the three Ruan brothers to Gongsun Sheng.
"This encounter cannot be an accident," they said. "Please, brother Chao, sit at the head of the table."
"I'm just a poor host with no delicacies to offer you fine guests," Chao Gai protested. "How dare I presume?"
"Please, brother," said Wu Yong, "be guided by me. You're the eldest among us. You must take that seat."
Only then did Chao Gai consent to sit in the first place. Wu Yong was seated second, Gongsun third, Liu Tang fourth, Ruan the Second fifth, Ruan the Fifth sixth, and Ruan the Seventh seventh. They drank together to celebrate their meeting, then the table was re-laid, and more wine and tidbits were served, and once more they drank.
"The ward chief has dreamt that the seven stars of the Big Dipper settled on the ridge of his roof, and now we seven, with the same righteous purpose in mind, encounter each other here today," said Wu Yong.
"Surely that is an omen from Heaven. We can take the precious convoy easily. I suggest that brother Liu Tang find out which route the convoy will follow. It's too late today but would he please set out early tomorrow?"
"No need for that," said Gongsun. "I already know. It's coming by way of the big road over Yellow Earth Ridge."
"Ten li east of there is the village of Anlo," said Chao Gai. "In Anlo lives an idler named Bai Sheng, better known as the Daylight Rat. He once sought me out, and I helped him with a little money."
"The Big Dipper gives off a white light. It must mean that man," said Wu Yong. "We can use him."
"But we're quite far from Yellow Earth Ridge. Where should we lie in wait?" asked Liu Tang.
"At Bai Sheng's place," said Wu Yong. "We'll be safe there. And we'll have other uses for him as well."
"Will we employ soft tactics or hard?" queried Chao Gai.
Wu Yong laughed. "I've already thought of a method. It all depends on how the convoy reacts. We'll meet force with force and guile with guile. I have a plan but I don't know whether you will approve." He outlined his proposal.
Chao Gai stamped his foot delightedly. "Marvellous! No wonder they call you the Wizard. You're better than Zhuge Liang.* An excellent plan!"
"Let's not talk about it again," said Wu Yong. " 'The walls have ears and people pass outside windows,' as the old saying goes. We must keep this strictly among ourselves."
"Please go back, you three," Chao Gai said to the Ruan brothers, "and return again when the time comes. Master Wu Yong, go on with your school teaching, as usual. Gongsun and Liu Tang can live here for the time being."
They drank until dark, then retired to rest in the various guest-rooms.
The next morning at the fifth watch they rose and had breakfast. Chao Gai presented the three Ruan brothers with thirty ounces of snow-white silver. "A small token of my regard," he said. "Please don't refuse." At first the three brothers wouldn't consider it but Wu Yong said: "Friendly gestures should not be rejected," and so they finally accepted.
All saw them off to the outside of the manor. Wu Yong gave them instructions in a low voice. "Be sure to be on time," he enjoined them.
The Ruan brothers took their leave and returned to Stone Tablet Village. Chao Gai kept Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang on in the manor. Wu Yong often came over to discuss their affairs.

But enough of idle talk. Let's get back to Governor Liang in Daming, the Northern Capital. After buying birthday gifts valued at a hundred thousand strings of cash, he chose a date to start them on their way.
The following day, as he was sitting in the rear hall, his wife, Madame Cai, asked him: "When will the birthday gifts go off, Your Excellency?"
"Tomorrow or the day after. I've bought everything I want. There's only one thing that's troubling me."
"What is it?"
"Last year I purchased a hundred thousand strings of cash worth of jewels and art objects and sent them to the Eastern Capital but because I didn't pick the right men they were seized by bandits on the road. To this day the robbers haven't been caught. At present I don't know of anyone really competent in my retinue. That is what's troubling me."
Madame Cai pointed to a man standing at the foot of the steps. "Haven't you often said that this fellow is quite remarkable? Why not entrust him with the mission? He can see it through."
The man she indicated was Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Brute. Liang was pleased. He summoned Yang Zhi into the hall.
"I had forgotten you," Liang said. "If you can safely deliver the birthday gifts for me, I'll have you raised in rank."
Yang Zhi clasped his hands together respectfully. "Since that is what Your Excellency wishes, I must of course comply. How shall the convoy be composed, and when shall it set forth?"
"I'm ordering the prefectural government to supply ten extralarge carts, and will send the service personnel from the city guard to escort them. Each cart will carry a yellow banner reading: 'Convoy of Birthday Gifts to the Premier.' In addition, I will have one strong soldier follow each of the carts. You can leave within the next three days."
"It's not that I'm unwilling but I really can't do it. Please give the mission to some brave and skilful person."
"It's my desire to raise you in rank. Along with the birthday gift documents, I intend to include a letter to the Premier, strongly recommending you. You'll return with his nomination for an official post. Why do you refuse to go?"
"Your servant has heard that the gifts were robbed last year, Excellency, and that the bandits still have not been caught. There are many brigands on the road these days. From here to the Eastern Capital there is no water route; you have to go entirely by land. Purple Gold Mountain, Two-Dragon Mountain, Peach Blossom Mountain, Umbrella Mountain, Yellow Earth Ridge, White Sand Valley, Wild Cloud Ford, and Red Pine Forest—all must be crossed, and all are infested with bandits. No merchant dares travel through them alone. If the bandits know we're carrying a precious cargo, of course they'll want to seize it. We'll just be throwing our lives away. That is why I can't go."
"In that case I'll simply provide you with a larger military escort."
"Even if you gave me ten thousand men, it wouldn't solve anything, Your Excellency. Those craven oafs would run as soon as they heard the bandits coming."
"Do you mean to say that the birthday gifts can't be delivered?"
"If you'll grant your servant one request, I will undertake the mission."
"Since I'm willing to entrust you with it, why not? State your wish."
"As I see it, Your Excellency, we shouldn't use any carts. Pack the gifts into containers to be carried, disguised as merchandise, on shoulder-poles. Let the ten strong soldiers serve as porters. I'll need only one more person, also dressed as a merchant, to go as my assistant. We'll travel quietly day and night until we reach the Eastern Capital and deliver the goods. That way we'll be able to do it."
"It shall be as you wish. I'll write a letter strongly recommending you for an official appointment."
"My profoundest thanks, Excellency, for your gracious kindness." That same day Yang Zhi made up the loads and picked his soldiers. The following day he was again summoned to the rear hall. Governor Liang came out and asked: "Yang Zhi, when will you be ready to leave?"
"We would like to start tomorrow morning, Your Excellency. I'm just waiting for the official documents."
"My wife has some gifts for her women relatives. I want you to take them along too. I'm afraid you won't know your way around the Premier's chancellery, so I'm sending with you Chief Steward Xie and two captains of the guards."
"I won't be able to go then, Excellency."
"Why not? The gifts are all packed in containers."
"I was made responsible for ten loads of gifts, and the soldiers were put in my charge. If I told them to march early, they'd march early. If I said late, then late it would be. They'd spend the night where I directed, and rest when I ordered it. Everything would be up to me. But now you also want to send the chief steward and two captains. The steward is one of madame's men, the husband of her old wet-nurse when she was an infant in the Premier's chancellery. If he disagreed with me on the road how could I argue? Yet the blame would be mine if the mission failed."
"That's easy. I'll tell him and the captains to do whatever you say."
"In that case, your servant is willing to accept the mission. May I be severely punished if I fail."

The governor was delighted. "I haven't decided to promote you in vain. You're a very sensible fellow." Summoning Chief Steward Xie and the two captains to the hall he gave them official orders: "Major Yang Zhi has accepted a mission to deliver birthday gifts—eleven loads of jewels and art objects—to the Premier's chancellery in the Eastern Capital. He is fully responsible. You three are to accompany him. During the journey he alone will decide whether to start early or late, where to spend the night, and when to rest. None of you is to cross him. You already know what madame wants done. Be cautious and prudent, leave soon and return quickly, don't let anything go wrong."

The old chief steward promised to obey the governor's injunctions.

Before dawn the next morning the loads were lined up outside the main hall. The chief steward and the captains brought another batch of valuables—making a total of eleven loads. Eleven strong soldiers of the guard were selected and disguised as porters. Yang Zhi was wearing a broad-brimmed hat and a black silk tunic. His feet were shod in hemp sandals tied with laces of cord. At his waist was a sword, and he carried a halberd in his hand.

The old steward was also dressed as a merchant. The two captains were disguised as lackeys. Each carried a halberd and a rattan switch. Governor Liang handed over the official documents. After all had eaten their fill, they formally took their leave in front of the hall. Liang watched the soldiers raise the carrying-poles to their shoulders and set forth. Together with Yang Zhi, the old steward and the two captains, a total of fifteen men left the governor's compound. Marching out of the Northern Capital's city gate, they proceeded down the highway in the direction of the Eastern Capital.

It was then the middle of the fifth lunar month. Although the skies were clear, walking was difficult in the broiling sun. Determined to deliver the gifts in time for the Premier's birthday on the fifteenth of the sixth lunar month, Yang Zhi pushed the march on briskly. During the first week after the convoy left the Northern Capital, they set out everyday before dawn to take advantage of the morning cool, and rested in the heat of noon.

By the sixth or seventh day, dwellings were few and far between, travellers had thinned out, and the road began climbing into the mountains. Yang Zhi now started the marches well after sunrise and didn't stop until late in the afternoon. The eleven guards were all carrying heavy loads and the weather was hot. Walking was a severe effort. Whenever they saw a grove they wanted to rest but Yang Zhi drove them on. If they halted, the least he did was curse them, and often he flogged them with his switch, forcing them to continue.

The two captains, although they bore on their backs only light luggage, gasped for breath and kept falling to the rear. Yang Zhi berated them harshly.

"How can you two be so ignorant? I'm responsible for this mission. Instead of helping me beat the porters, all you do is drag behind. This road is no place to dally!"

"It's not that we want to go slowly," said the captains. "We just can't move any faster in this heat. A few days ago we always set out early when it was cool but now we march only during the hottest hours of the day. Can't you tell the difference between fair conditions and foul?"

"You're talking farts, not words! A few days ago we were in a good part of the country, now we're in a very ticklish place. We must march in broad daylight. Who dares to set out while it's still dark?"

The captains said no more. But they thought to themselves: "That rogue swears at people whenever he likes!"

His halberd in one hand, his switch in the other, Yang Zhi urged on the convoy. The two captains sat beneath a tree and waited for the chief steward to catch up.

"That murderous Yang Zhi is only a major in his excellency's guard," they complained to the old man. "What right has he to act so mighty?"

"The governor ordered us not to cross him. That's why I haven't said anything. These past few days I too have found him hard to bear. But we must be patient."

"His excellency was only trying to make him feel good. You're the chief steward. Why don't you take over?"

"We must be patient with him," the old steward repeated.

That day they again marched until late afternoon. Then they stopped at an inn. Sweat was raining from the eleven porters. Groaning and sighing, they addressed the steward: "Unfortunately we're soldiers of the guard, and have to go where we're ordered. For the past two days we've been carrying these heavy loads in the burning sun, instead of starting early when it's cool. For anything at all, we're given a taste of the switch! We're flesh and blood too. Why should we be treated so cruelly?"

"Don't complain," the steward urged them. "When we get to the Eastern Capital, I'll reward you personally."

"Of course we wouldn't have said anything, Chief Steward," they replied, "if we had someone like you looking after us."

Another night passed. The following morning everyone rose before daylight, hoping to march early while it was still cool. But Yang Zhi jumped up and roared: "Where do you think you're going? Back to bed! I'll call you when it's time to leave!"

"We don't set out early," muttered the guards, "and in the heat of the day when we can't walk, he beats us!"

Swearing, Yang Zhi yelled: "What do you clods understand!" He threatened them with his rattan switch. The soldiers had no choice but to swallow their complaints and return to bed.

After the sun had risen and everyone finished a leisurely breakfast, the convoy resumed its march. Yang Zhi pushed on at a rapid pace, with no pauses for rest in the shade. The eleven guards grumbled constantly, and the two captains made no end of peevish observations to the chief steward. Although the old man did not reply, in his heart he was very irritated with the leader of the expedition.

To make a long story short, after marching for fifteen days there wasn't a man in the convoy who didn't hate Yang Zhi. On the fourth day of the sixth month they again rose late and slowly cooked breakfast. Then they set out. Even before noon the sun was a fiery red ball on high. There wasn't a cloud in sight. It was really hot. Now they were travelling along winding mountain trails. Towering peaks looked down on them from all sides. After marching about twenty //the porters were longing to relax in the shade of a willow grove. Yang Zhi lashed them with his switch.

"Move on," he shouted. "I'll teach you to rest before it's time!"

The guards looked up. There wasn't even half a cloud in the sky. The heat was simply unbearable. Yang Zhi hurried the convoy along a path fringing the mountain. It was about noon then, and the stones were so hot they burned the porters' feet. Walking was extremely painful.

"A scorching day like this," groaned the guards. "You're killing us!"

"Hurry up," Yang Zhi urged. "First cross that ridge ahead, then we'll see."

The column of fifteen men hastened on until they mounted the earthen ridge. Then the porters lowered their carrying-poles and threw themselves down beneath the pine trees.

"A fine place you've picked for cooling off," Yang Zhi ranted. "Get up, quick! We've got to push on!"

"Even if you cut us into eight pieces, we can't move another step!" retorted the soldiers.

Yang Zhi seized his switch and lashed them over the head and shoulders. But by the time he beat one to his feet another lay down again. He could do nothing with them. It was at this time that the old steward and the two captains climbed panting to the top of the ridge and sat down beneath a pine, gasping for breath. The old man saw Yang Zhi belaboring the porters.

"It's really much too hot to march, Major," he said. "Forgive them."

"You don't understand, Chief Steward. This is Yellow Earth Ridge, a favourite haunt of bandits. Even in peaceful times they robbed here in broad daylight, to say nothing of what they do in times like these! Stopping here is very dangerous."

"That's what you always say," countered the two captains. "You just use those stories to scare people!"

"Let the porters rest a bit," the steward urged. "We'll start again afternoon, what do you say?"

"Impossible. Where's your judgment? For seven or eight //around the ridge there isn't a single house. Who dares rest in the shade in a place like this?" Yang Zhi retorted.

"You go on with the porters first, then," said the steward. "I've got to sit a while."

Yang Zhi picked up his rattan switch and roared at the soldiers: "Any man who doesn't march gets twenty blows of this!"

They all noisily protested. "Major," one of them cried, "while you walk empty-handed we're carrying well over a hundred catties apiece! You act as if we weren't even human! If the governor himself were in charge of this convoy, he'd at least let us say a word or two. You have no feeling at all! The only thing you know is to storm and rage!"

"Wretched animal! A beating is all his kind understands!" Yang Zhi rained blows on the man with his rattan switch.

"Stop, Major!" shouted the steward. "Listen to me. In my days in the Premier's chancellery I met thousands of officers, and every one of them treated me with deference! I don't mean to be rude but it seems to me that an officer under sentence of death whom His Excellency has pitied and made a major of the guard—a post no bigger than a mustard seed—shouldn't be so pompous! Even if I were only a village elder, to say nothing of the governor's chief steward, you ought to heed my advice! Always beating the porters—what sort of conduct is that?"

"You're city dweller, Steward, born and raised in official residences. What do you know of the hardships of the road?"

"I've been as far as Sichuan, Guangdong and Guangxi but I've never seen anyone who behaved like you!"

"You can't compare today with times of peace!"

"You deserve to have your tongue cut out if you say such things! What's unpeaceful about today?"

Yang Zhi was going to reply when he saw a shadowy figure poke his head out of a grove opposite and peer at them. "What did I tell you?" he shouted. "Isn't that a bad fellow over there?" Ringing aside his switch, he seized his halberd and charged into the grove, shouting: "Insolent villain! How dare you spy on our convoy?"

In the grove he found a line of seven wheel-barrows and six men, buff naked, resting in the shade. One of them, a fellow with a scarlet birthmark on the side of his temple, grabbed a halberd when he saw Yang Zhi advancing. The seven men cried in alarm: "Aiya!" and leaped to their feet.

"Who are you?" Yang Zhi yelled.

"Who are you?" the seven countered.

"Aren't you robbers?"

"That's what we should be asking you! We're only small merchants. We haven't any money to give you!"

"So you're merchants. And I suppose I'm rich!"

"Who are you, really?"

"Tell me first where you're from."

"We seven are from Haozhou. We're bringing dates to sell in the Eastern Capital. At first we hesitated to pass this way because many people say that bandits often rob merchants on Yellow Earth Ridge. But then we said to ourselves: 'All we've got are some dates and nothing of any value.' So we decided to cross. Since the weather is so hot, we thought we'd rest in this grove till the cool of evening. When we heard you fellows coming up the rise we were afraid you might be bandits, so we sent this brother for a look."

"So that's how it is—only ordinary merchants! I thought he was a robber when I saw him watching us, so I hurried in here to investigate."

"Please have some dates, sir," said the seven.

"No, thanks," replied Yang Zhi. Halberd in hand, he returned to the convoy.

"Since there are bandits around, we'd better leave," said the chief steward, who was seated beneath a tree.

"I thought they were bandits but they're only date merchants," Yang Zhi explained.

"According to you," the old steward remarked, "these fellows were all desperadoes!"

"No need to quarrel," said Yang Zhi. "I only want everything to go well. You men can rest. We'll march on after it cools down a bit."

The guards smiled. Yang Zhi stabbed the point of his halberd into the ground, then he too sat down beneath a tree to rest and cool off.

In less time than it takes to eat half a bowl of rice, another man appeared in the distance. Carrying two buckets on the ends of a shoulder-pole, he sang as he mounted the ridge:

Beneath a red sun that burns like fire,
Half scorched in the fields is the grain.
Poor peasant hearts with worry are scalded,
While the rich themselves idly fan!

Still singing, he walked to the edge of the pine grove, rested his buckets and sat down in the shade of a tree.

"What have you got in those buckets?" the soldiers asked him.

"White wine."

"Where are you going with it?"

"To the village, to sell."

"How much a bucket?"

"Five strings of cash—not a copper less."

The soldiers talked it over. "We're hot and thirsty. Why not buy some? It will ease the heat in our bodies." They began chipping in.

"What are you fellows up to?" Yang Zhi shouted, when he noticed what they were doing.

"We're going to buy a little wine."

Yang Zhi flailed them with the shaft of his halberd. "What gall! How dare you buy wine without asking me?"

"Always raising a stinking fuss over nothing! It's our money! What is it to you if we buy wine? You beat us for that, too!"

"What do you stupid clodhoppers know anyhow? All you can think of is guzzling! But not a thought do you give to all the tricks that are pulled on the road! Do you know how many good men have been toppled by drugs?"

The wine vendor looked at Yang Zhi and laughed coldly. "You don't know much yourself, master merchant. I wasn't going to sell you any in the first place. What a dirty thing to say about a man's wine!"

As they were quarrelling, the date merchants emerged from the grove, halberds in hand. "What's the trouble?" they asked.

"I was carrying this wine across the ridge to sell in the village and stopped to cool off when these fellows asked if they could buy some," the vendor said. "I didn't let them have any. Then this gentleman claimed my wine was drugged. Is he trying to be funny, or what?"

"Pei!" snorted the seven. "We thought robbers had come, at least! So that's what all the row was about. Suppose he did say it—so what? We were just thinking of having some wine ourselves. If they're suspicious, sell a bucket to us. We'll drink it."

"No, no! Nothing doing!" said the vendor.

"We didn't say anything against you, you dull clod," cried the seven. "We'll give you the same price you'd get in the village. If you sell to us, what's the difference? You'll be doing a good deed, like handing out tea on a hot day, and quenching our thirst at the same time!"

"I don't mind selling you a bucket but they said my wine is bad. Besides, I don't have any dipper."

"You take things too seriously. What do you care what they said? We have our own dippers."

Two of the date merchants brought out two coconut ladles from one of the wheel-barrows, while a third scooped up a big handful of dates. Then the seven gathered around the bucket and removed its cover. Ladling out the wine in turn, they drank, while munching the dates. Before long the bucket was empty.

"We haven't asked you the price yet," said the seven.

"I never bargain," the vendor asserted. "Exactly five strings of cash per bucket—ten strings for the load."

"Five strings you say, then five strings it shall be. But give us one free scoop out of the other bucket."

"Can't be done. My prices are fixed."

While one of the date merchants paid him the money, another opened the cover of the second bucket, ladled up some wine and started to drink it. The vendor hurried towards him but the man ran into the pine grove with the half consumed dipper of wine. As the vendor hastened after him, another merchant emerged from the grove with another ladle. He dipped this into the bucket and raised it to his lips. The vendor rushed over, seized the ladle, and dumped its contents back into the bucket. Replacing the cover, he flung the ladle to the ground.

"You look like a proper man—why don't you act like one?" he fumed. "Is that any way to behave?"

When the soldiers saw this, their throats felt even drier. All were longing for a drink. "Put in a word for us, old grandpa," one of them begged the chief steward. "Those date merchants drank a bucket of his wine. Why shouldn't we buy the other and wet our throats? We're hot and thirsty, and have nothing else to drink. There's no place to get water on this ridge. Do us a favour, old grandpa!"

The old steward heard them out. He felt like having a drink himself. So he conferred with Yang Zhi.

"Those date merchants have already finished a bucket of that vendor's wine. Only one bucket is left. Why not let them buy some wine and ward off heat stroke? There really isn't any place on this ridge to get water."

Yang Zhi thought to himself: "I watched those birds finish off his first bucket, and drink half a ladleful from the second. The wine must be all right. I've been beating out porters for hours. Maybe I ought to let them buy a few drinks."

Aloud, he said: "Since the chief steward suggests it, you rogues can have some wine. Then we'll march on."

The soldiers chipped in and raised the price of a bucket. But the vendor refused them. "I'm not selling, I'm not selling!" he said angrily. "This wine is drugged!"
"Don't be like that, brother," the soldiers said with placating smiles. "Is it worth making such a fuss?"
"I'm not selling," said the vendor, "so don't hang around!"
The date merchants intervened. "Stupid oaf!" they berated him. "What if that fellow said the wrong thing? You're much too serious. You've even tried to take it out on us. Anyhow, it has nothing to do with these porters. Sell them some wine and be done with it!"
"And give him a chance to cast suspicion on me for no reason at all?" the vendor demanded.
The date merchants pushed him aside and handed the bucket to the soldiers, who removed the cover. Having no ladles, they apologetically asked the merchants if they could borrow theirs.
"Have some dates, also, to go with your wine," said the merchants.
"You're very kind."
"No need to be polite. We're all travellers together. What do a hundred or so dates matter?"
The soldiers thanked them. The first two ladles of wine they presented to Yang Zhi and the chief steward. Yang Zhi refused but the old man drank his. The next two ladlefuls were consumed by the two captains. Then the soldiers swarmed around the bucket and imbibed heartily.
Yang Zhi wavered. The soldiers showed no ill effects. Besides, the weather was hot and his throat was parched. Scooping up half a ladle of wine, he drank it while munching on a few dates.
"Those date merchants drank a couple of ladlefuls out of this bucket, so you had less wine," the vendor said to the soldiers. "You can pay me half a string of cash less."
The soldiers gave him his money. The vendor took it, then, carrying his shoulder-pole and empty buckets, he swung off down the ridge, again singing a folk song.
Standing on the edge of the pine grove, the seven date merchants pointed at the fifteen men of the convoy and said: "Down you go! Down you go!" The fifteen, weak in the knees and heavy in the head, stared at each other as, one by one, they sank to the ground. Then the seven merchants pushed the seven wheel-barrows out of the grove and dumped the dates. Placing the eleven loads of jewels and art objects into the barrows, they covered them over.
"Sorry to trouble you," they called, and trundled off down the ridge.
Yang Zhi, too weak to move, could only groan inwardly. The fifteen couldn't get up. They had only been able to goggle helplessly while the seven had loaded the barrows with the precious cargo. They were paralyzed, bereft of speech.

*

Now I ask you—who were those seven men? None other than Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Liu Tang and the three Ruan brothers. And the wine vendor was Bai Sheng, nicknamed Daylight Rat. And how was the wine drugged? When the buckets were carried up the ridge, they contained pure wine. After the seven finished the first bucket, Liu Tang removed the cover from the second and deliberately drank half a ladleful so as to dull the others' suspicions. Next, inside the grove, Wu Yong poured the drug into the other ladle. Then he came out and spilled it into the wine while taking a "free scoop." As he pretended to drink, Bai Sheng grabbed the ladle and dumped the wine back in the bucket.
That was the ruse. Planned entirely by Wu Yong, it can be called "Capturing the Birthday Gifts by a Ruse."

*

Yang Zhi had not drunk much, and he recovered first. Crawling to his feet, he could hardly stand. He looked at the other fourteen. Saliva was running from the corners of their mouths. None of them could move. "You've made me lose the birthday gifts," Yang Zhi muttered in angry despair. "How can I ever face Governor Liang again? These convoy documents are worthless now!" He tore them up. "I've become a man without a home or country. Where can I go? Better that I should die right here on this ridge!" Clutching his tunic, he staggered to the edge of the ridge and prepared to jump. Truly, rains in the third month wash the fallen blossoms away, the last of willow tendrils the autumn frosts destroy. Yang Zhi sought death on Yellow Earth Ridge. What became of his life?

When Gongsun Sheng was telling Chao Gai about the birthday convoy in the library, and how it was ill-gotten gain and there was no reason at all why they shouldn't steal it, some one rushed in and seized hold of the Taoist, saying, "You're pretty foolhardy, aren't you. I've just heard every word you said!" This person of course was Wu Yong. Chao Gai laughed and said: "Stop playing the fool, Professor, and let me introduce you!"
After the two had formally bowed to each other, Wu Yong said: "I have often heard the brethren of the rivers and lakes speak of 'The Dragon-in-the-clouds' but I never managed to meet you until now."
Chao Gai said: "This most talented gentleman is Dr. Wu Yong, the Beacon of Learning."
"I too have often heard your illustrious name from the brethren of the rivers and lakes," Gongsun Sheng said to Wu Yong, "but I never guessed it would be my fate to meet you here at Boss Chao's. No doubt it's Mr. Chao's great generosity and virtue that brings all men to his door."
"There are some other friends within," said Chao Gai, "please come inside now and allow me to introduce you." So they all went in and joined Liu Tang and the three Ruan brothers.

Wealth's a lasting cause of strife;
This meeting of seven stars henceforth
Will have effects that last for life,
And summon up official wrath.

Everyone agreed that it could be no accident that had brought them together. They requested Chao Gai to take the place of honour.
"But I'm a poor host, I've so little to offer you, how can I do that?" Chao Gai protested.
"You are the senior," Wu Yong said, "so please do as I say and take it."
So Chao Gai had to consent. Wu Yong took the next place, followed by Gongsun Sheng, Liu Tang and the Ruans in that order. Then they drank to their meeting, and afterwards drank a second round, with some accompanying dishes. Then Wu Yong said: "Mr. Chao dreamed of the seven stars of the Plough descending on the roof of this house and now here we are, the seven of us, meeting to make plans, who can doubt that it was a vision sent him by heaven? This prize is really ours for the taking. Remember what we said the other day: that friend Liu should go and make inquiries, to find out what route the convoy is going to take. It's too late for today but he'd better go first thing in the morning, if he will."
"But there's no need," said Gongsun Sheng. "I've already heard, and I know the whole route. It's coming by way of Yellow Mud Ridge."
"Only about three miles to the east of Yellow Mud Ridge there's a place called Peacehaven," said Chao Gai. "There's a certain vagabond there, Bai Sheng by name, alias 'The Daytime Rat.' He's been to me for help on several occasions, and I've lent him money."
Wu Yong said: "He must surely be that other bright star accompanying the Plough. I think we can use him."
"Yellow Mud Ridge is quite a way from here," said Liu Tang. "Where are we going to shelter while we wait?"
"We'll make that Bai Sheng's house our headquarters," said Wu Yong. "And we'll find other uses for Bai Sheng as well."
"Tell me," said Chao Gai, "are we going to have to use force or can we do it by guile?"
"I've got it all worked out," said Wu Yong gleefully. "We'll set a trap. It'll depend what happens when they come: if they want to play it rough, that's the way it'll be, if they're sensible, so will we be. I've got my plan but tell me if you think it will do. We shall do this … and we shall do this … "
When he had finished, Chao Gai showed his delight. He stamped his foot and said, "Masterly! It's not for nothing they call you 'Beacon of Learning.' I think you surpass Zhuge Liang. A stroke of genius!"
"There's another saying," said Wu Yong, "that walls have ears, and who knows someone isn't hiding outside the window. Let's keep this to ourselves."
"The Ruan brothers had better go home for now," Chao Gai said, "and return again nearer the time. Dr. Wu Yong can go back to teaching his students, and Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang can stay here with me."
They sat up quite late drinking that night, and then each went to rest in a guest-room. The next day they rose and breakfasted at dawn, and then Chao Gai got thirty taels of stamped silver and presented them to the Ruan brothers, saying: "Here is a little something to go on with, for friendship's sake." Of course the Ruan brothers refused but Wu Yong said, "What is given in the spirit of friendship cannot be rejected," so finally they had to accept it. The others escorted them to the manor gates, and Wu Yong whispered in their ears: "Remember, we will do so … and we will do so … When the time comes, there must be no mistakes." Then the brothers departed. Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang stayed on at Chao Gai's, while Wu Yong visited often to discuss the plan.
Lest this become tedious, let us leave it and turn to the Northern Capital, where Governor Liang has prepared the hundred thousand cash birthday gift and only needs to choose the right day for it to be dispatched in convoy. One morning as he was sitting in his council chamber, Madam Cai came in to him. "Husband," she said, "when is that birthday gift going to be sent?"
"The items have all been acquired," he answered. "It could leave tomorrow or the day after. There's only one thing that I still can't decide."
"And what is that?"
"Last year I also spent a hundred thousand on pearls and jewels and other valuables that I dispatched to the Eastern Capital but owing to the negligence of my people it was all seized en route by robbers, who still haven't been apprehended. Now looking over my staff I cannot find one capable man whom I can send with the convoy. That's my problem."
Madam Cai pointed to where all his staff stood in attendance: "I thought you always said that man was absolutely brilliant? Why don't you give him the job of taking the convoy to the capital? Then you'll feel confident of its getting there."
Governor Liang looked to see who she meant. It was Yang Zhi. Excitedly, he summoned Yang Zhi and said: "I had forgotten all about you. I have decided to promote you, if you will take charge of this convoy for me."
Yang Zhi clasped his hands together, bowed and said: "Sir, your wish is my command. But what are the arrangements, and when is it to leave?"
"There will be ten carts, provided by the administration of Daming and ten guards from my personal bodyguard to watch the carts. Each cart will carry a yellow flag bearing the words 'Gift convoy for the Grand Preceptor's birthday.' A guard will walk behind each cart. The convoy will start in three days' time."
"Please do not think I am unappreciative of the honour but I cannot accept this charge. I beg you to look for some brave and reliable man who will take it on."
"But I told you, I wish to promote you. A letter will be sent with the convoy, strongly recommending you to the Grand Preceptor, and when you return it will be with an imperial commission. I don't see what your objection is, why do you refuse?"
"With your leave, sir, my point is this: I have heard that last year a convoy was seized by robbers who were never caught. At the present time the country is swarming with robbers. Between here and the Eastern Capital there is no route by water, it is all overland, and lies through the Gold and Purple Hills, Twin-Dragon Mountain, Mount Peachblossom, Umbrella Pike, Yellow Mud Ridge, White Sand Pass, Wild Cloud Ford and the Red-Pine Woods. These are all places where brigands resort. Even ordinary merchants dare not travel this route alone. When the robbers hear that there's gold and silver and jewels coming, how can they leave it alone? I'd just be throwing my life away. No, I can't take the job."
"If that's the problem, we'll simply add more guards to the escort."
"If you sent a hundred thousand guards, it wouldn't help. As soon as the bastards heard the bandits coming, they'd decamp."
"Are you saying that it's impossible to send the convoy?"
Yang Zhi respectfully declared: "If the whole thing was under my control, I'd be prepared to undertake it."
"If I give you the job, of course it would be under your control. What's your idea?"
"If you want to know what I think, I'd say you shouldn't have any guard at all, and you shouldn't use carts. The gift should be divided into carrying loads, to look like the bundles of goods ordinary merchants carry, and ten tough guards should be picked and disguised as common porters. The escort should consist of just one other, to accompany me, also disguised as a merchant. We should travel quietly, by night, till we deliver the goods to the Eastern Capital. That way it would work."
"That's a brilliant plan. I shall write a very strong recommendation for you, and you will undoubtedly return with a commission from the Emperor."
"I am truly grateful, sir, for your consideration."
Yang Zhi was ordered the same day to make up the carrying loads and pick the guard. Next day the Governor summoned him and asked: "Yang Zhi, when can you start?"
"We shall be ready to start tomorrow morning, if you give the order."
"My wife also has some gifts which she is sending to some relatives in her father's residence. She wants you to take them too. But in case you don't know where to deliver them, she is sending along the husband of her old nurse, old Colonel Xie, together with two lieutenants."
"Sir," said Yang Zhi, "then I cannot go."
"But everything is ready, why do you say you cannot go?"
"The original ten loads are all my responsibility, and the party will be under my orders. If I say we must start early, we start early; if I say we should start late, we start late. We stop when I say so, we rest when I say so, everything will be under my control. But if you now want this Colonel to go with me and the lieutenants, he'll be working for your wife, and he's also the husband of the nurse in the Grand Preceptor's house, if any dispute should arise between us on the journey, how can I argue with him? If anything should go wrong, how can I explain it?"
"That's no problem, I will put them all under your command."
"If you arrange it like that, then I accept the responsibility. If there are problems, the blame is mine, just as much as the honour."
"How right I was to promote you," said the Governor, delightedly. "You really think of everything!" So saying, he summoned before him Colonel Xie and the two lieutenants and told them: "Major Yang Zhi has agreed to take command of the entire birthday convoy, consisting of eleven loads of treasure, until such time as they are delivered to the Grand Preceptor in the capital. The entire mission is therefore his responsibility. You are to accompany him but in matters of what time you start, how long you travel, where you stay and when you rest, you must obey his instructions. You must on no account argue with him."
The old Colonel and his aides agreed to all these terms. They left with Yang Zhi. Next day everyone was up at dawn to fetch the loads from the government offices. The loads were laid out on the ground, and the old Colonel and the lieutenants brought along another small load of valuables and silk, making eleven in all. Eleven strong soldiers were picked and disguised as porters. Yang Zhi had a straw sun-hat and was dressed in a green cotton tunic belted at the waist, and wore light hemp shoes for walking. He carried a sword in his belt and a halberd. The old Colonel was also got up as a merchant, and the two lieutenants were dressed to look like his servants. Each carried a pike and a number of rattan canes. Governor Liang handed over the papers and after an ample breakfast the party bade the Governor farewell in front of Government House and set off, leaving through the Daming city gate and taking the road to the Eastern Capital. They were fifteen in all, eleven soldiers carrying the loads, Yang Zhi and old Colonel Xie, and the two lieutenants.
It was halfway through the fifth month, and the weather, though beautifully clear, was excessively hot and made travelling arduous. Prince Wu Qi has a poem about this sort of weather:

Jade screens and crimson railings all about,
Shoals of fishes playing among the weeds,
All the floor o'erspread with sumptuous mats,
The pillows of red agate. And such heat
As makes the six Dragons fear to go abroad,
And the seas scald the shores of Paradise Isle.
The listless sons of princes even begrudge
The effort required for waving of a fan;
Through the red dust the weary travellers trudge.

This refers to the blazing heat of summer, and the sons of princes are sitting in a cool pavilion over the water, amusing themselves by floating melons and pears.
But if Yang Zhi's party was to arrive in time for the birthday, in the middle of the sixth month, they must not loiter. For the first few days the routine was to rise at dawn and travel in the cool of the early morning; when it got hot in the middle of the day they rested. But after a week or so, when the way had gradually become less populated and travellers were few, when every stage was mountainous, Yang Zhi changed to starting in the late morning, and then stopping in mid-afternoon. The eleven guards found the going very tough: their loads were all equally heavy, and the heat was exhausting. The moment they saw a wood, they wanted to go and rest in the shade. But Yang Zhi chased them on. If they stopped they received horrific curses or even worse, a beating, forcing them to keep going. The two lieutenants, though they were only travelling with small backpacks, were panting for breath. Yang Zhi told them off too: "You're a useless pair! I have all the responsibility for this expedition but instead of lending me support, you dawdle along behind. That's exactly what we've got to avoid on this road."
"We don't mean to lag behind," they said. "But it's really too hot for travelling, we can't help it. Before we only travelled in the early morning, in the cool of the day. Why do you now insist on travelling at the very hottest time? It's very bad planning."
"I don't give a fart for what you think," Yang Zhi replied. "That was the good part before but now we've reached a wild region. We've got to keep going during the day, because how can risk being on the move before dawn or at night?"
That shut them up. But they still nursed their grievance: "The only thing this character knows how to do is bawl people out," they said to themselves. And when Yang Zhi took himself off with his halberd and his cane to chivvy the porters, they sat down in the shade of a willow to wait for the old Colonel. When he caught them up, they said: "This Yang Zhi's a bloody tyrant. He's only a major in the Governor's guard but look what airs he gives himself!" But the old Colonel said: "The Governor personally insisted that we were not to argue with him, that's why I've been keeping quiet. I quite agree he's been insufferable the last few days. But for the time being we'll just have to grin and bear it."
"The Governor was too soft with him," they said. "It's time you took a stand."
"No, we have to humour him."
That day they stopped in the afternoon again and found an inn to put up at. The eleven guards were soaked with sweat and gasping for breath. They approached the old Colonel: "It was a bad day for us when we decided to become soldiers," they said. "We know we are on an important mission but this heat, it's like a furnace, and these loads are so heavy! The last few days we haven't even had the benefit of the morning cool, and then, just for the slightest thing, he lays into us with that cane of his. We're human beings, it's not right that we should have to suffer like this!"
"It's no good complaining. When we get to the Eastern Capital, I'll make it up to you." the old Colonel said.

"If you were in command, Colonel, we wouldn't have cause to complain," they said.
A day later, they all rose before daylight and were about to set off while it was still cool. But Yang Zhi rushed out and shouted: "Where do you think you're going? Go back to sleep, it's not time yet!"
"If we don't go now while it's still early, we won't be able to move later when the sun's hot, and you'll beat us!"
"What do you know about it!" Yang Zhi picked up his cane and threatened them with it. They had to swallow their indignation and go back to sleep again. They breakfasted slowly that day, and did not leave till late in the morning; they were then chased along unmercifully and had no chance to rest in the shade anywhere. They muttered angrily to themselves as they went. The two lieutenants held forth vociferously to the old Colonel and the latter, though he said nothing, was inwardly seething.
Thus they continued — to cut the story short — for a fortnight, and there was not one of the fourteen men who did not hate Yang Zhi. One day they set off from their inn after a late and leisurely breakfast. It was the fourth day of the sixth month; the best of the morning was already gone and a great blazing sun filled the sky, without the slightest sign of a cloud. The heat was absolutely unbearable. There's an old poem about this kind of thing:

The Fire-god whips his dragons from the South,
His flaming banners fill the fiery sky;
The sun seems stuck at midday up above,
The earth's the red-hot centre of a stove.
Gone is all trace of green from the Mountains Five;[1]
And emptied the whole basin of the seas.
Oh, for a soothing touch of the autumn breeze,
To save us from being barbecued alive!

The route they had to traverse that day was a narrow trail winding over a desolate mountain range — whichever way you looked there were mountain peaks. The eleven guards plodded on under Yang Zhi's watchful eye. After some six or seven miles, the men wanted to seek rest and relief from the heat in the shade of a willow but Yang Zhi drove them on with blows of his cane, shouting: "Get going! I'll teach you to stop without permission!" They looked up at the sky. Not a cloud could they see anywhere. Such appalling heat!
The heat roasts them, baking dust coats their faces. The earth is fired to a surface like earthenware, the sky is become an umbrella of fire. Nothing but a still and silent wilderness. Trees are burnt up, streams have boiled dry, thousands of mountains have been heated till stones split and explode in clouds of ash. Birds drop exhausted from the sky to hide in the thickest part of the forest. Water creatures, their scales flaking, burrow in the deepest mud-holes. A tiger of stone even would gasp for breath, a man of iron be drenched in sweat.
But Yang Zhi went on urging them up that desolate mountain trail. The sun was nearly at its highest and the stones of the way burnt their feet. They felt they could go no further. "On a day like this," they cried, "it's enough to roast us alive!" But Yang Zhi merely shouted: "Faster! Get beyond the next ridge and then we'll see."
The crest is thickly wooded but the lower slopes are clad in yellow mire. The mountain's outline is jagged as the back of an old dragon, nothing is to be heard here but the sound of wind and rain echoing from its awesome cliffs. The undergrowth is thick and matted enough to hide an ambush and there are huge boulders behind which tigers and leopards might be crouching. Don't speak of the dangers of the Xichuan road. This is every bit the equal of Mount Taixing.
They pushed on towards the ridge which loomed above them, straining every muscle. The whole party arrived panting at the top, whereupon the eleven porters threw off their loads and flung themselves down in the shade of some pine trees. "Bloody Hell!" said Yang Zhi. "What a place to choose to relax in! Get up! Quick!" But they only replied: "Cut us to pieces, if you like but we're not moving another step." He beat them about the head and shoulders with his cane till some of them rose to their feet but others merely collapsed and wouldn't stir and he could do nothing about it. At this point the old Colonel and the two lieutenants arrived panting at the top of the ridge and also flung themselves down under the pine trees. When he saw Yang Zhi belaboring the guards, the Colonel said: "Major, it's really too hot to move, you can't blame them."
"Sir, don't you understand?" said Yang Zhi. "This is a favourite spot for robbers. It's known as Yellow Mud Ridge. Even in peaceful times they think nothing of waylaying people here in broad daylight. Who dares rest here in today's circumstances?"
The two lieutenants intervened: "You keep saying that. You're just trying to frighten us!"
"Let the men have a spot of rest," the old Colonel said. "We can go on in a little while when the sun's lower, how would that be?"
"You still haven't understood," Yang Zhi said. "How can that possibly make sense? To get down from this ridge we've got two or three miles of deserted road. This is simply not the place to take a rest."
"Well, I'm going to sit here for a while," the Colonel said. "You go on ahead with the others."
Yang Zhi waved his cane in the air and said, "Anyone who doesn't move is going to get twenty strokes from this!"
This produced a general outcry. "These loads we're carrying are a hundred catties," one of the men protested. "We're not travelling light, like you. It's not human, the way you treat us! If the Governor himself were in charge he'd listen to us. But you've no regard for people's sufferings. All you know how to do is bully us."
Yang Zhi continued to revile them. "You animals! You'll drive me mad! Beating's the only language you understand!" And he applied the cane with renewed vigour.
The old Colonel cried out: "Major Yang! Stop this! Listen to me! When I was employed at the palace of the Grand Preceptor I saw thousands of officers and they all respected me. I'm not trying to make trouble but I have to say that you are just an ordinary soldier. You were lucky enough to escape death and then the Governor felt sorry for you and decided to promote you. But you're still just a pipsqueak. Your rank doesn't give you the right to throw your weight around like this! Forget that I'm a colonel on the Governor's staff — even if I were just a village elder, you still ought to take my advice. Always wanting to beat the porters — what sort of behaviour is that?"
"Colonel, you're from the city, you grew up in a palace, what do you know about the dangers of the open road?"
"Well, I've been to Sichuan, I've been to Guangdong and Guangxi but I've never seen anyone like you!"
"But things are not the same nowadays, it's not to be compared with peaceful times."
"That's treason! Who says the times are not peaceful?"
As Yang Zhi was about to reply something caught his eye under the pine trees in the little wood opposite: a man poked his head out and gazed around. "What did I tell you?" he said. "Surely that's someone who's up to no good." He threw down the cane, picked up his halberd and hurried off towards the pine wood, shouting: "You, there! Why are you eying my merchandise?"
When he reached the wood, he was surprised to see seven wheelbarrows drawn up in a straight line. Six men had taken off their clothes and were resting there in the cool. Another, who had a big red birthmark on the temple, was standing guard with a halberd. When they saw Yang Zhi coming, they all cried out: "Aiya!" and leapt to their feet.
"Who are you?" Yang Zhi said. The strangers also said, "Who are you?" Yang Zhi asked, "Are you robbers, then?", and they replied, "That's putting it back to front, we're just small traders, and we haven't any money to give you!"
"So you're just small traders, are you? I suppose you think I'm rich?"
"Well, who are you anyway?" they asked.
"Tell me where you're from," Yang Zhi countered.
"We're brothers and we're from Haozhou. We're going to the Eastern Capital to sell our dates. We have to pass this way but lots of people have told us that here on Yellow Mud Ridge travelling merchants often get robbed. We've been saying to ourselves that all we've got is some dates, we haven't got anything of value. So we weren't worried about crossing the ridge. We climbed to the top but it was so hot we decided to have a bit of a rest in the wood here and wait till evening when it's cooler. When we heard people coming up behind us we were afraid it might be robbers, so we told our brother here to go out and have a look."
"Oh," said Yang Zhi. "We are merchants too, and when I saw you spying on us I thought you were robbers. That's why I came to have a look at you."
"Allow us to offer you some dates, then, before you go," they said.
"No, no," said Yang Zhi, and gripping his halberd he returned to where the porters were.
The old Colonel was still sitting there but he said: "If there are robbers, let's go."
"I only said they might be robbers," said Yang Zhi. "In fact they're date-sellers."
The old Colonel nodded towards the guards and said, "If all you said was true, that lot would be dead men by now!"
"There's no point in quarrelling," said Yang Zhi. "I just hope nothing goes wrong. Have your rest now, and we'll go on when it's cooler." The guards looked very relieved. Yang Zhi stuck his halberd in the ground and also went to rest under the trees.
Just a little while later, in less time than it takes to eat a bowl of rice, a man appeared in the distance. He was carrying two buckets on a pole and singing as he came up the mountain towards them:

The sun's a fiery furnace,
The plants are all burnt brown.
The peasant sweats in harness.
The noble waves his fan.

The man reached the crest of the ridge, still singing, and headed for the wood, where he rested his load and sat down to enjoy the cool. The guards were watching him. "What have you got in those buckets?" one of them asked.
"Clear wine," he replied.
"And where are you off to?"
"I'm going out to sell it."
"How much a bucket?"
"Five strings of cash — nothing less."
The guards were thinking, "We're hot and we're thirsty, why don't we buy some? It would help us to bear the heat." They began making a collection.
Yang Zhi had observed them. "Now what are you doing?" he shouted.
"We're going to buy a bowl of wine for ourselves."
Yang Zhi reversed his halberd and began to beat them with the butt. "Haven't you heard anything I said? Now you have to go and buy wine for yourselves, do you? You must want to die!"
"You've no reason to swear at us like that," they said. "We're putting in our own money for the wine, so what business is it of yours? Why do you keep on beating us?"
"You bloody peasants, you've just got no idea! All you think of is getting drunk! You know nothing at all about the dangers of the road. How many good men have been destroyed by drugged wine!"
The wine-carrier gave Yang Zhi a nasty look and said: "You, Mr. Merchant, what the hell are you talking about? Anyway, I wouldn't sell to you, since you're so rude!"
While this dispute was in progress, the date-sellers appeared from the pine wood, carrying their halberds. "What's the row about?" they asked.
"I just got to the top of the ridge with this wine which I'm going to sell in the next village," the wine-seller said. "I was hot so I stopped here for a rest. They wanted to buy some wine from me but I didn't give them any. Then this boss of theirs goes and says my wine is drugged. How do you like that! He's got no right to go around casting aspersions like that!"
"Bah!" said the date-sellers. "So that's what all the noise was about, we thought robbers had come at least. What does it matter what he says? We were just thinking some wine would be good. If he doesn't trust it, sell some to us."
"No, I won't," the wine-carrier said.
"You're a bloody fool," they said. "We didn't insult you. Supposing you take the wine to the village and sell it there, you'll get the same money, won't you? So if you sell some to us what's the difference? You'll be doing a good deed, as well, you'll enable us to quench our thirst."
"All right, I'd sell a bucket to you but they said my wine was bad and besides, I haven't got a dipper."
"Don't take it so seriously. What does it matter what they said? And we've got our own dipper." Two of them went over to the wheelbarrows and brought out two coconut dippers. Another scooped up a big handful of dates. They ranged themselves around the bucket and someone took off the cover. Taking turns with the dippers they ladled out the wine and drank, and munched the dates. In no time at all they'd finished the whole bucket. Then one of them said: "We haven't even asked you the price."
"I never bargain," the wine-carrier said. "It's five strings of cash the bucket, ten for two."
"Then five strings it is but give us one free scoop from the other one."
"No go, the price is fixed."
While one of the date-sellers was paying him, another removed the cover from the other bucket, plunged the ladle in, withdrew it quickly and began to drink. The wine-carrier made a grab at him but he ran off towards the wood, still holding a half-full ladle of wine. When the wine-seller gave chase another date-seller emerged from the wood with a ladle, ran to the bucket, dipped and started drinking. The wine-carrier dashed back. He grabbed the ladle and poured its contents back into the bucket that he then covered. He threw the ladle on the ground, muttering: "You merchants have no morals. To look at you, anyone would say you were honest, respectable people but you go and behave like this!"
Now the guards had been watching all this, and they were seized with an overwhelming desire to drink. One of them addressed the old Colonel: "Sir, won't you put in a word for us? Those date-sellers bought one of his buckets, we would dearly love to buy the other one, to wet our throats a little. We're terribly thirsty, it's unbearable! There's absolutely nowhere we can get any water up here. Please sir, help us!"
Listening to them the old Colonel began to feel thirsty himself. He said to Yang Zhi: "The date-sellers have already finished the bucket they bought from him, and there's only one more. You might as well let the men buy it, to relieve their thirst. There's nowhere up here they can get water."
Yang Zhi considered. "I watched that lot finish off the first bucket and they also had half a ladle from the other," he thought to himself. "I suppose the wine must be all right. I've been giving them a hard time. I might as well let them have some wine." He said: "For the Colonel's sake, you can have the wine. But then we must start."
The guards collected the five strings of cash and approached the wine-carrier. But he refused to sell them any. "No," he said, "this wine is drugged, didn't you hear?" They laughed conciliatingly and said, "Friend, don't go on harping on that." But he merely repeated, "I'm not selling!" The date-sellers now intervened: "Don't be so bloody-minded! Okay, that officer was a bit rude but why take it so seriously? You even tried to take it out on us! Those porters aren't to blame. You might just as well let them have some wine."
"He had no right to accuse me like that for no reason at all."
Finally the date-sellers pushed him aside and handed the bucket of wine over to the guards. The latter took the lid off but they hadn't got a ladle. Somewhat apologetically they asked the date-sellers to lend them theirs. "Of course," said the latter, "and here are a few dates to go with the wine."
"That's very kind of you," the soldiers said.
"No need to thank us. We're all in the same boat, what's a few dates between friends?"
The first two ladles of wine were offered to the old Colonel and Yang Zhi. Yang Zhi refused but the Colonel drank his. Then the two lieutenants drank. Finally the soldiers waded in, and it was not long before the bucket was dry.
Yang Zhi watched them drink and saw there was no effect but at first he continued to resist. However, it was a very hot day and his throat was parched. He took the ladle and swallowed half. He also ate some dates.
"Those date-sellers drank a measure of wine out of this bucket," the wine-carrier said, when they collected the money to pay him. "That leaves you a bit short, so I'll charge you half a string of cash less." He took the money, picked up the empty buckets and marched off down the mountain as he had come, singing his mountain song.
Now suddenly the seven date-sellers standing on the verge of the wood pointed towards the party of fifteen and shouted: "They're going, they're going!"
See them there, all fifteen of them, heads falling and legs floating, staring at each other unseeingly till gently they keel over. Next thing, the seven push their wheelbarrows out of the wood. They sweep all the dates off onto the ground and reload with eleven bundles of treasure. They cover the barrows carefully and pausing an instant to say: "So sorry!" wheel them off down the mountain.
Well, after all, it was a case of:

It's valued in blood, this ill-gotten wealth
Wrung from the people, heedless of their health.
No wonder it caught the robbers' eye;
This crime's not hard to justify.

What could Yang Zhi do but bemoan his fate? His body was too weak, there was no fight left in him. They all witnessed the treasure being spirited away but, unable to move or speak, there was absolutely nothing they could do about it.
And now I ask you, who were those seven? Who else would they be but Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Liu Tang and the three Ruan brothers? And the wine-carrier, he was Bai Sheng, the Daytime Rat. How did they administer the drug? Well, when they first came up the mountain both buckets were good wine. When they had drunk the first one, Liu Tang uncovered the second and drank half a ladle, making sure everyone saw him. This was the trap they set. Afterwards Wu Yong went and got the drug from the wood and poured it into a ladle and pretended to steal more wine. When he dipped the ladle in the wine he mixed the drug with it. Then he pretended to take out half a ladle and drink it. The Daytime Rat seized the ladle from him and poured it all back. This was the ruse they employed, devised by Wu Yong, and it became famous as "Seizing the birthday convoy by craft."
Yang Zhi had only drunk a little of the wine and soon came round. He struggled to get up but he was still very shaky on his feet. The others lay there dribbling, quite unable to move. "Thanks to you," he thought bitterly, "the birthday convoy is lost. How can I ever return and face Governor Liang? My commission is useless now." So saying he tore the letter of appointment up. "Now I'm a man without home or country. Where can I go? Wouldn't it be better just to find somewhere to die here on the mountain?" He hitched up his robe and started unsteadily towards the edge, aiming to dash himself down from Yellow Mud Ridge. As they say:

Fallen flowers will vanish in spring rain;
And autumn frosts erase the willow's green.

While Gongsun Sheng was stating that it was not improper to seize the birthday presents from the Northern Capital as they had been bought with ill-gotten gains, a man rushed into the room, took hold of him and said, "I know what you are discussing. But how bold you are to talk about it!" The man was Wu Yong. Chao Gai laughed and said, "Teacher, stop this fooling, and let me introduce you to this man."

When the man had been introduced, Wu Yong said, "I have heard of the fame of Gongsun Sheng, the 'Cloud Dragon,' but I never expected to meet him here in this way."

Chao Gai introduced Wu Yong, and Gongsun Sheng then said, "Everywhere men speak highly of Wu Yong. But I did not expect to meet you at the village of this chief at the present time. It is simply because the chief distributes wealth in a good cause that all the heroes in the country come to him."

Chao Gai said there were some friends in the hall at the back whom he would also like to introduce.

They then all went into the hall where Liu Tang and the three brothers Ruan were duly introduced.

They all asked the chief to take the seat of honour, as their meeting there that day was not a casual affair.

"I am only a poor host," said Chao Gai, "so how dare I take the seat of honour?"

"Chief and elder brother," said Wu Yong, "you are much older than us, so I hope that you will comply with our requests, and take the seat of honour."

So Chao Gai sat down, Wu Yong took the second seat, Gongsun Sheng, the third seat, Liu Tang, the fourth seat, Ruan the Second, the fifth seat, Ruan the Fifth, the sixth seat, Ruan the Seventh, the seventh seat, and they all ate and drank the food and wine which was placed on the table.

Wu Yong said, "Chief, you had a dream, and saw the seven stars of the Dipper descending from the sky, and settling on the ridge of the roof. Today we seven men have assembled here to transact some business, and does it not mean that our meeting fulfills the forecasts of Heaven? I am sure that we shall succeed easily in this business. But previously we agreed that Brother Liu should make inquiries as to which way the presents are being sent so I suggest that he will start early tomorrow morning."

"There is no need for him to go," said Gongsun Sheng, "because I already know that the presents are being sent via Huangni Ridge."

"That place is not far from the village of Anlo which is about three li apart in an easterly direction. At that village there is a man of leisure named Bai Sheng, nicknamed 'Daylight Rat,' who previously came here when I helped him with some money."

"Does not this man answer the white light that was forecast in the dream?" said Wu Yong. "I think we ought to make use of him."

"This place is rather a long way from Huangni Ridge," said Liu Tang, "but is there a place there where we can rest?"

"We can stop at Bai Sheng's house," said Wu Yong, "and also make use of him."

"Mister Wu, shall we use force or not to get these presents?" asked Chao Gai.

Wu Yong laughed as he replied, "I have already prepared a trap for them. We need only to see how they arrive. If they are armed we must use force, and if they are on their guard we must use strategy. I have a plan but I do not know whether you will approve of it." He then explained his plan. When Chao Gai understood the plan he was so filled with glee that he stamped with his feet, and said, "A splendid idea! No wonder they call you 'Clever Star.' You are really better than Zhuge Liang![63] A splendid plot!"

"You must not mention it," said Wu Yong. "There is a saying, 'Walls have ears, and outside the window is there not a man?' This plan must be kept between you and me only."

"You three brothers of the Ruan family can now return to your home," said Chao Gai, "and you can come again when the time arrives. Tutor Wu can also go back, and resume your teaching. Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang can stay at this farmhouse."

On that day they all dined together, and afterwards retired to their separate rooms. The next morning they were all getting up about five o'clock, and after eating their breakfast Chao Gai took thirty taels of silver and giving it to the three brothers Ruan, he said, "This little silver is only a slight expression of what I think of you, and I hope that you will accept it."

But the three brothers Ruan refused to take the silver, and Wu Yong said, "As we are friends you should not raise any objection." The three brothers then agreed to accept the silver. The brothers were escorted outside the gate of the farmhouse where Wu Yong whispered to them as to what was going to be done, and that when the suitable opportunity arose there would be no delay. The brothers then departed for their home at Shijie Village. Chao Gai, Gongsun Sheng, and Liu Tang stayed behind at the farm where they had frequent conferences with Wu Yong.

Now we shall relate how Grand Secretary Liang at the Northern Capital, having purchased the birthday gifts for one hundred thousand strings of cash, selected a day on which to dispatch them. It happened that one day as he was sitting in the private apartments his wife Madame Liang asked him, "On what day are you thinking of dispatching the birthday presents?"

Liang replied, "The presents are now all ready, and they will be dispatched either tomorrow or the day after. But there is one thing that I cannot decide."

"What is that?" asked his wife.

"This year I am unable to find a servant whom I can intrust with these valuables, and that is the difficulty."

Madame Liang pointed to a man standing at the bottom of the steps to the hall, and said, "You have always said that that man was very strong so why don't you give him the order for this work? I think that he will not make a mistake."

Grand Secretary Liang saw that the man she was pointing to was Yang Zhi, "Blue Faced Brute." Although he had not made up his mind what to do, he summoned Yang Zhi and said to him, "I have almost forgotten you. If you will escort some valuable birthday presents for me without mishap I will see that you will be duly promoted."

Yang Zhi saluted with his folded hands, and said, "If Your Excellency tell me to go I must obey you. But I do not know yet what arrangements have been made, and when you want me to start."

Liang said, "I want to dispatch ten carts from Daming Prefecture, in charge of ten soldiers from my headquarters. On each cart there, will be a yellow flag, with the inscription, 'Birthday Presents for the Prime Minister,' I will also send a soldier for each cart to guard it. These will be dispatched within the next three days."

Yang Zhi said, "I am not trying to excuse myself but really I cannot go. I suggest that you should send the best of your able heroes."

"I have been thinking of promoting you," said Liang. "With the presents I will dispatch a letter for the Prime Minister recommending you for promotion, and when you have received the Imperial appointment you can return here. What is your objection to going?"

"I have heard," said Yang Zhi, "that last year the presents were seized by brigands who have not been arrested so far. This year there are more brigands about than last year. We shall have to go by road to the Eastern Capital as there is no water route. The road is via Mount Zijin, Mount Lianglong, Mount Taohua, Mount Sangai, Huangni Ridge, Baisha Wharf, Yeyun Ferry, and Chisong Forest. But at all those places there are bandits so that even a merchant with no valuables dare not travel there by himself. If the bandits get to know of the presents being sent they will certainly try to seize them. I do not want to lose my life just now so I am afraid that I cannot go."

"In that case," said Liang, "I will let you have more soldiers to accompany you."

"'Even if you let me have ten thousand soldiers," said Yang Zhi, "they will be of no use, because as soon as they hear of the coming of bandits they will all run away."

"Then do you think that I had better not to send the presents?" asked Liang.

"I will go if you will promise me one thing," replied Yang Zhi.

"Since I ask you to do this business," said Liang, "I of course have confidence in you. What promise do you want?"

"I want you to leave the matter in my hands, and I shall not use carts but will pack the presents in ten loads as traveller's baggage to be carried on poles over the shoulders. The ten soldiers shall be dressed as porters to carry the loads, and another man in traveller's costume without a load can accompany me. We should travel stealthily during the night until we reached the Eastern Capital."

"What you say is fine," said Liang. "I will write a dispatch recommending you for promotion, and when you have received your new rank you can return here."

"Thanks very much for your favour," said Yang Zhi.

The same day Yang Zhi packed the presents, and selected soldiers to go with him. The following day he was told to wait in the hall, and when Grand Secretary Liang came there he said to him.

"Yang Zhi, when do you propose to start?"

Yang Zhi replied that he thought of starting early the following morning, and asked for his orders.

Liang said that his wife had also some presents which she was sending to Cai's family, and these would also be intrusted to Yang Zhi. "As she is afraid that you do not know the person to whom the present must be delivered she will send with you the husband of one of her nurses, Chief Steward Xie, and also two servants."

Yang Zhi said, "Sir, I am afraid that I cannot go."

"The presents are now all packed ready for dispatch," said Liang, "so why do you now refuse to go?"

Yang Zhi saluted and said, "I will be responsible for the presents carried by the soldiers, and they will obey my orders as to when we must travel, whether early or late, and when we must stop or rest. But what can I do if these three extra men who have been deputed by your wife will not obey my orders on the road? If in this way any mishap happens to the convoy what explanation can I offer?"

"That is easily arranged," said Liang. "I will give them definite orders that they must follow your instructions."

"In that case," said Yang Zhi, "I will undertake the job, and if the things are lost I am willing to bear severe punishment." Grand Secretary Liang said, "I am not mistaken in employing you, you are indeed an experienced man." He forthwith summoned Xie and the two servants from his private apartments, and gave them orders saying. "Major Yang Zhi is willing to take charge of the convoy of the birthday presents made up in eleven loads, and will see that they are duly delivered to the Prime Minister at the Eastern Capital. He is responsible for everything. You three men will go with him, and on the road you must carefully follow his orders at all times as to when you are to stop or rest, and you must not dispute his authority. You will of course carry out the commissions my wife told you to execute for her. You must also be careful and not lose anything, and also get the business finished as soon as possible."

The three men agreed to do this, and the same day Yang Zhi took charge of the presents. The following morning about five o'clock Yang Zhi had the eleven loads of presents placed in front of the hall, and gave them to the eleven robust soldiers who were dressed like coolies. Yang Zhi was wearing a cool summer hat, a black crape gown, hempen shoes, with puttees wound round his legs, a sword in his belt, a halberd carried in his hand. Xie was dressed like a traveller, and his two servants accompanied him. Each man wore a halberd, and carried a cane. Grand Secretary Liang gave Yang Zhi the dispatches he had prepared. The men who had eaten their meals, saluted Liang in the hall before their departure, and he then watched them start on their journey. Including Yang Zhi, Xie, and the two servants there were altogether fifteen men in the convoy who left the Northern Capital and started on the road towards Eastern Capital.

That time was the middle of the fifth lunar month, and the weather was very hot so that traveling was unpleasant.

Yang Zhi was determined to reach the Eastern Capital by the fifteenth day of the following month, so he made forced marches on the road. During the first seven days from the Northern Capital they started about five o'clock each morning when it was quite cool, and rested at midday. After the first week, they passed through a scarcely populated district and met few people on the way. The road was hilly, and therefore Yang Zhi decided to start everyday about 8 A.M. The eleven soldiers acting as porters found their loads quite heavy in that district, and whenever they saw a wood they wanted to stop there and rest. If the men stopped for a short time Yang Zhi cursed them as lazy hounds but if they stayed a long time he even went so far as to strike them in order to get them to move. The two servants carried only their own baggage but still they panted for breath and walked very slowly. Yang Zhi spoke to them strongly saying, "You do not seem to understand this business! I am responsible for the whole thing! You do not beat these men for me, yet you walk slowly behind them. This is not a place for passing the time idly."

The two servants replied, "We do not wish to walk slowly but the weather is so hot that it is impossible to walk quickly, and that is why we get behind them. Previously we started early when it was cool but now the travel in so hot weather makes us walk slowly. Your orders are hardly fair."

Yang Zhi replied, "You're just farting, not speaking! Previously we travelled through fairly quiet places but now we are passing a dangerous locality. If it is hard to walk during the day who would dare walk here during the night?"

The servants did not reply to this but they thought in their minds, "This fellow ought not to go to the extent of using abusive language."

Yang Zhi took his halberd in one hand, and a cane in the other, and went to urge the men on. The two servants however sat down in the shade of a willow tree, and waited there until Xie caught up to them when they spoke to him. "This fellow Yang Zhi, although he is only a Major yet tries to pass himself off as a more important person. He puts on too much side."

Xie replied, "Grand Secretary Liang told us definitely that we must obey Yang Zhi, and that is why I have not said anything although these last few days I have noticed that he has been very severe, and we have had to endure it."

The two servants said, "What Liang said was simply to give Yang Zhi a little face but now you ought to decide matters yourself."

Xie replied, "Let us put up with him for the time being."

That evening about five o'clock they found an inn where they could stop. The eleven porters were dripping with perspiration, and panting for breath. They said to Xie, "We were very unfortunate to ever become soldiers. We are of course aware that we have been sent to do this work. But the heat has been so oppressive and our loads are exceptionally heavy. These last few days we have not even been walking in the cool of the morning. It has been very fatiguing, and Yang Zhi has beaten us with his cane. Our flesh and blood is the same as his, so why should we have this bitterness?"

"You must not be discontented," said Xie. "When we reach Eastern Capital I myself will give you a reward."

"If he treat us as you do," said a soldier, "we should have no cause for complaint."

They passed the night there, and before daybreak they all got up as they wanted to avail of the morning cool to start. Yang Zhi hastily got up and shouted out, "Where are you going? Go to sleep again, and wait until I give you the order."

The men said, "If we do not start when it is early, it will be so hot during the day that you will beat us with your cane."

"What do you know about it?" asked Yang Zhi. He seized his cane and was trying to strike them.

The men restrained their anger, and lay down to sleep. That day they got up about 8 A.M., slowly cooked their breakfast, and then started off. Again on the road Yang Zhi used his cane, and would not allow the porters to rest where there was a cool place. The men muttered their discontent to themselves as they plodded along. The two servants frequently spoke to Xie about the matter. Xie listened to what they said, and in his heart he harboured disgust with Yang Zhi.

We need not describe in detail the journey but after traveling like this for about a fortnight there was not a single man of the fourteen who did not hate Yang Zhi.

On the fourth day of the sixth month they got up as usual at 8 A.M. and prepared their breakfast in a leisurely manner. That morning there was not the smallest speck of cloud in the sky, the sun was glaringly bright, and it was exceedingly hot. There was only a very narrow footpath to follow, and it led through a lonely shaggy area among the mountains. After they had travelled about seven li the porters felt tired and wished to rest a while in the shade of some willow trees. But Yang Zhi came up with his cane, and shouted at them, "Hurry up! I will give you a rest by and by!" The porters looked at the sky but could not see a cloud anywhere, and as the day was so hot they could not stand in the heat any longer. But Yang Zhi continued to press them forward along the deserted footpath. It was almost noon, and the stones on the road were as hot as to burn their feet. They said, "It is very hot, and we shall be burnt to death."

Yang Zhi shouted, "Hurry up! When you get over this mountain ridge we will then discuss matters."

The men continued on their way, and when they reached the summit of the hill they rushed to the shade of a pine forest to sleep.

Yang Zhi said, "What kind of a place is this to rest in. Get up at once!"

The men replied, "Even if you threatened to cut each of us up with your sword into seven pieces we could not go any further just now."

Yang Zhi belabored the men with his cane, and got a few to stand up but the others all lay down to sleep. Yang Zhi saw that it was impossible to do anything more. The two servants and Xie just then also reached the top of the pass, panting for breath, and they also lay down under the pine trees.

Xie spoke to Yang Zhi, "Major, it is too hot to walk any further just now. Do not beat the men any more."

"You do not understand," said Yang Zhi. "This is a place well-known for bandits and is called the Huangni Ridge. Even in time of peace they often committed their robberies in broad daylight. Now the times are so full of troubles, how can we stop here?"

The two servants upon hearing this said, "We have heard you say that several times before, and you only frighten us with that."

"Would it not be better," said Xie, "if you let these men rest now, and they can proceed on their way after noon has passed?"

"You also do not understand," said Yang Zhi. "How can we do that? In the next three li going down from this pass there are no houses. This is an awful place so how dare we stop here?"

"I will rest here a while before I go on," said Xie. "You tell the men to go forward, and not wait for me."

"If any one does not go forward," said Yang Zhi, "I will give him twenty blows with my cane."

The men cried out and expressed their disapproval of this. One of them said, "Major, each of us is carrying a load of about one hundred and forty pounds, whereas you carry nothing. You are not treating us as human beings. If Grand Secretary Liang was in your place he would willingly listen to what we say. You do not know the pain we have to bear. You are only trying to enforce your own order."

"You brutes are enough to make me die from anger," said Yang Zhi, "I must beat you." So saying he struck them on their heads with his cane.

"Major, stop," shouted Xie. "Listen to me! When my wife was acting as wetnurse in the home of the Prime Minister I saw many officers in the army, and they always did what I asked them without a murmur. I do not wish to offend you but previously you were only a banished soldier and only through the kindness of the Grand Secretary did you get your present position as a Major. At present your rank is about the size of a mustard seed, how can you carry matters with such a high hand? Even if I am a village elder you should listen to my one advice, to not say that I am a steward in the household of the Grand Secretary. Now you insist on beating them, what is this treatment?"

"Steward Xie," said Yang Zhi, "you are brought up in town and have passed your time in the house of the Prime Minister, you naturally know nothing of the enormous difficulties of traveling by road."

The steward replied, "I have travelled in both Sichuan, Guangdong, and Guangxi provinces but I never saw a man who put on such airs as you do."

"The country at present is not so peaceful as that in your time," said Yang Zhi.

"As you talk like this," said steward Xie, "your tongue ought be cut out. Where is the place that is not peaceful just now?"

Yang Zhi was just on the point of answering the steward when looking into the pine forest he saw the shadow of a man who was evidently spying on them. He then said, "What are you saying? Just here comes the bad man." He then threw down his cane, picked up his halberd, and striding into the forest he shouted out, "What a brigand you are! How dare you look at our things like that?" Going forward he saw among the trees seven Jiangzhou style handcarts and arranged in a line. There were also six men with them who had stripped off all their clothes and were resting in the shade. One of the men had a big red birthmark on his temple, and he had a halberd in his hand. When the men saw Yang Zhi approaching them they all exclaimed, "Ai Ya!" and got up.
"Who are you?" shouted Yang Zhi.
"Who are you?" asked the men.
"Are you not all bandits?" asked Yang Zhi.
"You talk nonsense," said the men. "We are only petty traders, so where can we have the money to give you?"
"You are only petty traders," said Yang Zhi, "where can I have the money to give you?"
"Then tell us who you are," asked the seven men.
"You first tell me where you come from," said Yang Zhi.
The seven men replied, "We seven brothers are from Haozhou. We are on our way to the Eastern Capital to sell our dates there, and happen to pass this way. We have heard many people say that at this Huangni Ridge there are bandits who may attack us and seize our goods. But as we have only dates, and no other valuable goods, we came this way in spite of the warning. When we got to the top of this ridge we found the heat was so hot that we decided to have a little rest in the shade of these trees, and proceed further when it is a little cooler. While we were resting we heard you coming along and as we were afraid that you might be bandits, we sent a man to see who you were."
"Then it appears," said Yang Zhi, "that you are travellers just like us. When I saw this man spying I was afraid that he was a bandit, and so I came forward to investigate matters."
The seven men then asked Yang Zhi to partake of some of their dates but Yang Zhi declined the offer, and with his halberd in his hand went back to his own men.
The steward Xie, who was resting under the trees, said, "As there are bandits here we had better get along."
"At first," said Yang Zhi, "I also thought that they were bandits but I have found out that they are only traders with some dates."
"If it had been as you said previously all our men would have been killed," said Xie, looking towards the men.
"We need not quarrel any more. The only thing that I am anxious about is our safety," said Yang Zhi. "You can now have a rest, and when it is cooler we will go on."
All the men laughed upon hearing this. Yang Zhi stuck his halberd in the ground, and then went and sat under a tree for a rest.
In a very short time they saw a man approaching carrying a couple of buckets from a pole over his shoulder. As he reached the summit of the ridge he sang:

The sun pours down its glowing heat.
Parching the growing corn;
The farmer's heart melts in the glow,
The rich fan to and fro,
While I sweat here forlorn.

The man put down his buckets, and also sat down under a tree to rest. The soldiers asked him what he had got in the buckets, and he told them it was white wine. They then asked where he was going to, and the man replied that he was going to sell it in the village. The soldiers inquired the price of a bucket, and were informed that the lowest price was five strings of cash.
The soldiers talked the matter over among themselves saying that as they were all hot and thirsty why should they not buy the wine and have a drink. They then got out their money to see how much they had altogether.
Yang Zhi seeing this shouted out, "What are you doing?"
The men replied that they were going to buy some wine for a drink. Yang Zhi took hold of his halberd by the blade, and beat them with the shaft saying, "You have not even asked me whether you can do this or not. How dare you buy wine without my permission. How brave you are!"
The soldiers replied, "Without any justification you try to stir up troubles. We are going to buy some wine by our own money so what have you got to do with that? And yet you beat us."
Yang Zhi said, "You clodhoppers! What do you know? You want to drink wine, and yet you do not understand the great difficulties of the road. Many heroes have drunk drugged wine, and become unconscious."
The man who had carried the wine grinned at Yang Zhi, and said, "You evidently do not know much. I will certainly not sell any of the wine to you yet you talk so unreasonably." While they were so wrangling the seven men came towards him with halberds in their hands. They asked him, "What is the row about?"
The man with the wine said, "I am carrying this wine to a village to sell it, and being hot I sat down to rest here. These men asked me to sell them some wine but before I could do so this traveller said that the wine might be drugged. Wasn't that funny?"
"Pooh!" said one of the seven men. "We thought that some bad man had come but it appears now that your talk was hardly worthwhile. There is no need for a quarrel. We are very thirsty, and although he is suspicious, we will buy a bucket of wine ourselves."
The wine seller said that he would not sell.
"You stupid fellow," said one of the seven men, "you evidently do not understand that we have not condemned your wine. If you take it to the village you will only get the same price that we shall pay so why not sell it to us? We think that if you had only tea or water you would give it to us to assuage our thirst."
"I would not mind selling you a bucket of wine," said the wine seller, "if he had not said that it might be bad. But you have no ladles or cups to drink the wine with."
You are too particular," said one of the seven men, "what he said was not very important. We have a coconut shell which we can use as a ladle." Two men went to their carts, and one brought back two coconut shells, and the other as many dates as he could carry in his hands. The seven men then stood round the bucket, and taking off the cover they helped themselves to the wine, and ate the dates. In a short time they had finished the bucket of wine. One of the men pointed out that they had not asked what the cost of the wine was.
The wine seller said, "I have not mentioned the price but each bucket costs five strings of cash."
"We will pay you five strings of cash," said one of the seven men, "but you might now give us a ladle of wine free."
"I cannot give you wine free, the price is fixed," said the wine seller.
One man gave him the money but another man took off the cover of the other bucket, and took a ladle full of wine. The wine seller objected to the latter's conduct but the man drank half of the wine, and went towards the pine forest. The wine seller followed him, and then saw another man come out of the forest with a ladle that he dipped into the wine. The wine seller hurried back and seizing the ladle emptied the contents into the bucket. He threw the ladle down on the ground, and put the cover on the bucket again. He said, "You have not the manners but are dressed as gentleman and yet make so much trouble?"
The soldiers had seen all this happening, and as they also would have liked a drink of the wine they became dissatisfied. One of them said to steward Xie, "Sir, will you speak for us? Those merchants selling dates have bought a bucket of wine and drunk it. We must buy the other bucket of wine, and moisten our throats a little. We are very thirsty, and there is no other way. At this place there is not a drop of water anywhere so we hope you will do this good action."
Steward Xie wanted a drink himself and upon the soldier's request he spoke to Yang Zhi, "These dates traders have bought and drunk a bucket of wine, so would it not be as well to let our men buy some wine to assuage their thirst? Here there is no water."
Yang Zhi thought the matter over, "I have noticed from a distance that the men who have bought a bucket of wine have taken also one ladle from the other bucket, and drank it, and it appears to be all right. As I have been beating my soldiers I will now allow them to buy the wine just as they please." He said, "Steward, as you have requested me you may now tell our men to buy wine and drink it. Then they must start without further delay."
The soldiers upon hearing this soon collected five strings of cash to buy the wine with. But the wine seller declined to sell it, as he had said that it was drugged.
The soldiers coaxed him and said, "Brother, is it worthwhile saying that?"
"I won't sell," said the wine seller. "You need not say anything more."
The man who was selling dates interposed and said, "You foolish fellow! That man (Yang Zhi) was wrong but you are so particular and refused to sell to us before but I think you had better let them have a drink because they have not spoken against you." "How can it be that suspicion is aroused without cause?" asked the wine seller.
The trader of dates gently pushed the wine seller to one side, and then gave the soldiers the remaining bucket of wine.
The soldiers took the lid off the bucket but as they had no ladle, they asked the trader to lend them the coconut ladle. The trader lent them the ladle, and also gave them some dates to eat with the wine.
The porters expressed their thanks.
"You need not thank me," said the trader, "nor mention the hundred dates I have given you, as we are both travellers."
The soldier porters again expressed their thanks, and then offered a ladle of wine to the Steward Xie, and also another one to Yang Zhi.
But Yang Zhi would not drink the wine so the two servants drank it. The soldier porters then all drank, and it was not long before the bucket was quite empty.
Yang Zhi saw that his men had no ill effects from drinking the wine, so as the day was so hot, and besides that he was very thirsty, he himself took and drank half a ladle of the wine, and also took some of the dates.
The wine seller said, "There was a ladle of wine stolen from that bucket, so I will make a discount for it of half a string of cash."
The soldiers paid him accordingly, and as soon as he had received the money the wine seller shouldered his two empty buckets, and left the place singing his song. The seven traders of dates sitting under the pine trees pointed their fingers at the soldiers and said, "They are now falling down." The soldiers, in fact, felt "their heads heavy and their feet fight," and after looking at each other slyly had lain down.
The seven traders left the shade of the pine trees, and unloaded their carts of the dates, and then reloaded them with the valuable presents, and covered the loads. They then went straight down the Huangni Ridge making a loud noise on their way.
Yang Zhi saw this happen but although he struggled to get up he could not do so as his body was so weak. He fully realized the bitterness of his position. Also the fifteen men stared at these proceedings but they were equally helpless.
Now I want to ask you who those seven men were. They were none other than Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Liu Tang, and the brothers Ruan. The wine seller who had just gone before was Bai Sheng, the "Daylight Rat."
When and how had they drugged the wine? At the time the wine arrived at the Huangni Ridge it was quite good wine. The wine that the seven traders drank was also good, and Liu Tang opened the bucket and took half a ladle to drink just to show the soldiers that this wine was also good. Afterwards Wu Yong put some drug in a ladle, and bringing it from the pine forest he put it into the wine bucket pretending that he wanted to get a drink free but Bai Sheng (the wine seller) prevented him from doing so by knocking the ladle on the ground. All these plots had been conceived by Wu Yong, and are now known as seizing the birthday presents by craft.
Yang Zhi had not drunk much of the wine so that he soon recovered, and crawled, as he could not yet stand up. Approaching his men he saw that spittle was dripping from the corners of their mouths, and they could not get up. Yang with a sorrowful heart said to himself: "I need not quarrel with you seven men who stole the birthday presents but will you tell me how I can return and face the Grand Secretary Liang? As I cannot return these dispatches I had better destroy them. Now I have a home whereto I cannot go; I have a country whereto I cannot return. But where must I go to? Had I not better find a place here where I can commit suicide?" Raising his gown, he staggered along until he came to a steep place where he would jump down.

April showers made the blossoms fall;
Autumn frosts have killed the willow leaves.

The Tattooed Monk Lu Da Assaults & has a Fight at Twin-Dragon Mountain Alone & the mountain chief experiences disaster; the Blue-Faced Brute Yang Zhi Tries to Seize, & with him, Takes Precious Pearl Monastery & in the fortress, Yang Zhi becomes joint master

How could Yang Zhi return and face Governor Liang after having lost the birthday gifts on Yellow Earth Ridge? He wanted to leap from the ridge and kill himself. But he came to his senses and halted just in time.
"My parents who bore me gave me this fine appearance and handsome physique," he thought. "From childhood I learned all the eighteen arts of armed combat. This is no way to die. I can at least wait until I am captured, then decide."
He gazed at his fourteen companions. They could only stare at him, unable to move. Yang Zhi swore. "It's all because you wretches wouldn't listen to me that this has happened. Now I'm involved!" He picked up his halberd that lay by the stump of a tree, buckled on his sword, and looked all around. There was nothing else that belonged to him. He sighed, and went down the ridge.
Not until the second watch did the fourteen revive. One by one, they crawled to their feet, uttering strings of lamentations.
"You didn't take Yang Zhi's good advice," said the old steward. "You've ruined me!"
"What's done is done, old sir," the others replied. "We'd better come to an understanding."
"Do you have any suggestions?"
"The fault is ours. But as the old saying goes: 'When fire licks your clothes you beat it out, when there's a hornet in your tunic open it quick.' If Yang Zhi were here, we'd have nothing to say. But since he's gone, no one knows where, why not put the blame on him? We can go back and say to Governor Liang: 'He abused and beat and cursed us all along the road, he drove us till we were too exhausted to stir another step. Yang Zhi was in cahoots with the robbers. They drugged us, bound us hand and foot, and made off with the treasure.' "
"That's an idea. We'll report the theft to the local district authorities the first thing tomorrow, and leave the two captains of the guards behind to help in the capture of the robbers. The rest of us will travel day and night till we reach the Northern Capital. We'll tell the governor what we agreed upon, and he will inform the Premier in writing and direct Jizhou Prefecture to apprehend the brigands, and that will be that." Early the next day the steward and his company advised the Jizhou officials of the robbery.

*

Yang Zhi halberd in hand, gloomily left Yellow Earth Ridge. He travelled southward half the night, then rested in a grove. "I've got no money and there's no one around here I know," he brooded. "What am I going to do?"
By then the sky was just turning light, and he set out again to take advantage of the cool. After covering another twenty li, he stopped in front of a tavern. "If I don't have some wine," he said to himself, "I'll never be able to carry on."
He went in and sat down. The tables and benches were made of mulberry wood. Yang Zhi leaned his halberd against the wall. A woman, who was beside a stove, came over and spoke to him.
"Can I cook something for you, sir?"
"First let me have two measures of wine. Then cook me some rice. If you have meat, I'll have some of that, too. Add it up later and I'll pay the whole thing together."
The woman called a young fellow to pour the wine. She cooked the rice, fried some meat, and set them before Yang Zhi. When he finished eating, he rose, took his halberd and headed for the door. "You haven't paid yet," the woman said.
"I'll pay you when come back. Just credit me for now."
The young fellow who had poured the wine rushed after him and grabbed his arm. With one blow Yang Zhi knocked him to the ground. The woman began to wail. Yang continued on his way. He heard another voice shouting at him from behind. "Where do you think you're going, rogue!"
He turned and saw running towards him a big bare-chested fellow, dragging a staff.
"So he's after me," thought Yang. "Well, that's his bad luck!"
Yang halted. Still further behind was the young waiter armed with a pitchfork and two or three vassals carrying cudgels, all racing towards him at flying speed.
"If I can finish off this first one, the rest won't dare come any nearer," he thought. Gripping his halberd, he charged forward to give combat.
The man, twirling his staff, met him head on. They fought twenty or thirty rounds. Of course the man was no match for Yang Zhi. He could only parry and dodge. The young fellow and the vassals were about to join in the fray when the staff-wielder jumped from the combat circle.
"Nobody move," he shouted. "You, big fellow with the halberd, what's your name?"
Yang Zhi smote his chest. "It is and always has been Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Brute! I haven't changed my name!"
"Not Yang Zhi, military aide in the palace of the Eastern Capital?"
"How do you know I'm Military Aide Yang?"
The man cast down his staff and fell on his knees. "I have eyes but didn't recognize Mount Taishan!"
Yang raised him to his feet. "And who are you, sir?"
"I'm from the prefecture of Kaifeng, originally, and I was a pupil of Drill Instructor Lin Chong in the Imperial Guards. My name is Cao Zheng. My family have been butchers for generations. I know how to slaughter, draw sinews, cut bones, remove entrails and skin carcasses. For this reason I'm known as the Demon Carver. A rich man in my district gave me five thousand strings of cash and sent me here to Shandong to do some business for him. I lost his entire capital. After that, I couldn't go back, and I married a local country girl and moved in with her family. She's the one you saw at the stove. The boy with the pitchfork is her younger brother. When we fought just now I recognized your moves. They were the same as my teacher, Drill Instructor Lin. I knew I couldn't beat you."
"So you were one of Lin's pupils. Your teacher was ruined by Marshal Gao, and had to take to the hills. He's in Liangshan Marsh, today."

"I've heard that, also. I didn't know whether it was true or not. Please come to my home, Military Aide, and rest a while."
Yang Zhi returned with Cao Zheng to the tavern. The host requested Yang to be seated. He told his wife and the young man to bow to their guest, and to bring him food and wine.
While they were drinking, Cao Zheng asked: "What brings you here, Military Aide?"
Yang related in detail how he lost the birthday gifts he was convoying for Governor Liang.
"In that case, why not remain with me for a time?" Cao Zheng proposed. "Then we can discuss what to do."
"That's very kind of you," said Yang. "But the police are liable to catch up with me. I'd better not stay too long."
"Where can you go?"
"I was thinking of going to Liangshan Marsh and joining your teacher Drill Instructor Lin. I passed there once, and ran into him as he was coming down the mountain. The two of us fought. Wang Lun saw that we were evenly matched, and invited us both to the mountain stronghold. That's how I got to know your teacher, Lin Chong. Wang Lun pleaded with me to stay but I didn't want to become an outlaw. I'm not going to look very gallant if I join him now, when I have the tattoo of the criminal on my face. That's why I've been hesitating. I can't make up my mind."
"You've got something there. I've heard what a narrow-hearted knave that Wang Lun is. He doesn't know how to treat talented people. They say when Lin Chong first went up the mountain he had to take a lot of abuse from him. If my place won't do, not far from here, on Two-Dragon Mountain in Qingzhou Prefecture, is a monastery known as the Precious Pearl. It's nestled in the mountains and has only one path leading to it. The monk in charge has given up religious life and let his hair grow. All the other monks have done the same. It's said that he's formed a gang of four or five hundred robbers. His name is Deng Long, and he's known as the Golden-Eyed Tiger. If you're determined to become an outlaw, you might do well to join him."
"Since there is such a place, why shouldn't I take it over and make it my refuge?"
Yang Zhi spent the night at Cao Zheng's house. The next morning he borrowed some travelling money, picked up his halberd, bid farewell to his host, and set out for Two-Dragon Mountain.
He travelled all day. Towards evening, he came in sight of a high mountain. "I'll sleep in this grove tonight," he said to himself, "and climb up tomorrow."
When he entered the grove he received a shock. Seated in the cool of a pine was a big fat monk, stripped to the buff. His back was elaborately tattooed.
The monk, on seeing Yang Zhi, grabbed a staff that was beneath the tree and leaped to his feet. "Hey, prick," he shouted. "Where are you from?"
"He has a west of the Pass accent," thought Yang Zhi. "We're from the same part of the country. I'll ask him." Aloud, he called: "Tell me where you're from, monk."
Instead of replying, the monk came charging forward, twirling his staff.
"That surly bald pate!" Yang swore under his breath. "I'll let out some of my anger on his hide!"
He rushed at his foe, halberd in hand. They battled up and down the grove, man to man, until they had fought forty or fifty rounds, with neither the victor. The monk executed a feint and jumped from the combat circle.
"Rest!" he roared. Both men stayed their hands.
"Where was there ever such a monk?" Yang said to himself admiringly. "He's really good. His skill is terrific! I can just barely outfight him."
"You blue-faced fellow," yelled the monk. "Who are you?"
"I am Yang Zhi, a military aide from the Eastern Capital."
"The one who was selling his sword and killed that loafer Niu Er?"
"Don't you see the tattoo on my face?"
The monk laughed. "Who would have thought we'd meet here!"
"May I presume to ask your name, sir monk? How did you know about my selling my sword?"
"I used to be a major in the Yenan garrison under Old General Zhong. Then I killed the Lord of the West with three blows of my fist and had to shave my head and become a monk on Mount Wutai. Because of the decorations on my back, everyone calls me the Tattooed Monk Lu Zhishen."
Yang Zhi smiled. "So we're both natives of the same place. I've heard a lot about you in the fraternity of gallant men. But I thought you were at the Great Xiangguo Monastery. What are you doing here?"
"It's a long story. When I was in charge of the monastery's vegetable garden, Marshal Gao wanted to have Lin Chong killed. I wouldn't stand for such injustice. I went with Lin all the way to Cangzhou, and saved his life. The two escorts went back and reported to that lout Gao that Lu Zhishen of the Great Xiangguo Monastery had rescued Lin just as they were about to murder him in Wild Boar Forest and had gone with them right up to Cangzhou, and that was why they couldn't finish him off. The mother-raper was furious. He made the abbot dismiss me and was sending men to arrest me. But I was tipped off by a gang of rascals and was able to foil the rogue. I burned down the vegetable garden buildings and took to the road but nowhere could I find a refuge.
"In Mengzhou Prefecture I stopped at a tavern in Crossroads Rise and was nearly done in by the tavern keeper's wife. She drugged my wine and I collapsed in a stupor. Luckily, her husband came home early. He was amazed at my appearance, my staff and my sword, and quickly gave me a drink that revived me. After I told him my name he kept me at his house for several days and made me his sworn brother. He and his wife are famous in the gallant fraternity. He is known as Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener. She is Sun Erniang the Witch. Both are considerate and bold.
"After four or five days at their place I heard that I would be safe in the Precious Pearl Monastery on Two-Dragon Mountain, and I went there, intending to join Deng Long's band. But the wretch wouldn't have me. I fought him, and he saw he was no match for me, so he fled up the mountain, closing and bolting the three big gates at its foot. There is no other way up. No matter how I cursed the prick he wouldn't come down and fight. I was stymied and enraged, and then you, brother, came along!"
Yang Zhi was very pleased. The two bowed to each other there in the grove and sat together the entire night. Yang told in detail how he tried to sell his sword and killed Niu Er, and how he lost the birthday gifts. He related also what Cao Zheng had said.
"Here we are but Deng Long has closed the gates. How can we get him to come down?" mused Yang. "Let's go to Cao Zheng's house and talk it over."
The two left the grove together and returned to the tavern. Yang Zhi introduced Lu Zhishen. Cao Zheng hastily poured out wine, and they discussed how to take Two-Dragon Mountain.
"If he's really shut the gates," said the tavern keeper, "an army of ten thousand couldn't get up there, to say nothing of just you two. The stronghold can only be conquered by guile, not by force."
"That prick," said Zhishen.
"Since it's such a good place," said Yang Zhi, "why don't you and I go all-out and take it?"
"We must have a plan for getting up there, first," said Lu, "or we won't be able to come to grips with him."
"I have an idea but I don't know whether you two will approve," said Cao Zheng.
"Let's hear it," said Yang.
"You, Military Aide, will have to change your clothes, and dress like a local peasant. I will take the staff and sword of the reverend, here. My wife's younger brother and few stalwarts will go with us to the foot of the mountain, and there we'll bind the reverend. I'll attend to that personally, using nothing but slip-knots. Then I'll shout up and say: 'We're from the neighbouring tavern. This monk drank so much he got tipsy but he refused to pay. He kept muttering that he was going to muster his men and attack your stronghold. We took advantage of his drunkenness to tie him up and present him to your chieftain.'
"Those clods will certainly let us up the mountain. When we get into the stronghold and are brought before Deng Long, the reverend can slip his bonds and I will hand him his staff. Once you two good fellows get to work, Deng Long will be finished. With him out of the way, his underlings won't dare resist. What do you think of my idea?"
"Shrewd, shrewd," said Lu and Yang.
That night all ate and drank and prepared dry rations for the coming expedition. They rose at the fifth watch the following morning and ate their fill. Lu stored his pack and luggage in Cao's house. Then the three men, plus the wife's younger brother and six or seven peasants set out for Two-Dragon Mountain. They reached the grove afternoon and changed their clothes. Lu Zhishen was bound tightly by two of the peasants but the knots were false. Yang put on a straw sun hat and a tattered cloth shirt. He retained his halberd but held it shaft forward. Cao Zheng carried the monk's staff. The others, who walked closely front and rear, were armed with cudgels.
They halted outside the first gate. It was bristling with bows and lime flagons and ballista stones. When the guards at the gate saw the trussed-up monk, they sent a messenger flying to the summit to report.
Not long after, two junior officers came down to the gate and demanded: "Who are you people? What do you want here? Where did you get that monk?"
"We're from that village below. I run a small tavern," Cao Zheng replied. "This fat monk came and drank himself silly, and then refused to pay. He kept saying: 'I'm going to get a thousand men from Liangshan Marsh and blast that Two-Dragon Mountain, and wipe out this village of yours too!' I plied him with good wine until he was dead drunk, and then tied the rogue up and brought him here to hand over to your chieftain as a token of our filial respect. It will save our village from disaster."
The junior officers were delighted. "Excellent," they said. "Just wait here a little." They returned to the stronghold and reported that the monk had been captured.
Deng Long was overjoyed. "Bring him up," he cried. "I'll eat the scoundrel's heart and liver with my wine to slake a bit of my hatred!"
The brigands were ordered to open the gates and send up the prisoner. Yang Zhi and Cao Zheng, escorting the bound Lu Zhishen, climbed the trail. With its three gates at three perilous passes, the stronghold was a formidable place. Wrapped in the embrace of tall peaks was the monastery. Only a single path wound between the majestic heights. The three gates were guarded by throwing-logs and ballista stones, powerful bows and sharp arrows, and a dense proliferation of bamboo spears.
After passing through the three gates, they came to the Precious Pearl Monastery. A three-doored temple stood on a mirror-smooth clearing, all enclosed in a strong wooden palisade. Seven outlaws stood at the entry arch before the building. They swore when they saw Lu Zhishen.
"You hurt our chieftain, you scabby donkey! Now, you've been taken and he's going to cut you slowly to bits!"
Lu didn't utter a sound as they brought him into the temple. The idol had been removed from its pedestal and replaced by an armchair covered by a tiger skin. Spear-carrying guards stood on either side.
A few minutes later Deng Long entered, supported by two bandits, and seated himself on his throne. Cao Zheng and Yang Zhi pushed Lu Zhishen forward to the foot of the pedestal.
"Wretch!" cried Deng Long. "The other day you knocked me down! My groin is still swollen and black and blue. Today it's my turn!"
Lu glared at him. "Prick! Don't try to get away!"
The two peasants yanked the rope and the slip-knots vanished. Lu took his staff from Cao Zheng and whirled it like a flurry of clouds. Yang Zhi, casting aside his sun hat, turned his halberd point forward and grasped its shaft. Cao Zheng brandished a cudgel. Together, the group charged.
Deng Long struggled to escape but Lu's staff swiftly split his skull and pulverized the throne. Yang Zhi ran his halberd through four or five of the bandits.
"Surrender, all of you!" yelled Cao Zheng. "If you don't we'll kill every last one of you!"
The five or six hundred brigands before and behind the monastery and the handful of junior officers were frightened stiff. They all submitted. Men were directed to carry Deng Long's body to the rear of the mountain and bum it. An inventory was taken of the food supplies, the building were set in order, and an inspection was made of the items stored in the back of the monastery. Then meat and wine were called for. Lu and Yang became the stronghold's leaders, and they feasted in celebration. The bandits, who all swore fealty, remained under the direct control of the junior officers.
Cao Zheng bid farewell to the two bold fellows and returned home with the peasants. Of them we'll say no more.

We'll talk rather of the old steward and the soldiers who had convoyed the birthday gifts. They travelled daily from dawn to dusk until they reached the Northern Capital. They reported directly to Governor Liang at his mansion. Kneeling before him, they confessed their criminal blunder.
"You've had a hard time on the road. I'm thankful to you," said Liang. And he asked: "Where is Major Yang Zhi?"
"He's unspeakable!" they cried. "An audacious, ungrateful thief! Five or six days after we left here, we arrived at Yellow Earth Ridge. It was very hot, and we rested in the cool of a grove. Who would have believed that Yang Zhi was in league with seven robbers, disguised as date merchants! He had arranged to meet them, and they were waiting there in the grove with seven laden carts. He also had a fellow carrying wine come and rest on the ridge. We bought wine from him but it was drugged, and we fell down in a stupor. Then they tied us up, and Yang and the seven robbers loaded the birthday gifts onto the carts, together with their luggage, and trundled them all away! We reported the crime to Jizhou Prefecture and left the two captains to help the authorities apprehend the culprits. The rest of us hurried day and night to report back to Your Excellency."
Liang was shocked. "That thieving exile! A convicted felon who thanks to my efforts was raised to respectability! How could he be such an ingrate! If I ever get hold of him I'll smash him to bits!"
He had his scribe write a document which he immediately dispatched to Jizhou. He also sent an urgent letter to his father-in-law, the Premier in the Eastern Capital, relating what had transpired.
We'll not speak of the messenger to Jizhou but rather of the emissary to the Eastern Capital. He was received by the Premier and presented the letter. Cai read it, aghast.
"What brash devils those robbers are!" he exclaimed. "Last year they stole the birthday gifts my son-in-law sent me, and they haven't been caught to this day. Now they've robbed me again. Something must be done or we'll never be able to maintain order!"
He issued a directive and dispatched an officer of his court to deliver it, at all possible speed, to the prefect of Jizhou, calling for the immediate arrest of the culprits, and demanding of formal reply.
For some days the prefect had been despondently mulling over the order he had received from Governor Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital. Now, the gate-keeper came in and announced: "An officer from Premier Cai of the Eastern Capital is here with an urgent directive for Your Excellency."
The prefect was startled. "It must be about the birthday gifts," he thought. He hastily summoned court and received the officer. "I've already been notified by Governor Liang's stewards," he said, "and have sent my police to apprehend the criminals. But we haven't discovered a trace. A few days ago, the governor made another query, and I again sent my police out with strict orders to investigate and arrest but so far they haven't caught them. I'll reply personally to the Premier the moment we hear anything."
"I'm very close to the Premier," the officer said. "He sent me here specially to make sure we get them. Just before I left, he told me that I was to stay here until you've apprehended every one of them—the seven date merchants, the wine seller, and the fugitive officer Yang Zhi. He set a time limit of ten days within which to arrest and deliver them to the Eastern Capital. If you fail to do so, I'm afraid you'll be sent into exile on the remote Shamen Island! It will also be difficult for me to return to the Premier's presence, in fact my life will be in jeopardy. If Your Excellency doesn't believe me, please read this order."
The prefect was greatly alarmed after reading the document. He immediately summoned his police officials. A man came forward and hailed him respectfully.
"Who are you?" asked the prefect.
"Ho Tao, police inspector of third district."
"Are you in charge of that robbery of the birthday gifts on Yellow Earth Ridge?"
"Yes, Your Excellency. I've been working on the case day and night. I sent our quickest and most sharp-eyed men to the ridge to search. But although I've had them beaten several times, they still haven't found a trace. We're doing our best, Excellency but it looks hopeless."
"Rot! 'If the superiors don't press, the underlings loaf.' I started my career by passing the palace examinations. Becoming a prefect wasn't easy! And now the Premier in the Eastern Capital has sent an officer with an order giving me ten days to catch the robbers, on pain of dismissal and exile to Shamen Island. You're a police inspector but you're not trying, and the disaster falls on my head! I'm going to exile you to a miserable border garrison, so far that even the wild geese can't reach it!"
The prefect sent for the tattooer and had him write on Ho Tao's cheek: "Exiled to ___ prefecture," leaving the name of the destination blank.
"If you don't catch those crooks," he warned, "you can expect no mercy!"
Ho Tao left the prefect's court and returned to his station. He immediately called most of his police to a private room for a conference. They all sat looking at one another, as silent as geese with arrow-pierced bills, as mute as gill-hooked fish.
"This is the room that I pay you in," said Ho Tao. "You're not generally so quiet. Is it because we're having a hard time solving this case? I'm the one who should be pitied. Don't you see what's written on my face?"
"We're not blocks of wood," said the policemen. "We know you're being pressured from above. It's just that those date merchants must be brigands from some stronghold deep in the mountains in another prefecture. Once they snatched the booty, they surely holed up to celebrate and revel. How can we catch them? Even if we knew where they were, we could only gaze at them from a distance."
Ho Tao had been five-tenths depressed to start with. Now, these words added another five-tenths. He left the station, mounted his horse, rode home, and tied the beast to the trough in the rear of the house. Then he sat and brooded.
"Why are you so dejected?" his wife asked.
"You don't know what's happened," said Ho Tao. "The other day His Excellency issued an order to capture the robbers who stole the eleven loads of birthday gifts Governor Liang was sending his father-in-law Premier Cai. It happened on Yellow Earth Ridge. We don't know who the culprits are and I still haven't caught them. Today, I went to ask for more time, and found that the Premier had sent an officer to wait here for the criminals and bring them back to the Eastern Capital. The prefect asked me about the case and I said: 'There isn't any news, and we haven't caught them yet.' He had an exile tattoo put on my face, leaving only the destination blank. There's no telling how much longer I have to live!"
"What are we going to do?" cried his wife. "This is awful!"
As they were talking, Ho Tao's younger brother, Ho Qing, came to see him.
"What do you want?" Ho Tao demanded. "Why aren't you out gambling? What are you doing here?"
The wife, a clever woman, quickly signalled the young man not to reply, and said: "Won't you come into the kitchen? There's something I want to talk to you about."
Ho Qing went with her into the kitchen and sat down. She served him meat and vegetables, and heated several cups of wine.
"Brother is too overbearing," he complained. "I may have faults but I'm still his brother! Why is he so high and mighty? He's my brother, isn't he? Would it disgrace him to have a couple of drinks with me?"
"You've no idea how upset he is."
"He's always had plenty of money and goods. What's happened to them? And I haven't been around to bother him. Why should he be upset?"
"You don't know. The other day on Yellow Earth Ridge a gang of date merchants robbed the birthday gifts Governor Liang of the Northern Capital was sending to Premier Cai. The prefect of Jizhou has just received an order from Cai to arrest the robbers within ten days and deliver them to the capital. If he doesn't, he'll be exiled to a distant garrison. Didn't you see what the prefect had tattooed on your brother's face? If he doesn't catch them soon, he's going to suffer. How can he think of drinking with you? That's why I prepared some food and wine for you in here. He's been very depressed. You mustn't blame him."
"I've heard some rumours that robbers have taken the birthday gifts. Where did it happen?"

"They say it was on Yellow Earth Ridge."
"And what kind of people were the robbers?"
"Brother, you're not drunk. I just told you—seven date merchants."
Ho Qing laughed. "So that's how it was. Since it's known that date merchants did the job, what's there to brood over? Why not just send a few capable men to arrest them?"
"That's easy to say. They can't be found."
"There's nothing to worry about, sister-in-law," Ho Qing smiled. "Brother always welcomes a lot of fair weather friends but he has no use for his own kin. He's looking for robbers, and his cronies say they can't find them. If he'd drunk a few cups of wine with me from time to time, I might be able to tell him how to go about it."
"Do you really have any clues?"
Ho Qing laughed. "Wait till brother's situation is desperate, then I may have a plan to save him."
He rose to leave. His sister-in-law persuaded him to stay for another few cups of wine.
Meanwhile she hurried into the next room and told her husband. Ho Tao quickly invited his brother to join him.
"Since you know where the robbers have gone," he said with an apologetic smile, "why don't you rescue me?"
"I don't know anything. I was only joking with sister-in-law. How can I rescue you?"
"Good brother, don't be offended by my manner. Think of how good I am to you generally, not of how bad I am on occasion. Save my life!"
"But you have so many sharp-eyed, fast-moving police. There are nearly three hundred men under your command. Aren't they doing their utmost? What can a mere younger brother do?"
"Never mind about them. You've got something up your sleeve. Don't wait for others to be the heroes. Tell me where the robbers have gone and I'll reward you. Let me relax."
"How do I know where they've gone?"
"Don't torment me. Remember we were born of the same mother!"
"No need to panic. When the situation gets really critical, I'll go out and nab the petty culprits myself."
"Ho Qing," said his sister-in-law, "you must rescue him, come what may. It's your duty as a brother. The Premier has issued an order for the arrest of the gang. It's very serious. How can you talk about 'petty culprits'!"
"You know I come only for money for gambling, sister-in-law," Ho Qing said ironically. "Many's the time brother has berated me. Even when he struck or cursed me, I never talked back. And when he feasted, it was always with others. But today I seem to be of some use after all!"
Ho Tao realized there was reason in what Ho Qing said. He hurriedly got a silver ingot weighing ten ounces and placed it on the table. "Take this, brother," he urged. "After we catch the robbers, I guarantee you won't lack for gold or silver, silks or satins."
Ho Qing laughed. "This is certainly a case of 'not burning incense in ordinary times but embracing the idol's foot in a crisis.' It would be sheer extortion if I accepted your silver now. Take it back. Don't try to bribe me. If you act like this I won't say a word. I'll tell you only because you two have apologized. I'm not impressed by your money."
"My silver is all rewards for cases I've solved," explained Ho Tao. "Naturally, I've always four or five hundred strings of cash on hand. Don't refuse the silver, brother, and tell me—where have those robbers gone?"
Ho Qing slapped his thigh. "I've got them right here in my pocket!"
Ho Tao was astonished. "What do you mean?"
"Never you mind. Just take my word for it. I don't want your silver. You don't have to bribe me. I ask only that you treat me decently." Then Ho Qing calmly related what he knew. And as a result, a gallant hero emerged in Yuncheng County, and in Liangshan Marsh there gathered a Heaven-shaking assemblage of courageous men. Who were the persons of whom Ho Qing spoke?

We left Yang Zhi on Yellow Mud Ridge after the capture of the birthday convoy, certain that he could not possibly return and report to Governor Liang and intent on finding somewhere to die right there on the mountain. But when he approached the edge and was about to throw himself off, he suddenly came to his senses and drew back. "I have parents who brought me into this world," he thought, "and from whom I inherited a respectable appearance and a certain dignity. From a tender age I studied, with some success, the eighteen martial arts. Is it all to end like this? Rather than kill myself here on this mountain, would it not be better to wait till I am taken and then consider what to do?" He turned to look at the others. They gazed back at him with sightless eyes, unable to move hand or foot. He pointed a finger at them, saying: "It's all because you fools wouldn't listen to my instructions that it had to end like this, that's what got me into this mess!" He pulled his halberd out of the tree root and stuck the sword through his belt, and after taking a good look around that revealed nothing new, sighed and set off down the mountain.
The others did not come to until evening. One after another they staggered to their feet. They poured out strings of curses, in their disgust. The old Colonel complained: "You lot refused to listen to Major Yang's good advice and now I'm scuppered!"
The soldiers said: "Sir, what's done is done. We've got to think what to do next."
"Have you anything to propose?" the Colonel asked.
"It's our fault, yes. But think of the old saying: When the flames get close, it's every man for himself; when a wasp gets under your shirt, the best thing is to undress. Of course, if Major Yang was still here, we'd have to accept the blame. But since he's disappeared, there's nothing to stop us going back and reporting to Governor Liang: we can put all the blame on the major, can't we? All we've got to do is say it like this: that all the time on the journey he was beating us and cursing us, driving us on till we couldn't move another step, and then he made a pact with the robbers and they drugged us and tied us up so they could steal the treasure."
"You're absolutely right," said the old Colonel. "We'll wait till morning, then go to the local police station and report. We'll leave my aides there to help in the inquiries and we'll return with all speed to the Northern Capital and inform the authorities and ask them to produce a written report informing the Grand Preceptor and making the Jizhou government responsible for apprehending the criminals."
Next day the Colonel and his party reached Jizhou and made their report of what had happened. We say no more of this.
Yang Zhi, meanwhile, had left Yellow Mud Ridge behind. For a long time he headed south, halberd in hand, his heart filled with despair. He continued walking long into the night, before he realized it was late and took shelter in a wood. "Here I am with no provisions," he thought to himself, "and no friends in these parts. What am I going to do?"
Gradually the sky lightened and he must needs set off again, to avail himself of the cool hours. He traversed another six miles or more:

His face bears the mark of a warrior,
Yet the treasure was got for free.
Now he's a weary traveller,
And flogging should be his fee.

Such was his misery that when he found himself in front of an inn door, he said: "If I don't get some wine, I just won't be able to go on." He entered and seated himself — the table and benches were made of mulberry wood. He laid his halberd down beside him. A woman standing by the stove said, "I expect you'd like something to eat, sir."
"First bring me two measures of wine," he replied. "Then find me some rice and cook a bit of meat for me. I'll give you the money in a moment." The woman ordered a young lad to come and pour the wine, then she cooked the rice and fried some meat, all of which she put in front of Yang Zhi. As soon as he had finished it, he stood up, grasped his halberd and strode out. "You haven't given me the money for your food and wine yet," the woman shouted after him. "I'll give it to you when I come back," he said. "For the moment I'll have to owe you." He proceeded on his way. The lad who had poured the wine chased after him and made a grab at him but Yang Zhi knocked him down with one blow of his fist. The woman began to shout that she had been cheated but Yang Zhi paid no attention. At this moment, however, he heard steps behind him and someone shouted: "Where do you think you're going, you thieving bastard?"
Turning, Yang Zhi saw that he was being hotly pursued by a rather dishevelled character with a stick. "Well, it's his bad luck if he wants to pick a fight with me," Yang Zhi thought. He halted and waited. Behind his pursuer he could make out the waiter from the inn, armed with a pitchfork, and two or three villagers, all carrying sticks. They were rapidly closing on him. "If it wasn't for this first one," Yang Zhi thought, "the others wouldn't dare chase me." He brandished his halberd and prepared to take on the leading assailant. The latter rushed towards him whirling his stick. They fought twenty or thirty bouts but the other could make no impression on Yang Zhi and had to resort to blocking and parrying, dodging and side-stepping. The waiter arrived, and the villagers, and they stood by awaiting an opportunity to intervene.
Suddenly the stranger leapt out of the circle of combat and yelled, "Let's call a truce. You're a great fighter. Would you be willing to tell me your name?"
Thereupon Yang Zhi struck his chest and said: "I don't stoop to using a false name or travelling under an alias. I am Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast!"
The stranger said: "Does that mean you're the Yang Zhi who was a commander of the palace guard in the Eastern Capital?"
"How did you know?" Yang Zhi asked, surprised.
The stranger threw away his weapon and prostrated himself, saying: "Pardon me, for being unable to see what was staring me in the face!"
Yang Zhi helped him up. "But who are you?" he asked.
"I was once a pupil of Lin Chong, instructor of the palace guard. My name's Cao Zheng. I come from a line of butchers. I can slaughter an animal very prettily: skinning and cleaning, separating the meat and scraping the bones. That's why people sometimes call me the 'Devil with the Darting Knife.' A rich man in my home town gave me five thousand cash to set me up in business here in Shandong but unfortunately I lost my capital. I couldn't go back so I married into this peasant's household. The woman who tends the stove is my spouse. The fellow with the pitchfork is my brother-in-law. When I had that exchange with you, Commander, I recognized your style of fighting — it's exactly like that of my instructor, Lin Chong — so I knew I had no chance against you!"
"So you're Lin Chong's pupil, are you?" Yang Zhi said. "Lin Chong was persecuted by Marshal Gao and became an outlaw. He's now in the Marshes of Mount Liang."
"I had heard something of the sort myself but I didn't know if it was true or not. Anyway, please come and rest in my house, Commander."
Yang Zhi returned with Cao Zheng to the inn. Cao Zheng invited him to sit down and told his wife and brother-in-law to come and pay their respects, and to bring wine and food. While they were drinking, Cao Zheng inquired: "What brought you to these parts, Commander?"
Yang Zhi told him the whole story, from the time when as Imperial Commander he lost the convoy of stones and plants to the recent business with the birthday convoy.
"In that case," said Cao Zheng, "why don't you stay with me for a while? That'll give you time to think what you're going to do next."
"That's exceedingly kind of you," said Yang Zhi. "But I'm worried about the police. They may come looking for me, so I'd better not stay long."
"If that's the case, where do you plan to go?"
"I'd like to go and look for your instructor, Lin Chong, in the Marshes of Mount Liang. I passed that way before and I ran into him at the foot of the mountain and we crossed swords. Wang Lun was so impressed by our fighting he invited us both to the mountain retreat. That's how I got to know your instructor. At that time Wang Lun was very insistent that I should stay but I didn't want to be an outlaw. On the other hand if I go there for refuge now, with these marks of shame on my face, it won't look good either. That's what makes me hesitate. It's a dilemma."
"I think you're right. I have heard that Wang Lun is a mean and narrow-minded type, and that he is afraid of rivals. They say that when my instructor, Lin Chong, was obliged to join the outlaws, he had to put up with a lot from Wang Lun. You might do better in this region. Not far from here in a place called Qingzhou there's a mountain called Twin Dragon Peak where there's a temple called Temple of the Precious Pearl. This temple has the most splendid situation, buried deep in the mountain with only one road for access. Recently the superior renounced his vows and let his hair grow and the other monks have all followed suit. They're said to have got up a force of four or five hundred men and they go around looting and wrecking. That monk is called the Golden-Eyed Tiger Deng Long. If you've decided to become an outlaw, you might go and join that lot, you'd be safe there."
"Indeed, if there's a place like that, why not go and seek sanctuary there?" Yang Zhi said. He stayed the night at Cao Zheng's and then, after borrowing his travel expenses, took up his halberd, said goodbye and strode off in the direction of Twin Dragon Peak.
A day later, at nightfall, he came to an immensely high mountain. "I'd better spend the night in this wood," he said to himself, "and leave the climb for tomorrow." But when he entered the wood he got a shock. An enormous monk, completely naked, his back covered in elaborate tattoos, was leaning against the roots of a pine enjoying the cool. When he saw Yang Zhi, the monk seized his staff that he had propped against a tree root, leapt to his feet and roared "Well, now, my fine friend, where have you sprung from?"
"This monk must be from Guanxi," Yang Zhi said to himself when he heard the accent. "We're fellow countrymen. Let's question him." Aloud he said, "Where are you from, monk?"
The monk did not reply but instead began to whirl his staff, as if minded to attack.
"This priest is most uncouth," Yang Zhi said to himself. "Well, he'll give me a chance to work off my spleen." Raising his halberd, he advanced towards the monk.
So the two of them fought it out, there in the wood, advancing, retreating, striking this way and that, and after forty or fifty passes neither had the upper hand. Finally the monk feinted and leapt back out of the circle of combat, shouting: "Hold!"
Both men stood stock-still, while Yang Zhi, hiding his amazement, was thinking: "Where can he come from, this monk? He's a tremendous fighter. He's got so much technique I can barely manage him."
"Well now, you with the blue face, who and what are you?" the monk roared.
"I am Yang Zhi, former palace guard commander in the Eastern Capital."
"Are you the fellow that was trying to sell a sword in the Eastern Capital, and ended up killing that scoundrel, the Ox?"
"Don't you see the marks on my face?" Yang Zhi replied.
"So that's it! ... but how surprising to meet you here," said the monk.
"Might I be permitted to ask who you are, Father, and how you come to know about my selling the sword?"
"You want to know who I am? I'm Major Lu, formerly garrison commandant of Yanan under the command of Old Marshal Zhong, that's who. Because I gave butcher Zheng three blows of my fist which happened to kill him, I had to shave my head and become a monk at the temple on Mount Wu Tai. On account of these tattoos on my back people sometimes call me the Flowery Monk."
"I knew you were a fellow-countryman," said Yang Zhi delightedly. "I've so often heard your praises sung by the brethren of the rivers and lakes. But I heard that you used to hang out at the great Xiangguo Temple. What brings you to these parts?"
"It's a long story. I was looking after the vegetable garden at the Xiangguo Temple. It was there I ran into Leopard's Head Lin Chong, a man whom Marshal Gao did his best to ruin. I saw he was in a lot of danger so I escorted him to Cangzhou and saved him from certain death. I didn't bargain for the fact that those two guards when they got back would say to Gao-the-Ball, 'We were about to finish Lin Chong off in Wild Boar Wood but he was rescued by Lu Zhishen of the Xiangguo Temple. The monk escorted him all the way to Cangzhou so we couldn't do anything to him.' On account of this that son of a bitch, Marshal Gao, couldn't wait to get even and he told the abbot to ban me from the temple. He even sent people to arrest me but I was forewarned by a bunch of layabouts, so I didn't fall into his hands. Before escaping I took the trouble to set fire to the overseer's lodge and the outhouses in the vegetable garden. Then I went to ground with the rivers and lakes fraternity. After that, they might search for me east and west but they'd never find me. When I reached the Hill of the Cross in Mengzhou I came within an inch of losing my life at the hands of an innkeeper's wife, who drugged my wine. Fortunately her husband returned just in time. He had a shock when he saw me and noticed my monk's staff and sword. He quickly gave me the antidote and brought me round, questioned me and made me stay with him for several days, so we became sworn brothers. Those two, husband and wife, are well known and respected among the rivers and lakes fraternity. He is Zhang Qing, the Gardener, and she is Sister Sun, the Ogress. They are upright people. After I'd been there three or four days, I heard of this Twin Dragon Peak as a place where one could find sanctuary so I came here to join Deng Long's band. But the blighter said he wouldn't have me. We started to fight it out. He couldn't get the better of me, so what he did was make fast the three gates barring the way up the mountain. There's no other way in. So there we were, cursing each other but the so-and-so wouldn't come out and fight again, and so here's yours truly completely stymied." He ended this speech by again expressing his surprise at meeting Yang Zhi there.
Here was an encounter after Yang Zhi's own heart. Right there in the wood the two of them performed a formal greeting and then sat down on the ground to pass the night. Yang Zhi recounted all his adventures, from selling the sword and killing the Ox to the business with the birthday convoy. He told how Cao Zheng had recommended him to come here. Then he said: "Since he's closed the gates and we are stuck here, we ought to think of a way to get him to come down. Why don't we go back to Cao Zheng's and work out a plan?"
Together they left the forest and went to Cao Zheng's inn. When Yang Zhi had introduced the monk and Cao Zheng had eagerly served them with wine, they all settled down to discuss the assault on Twin Dragon Peak. "If the gates at the bottom are secured," Cao Zheng said, "you'll never get in — not just you two, even ten thousand troops couldn't do it. So you'll have to use cunning, not force."
"Fuck the bastard!" Zhishen exclaimed. "When I first went to see him he would only talk to me outside the gates. When he refused to take me in we fought, and I floored him with a kick to the stomach. But before I could finish it off his people rescued him — there was a big crowd of them — and carried him up the mountain, shutting those bloody gates behind them, with me outside able to do nothing except shout insults! He wouldn't come out and fight again."
"If it's such a good stronghold, wouldn't it be worth making a combined assault?" said Yang Zhi.
"The problem is there's only the one way in," said Zhishen. "Oh, how I'd like to get my hands on that bastard!"
"I've got an idea," said Cao Zheng. "But I don't know if you'll approve or not."
"We're all ears, naturally," said Yang Zhi.
"Well, then, Commander, you'll need to change your dress. You can be got up like one of the local villagers. I myself will take His Reverence's staff and sword. We'll get my brother-in-law and some others to go to the foot of the mountain and tie up His Reverence with a rope — I'll make some slip-knots. Then we'll go to that lot on the mountain and say: 'We're villagers from the inn. This monk came to our inn and got drunk and refused to pay. He just kept saying he was going to go and get people to attack your stronghold. So we took the opportunity while he was drunk to tie him up. We've got him here and want to hand him over to you.' I'm sure they'll let us in. Once we're inside and get to see Deng Long, we can loosen the slip-knots and take the rope off and I'll give His Reverence back his staff and sword. Then you'll both attack him and he won't have a chance to escape. Once you've done him in his people won't offer any resistance. What do you think of my plan?"
"Brilliant!" the other two cried out in unison. As the poem says:

A tiger cub can never be a dragon.

Twin Dragon Peak should have a dragon master.
This like-minded pair had but to meet:
The battle plan is ready and complete.

That evening they ate and drank, and prepared some rations for the journey. Next day they got up at dawn and had a good breakfast. Zhishen's baggage and all his other things were stored at Cao Zheng's.

Then the three of them, together with Cao Zheng's brother- in-law and several villagers, set off for Twin Dragon Peak. They reached the wood before midday, and changed their clothes there. Zhishen was bound, using slip-knots, and two villagers were instructed to take a strong grip on the ends of the rope. Yang Zhi put on a straw sun-hat and a tattered shirt, and carried his halberd. Cao Zheng carried the monk's staff. The remainder, armed with sticks, formed an escort. Arriving at the foot of the mountain, they found the first de- fences, bristling with crossbows, lime bottles, and various missiles. When the guards saw the monk was tied up, they hastened to report the news to their chief. After quite a while, two of Deng Long's henchmen appeared and asked: "Who are you and what do you want? Where did you get hold of that monk?"

"We're from the village," Cao Zheng said. "I keep an inn there. This big fat monk here came to the inn and got very drunk and refused to pay. He kept muttering about going to the Marshes of Mount Liang and bringing back thousands of men to smash up the stronghold on Twin Dragon Peak. He said you'd be wiped out, together with all the neighbouring villages. So we gave him a lot more wine till he was completely smashed and then we tied him up and brought him here to hand him over to your chief. We want to show our loyalty and make sure there isn't any trouble for the village."

The two henchmen were elated. "All right," they said, "just wait here a moment." Off they went to report back to Deng Long that the big monk had been captured. Deng Long was equally pleased. "Bring him up," he cried. "I'll have the villain's heart and liver to go with my wine. That's the thing that will ease the pain I feel."

In obedience to the order, the men went down and opened the gate and ordered the monk to be brought up. Yang Zhi and Cao Zheng escorted Lu Zhishen up towards the stronghold. On the way they had a chance to see all three defensive barriers. The site was really precipitous. On both sides towering peaks of awe-inspiring majesty protected the temple, and there was only the one road leading up through the pass with its three gates. Each barrier was piled with wooden or stone projectiles, catapults and ballistae, and surrounded by sharp stakes of bamboo care- fully concealed. When they had threaded this defensive complex and stood before the Temple of the Precious Pearl, they saw a gatehouse with three towers and a terrace smooth as a mirror, surrounded by a defensive palisade. At the main gate of the temple stood seven or eight guards, who immediately began to curse Zhishen.

"You bald ass," they shouted, "you wounded our Chief! Now you're going to pay for it! We're going to chop you into little pieces!"

Zhishen remained silent. They brought him to the Hall of the Buddha, where all the Buddha images had been removed and replaced by a throne covered with a tiger-skin. Troops with lances in their hands were ranged on either side.

A moment later two soldiers helped Deng Long to the throne. Yang Zhi and Cao Zheng were still holding Zhishen tightly at the foot of the steps. Deng Long glared at the monk and shouted: "Why, you poxy bald ass! The other day you tripped me up and bruised my stomach — the swelling still hasn't gone down. But it's my turn now!"

Lu Zhishen simply stared back, with big round eyes, and roared: "Got you, you scum!" At this, the two villagers gave a quick tug of the rope to free the knots and the rope fell away. Lu Zhishen received his staff from Cao Zheng, and began to perform the flying cloud ploy with it. Yang Zhi threw off his straw hat and readied his halberd, while Cao Zheng brandished his stick menacingly and the villagers advanced in a coordinated and resolute manner. Deng Long desperately tried to dodge but Zhishen's staff caught him on the top of his head, splitting his skull in half and even shattering the throne he sat on. Four or five of his followers were quickly knocked down by Yang Zhi. "Surrender, or you'll all be put to the sword!" Cao Zheng shouted. There were five or six hundred troops both in front of the temple and behind it and one or two minor chiefs but all were paralysed with fear and they meekly came forward and surrendered. They were ordered to take the corpses of Deng Long and the others to a place on the other side of the mountain and burn them. Next the victors inspected the stores and checked the buildings, and then they went to see how much booty had been amassed at the back of the temple. This done, a feast was organized. Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi had become lords of the mountain stronghold and a banquet was held in their honour. All the men swore allegiance to them and the minor chiefs were confirmed in their positions. Finally Cao Zheng said farewell to his two friends and went off home with the other villagers. Of them no more. There's a poem now for Lu Zhishen:

The ancient temple in its green retreat:
A nest of robbers behind a pious mask.
And Heaven's choice to rule this sacred seat:
The Flowery Monk — well suited for the task!

And another one for Yang Zhi:

Able assistant to Lu Zhishen,
He rules this green chapel of outlawed men;
Dragons and tigers flee from his art;
The face is ferocious but gentle the heart.

Now as to those other members of the birthday convoy, the old Colonel and the guards, they had returned to the Northern Capital, setting off at dawn and not halting before noon. Arriving at the government building, they had all, as one man, thrown them- selves down on the ground in front of the audience chamber and reported their failure. But at first all Governor Liang said was: "You have had a hard time of it; you ordinary soldiers are not to blame." Then he asked what had happened to Major Yang. "We don't like to say this," the guards answered. "But that Major Yang is a bold and shameless robber. About a week after leaving here we reached Yellow Mud Ridge. It was a fearfully hot day and we sat down to rest in a wood. Suddenly Yang Zhi was joined by seven robbers dressed up as merchants selling dates. Yang Zhi had fixed a rendezvous with them and told them to meet him with seven wheelbarrows in this wood on Yellow Mud Ridge. He also got a wine-carrier to come and halt for a rest on the mountain. We were unlucky enough to drink some of his wine that was drugged. Then they tied us all up, and Yang Zhi and the seven robbers loaded the birthday gift and all our other things onto the wheelbarrows and left. We reported it to the Jizhou authorities and left those two lieutenants with them to assist in the inquiries and help catch the robbers. We returned with all speed to inform Your Excellency."

Governor Liang was beside himself. "That faithless bastard," he bellowed. "He was a convicted criminal but I took it on myself to raise him up and give him a position. How could anyone be so ungrateful! Wait till I get my hands on him, I'll have him chopped into little pieces!" Then he called a secretary and dictated an order, to be delivered with all possible speed to Jizhou. He also wrote a personal report for the Grand Preceptor in the Eastern Capital, also for urgent delivery, informing him of what had happened.

Let us leave the Jizhou messenger and follow the courier sent to the Eastern Capital. The Grand Preceptor was extremely shocked when he received the news. "These robbers are of an unparalleled audacity," he said. "Only last year the items sent by my son-in-law were stolen and the culprits have still not been apprehended. Now the same thing has occurred again. What are we going to do?" Then he too dictated an order that he handed to a member of his entourage with instructions to ride post-haste to Jizhou and deliver it to the governor, who was to secure the immediate arrest of the bandits and himself report back to the capital.

Now by this time the Governor of Jizhou had received the message from Governor Liang of the Northern Capital and was racking his brains for a suitable response. In this extremity, an usher came and announced: "An official from the household of the Grand Preceptor in the Eastern Capital is waiting to see you on urgent business."

This put the Governor in an even greater flurry. "I bet it's something to do with the birthday convoy," he said to himself, and hurriedly went into session and received the official. "I have already received a report from two of Governor Liang's lieutenants," he said hurriedly, "and investigations are under way but so far no trace of the criminals has been found. The other day I received a letter from Governor Liang and the inspector in charge of suppression of banditry has been put in charge of the case with orders to produce results within a set period on pain of flogging but so far he has not made any arrests. If any progress is made in this matter, I shall be going personally to the capital to report it."

"I am in the confidence of the Grand Preceptor," said the envoy. "I have received specific orders from His Excellency to come here and insist on the arrest of the culprits. Just before I left the Grand Preceptor personally gave me my instructions: he wants me to stay right here in the government building and wait until such time as you have those date-sellers, the wine-carrier and the deserter Yang Zhi under lock and key. There is a time limit of ten days, by the end of which time it is essential that the culprits be transferred to the Eastern Capital. If by the end of the ten days' grace this has not been performed, you, Your Excellency, will be ordered to pro-ceed to the Island of Shamen. For me, too, it will almost certainly be impossible to return to see the Grand Preceptor and my fate will be, to say the least of it, uncertain. If you do not believe me, please take a look at the Grand Preceptor's written instructions."

The Governor did so, and what he saw did not reassure him. He immediately summoned all those responsible for the suppression of banditry. At this point one of those standing in attendance saluted and advanced to stand in front of the screen.

"Who are you?" the Governor asked.

"I am Ho' Tao, Your Honour, I'm in charge of anti-bandit operations in the three capitals."

"Is the recent theft of the birthday convoy on Yellow Mud Ridge your responsibility?"

"Let me tell you, Your Excellency, ever since I was given the case I have been working on it night and day. I have sent our most brilliant investigators to Yellow Mud Ridge to carry out a thorough search and make arrests. But up till now, even with threats and beatings, they have not been able to find the smallest clue. Please don't think that I have been dragging my feet. There simply is nothing I can do."

"Balls! What is it they say? When the cat's away the mice will play! Well, since I qualified in the exams and was appointed to this post, it's never for one moment been easy. Now someone's come here from the Grand Preceptor in the Eastern Capital and given me my instructions. I have ten days to arrest all the bandits and send them to the capital. When the time limit expires, I shall not only be removed from office, I shall be sent to languish on Shamen. You're supposed to be investigating this case but thanks to your remissness, calamities are about to fall on my head. Well, let me tell you, before it comes to that, you're going to be removed to somewhere so remote that even the wild geese don't fly." Thereupon he called for the tattooer, and had him inscribe on Ho Tao's face the words: "Banished to the district of ...," leaving the actual name blank. He concluded with this solemn warning: "Ho Tao, if you fail to catch the villains, you can expect the severest of sentences and no remission."

This scribbling on the cheeks is rather tough
It's always the little guy who's treated rough.
The villain hatches plots without obstruction,
The honest man must move with circumspection.

Now that he knew what the score was, Inspector Ho went straight from the audience hall to a reserved room and assembled his team of investigators there, then led them all off to a conference room to go through the case behind closed doors. The constables were staring at each other in horror, each with the look of a goose transfixed by an arrow, or a fish on a hook. They could think of nothing to say.

"In the general run of things you're all of you pretty lively when you come here to get paid," Inspector Ho said, "but now there's a real problem to solve I don't get a sound out of you. You might at least show me some sympathy. Haven't you noticed this mark on my face?"

"Sir, we do have feelings," they answered. "We're not blocks of wood, so how could we fail to notice it? It's just that those bogus merchants must have come from outside, they must be bandits from some wild mountainous region. So, then, when they'd seized the booty they made off back to their mountain hideout, where no doubt they're living it up this very minute. How can we be expected to catch them? Even if we knew where they were, we probably wouldn't be able to do much more than just report it."

If the Inspector was vexed before, now he was doubly vexed. He left the office and rode straight home. On arrival he tied up his horse in the stable and went to meditate on his misfortune in solitude.

"Why such a long face today?" his wife asked. And indeed:

Heavy his brow as if hung with chains,
His belly filled with sorrows and pains;
The netted fish will not get far;
Who'll help the turtle from the jar?

"I suppose I'd better tell you about it. The other day the Governor assigned me to the Yellow Mud Ridge case: a bunch of robbers stole the convoy of treasure Governor Liang of Daming was sending as a birthday gift to his father-in-law, Grand Preceptor Cai. Eleven loads of it. Nothing is known about the people who stole it. Since I was put on the case I have made no progress. Today when I went to ask for an extension of the deadline I learnt that there'd been a message from the Grand Preceptor's office saying that he wants the robbers arrested and sent to the capital immediately. When the Governor asked me about the case, I had to say that I hadn't made any arrests because there weren't any clues. So the Governor had them put this tattoo on my face. The place of exile hasn't been named yet. I shall learn my fate later!"

"Oh dear, what will we do? What can we do?"

At this moment Ho Tao's younger brother, Ho Qing, came to see him. "What do you want?" Ho Tao asked. "Why aren't you out gambling, as usual? Why have you come here?"

Ho Tao's wife, who was no fool, made an urgent signal to Ho Qing and said: "Come to the kitchen, I want to tell you something." Ho Qing followed his sister-in-law into the kitchen and sat down. She prepared some wine and food, poured him several cups, and urged him to eat. "Ho Tao is really unfair to me," his brother said. "I may not be much good at anything but after all we are brothers. Whatever his feelings for me, he is my elder brother. It really wouldn't hurt him to invite me sometimes to drink a cup of wine with him!"

"You don't understand. Your brother has a lot to worry about."

"My brother always has plenty of money and good things. Where does it all go to? I never ask him for anything. And anyway, what's he got to worry about?"

"I don't suppose you know about it. It's all because of this Yellow Mud Ridge case, those seven robbers disguised as date-sellers who stole Governor Liang's birthday convoy for the Grand Preceptor. The Governor of Jizhou has just received word from the Grand Preceptor that he's got only ten days to capture the culprits and send them to the capital, or else he'll be branded and banished to a frontier region. Didn't you notice the tattoo on your brother's face, saying that he's to be banished but not saying where to? If the robbers aren't caught your brother's really for it! So how can you expect him to be in the mood to drink wine with you? That's why I've taken it on myself to give you this wine and food. Your brother's very unhappy these days, you mustn't hold it against him."

"I'd heard a lot of gossip," Ho Qing said, "about some robbers who seized the birthday convoy. Where did all this happen?"

"On Yellow Mud Ridge, so they say."

"And what were they like, the ones who did it?"

"Are you drunk or something? I just told you, it was seven date-sellers who committed the robbery."

Ho Qing began to laugh triumphantly. "So that's how it is," he said. "Well, if it was some date-sellers, there's nothing to be so miserable about. It's just a matter of sending someone to arrest them, provided it's done carefully."

"It's all very well to say that but where are they going to be found?"

Ho Qing grinned again. "Sister-in-law, stop worrying. My brother's always offering hospitality to a bunch of spongers who come here to eat and drink with him. The one person he generally pays no attention to is his younger brother. Now he's in difficulties and says he can't find these robbers. Well, if he'd take the trouble to offer me a few cups of wine sometimes, he wouldn't find it such a problem to lay his hands on these robbers of his!"

"You mean you've got a clue?"

Ho Qing grinned broadly. "If big brother is really desperate, I think I might be able to find a way to help him!"

He stood up and made as if to leave but his sister-in-law pressed him to take another cup or two. Ho Tao's wife was sure there must be something in it. She told her husband. Ho Tao summoned his brother and said with all the friendliness he could muster: "Brother, if you really know the whereabouts of these robbers, why don't you help me?"

"Me? I don't know anything. I was just joking. How should I be able to help my big brother?" "My dearest brother, don't be so touchy. Just remember how good I usually am to you. Forget my occasional bad temper. Right now I really need your help."

"Haven't you got all those sharp-eyed quick-witted officers under your command, and hundreds of constables? Why can't they make a little effort on your behalf? How can a younger brother rescue an elder brother?"

"Forget about them. From the way you talk I know you've got something up your sleeve. You wouldn't want to keep it back for the benefit of someone else, would you? Just give me a clue. Of course, I'll make it up to you. I believe my fate rests in your hands."

"What kind of clue? I don't know what you're talking about."

"Stop trying to annoy me. Just remember that we're the same flesh and blood."

"All right, all right. But wait till the situation is really desperate, then I'll come myself and lend a hand in capturing this bunch of petty thieves."

"Brother-in-law," the lady said. "You really ought to do something to help your brother, if you've got any brotherly feelings. He's received orders from the Grand Preceptor, who wants these felons handed over immediately. Theirs was a capital offence. How can you talk of petty thieves?"

"You ought to know, sister-in-law, that I'm only interested in gambling. How many times have we heard my brother say so? But however much he shouts at me, I've never dared complain. When he's got food and drink it's always other people he enjoys it with. It's only today that he finds he needs me!"

Ho Tao could still sense from his brother's words that he knew something. He quickly went and got ten taels of silver and placed them on the table. He said: "Here you are, then, brother. Here's something to start with. Later, if we catch the robbers, I'll give you gold and silver and silk, I promise you."

"Well, brother," Ho Qing said, "it's obviously true what they say, 'people kiss the Buddha's feet when seas are rough but in fine weather no one lights incense.' But it would be like blackmail if I took your money now. Put it away, quickly, you don't have to bribe me! If you behave like that I won't tell you a thing! However, since you've both apologized to me, I will tell you. Only don't try to impress me by bringing out your money."

"But it's the official reward," his brother said. "Just a few hundred cash, don't refuse it. But please do tell me where I can find out about those robbers."

Ho Qing slapped his thigh. "I've got the robbers right here, in my pouch."

"How can you say you've got them in your pouch?" said the startled elder brother.

"Don't ask how. They're here, isn't that good enough for you? And put your money away. Stop trying to bribe me. All you need is to show me a little kindness." Ho Qing spoke lightly but his words were to have grave consequences:

In Yuncheng province, a leader will arise;
In the Marshes of Mount Liang, bold spirits conspire.

Just as Yang Zhi was preparing to commit suicide by jumping down a steep place on the Huangni Ridge he stood still and thought. "When my parents gave birth to me I was very good-looking, and when I was a youth I knew all the eighteen forms of military exercises. I cannot ruin my future career by committing suicide as it will be better to wait until the bandits have been arrested and then I can explain matters." He then returned, and saw that his party of fourteen men were still staring at him but yet could not get up. He pointed at them with his ringer and cursed; saying, "You knaves would not listen to what I had said, and that was the cause of what followed, and you put me into this trouble." He then picked up his halberd that was lying at the foot of a tree, and put a sword at his belt. He looked all round but could see nothing else. He heaved a sigh, and went down the ridge.

About ten o'clock in the evening the fourteen men were able to scramble to their feet, and then they expressed their sorrow. The steward Xie said to them, "You would not listen to Major Yang Zhi's order, and therefore today I am in danger of my life."
"Sir," said one of the men, "now that it is all finished let us discuss a plan."
"What is your idea?" asked the steward Xie.
"We are certainly to blame," said the man. "The ancients had a saying, 'When the fire is scorching our bodies we try to put it out, or when a wasp gets in our bosom we quickly unfasten our clothes.' If Major Yang Zhi were here now we could not say anything but as he has now gone away why should we not return to Grand Secretary Liang, and lay all the blame for this on Yang Zhi? We could say that on the way Yang Zhi insulted us by continual curses and beat us so bitterly that we could hardly walk. He was in league with some bandits, and gave us some drugged wine so that we became unconscious; when he bound our hands and feet he went off with the golden articles and jewels."
The steward replied, "What you say is all right. At daybreak we will go to the local magistrate and report the matter as you say. We can leave the two servants at the yamen to guide the officials here and assist in arresting the bandits. The following night we can start for the Northern Capital where we can report the matter, and get a dispatch sent to the Prime Minister so that he can give orders for the arrest of the bandits." The following morning steward Xie led the men to the local magistrate at Jizhou Prefecture to report the matter but we need not go into the detail.
As he left the Huangni Ridge Yang Zhi was in a very melancholy spirit. He travelled during half the night in a southerly direction, and then lay down in a forest to rest. He asked himself, "I have no money to cover the traveling expenses and I cannot meet anyone on this road whom I know so what shall I do?" As soon as it was dawn he however took the advantage of the cool breeze and started. He felt quite miserable, after walking about seven li. Upon coming to an inn he thought, "If I don't get some wine here I shall soon be unable to proceed any further." Entering the inn he sat down on a stool which was made of, as same as the table, the wood of the mulberry tree. He placed his halberd leaning against the stool by his side. In the kitchen he saw a woman who asked him, "Do you want to dine, sir?"
"Bring me a small horn cup of wine," said Yang Zhi. "Also boil a little rice for me, and serve it with some meat. When I have dined I will pay you." The woman called a youth who poured out the wine and took it to Yang Zhi. She duly prepared the rice and meat and it was also brought in. When he had finished his meal he picked up his halberd, and was walking towards the door when the woman called out, "You have not yet paid me for the food and drink."
"Place it to my account, and I will pay you when I come back," said Yang Zhi. So saying he walked off.
The youth who had served the wine ran after him, and took hold of his clothes but Yang Zhi knocked the youth down by a blow of his fist. The woman seeing this cried out for help. Yang Zhi paid no attention to this, and went on his way. He heard a man behind him calling out, "Where are you going to?" Turning his head he saw that the man was only half dressed, and was running after him trailing a cudgel. He thought the man was unwise in attacking him as he could easily kill him. He stood still, awaiting the attack, and saw that the youth had got a pitchfork, and was also running towards him. There were also three farm labourers armed with cudgels who were also hastening forward. Yang Zhi thought, "If I knock this first man down the others probably will not dare to come any further." So he held his halberd in front of him ready to strike the man. The man came up whirling his cudgel, and then both men fought for about twenty bouts; but the man did not overcome Yang Zhi. He was only able to parry and dodge Yang Zhi's blows. The youth and the farm labourers were on the point of rushing upon Yang Zhi when that half-dressed man suddenly sprang back clear of Yang Zhi's halberd, and said, "No more fighting! What is the name of this man with the halberd?"
"Whether I am traveling or staying at home I do not change my name," said Yang Zhi, "I am Yang Zhi, the 'Blue Faced Brute.'"
"Are you not the Yang Zhi who looked after the Emperor's pavilion at Eastern Capital?" asked the man.
"How do you know that I am that officer?" said Yang Zhi.
The man threw his cudgel away, saluted with folded hands, and said, "I did not recognize Mount Tai."
Yang Zhi raised him up, and asked, "Who are you?"
The man said, "I previously lived at Kaifeng. I was a pupil of Drill Inspector Lin Chong of the Imperial Guard. I am Cao Zheng, and my father and also my grandfather were butchers. I was very skilled in drawing the sinews, breaking the bones, and scraping the skins. And because of this people gave me the nickname 'Demon Carver.' A wealthy man at Kaifeng gave me five thousand strings of cash to trade with in Shandong but I was unfortunate and lost all the money so that I dare not go back. Instead I married the daughter of a farmer near here, and live in their home. The woman whom you saw in the kitchen is my wife, and the man with the pitchfork is my brother-in-law. I saw that your skill with the halberd was almost equal to that of my instructor Lin Chong, and that I had no chance of defeating you."
"You say you were the pupil of Drill Instructor Lin Chong," said Yang Zhi. "You will therefore know that Marshal Gao Qiu, the Marshal of the Imperial Guard, insulted the wife of Lin Chong, and that was why the latter became a brigand. He is now at Liangshan Marsh."
"I have heard people say so," said Cao Zheng, "but I have no means of knowing whether it is true or not. Will you please come to my home and rest a while there?"
The two men then went back to the inn, and Cao Zheng asked Yang Zhi to be seated. He also asked his wife and his brother-in-law to salute Yang Zhi. They then dined together. During the meal Cao Zheng asked Yang Zhi what business had brought him to that place. Yang Zhi told him all about the matter of losing the convoy of marble, and how he had now also lost all the birthday gifts of the Grand Secretary Liang.
"In that case," said Cao Zheng, "I trust that you will stay at my house, and we can talk matters over."
"It is very kind of you to make such an offer," said Yang Zhi. "But I cannot stay here as I am afraid that the police will come to search and arrest me."
"Then where are you thinking of seeking refuge?" asked Cao Zheng.
"I am thinking of going to Liangshan Marsh to find Drill Instructor Lin Chong," said Yang Zhi. "Sometime before when I was passing near Liangshan Marsh I had a fight with him but Wang Lun saw that we were both experts at arms, and took us both up the hill to his stronghold where Lin Chong and I became friends. Wang Lun tried very hard to get me to stay at Liangshan Marsh but I had no desire to become a bandit. Now, if I go to seek refuge there for fear of being branded as a criminal it would be too unmanly, so I have not yet decided whether to do that or not."
"What you say is quite true," said Cao Zheng. "I have also heard that Wang Lun is jealous of other men and that when Drill Instructor Lin Chong went there he suffered much at his hand. But would it not be better to go to the Baozhu Monastery on the Lianglong Mountain in Qingzhou which is not far from here. The place is a natural stronghold, and there is only one road to it. Just now the Abbot, and also a number of monks have given up their vows, and have allowed their hair to grow again. They say he has now about four or five hundred men who loot in the surrounding villages. His name is Deng Long, and his nickname is 'Golden Eyed Tiger.' If you are thinking of becoming a bandit you had better go and join that gang, and enjoy your life."
"As there is such a place," said Yang Zhi, "why should I not go there, and capture it for the benefit of myself."
So he stayed with Cao Zheng for the night, and next morning set out for the Lianglong Mountain. Towards the evening of the following day he saw a high mountain in the distance so he decided to rest for the night in the forest, and proceed on his way the next day. Upon entering the forest to find a safe place to sleep he was surprised to see there at the foot of a pine tree a very fat monk who had stripped off all his clothes to enjoy the cool. He saw some tattoo marks on his bare back. When the monk saw Yang Zhi he jumped up, seized his monk's staff, and shouted out, "You prick! Where are you from?"
Yang Zhi recognized his voice, and thought that the monk came from the same village as himself. So he said, "Where are you from?" But instead of replying, the monk raised his staff to strike Yang Zhi.
"This bald-headed donkey is not polite," said Yang Zhi; "I will revenge my wrong on him." So saying he ran forward with his halberd towards the monk. The two men fought maneuvering backwards and forwards but after about fifty bouts neither of them had gained any advantage. The monk saw a fault on his opponent's part so he jumped aside clear of his halberd, and shouted out, "Let us have a rest."
Yang Zhi appreciated the monk's skill very much, and asked himself, "Where does this monk come from? He is certainly very skillful with his staff, and we are just well matched."
"Who are you," asked the monk, "with such a blue face?"
"I am Yang Zhi who looked after the Emperor's hall at the Eastern Capital," replied Yang Zhi.
"Are you the man who tried to sell a sword at the Eastern Capital, and killed a man named Niu Er?" asked the monk.
"Do you not see the brand on my face?" asked Yang Zhi.
"So now we meet here for the first time," said the monk laughingly.
"May I venture to ask who you are," said Yang Zhi, "and how did you know that I once wanted to sell a sword?"
"I am no other," said the monk, "than Major Lu Da, of the headquarters of Old General Zhong at Yanan Prefecture. Because I killed a man nicknamed 'The Bully of the Western Pass' I sought refuge at Mount Wutai where I became a monk. I have a tattoo on my back, and therefore people call me 'The Tattooed Monk.'"
Yang Zhi laughed and said, "We are evidently from the same village. I have heard of your fame everywhere. I did hear also that you were a monk at the Great Xiangguo Monastery so what are you doing here?"
Lu Da said, "That would entail a long explanation. While I was in charge of the vegetable garden of the Great Xiangguo Monastery I met Lin Chong, 'Leopard's Head,' whose life was in danger through the hatred of the Marshal Gao Qiu of the Imperial Guards. I saw his danger on the way to Cangzhou so I rescued him. The two constables who were escorting Lin Chong, returned and reported to Gao Qiu that I had rescued Lin Chong from them in the Yezhu Forest, and then escorted him to Cangzhou so that they had no opportunity of killing him as Gao Qiu ordered. That bastard was so angry that he wanted to kill me. He informed the Abbot at the monastery that he must not allow me to stay there. He also sent men to arrest me but some ruffians came and informed me of that fact, so I could escape being arrested. So to give them a wrong impression I burned down the hut where I lived at the vegetable garden, and then ran away but in whatever direction I went I never felt safe. I arrived at last at Shizipo in Mengzhou where I was almost killed by a woman of an inn who gave me some drugged wine so that I became unconscious. But her husband just then arriving was very much surprised at seeing my heavy monk's staff and knife, and he therefore gave me another drug which quickly brought me to my senses again. After he had ascertained my name he asked me to stay there a few days, and adopted me as his brother. The man and his wife were well known to the bandits as "'Market Gardener" Zhang Qing' and his wife, Sun Er Niang, nicknamed 'Night Witch.' They are very generous. After staying there for four days I heard that the Baozhu Monastery on the Lianglong Mountain was a safe place to establish oneself so I decided to go there and join the bandits under Deng Long. But that man was unwilling to let me join them on the mountain, and attacked me before I got there but as he failed to defeat me he retreated to the stronghold, and barred the three doors against me. As there was only one way up the mountain, and they would not come out again to fight with me in spite of my cursing them, and as I had no other prospect, I came to this forest, and did not expect to meet you here."
Yang Zhi was much pleased at hearing this, and after saluting each other the two men sat down on the ground. Then Yang Zhi gave his new friend all the details of selling of the sword which resulted in the death of Niu Er; also how he had lost all the birthday presents from Grand Secretary Liang; and how Cao Zheng had advised him to come to that place. He then asked, "As the bandits at the Lianglong Mountain have barred the gates in the defile how would it be if we had a ruse to bring them here? Let us go to Cao Zheng's home and discuss the matter there."
They immediately left the forest, and soon reached Cao Zheng's inn. Yang Zhi duly introduced Lu Da and Cao Zheng quickly brought them wine and food. They then discussed the position at the Lianglong Mountain, and Cao Zheng said, "As they have definitely barred the gates, not only you two but even ten thousand cavalry could not get to the top of the mountain. As it would be useless to use force to get them to open the gates we must think of some other plan."
Lu Da said, "That prick! When I went there he met me outside the gate, and as he did not allow me to stay there we fought, and I gave Deng Long a kick in the crotch and knocked him down. But a great many of his men rescued him, and retreated up the stronghold barring those beastly gates. I cursed them but they would not come outside again to resume the fighting."
"Since it is a delectable place," said Yang Zhi, "how can we afford not to attack by strategy?"
"We cannot get there," said Lu Da, "and that makes his position intact."
"I have a plan," said Cao Zheng, "but I do not know whether you two gentlemen would approve of it."
"Let us hear your plan," said Yang Zhi.
"You cannot do in those clothes," said Cao Zheng, "and you will have to dress in the same clothes as our farm labourers. I will take the monk staff and broadsword and go with my brother-in-law and a number of other men to the mountain. We take Lu Da with us as a prisoner, bound with ropes but tied in such a way that I can release him with a single pull on the rope. Upon arriving there I shout out: "I am an innkeeper at a village near here. This monk came to my inn, and drank so much wine that he became drunk. He would not pay me but instead said that he was going to take some men to fight you in your mountain stronghold. Upon hearing this I had him bound while he was still drunk, and have brought him here to present to the bandit chief. Upon hearing this Deng Long will at once allow us to go up the mountain. Upon arriving at the stronghold, and meeting Deng Long I will pull the rope, and release Lu Da and hand him his monk's staff. Then you two can rush forward, and Deng Long will not be able to run away. If we succeed in killing Deng Long his followers will submit to us without any further trouble. What do you think of that scheme?"
Lu Da and Yang Zhi both said that the scheme was excellent.
That evening all the men dined, and prepared the food to take with them the next day. The following morning they were up at five o'clock, and ate a hearty breakfast. Lu Da's things were packed up, and stored away. Lu Da, Yang Zhi, Cao Zheng and his brother-in-law, and about seven farm labourers departed on the road to the Lianglong Mountain.
In the afternoon they stopped in a forest, and stripped the clothes off Lu Da, then bound him with ropes, and handed him over to two labourers to lead him. Yang Zhi wore a straw hat, a cloth shirt, and carried a halberd in his hand. Cao Zheng carried the monk's staff. The other men had cudgels, and they formed an escort round Lu Da both in front and behind. Upon coming in view of the gates at the foot of the defile they noticed crossbows, bows, bottles of lime powder, and supplies of stone balls were stacked ready for defence. As soon as the brigands on guard at the gate saw that the monk had arrived as a prisoner they flew up the mountain to report the matter. In a short time two junior minions came to the gate, and asked, "Where do you come from, and what do you come here for? Why have you brought that monk here?"
Cao Zheng replied, "We come from a small village in the vicinity of this mountain, and I have an inn at that place. This fat monk often came to my inn to drink wine. One time he got drunk, and would not pay for the wine. He said that he would go to Liangshan Marsh, and get many hundreds of men to come here with him to attack your stronghold. He would also lay waste all the villages about here. So we made him still more drunk by giving him plenty of wine, and then tied him up with ropes to bring him here as a prisoner for your chief. We think this would prove our submission to you, and so save us from calamity in the future."
When the two junior minions heard this they were extremely happy, and said, "Good! But just wait a minute here." They then went up the mountain, and reported to Deng Long that the fat monk had been captured, and brought there as a prisoner.
Deng Long was also pleased at this and told them to bring the monk there. So he could have his heart and eat it with wine, and his feeling of resentment would thus be appeased. The brigands hearing these orders opened the gates, and told the men outside to enter. Yang Zhi and Cao Zheng closely guarding Lu Da advanced up the mountain, and as they passed up the narrow defile, and through the barriers they realized how impregnable the place was. The monastery itself was encircled by high mountains, and the peaks were unscalable. The narrow road led to the final barriers in front of the monastery. There were three stout barriers, and neatly arranged logs of wood for rolling down on the road, huge stones for discharging upon the enemy, crossbows, ordinary bows, and darts made of bamboo. After passing the three barriers they came to the Baozhu Monastery which had three large doors. In front was an open space as flat and smooth as a mirror, and around it were railings.
Standing near the gate in front of the monastery were seven or eight brigands who, upon seeing that Lu Da was bound, pointed at him with their fingers and cursed him, "You bald-headed donkey assaulted our chief and have now been arrested. You shall soon be chopped into small pieces."
Lu Da did not reply to this. Upon entering the monastery they saw that there was no idol of Buddha but in the centre of the hall there was a large chair covered with a tiger's skin. Many bandits there had spears and cudgels and stood in ranks on both sides. In a little time Deng Long entered assisted by two bandits, and took his seat on the chair. Cao Zheng and Yang Zhi were close to Lu Da, and led him to the steps below the chair.
"You bald-headed donkey!" said Deng Long, "a few days ago you kicked me in the crotch, and it is still swollen and black and blue. Today you see me face to face."
Lu Da opened his eyes wide and staring shouted, "You prick! You need not go!"
Two labourers seized the rope, and pulling it released Lu Da who taking the monk's staff from Cao Zheng whirled it round. Yang Zhi threw off his straw hat, and seized his halberd. Cao Zheng whirled his cudgel and his labourers all came forward with their cudgels. Deng Long was endeavoring to escape when Lu Da struck him with his staff, and split his skull into two parts, and the same blow shattered the chair. Yang Zhi had attacked about five of the bandits with his sword when Cao Zheng called out, "All of you must surrender. Otherwise we shall wipe you all out." The five hundred bandits outside the monastery were so surprised at what had happened that they immediately surrendered.
They then ordered the bandits to take the body of Deng Long and burn it on the mountain at the back of the monastery. Yang Zhi and Lu Da then went to the granary and took stock of the grain there, put other rooms in order, and took particulars of the things that were stored behind the temple. They then took food and wine for them to eat in the temple. As Lu Da and Yang Zhi were now masters of the stronghold they had a big feast with plenty of wine. All the bandits were submitted to the changed position of affairs and still controlled by their officers. Cao Zheng bid adieu to Yang Zhi and Lu Da and returned to his homestead but we need not say anything more about him.
The men who had formed the escort for the birthday presents and also Xie, the steward, went on their way to the Northern Capital, and upon arrival there they went to the yamen of Grand Secretary Liang, and there prostrating themselves asked to be excused for their crime.
Grand Secretary Liang said, "I appreciate fully the difficulties you must have had on the road. But where is Yang Zhi?"
"That we dare not say," said the men. "That man is a bold ungrateful thief. When we had gone about seven days from here, we reached the Huangni Ridge where we rested in the shade of some pine trees as it was a very hot day. We did not know that Yang Zhi had an understanding with a band of seven thieves. They pretended to be traders of dates, and were pushing seven small Jiangzhou–made handcarts. They had apparently arranged to meet us at that place, and were waiting for us there. Yang Zhi had also arranged for a man to carry some wine to arrive there at the same time. Without thinking we bought the wine but it had been drugged so that we were soon insensible and were all bound up with ropes. Yang Zhi joined with the seven bandits in loading the birthday presents on the small carts, and then went off with them. We reported the matter to the magistrate at Jizhou Prefecture where we left two of our servants to assist in arresting the bandits. We have travelled both day and night to reach here, and report this to Your Honour."
Upon hearing this Liang was very much surprised and cursed; saying, "That banished thief! He was a convicted criminal. I promoted him, gave him a position, and now I find that he has forgotten all my generosity. If I can only catch him I will kill him, and cut him up into ten thousand small pieces." He then dictated a dispatch to his secretary, and sent a man with it to Jizhou Prefecture with instructions to travel day and night until delivered. He also wrote a personal letter to Prime Minister Cai at the Eastern Capital, explaining what had happened.
We need not say anything about the dispatch sent to Jizhou Prefecture but we will now follow the personal letter for the Prime Minister. When Prime Minister Cai received the letter, and read it he was very much surprised and said, "These bandits are quite fearless. Last year they seized presents from my son-in-law, and so far they have not been arrested. This year the same thing has happened again, so what will be the end of it?" He wrote a dispatch, and told an officer in his yamen to take it himself with all speed to the Prefect of Jizhou who must immediately have the bandits arrested, and report to him at once.
After receipt of the order from Grand Secretary Liang at the Northern Capital the Prefect at Jizhou attended to the matter everyday without succeeding in arresting the bandits, and was becoming very anxious. One day the doorkeeper reported that an officer from Prime Minister Cai at Eastern Capital had arrived with a very urgent dispatch, and was waiting outside the hall to see the Prefect.
The Prefect was surprised at this but thought that it must have something to do with the matter of the birthday presents also. He went into the hall and when he met the officer he said, "I have already received an accusation against the bandits from the servants of the Grand Secretary Liang, and have sent men to arrest the bandits but so far we have not been able to find any trace of them. I also received a personal dispatch from Liang instructing me to give the police and the Inspector only a few days in which to arrest the brigands, and if they did not secceed in that time they were to be beaten. If we get only information as to the whereabouts of these brigands I will go myself and report the matter to your master."
"I am the intimate servant of the Prime Minister," said the officer. "He told me his intentions, and sent me specially to see that all the bandits were arrested. Just before I left the Eastern Capital the Prime Minister spoke to me and said that he wanted me to stay in your yamen until this matter was settled. He wants you to arrest the seven traders of dates, the wine seller, and also Yang Zhi who disappeared. They must all be arrested within ten days, and be sent to the Eastern Capital. If you do not succeed in arresting the men within that time I am afraid that he will banish you to Shamen Island. It will be very dangerous even for me to return and report a failure to the Prime Minister. If you doubt my word then please peruse the dispatch from the Prime Minister which I have brought."
The Prefect read the dispatch, and was much surprised. He at once summoned a number of police. Just then a man standing on the steps outside the door attracted attention by calling out "nud" and the Prefect turning to him said, "Who are you?"
The man replied, "I am He Tao, Police Inspector in the Third Police Area."
The Prefect asked, "Are you the man in charge of the affairs regarding the stealing of the birthday presents at the Huangni Ridge?"

He Tao replied, "Your Excellency, I had charge of the party that went to attend to that matter, and I have not had a wink of sleep since I started, and have kept the men under constant supervision. Although I beat the men with my stick continually we have not found a single trace of the bandits so far. There has been no neglect on my part, and yet I can find no plan to settle the matter."
The Prefect spoke in a loud voice, "Nonsense! As the ancients said, 'You have not been sharp enough, and your men have been too slow.' I passed my Imperial Examinations, and rose to my present position after many difficulties. Today an officer has arrived from the Prime Minister at the Eastern Capital with a dispatch which states that all the bandits must be arrested within ten days, and sent to the Eastern Capital. Should I fail to execute this order I shall be dismissed from office, and banished to Shamen Island. Although you are an Inspector yet apparently you are of no use, and will bring a great calamity to me. I shall, however, first send you to a very distant military post, so far away that even the wild geese cannot fly there." He then summoned a man, and told him to brand on the Inspector's face the three characters: "Banished to... Prefecture" leaving a blank space for the destination to be branded in afterwards. This done the Prefect said, "He Tao! If you do not arrest those bandits I will never forgive you."
He Tao after hearing this withdrew to his office where he summoned a large number of policemen to have a secret discussion of this matter.
He Tao said, "In your positions you get your wages whether you have anything to do or not but although you have not arrested the bandits you have not said anything about it. But you will surely have pity for me with these characters branded on my face."
The men replied, "Sir, we are not as senseless as wood or grass and we do know about your difficulty. We think that the bandits must have come from a remote and wild place in the hills in another district. When they seized the valuable presents they must have returned to their mountain stronghold in good spirits so how can we find them? Even if we know where they have gone to we shall still be quite helpless."
When He Tao heard them say this his sorrow for himself was doubled. Without saying anything he left the room, mounted a horse and started off for home. Upon arrival at home he led the horse to a trough at the back of the house, and tied it up there. He was by himself, and felt very melancholy.
Upon entering the house his wife asked him, "Husband, how is it your face is like that?"
"A few days ago," said He Tao, "the Prefect gave me an order to arrest some bandits who had stolen, at the Huangni Ridge, the valuable birthday presents that had been sent by Grand Secretary Liang to Prime Minister Cai. I took the order but so far I have failed to arrest the bandits. Today I was going to ask for a renewal of the time limit for the arrest of those men, and I did not know that an officer had arrived from the Eastern Capital with an order that the bandits must be sent there without delay. The Prefect asked me what news I had about the bandits, and I replied that I could get no news of them, and so far they had not been arrested. Thereupon the Prefect gave orders and had these three characters branded upon my face leaving a space for the place of my banishment to be filled in later on. I did not know what my fate will be."
His wife asked, "Well, and how will you put this matter right?"
Just then his younger brother He Qing entered, and He Tao said to him, "What are you doing here? Why have you not gone gambling?"
Madame He Tao signaled to He Qing with her hand and said to him, "Brother-in-law, just come into the kitchen, as I have something to say to you." They both then went into the kitchen where He Qing sat down.
The woman spread on the table some meat, vegetables, and wine, warmed a cup of wine, and then asked He Qing to dine.
He Qing said, "My elder brother was very insulting to me. I am his younger brother, although I am not very able."
The woman said, "You do not understand but your brother is exceedingly upset just now."
"But my brother has a good income everyday," said He Qing, "so where has the money gone to? I have not troubled him with visits so why is he so upset today?"
The woman said, "Some traders of dates at the Huangni Ridge stole the birthday presents sent by Grand Secretary Liang at the Northern Capital to Prime Minister Cai at the Eastern Capital. An order came from the Eastern Capital that if the bandits were not arrested within ten days the officer should be branded and banished to a distant military post. Did you not notice the three characters branded on your elder brother's face? Sooner or later he would suffer more if those men were not arrested, and is therefore disinclined to drink with you. So I have prepared some food and wine for yourself. While he is in this melancholy mood you must excuse him."
"I have heard at several places," said He Qing, "that some bandits captured the birthday presents. But where did it happen?"
"I heard that it occurred at the Huangni Ridge."
"But who could have done it?"
The woman replied, "Brother, you are not yet drunk. I have already told you that the men who captured the valuables were seven traders of dates."
He Qing burst into a roar of laughter, and said, "So that is it. But if he knows that there were date traders why is he so melancholy? Why does he not send some clever men to arrest them?"
"What you say is all right," said the woman, "but he cannot find out where they have gone to."
He Qing laughed again and said, "Sister-in-law, you need not be anxious. But you know that my elder brother was always asking men to come and dine with him whom he called his 'younger brothers' but he never invited me, his real younger brother, to join them. If he had previously invited me to dine with him we could this day have discussed the matter of these bandits."
"Brother-in-law, do you know where the bandits are?"
"I might have some plan of saving him from it," said He Qing, "when my brother is in a critical position." He then got up with the idea of leaving the room but his sister-in-law detained him to drink two more cups of wine. When she heard these statements made she thought they were somewhat strange, so she immediately went to her husband, and told him what she had heard. Her husband told her to bring He Qing in, and when He Tao saw him he smiled and said to him, "Younger brother, if you know where the bandits have gone to why do you not help me?"
"I do not know that," said He Qing. "I only spoke to your wife in a joking manner. But how can I help you?"
"Good brother," said He Tao, "do not look upon this matter with indifference. Just think of my goodness instead of my fault, and so save my life."
"Elder brother," said He Qing, "have you not some very smart men among the two or three hundred you employ, and why cannot they help you in this matter? I am only a single individual so how can I help you?"
"You need not talk about those men," said He Tao. "I think that you know something of the haunts of the bandits so I hope that you will not tell any other man about it and so help him to capture the bandits. If you give me the information I will see that you are duly rewarded. You will in this way also relieve my mind."
"Elder brother," said He Qing, "I really do not know where they have gone to."
"You may pay no attention to me," said He Tao, "but we are real brothers and you must tell me what you know for the sake of our parents."
"Do not be in such a hurry," said He Qing. "When matters are more urgent I will try and help you to arrest those small bandits."
"Brother," said the woman, "you should display your brotherly love by helping your elder brother. The Prime Minister has issued an order for the immediate arrest of all these men. It is a very big affair, and yet you speak of 'small bandits.'"
"Sister-in-law," said He Qing, "you are aware how many times my elder brother has beaten and cursed me for gambling so that I am afraid of him, and do not dare to dispute with him. Previously he had wine and food, and had a good time with other men but now he realizes that his younger brother is of some use."
He Tao saw that his brother knew something more so he quickly took ten taels of silver and placed them on the table and then told his brother to take them. "If we capture the brigands I myself will give you a reward of gold, silver, and silk."
He Qing laughed and said, "There is a saying, 'When there is urgent business we clasp the feet of Buddha but when nothing happens we do not even burn incense.' But if I now take the silver it would seem that I have been trying to extort it from you. So take the money away as I do not like you to bribe me. If you say anything else about giving me money I will not say anything. As you both have spoken kindly, I will tell you about the bandits."
"The money is the reward offered by the yamen," said He Tao, "so why should you not take it? Younger brother, do not refuse it." I ask you again, 'Do you know where those bandits have gone to?'"
Patting his leg, He Qing said, "I have all those bandits in my pocket."
He Tao was surprised, and asked, "Younger brother, how can you talk about putting all those bandits in your pocket?"
"That's my business," said He Qing. "I've already got them all inside. Now take away that money and do not try to bribe me again. I want us to be the best of friends." He then told them in detail all that he knew.

At Yuncheng County heroes distribute wealth,
At Liangshan Marsh assemble many veterans.

018

Song Jiang Gongming Secretly Helps & Enables Ward Chief Chao Flee by riding to give his friend a warning; Beautiful Beard Handsome Whiskers Zhu Tong Devises a Scheme to Secure the Flying Tiger & Cleverly Fools the Winged Tiger & confuses everyone till morning

Inspector Ho continued to urge his younger brother to tell what he knew. From a document case at his waist Ho Qing extracted a notebook.
"All the robbers are written down right here!"
"How can that be?"
"To tell the truth, a few days ago I lost again at gambling. I was clean, without a copper. A gambling pal of mine took me to a village called Anle, fifteen //outside the North Gate, and I put up at the Wang Family Inn, where I was able to raise a bit of change for the gaming tables. The authorities have issued an order that all inns must keep a register, with proper seals, and that an entry must be made for every guest, stating his name, place of origin, destination, and line of business, and that it must be shown to the local ward chief on demand, once a month. The attendant at the Wang Family Inn is illiterate, and he begged me to keep the register for him for a couple of weeks.
"On the third day of the sixth month, seven date merchants arrived pushing seven carts. I recognized one of them as Ward Chief Chao of East Bank in Yuncheng County, because I once stayed at his manor with a gambling friend. I took up my brush-pen and asked: 'What is your name, please?' Before he could speak, a fair-faced man with a mustache and goatee quickly answered for him: 'We're all of us named Li. We're from Haozhou Prefecture, and are on our way with dates for the Eastern Capital.'
"Though I was sceptical, I wrote it down. The next day, they left. My host offered to take me gambling in a place in the village. On the way, at a fork in the road, we met a fellow carrying buckets on a shoulder-pole. I didn't know him but the innkeeper hailed him: 'Where are you going, Master Bai?' 'To a rich man's house in the village. I'm bringing him this load of vinegar,' the man replied. The innkeeper said to me: 'This is Bai Sheng, known as the Daylight Rat. He's also fond of gambling.' I made a mental note of it. Later, when I heard gossip that date merchants had drugged some travellers on Yellow Earth Ridge and stole the birthday gifts, I guessed at once that Ward Chief Chao was involved. Arrest Bai and question him, and you'll get the whole story. Here is my copy of the register."
Ho Tao was delighted. He led his brother in to see the prefect.
"Any developments on that case?" asked the official.
"Some," replied Ho Tao.
The prefect called them into his rear chambers and questioned them carefully. Ho Qing responded in detail. The prefect directed eight policemen to go with the brothers that same night to Anle Village. They compelled the innkeeper to take them to Bai Sheng, and reached the wine seller's house at the third watch. The innkeeper, at their insistence, called Bai Sheng to open the door and strike a light. Bai's wife led them in. They heard Bai Sheng groaning on the bed. The wife said he had a fever but had not been able to sweat. They hauled him from the bed and tied him up. His face was blotched red and white.
"That's a fine thing you did on Yellow Earth Ridge!" they yelled.
Bai Sheng denied everything. They bound his wife but she also refused to talk. The policemen searched the house. They noticed that the earthen floor beneath the bed was uneven, and started to dig. At a depth of three feet, one of them uttered a cry. Bai Sheng's face turned the colour of clay. From the hole in the ground, the diggers extracted a bag of gold and silver.
The police concealed Bai Sheng's head and face in a hood, and took him and his wife and the loot back to Jizhou. It was the fifth watch and the sky was already light when they reached the prefectural office. They brought him before the prefect, tied the ropes around him more securely, and asked him who the brains was behind the robbery. Bai Sheng denied any connection, and refused to name his confederates. They beat him three or four times, till his skin split and blood was pouring from his wounds.
"We already know that the chief culprit is Ward Chief Chao of East Bank, Yuncheng County," shouted the prefect. "There's no use denying it. Name the other six and I'll stop the beating."
Bai Sheng tried to hold out. But soon he couldn't take it any longer. "The leader is Ward Chief Chao," he admitted. "He came with six men and inveigled me into carrying the wine! But I really don't know who the other six are!"
"That's no problem," said the prefect. "All we have to do is take Ward Chief Chao, and we'll find the rest quickly enough."
A twenty-catty cangue for condemned criminals was locked around Bai Sheng's neck. His wife, also fettered, was sent to the women's prison. The prefect then issued an order directing Ho Tao to proceed at once with twenty crack policemen to Yuncheng County and request the magistrate to aid in arresting Ward Chief Chao and his six un-named fellow conspirators. Inspector Ho was told to take along the two captains who had accompanied the birthday gift convoy to identify the culprits. But, warned the prefect, he was to proceed quietly and not let news of the raid leak out.
The inspector and his men travelled all night to Yuncheng. First Ho Tao secretly put up his party at an inn. Then, with two of his policemen and the prefect's order, he presented himself at the gate of the magistrate's compound.
By then it was late morning. and court was in recess. All was still. Ho Tao went into a tea-house across the street and sat down to wait. As he was sipping some steeped tea he had ordered he asked the waiter: "Why is it so quiet outside the magistracy?"
"The morning session is over. The attendants and litigants have all gone off to eat. They haven't come back yet."
"Do you happen to know which clerk is on duty today?"
"Here he comes, now," said the waiter, pointing.
Ho Tao looked. Emerging from the magistracy was a man whose family name was Song. His formal given name was Jiang, his popular given name was Kongming. A third son, he was born in the county's Song Family Village. Because he was short and swarthy, everyone called him Dark Song Jiang. And since he was filial to his parents, and was a chivalrous man, generous to friends, he was also known as the Filial and Gallant Dark Third Master. Above him, his father was still alive, though his mother had died early. Below him was a younger brother Song Qing, known as the Iron Fan who, with their father, the Venerable Song, ran the farm in the village and lived on the fruits of their fields.
Song Jiang was a clerk of the county magistrate's court in Yuncheng. He wrote legibly and well, and was familiar with administrative procedures. Especially fond of playing with weapons, he was adept at many forms of fighting. He made friends only in the gallant fraternity but he helped anyone, high or low, who sought his aid, providing his guest with food and lodging in the family manor, tirelessly keeping him company, and giving him travelling expenses when he wanted to leave. Song Jiang scattered gold about like dust! He never refused a request for money. He was always making things easy for people, solving their difficulties, settling differences, saving lives. He provided the indigent with funds for coffins and medicines, gave charity to the poor, assisted in emergencies, helped in cases of hardship.
And so he was famed throughout the provinces of Shandong and Hebei, and was known to all as the Timely Rain, for like the rain from the heavens he brought succor to every living thing.
As Song Jiang walked from the magistracy with an attendant, Inspector Ho crossed the street to meet him.
"Won't you join me for some tea, sir Clerk?"
Song Jiang could tell from his appearance that Ho Tao was in the police.
"Where are you from, brother?" he queried courteously.
"If I may have the pleasure of your company in the tea-house we can talk there."
"As you wish, sir."
The two men entered the tea-house and sat down. Song Jiang told the attendant to wait outside. Then he turned to the inspector.
"May I presume to ask brother's name?"
"I am Ho Tao, a mere police inspector of Jizhou Prefecture. May I dare ask your name, sir Clerk?"
"Forgive me for not having recognized you, Inspector. I'm a small official called Song Jiang."
Ho Tao fell to his knees and kowtowed. "I have long known your fame but never had the honour of meeting you."
"You overwhelm me. Please sit at the head of the table."
"An insignificant person like me—I wouldn't dream of it!
"As a member of our superior organization and a guest from afar, you must, Inspector."
They argued politely for a few moments. Then Song Jiang took the host's seat and Ho Tao the guest's.
"Waiter," called the clerk, "two cups of tea." The refreshments soon came and both men drank.
"What instructions from above do you bring to our humble county, Inspector?" asked Song Jiang.
"I'll speak frankly. It concerns several important people here."
"It couldn't be about a robbery?"
"I've brought a sealed order. I trust you will help me carry it out."
"How could I do otherwise with an emissary from our superiors? Which robbery does it involve?"
"You're the keeper of the official records, sir Clerk. There's no harm in telling you. On Yellow Earth Ridge that is under our prefect's jurisdiction, a band of eight robbers drugged fifteen men who were bringing birthday gifts from Governor Liang of Daming, the Northern Capital, to Premier Cai and made off with eleven loads of gold and jewels of an estimated value of a hundred thousand strings of cash. We've caught Bai Sheng, the accomplice. He says the other seven, the actual robbers, are all in this county. The Premier has sent an aide to our prefecture with orders to remain until we've caught them. We hope you'll give us every assistance."

"Of course we'll apprehend the criminals and turn them over. We'd do that on your orders, Inspector, to say nothing of orders from the Premier himself. Who are the seven named by Bai Sheng?"
"The leader is Ward Chief Chao of East Bank. To tell you the truth, we don't know the names of the other six. We beg your utmost diligence."
Song Jiang was shocked. He said to himself: "Chao Gai is one of my dearest friends! This crime he's committed is a capital offence! I must save him. If they capture him he's sure to die!"
Concealing his anxiety, Song Jiang said: "That dirty scoundrel. Everyone in the county hates him. So now he's come to this. We'll make him pay!"
"Please help us apprehend him."
"There won't be any difficulty. 'Easy as catching turtles in a jug. Just stretch out your hand,' as the old saying goes. But you'll have to present your order to the magistrate when the court is in session. He will read it and send men to make the arrest. I'm only a clerk. I couldn't assume responsibility for an important matter like this. What if word leaked out!"
"You're quite right. Please lead me in."
"The magistrate has been busy all morning and he's taking a short rest. If you'll wait a bit, court will be resumed soon. I'll call you."
"I hope you'll help us accomplish our mission, come what may."
"Naturally. That goes without saying. I must go home to attend to a few things. I'll be right back. Please sit and rest a while."
"Go ahead, sir Clerk. I'll wait here for you."
Song Jiang rose and left the booth. "If that gentleman wants any more tea, put it on my account," he said to the waiter. He hurried from the teahouse and told his attendant to remain outside the door. "When the magistrate resumes court, go into the tea-house and tell the officer I'll be back soon," he instructed. "Ask him to please wait a bit."
At his house, Song Jiang saddled his horse and led it out the rear gate. Quirt in hand, he mounted and walked the beast slowly from the county town. Once outside the East Gate, he struck the horse sharply twice with his quirt, and the animal scooted like a rabbit towards East Bank. In less than half a watch Song arrived at Chao Gai's manor. When a vassal saw who it was, he went in and reported.
Chao Gai was drinking wine with Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang beneath a grape arbour in the rear garden. The three Ruan brothers had received their share of the loot and returned to Stone Tablet Village. The vassal announced that Clerk Song was at the front gate.
"How many people with him?" asked Chao Gai.
"He's alone, and his horse is in a lather," replied the vassal. "He wants to see you at once."
"Something must be up." Chao Gai hastened out.
Song Jiang hailed the ward chief respectfully, grasped him by the hand and walked to a small building nearby.
"Why have you come in such a hurry, sir Clerk?"
"You know my devotion, brother. I'd lay down my life for you. They've broken the Yellow Earth Ridge case! Bai Sheng has been taken to the prison in Jizhou. He's confessed about you seven. The prefect has sent an Inspector Ho and several men, with orders both from himself and Premier Cai that all seven be apprehended, and naming you as the leader. Thank Heaven the matter fell into my hands! I put the inspector off by saying the magistrate was sleeping, and told him to wait for me in the teahouse opposite the court. Then I came galloping out here to warn you. 'Of all the thirty-six possible solutions, the best one is—leave.' Get out, quickly! Don't delay! I'm going back now to take the inspector and his documents into court. The magistrate will send men this very night. You mustn't delay. If anything goes wrong, I'll be helpless. Don't blame me if I can't save you!"
"Brother," said the startled Chao Gai. "I'll never be able to thank you enough."
"Save your breath. Just concentrate on getting away. Don't linger. I must go back."
"There are seven of us. The three Ruan brothers—Second, Fifth and Seventh—have returned to Stone Tablet Village with their share. The other three are here. You must meet them." Chao Gai led Song Jiang to the rear garden and introduced him.
"Wu Yong. Gaongsun Sheng, from Jizhou. Liu Tang, from Dounglu."
Song Jiang exchanged a few brief courtesies and turned to leave. "Look after yourself, brother," he urged the ward chief. "Get away quickly. I'm going now." He mounted his horse at the front gate, flailed his quirt, and flew back to the county town.
"Do you know who that was?" Chao Gai asked his three companions.
"What was he in such a hurry about?" countered Wu Yong. "Who is he?"
"This will surprise you but if he hadn't come all of us would be dead.
"Does that mean there's been a leak and our story's got out?" cried the three.
"That brother came to warn us, at the greatest risk to himself. Bai Sheng has been arrested. He's in Jizhou Prison, and he's named the seven of us! The prefect has sent an Inspector Ho and some men, together with a special order from the Premier, to request Yuncheng County to apprehend us immediately. Fortunately, my friend kept the inspector waiting in a tea-house while he rushed out here. When he gets back the magistrate will issue his orders and send men this very night to arrest us. What shall we do?"
"If he hadn't informed us, we'd all be in the net," said Wu Yong. "Who is our benefactor?"
"A clerk in the magistrate's court, Song Jiang, Defender of Chivalry."
"I've heard of him but we've never met, though we live not far apart."
The other two asked: "Isn't he the one known among chivalrous men as Song Jiang the Timely Rain?"
Chao Gai nodded. "That's the man. He and I are very close, we're sworn brothers. Teacher Wu hasn't met him but I can assure you he's worthy of his reputation. Since I became his blood brother I feel that my life hasn't been lived in vain!" To Wu Yong he said: "Our situation is critical. How can we solve it?"
"There's nothing to discuss. 'Of all the thirty-six possible solutions, the best one is—leave.' "
"That's what Clerk Song said. But where should we go?"
"I'm considering that. I'd say we should get together six or seven shoulder-pole loads of possessions and join the three Ruan brothers in Stone Tablet. First send a man on ahead quietly to let them know we're coming."
"But they're fishermen. How can they accommodate so many of us?"
"You're not thinking carefully, brother. Stone Tablet Village is only a few steps away from Liangshan Marsh. The citadel on the mountain top is thriving. When the officials and police go looking for robbers, they don't dare even glance in its direction. If the search for us gets too hot, we can always join the band."
"A very good idea. But what if they don't want us?"
"We've plenty of gold and silver. If we present them with some they'll accept us all right."
"Since we're all agreed, we'd better get started. Teacher Wu, you and Liu Tang take several vassals and a few loads and go first to the Ruan family and arrange everything. Have them meet us. We'll be coming by land. I and Gongsun will join you as soon as we've settled things here."
Wu Yong and Liu Tang made up the purloined birthday gifts of gold and jewels into half a dozen loads, and directed six vassals to eat a meal. Then, the teacher tucked his bronze chain into his sleeve, Liu Tang took up his halberd, and the group set out for Stone Tablet, shouldering the loads.
The ward chief and the Taoist priest began closing down the manor. They gave money to those vassals who didn't want to go along, and advised them to find other masters. Those who wished to go gathered their possessions and prepared their luggage. Of that we'll say no more.

*

We'll speak rather of Song Jiang, who galloped back to town and hurried to the tea-house. Inspector Ho was standing outside the door, looking for him.
"Sorry to keep you waiting so long," said the clerk. "A relative from my village kept me tied up talking about family affairs."
"May I trouble you to take me in?"
"Please come this way."
The two men entered the magistracy, where Shi Wenbin was holding court. Song Jiang with the sealed papers in his hand, led Ho Tao to the magistrate's table, and instructed the attendants to put up a "Do Not Disturb" sign.
"Documents from Jizhou Prefecture," he told the magistrate, "brought by Inspector Ho because of the urgency of the robbers' case."
Shi opened the envelope and read the documents. He was shaken. "The Premier has dispatched an aide to wait in the prefecture!" he exclaimed to Song Jiang. "We must send men and catch the criminals!"
"If they go during the day, word is liable to get out. Night would be the best time. Once we take Chao Gai, we'll be able to bag the other six."
"Chao Gai is the ward chief of East Bank and has a very good reputation. I don't understand how he could have become involved in such a business!"
The magistrate summoned his sheriff and two constables. One was called Zhu Tong, and the other Lei Heng. Both were unusual men.
After receiving instructions from the magistrate in the rear chambers, they and the sheriff got on their horses, rode to the garrison and there picked over a hundred men, including ordinary soldiers and walking and mounted archers. When night fell, they all set out with Inspector Ho and the two captains who had originally accompanied the birthday gifts. Every man carried ropes and weapons. The sheriff rode his horse, as did the two constables. They wore swords, bows and arrows, and each held a halberd. Front and rear were platoons of mounted and walking archers. They left the town through the East Gate and proceeded rapidly towards East Bank and the home of Ward Chief Chao.
It was the first watch by the time they reached the village, and they assembled in the Guanyin Temple courtyard.
"Chao Gai's manor is just ahead," said Zhu Tong. "There are roads leading from both its front and rear gates. If we attack from the front, he'll leave by the rear. If we attack from the rear, he'll escape through the front. We must bear in mind that Chao Gai is a remarkable man. We don't know who those other six are but they're certainly not kindly gentlemen, and they're all desperate. If they decide to fight their way out, with their vassals helping, we'll never be able to stop them. Our only hope is to shout from one direction and attack from another, get them running around in confusion, then make our move.
"I propose that we divide our forces into two groups, with me taking one half and Constable Lei taking the other. I will go quietly with my men, on foot, to the rear gate, and lay an ambush. When you hear us whistle, Constable Lei, you and your group smash in through the front gate. Arrest every man you can lay your hands on."
"That sounds all right," said Lei. "Only, wouldn't it be better if you and the sheriff struck from the front gate while I cut off the rear?"
"You don't understand, brother. There are three possible escape routes from the manor. I've observed them often. I know every path. Even without torches, I could follow them in the dark. You're not familiar with all the places Chao Gai could twist in and out of. If he gets away it'll be no joke."
"You're right, Constable Zhu," said the sheriff. "Take half the men."
"I'll only need about thirty," said Zhu Tong. He picked ten archers and twenty soldiers and departed.
The sheriff again climbed into his saddle, and Lei Heng placed a protective cordon of mounted archers around him. The soldiers were ranged in front. In the light of thirty or so torches, with tined-spears and halberds and hooks, they advanced rapidly in a body towards the manor.
When only half a //away, suddenly they saw fire rising from the central building, spreading a thick pall of back smoke and spewing red flames into the sky. Another ten paces and they saw thirty or forty more blazes springing up everywhere around the front and rear gates.
Lei Heng waved his halberd, the soldiers behind him shouted, and they broke through the front gate in a body. Inside, the fires had turned the manor bright as day but the attackers didn't see a single person. Then, from the rear of the manor they heard yells and shouts, and cries of "Grab them!"
Actually, it had been Zhu Tong's intention from the start to let Chao Gai escape through the rear, and so he told Lei Heng to attack from the front. Lei Heng had the same idea. He too wanted to cover the rear gate and let Chao Gai flee. He had no choice when Zhu Tong insisted that he make a frontal assault but he only put on a show, creating a lot of noise and running about with the aim of hastening the ward chief's get-away.
By the time Zhu Tong arrived at the rear gate Chao Gai had not yet finished putting his affairs in order. Vassals hastened to report: "The soldiers have come! We must hurry!" Chao Gai ordered them to set fire to the manor. He and Gongsun the Taoist priest, at the head of a dozen or so vassals, brandishing their halberds, dashed through the rear gate. "Try to stop us and die, get out of our way and live!" they shouted.
"Halt, Ward Chief," Zhu Tong called from the shadows. "I've been waiting here for you a long time!"
Chao Gai paid no attention. He and Gongsun continued slashing furiously with their halberds. Pretending to dodge, Zhu Tong left a hole in the besiegers' line. The ward chief sent Gongsun and the vassals plunging through, and then followed, protecting their rear.
Zhu Tong pulled his foot archers from the manor's rear gate.
"There are robbers ahead, catch them!" he yelled. Lei Heng, hearing his shouts, came out of the front gate and also ordered his mounted and foot archers to give chase in various directions. He himself rushed about in the light of the fires, pretending to seek the fugitives.
Zhu Tong got away from his men and ran after Chao Gai, halberd in hand.
"Why are you chasing me, Constable Zhu?" the ward chief called over his shoulder. "I've done no wrong."
Zhu Tong saw there was no one behind him, and he dared to speak freely. "You don't know what I've done for you, Ward Chief. I was afraid Lei Heng would get muddled and not treat you right. So I fooled him into raiding your front gate, while I waited at the rear to ensure your escape. Didn't you see that big breach I just made for you? Liangshan Marsh is your only safe refuge. Don't try any other place."
"I'm deeply grateful to you for rescuing us. Some day I'll repay you."
Behind them came the sound of Lei Heng shouting: "Don't let them get away!"
"There's nothing to be alarmed about," Zhu Tong said to the ward chief. "Keep going. I'll draw them off." He called back. "Three robbers are heading for the east path! After them, Constable Lei!"
Lei Heng and his men hurried east, followed by the soldiers. Zhu Tong continued talking with Chao Gai while feigning to pursue him. The fact is he was protecting the ward chief and seeing him on his way. Chao Gai finally vanished into the night. Zhu Tong pretended to trip. He fell heavily to the ground. The soldiers caught up and raised him to his feet.
"I couldn't see the path in the darkness. I ran off into the fields by mistake," said Zhu Tong. "I slipped and fell. My right ankle is sprained."
"The main culprit got away," said the sheriff. "A pretty kettle of fish!"
"It isn't that I didn't try but there isn't much I can do in the dark of the moon," said Zhu Tong. "Most of these soldiers are useless. They're afraid to go after the robbers."
The sheriff ordered the soldiers to continue the chase. But the soldiers thought: "Those two constables weren't any use themselves. If they couldn't get close, what good can we do?" They made a desultory show of pursuit, then came back and reported: "In this darkness we can't find which path they've taken."
Lei Heng also returned after running a while. "Zhu Tong and Chao Gai are close friends," he said to himself. "He's probably let him escape. I have no reason to harm him. I also wanted to let him go. Well, now he's gone before I could prove my good intentions."
"We hadn't a chance of catching them," he said to the sheriff. "Those robbers are fantastic!"
It was already the fourth watch by the time the sheriff and the two constables reached the front of the manor. Inspector Ho observed the soldiers straggling in. After hunting all night they hadn't nabbed a single robber.
He groaned. "What am I going to tell the Jizhou prefect?"
All the sheriff could do was to seize a few of the ward chief's neighbours and take them back to Yuncheng County.
The magistrate hadn't slept all night, waiting for a report. What he heard was: "The criminals have escaped. We've brought in some of the neighbours." The magistrate had them summoned, and he questioned them.
"Although we're neighbours of Ward Chief Chao," they said, "the nearest of us are separated by a few hamlets from the manor, the furthest are two or three //across the fields. He often had visitors, bearing spears and staves but we never thought he'd do this sort of thing!"
The magistrate pressed them for information, determined to unearth a clue.
"If you want to get at the truth," said one of the closer neighbours, "why not ask his vassals?"
"Didn't they all go with him?"
"Some didn't want to go. They're still here."
The magistrate immediately dispatched men to East Bank to apprehend the vassals, sending the neighbour along to identify them. In less than two watches they returned with two vassals. At first when questioned the vassals denied everything. But when they were beaten beyond endurance, they confessed.
"There were six of them who conferred with the ward chief," they said. "The only one we knew was a teacher in our township named Wu Yong. Another man is called Gongsun Sheng. He's a Taoist priest. Another is a big dark fellow named Liu. There were also three others we didn't know. Wu brought them. We heard him say. 'They're three brothers, fishermen, named Ruan, from Stone Tablet Village.' That's the whole story."
The confession was recorded, and the magistrate turned the two vassals over to Inspector Ho and wrote a detailed report to the prefect. Song Jiang made himself surety for the neighbours, and they were allowed to go home and await further instructions.
Ho Tao and his men travelled all night and returned to Jizhou with the two vassals. The prefect was holding court. Ho Tao presented himself before him with his company and related how Chao Gai had burned down the manor and escaped. He repeated the confession of the vassals.
"So that's how it was! Summon Bai Sheng again," said the magistrate. "Do the three Ruan brothers really live where these men said?" he asked him.
Bai Sheng saw that denial was useless. "Yes," he said. "They all live in Stone Tablet. Second Brother is called Ferocious Giant, Fifth Brother is called Reckless Rash, and Seventh Brother is called the Devil Incarnate."
"What are the names of the other three?"
"Wu Yong the Wizard, Dragon in the Clouds Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon."

"Now we're getting somewhere! Return Bai Sheng to his prison and lock him up," said the magistrate. He ordered Inspector Ho to Stone Tablet Village. "Once we take the three Ruans the case is half solved." As a result, stars of Heavenly Spirits and Earthly Fiends gathered amid stormy clouds. In the marsh-girt fortress congregated a mighty battle host.

Then Inspector Ho said to his brother, Ho Qing: "This silver is the official reward, it's not a bribe. And there's a further reward to come. Now, brother, just tell me, please, what do you mean by saying the robbers are in your pouch?"
Ho Qing felt in the pouch he carried at his waist and drew out a little folder or notebook that he waved in their faces, saying: "They're all in here."
"How can they be in there?"
"All right, I'll explain. Some while ago I lost heavily at the tables, I was broke, hadn't a cent. Another player took me to a place called Peacehaven, outside the north gate, about five miles away; there's an inn, run by the Wangs, and I was able to come by a spot of cash there to gamble with. The authorities have decreed that inns should keep registers and that the names of all guests should be noted down, on those split sheets where you put the stamp across the two halves. When travellers arrive and ask for a room you're supposed to ask them their point of departure, destination, name and business. This all has to be copied into the book. The books are inspected once a month and the innkeeper must take them to the registrar's to be stamped. Since the waiter there can't write, he got me to copy out a fortnight's names for him. One day, actually it was the third day of the sixth month, seven 'date-sellers' appeared, pushing wheelbarrows, and asked for rooms. I happened to recognize one of the leaders of this group as Boss Chao of East Riverside in Yuncheng. How did I know it was him? I once went to his house with another gambler who wanted his help, that's how. When I was filling in the register I politely asked them their names. One of them, a very pale fellow, with a little three-pointed beard, suddenly pushed forward and said: 'We're all called Li, and we're from Haozhou. We're bringing a consignment of dates to sell in the Eastern Capital.' Well, I wrote it down but I thought it sounded a bit fishy. Next day they left. Later, when I was going with the innkeeper to gamble in the village, we met a fellow with a carrying-pole and buckets at one of the crossroads. I didn't know him but the innkeeper shouted out: 'Where are you going, friend Bai?' He answered: 'I've got this load of vinegar, I'm going to a rich man's house to sell it to him.' The innkeeper told me that this fellow was Bai Sheng, alias the Daytime Rat, and that he was also a gambler. It stuck in my mind. Later I heard all the gossip about the events on Yellow Mud Ridge — the date-sellers, the drugged wine, the robbery — and I thought, who else could it be but Boss Chao? So now all you've got to do is arrest Bai Sheng and question him and you'll know it all. This is the copy of the register."
Inspector Ho was overjoyed. He took his brother off straight away to the government offices to see the Governor. "Has there been some new development?" the Governor asked.
"Yes, I think I've got some good news," the Inspector replied.
The Governor called them into an inner chamber and questioned them closely. Ho Qing answered precisely on every point. Eight constables were detailed to go immediately with Ho Qing and Ho Tao to Peacehaven. There, the innkeeper was roped in as an informant and led them without delay to Bai Sheng's house. It was round about midnight and the innkeeper had to pretend he wanted something to eat. They heard Bai Sheng shouting from his bed. His wife told them that he was suffering from typhoid and was waiting for the sweat to break. Certainly he was both pale and flushed, when they dragged him out of his bed. They tied him up and shouted in his face: "I suppose you're proud of what you did on Yellow Mud Ridge!" Naturally, he denied it. They tied the woman up as well but she wouldn't talk either. The constables subjected the house to a thorough search. Under the bed they found the ground was not quite even, so they started to dig. A cry went up before they had even gone three feet. Bai Sheng's face turned deathly pale as they dragged out a cache of gold and silver. They covered Bai Sheng's head with a cloth and, together with his wife and the valuables on a carrying pole, conveyed him forthwith to Jizhou. Just as dawn was breaking he was brought into the audience chamber, bound hand and foot. When asked who had masterminded the plot, he denied everything; he preferred to die rather than name Chao Gai and the others. He was beaten repeatedly, till his skin was lacerated and the blood ran. "Miserable thief!" the Governor cried, "Our investigators have already ascertained that it was Chao Gai of East Riverside. What's the point in denying it? Just tell us who the other six were and we won't beat you any more." Bai Sheng held out a little longer but then, under extreme duress, he confessed: "Chao Gai was the ringleader. He and six others came and persuaded me to act as the wine-seller. But I don't know who the others are, honest."
"That's no problem," the Governor said. "We only have to arrest Chao Gai and we'll soon have the rest in our hands." Bai Sheng was fitted with the twenty-catty cangue of a man condemned to death. His wife was committed to the gaol for female prisoners. Then a warrant was made out, and the Inspector was ordered to take twenty picked constables to Yuncheng and show the local magistrate the order for the immediate arrest of Chao Gai and the six other robbers, whose identity was as yet unknown. He was to take along the two lieutenants from the original birthday convoy as witnesses.
The Inspector and his party set out, with as little to-do as possible, to prevent the news of it getting out. They reached Yuncheng at night, where the police and the two lieutenants put up at the local inn. The Inspector, with just two or three men, went to the Magistracy to show his warrant.
It was now well into the morning, and the Magistrate had just adjourned the early session. The area round the court-house was quiet and deserted. The Inspector found a teahouse opposite and sat down there to drink tea while he waited. He drank his tea and then asked the waiter: "Why are the government offices so quiet today?"
"The Magistrate dismissed the court early and all the officials have gone to eat. They're not back yet."
"Do you happen to know who is the duty registrar today?"
"That's him, just coming out now," said the waiter, pointing.
The Inspector looked and saw an official leaving the courtroom.
Now the name of this official was Song Jiang. He was also nicknamed Song Jiang the Just. He was originally the third in his family and his home was the Song village in Yuncheng. Because he was extremely dark and not very tall, people sometimes called him Song Jiang the Black, or Blackie. But because he was famed for his loyalty to his family and the openness and generosity of his dealings with the world, people also called him Blackie the Loyal and True. His father was still living but his mother was deceased. He had a younger brother called Song Qing, nicknamed Iron Fan, who was with their father, Squire Song, in the village, where they engaged in farming and made a living from the cultivation of a few fields and plots of land.
Song Jiang himself served as registrar in Yuncheng. He was skilled at inditing charges and highly experienced in his job but he also loved to practise martial arts, and had studied many different modes and styles. What he liked best in the world was to make friends with heroes of the rivers and lakes. No one was turned away who came to him for help, be they great or small; all were afforded refuge at his house in the country, where Song Jiang would keep them company all day long — he never tired. When they left he would be careful to make sure their purses were lined. He scattered his wealth like water and if anyone asked him for money he never said no. He deemed it a pleasure to offer people relief and arrange their affairs. He bought coffins and medicine for those who could not afford them, succoured the poor and aided the needy. Anyone in trouble could rely on him for support. This behaviour had made him famous throughout Shandong and Hebei and people called him "The Opportune Rain," comparing him to the rain which heaven bestows just when it is needed, to the benefit of all earthly things.
When Song Jiang appeared with a servant in front of the court-house, the Inspector rushed out to catch him in the street and said: "Will you allow me to offer you a cup of tea, sir?"
Seeing from his dress that this was a government official, Song Jiang replied at once with equal courtesy: "What can I do for you, sir?"
"Would you do me the honour of taking a cup of tea with me in this teahouse, and spare me a moment's attention?"
"I shall be delighted."
They went in and sat down. The servant was asked to wait outside. "Might I ask your name?" Song Jiang said.
"I am Inspector Ho Tao, head of operations for the suppression of banditry in the administration of Jizhou. May I in return ask your name?"
"Excuse me for not knowing you, Inspector. I am Song Jiang."
The Inspector immediately prostrated himself, saying: "I have long heard about you but I had not the opportunity till now of paying you my respects."
"You do me too much honour. Please, Inspector, take the chief place."
"How could I presume?"
"Inspector, you serve a higher authority. Besides, you are a guest here."
Thus they disputed courteously for a while, until Song Jiang sat down in the host's place and the Inspector in the guest's. Song Jiang told the waiter to bring tea and soon it was there on the table. They both drank. "Inspector, what brings you to our district? Are you here on official business?" Song Jiang asked.
"I'll be honest with you," the Inspector answered. "There are some people here I urgently need to talk to."
"Is it something to do with the suppression of banditry, then?"
"I have a sealed order here, and I would like to ask your assistance."
"Inspector, you are serving a higher authority, how could I fail to do all in my power to assist? But can you tell me more about the case?"
"Since you are an official of the court, there's no reason why I shouldn't tell you. My jurisdiction includes Yellow Mud Ridge, where a band of desperadoes, eight in all, drugged the fifteen-man escort of the Northern Capital Governor's birthday convoy to Grand Preceptor Cai in the Eastern Capital and stole the eleven loads of priceless treasure, valued at something in the region of a hundred thousand cash. We've got one of the gang now, an individual named Bai Sheng, who says the other seven are all from your district. This is such a serious affair that the Grand Preceptor has sent one of his own people to the Governor's office, and he's going to wait there till it's cleared up. I hope you will give us your full support."
"Even without the Grand Preceptor's intervention, the fact that you, Inspector, have come yourself to present the relevant order would oblige us to do everything in our power to secure the arrests. But what in fact are the names of the seven people implicated by Bai Sheng?"
"Well, I have to tell you that the ringleader is Chao Gai of East Riverside, in your district. We don't know the names of the other six but I trust you'll do everything possible to help us find them."
Song Jiang was greatly disturbed by this news. Secretly he was thinking to himself: "Chao Gai is an old friend. If he has now committed a major crime and I don't help him, and he gets caught, my reputation will be ruined!" To cover his confusion, he said: "Chao Gai is an obstinate bastard, an utter disgrace, in fact, and there's no one in the district who hasn't cause to complain of him. This time he's gone too far and we'll have to teach him a lesson."
"Then I can count on your cooperation in this affair?"
"Absolutely. It won't be difficult. As they say, to catch a turtle in a jar, just put your hand in and there you are! There's just one thing, though. That signed order you have there must be delivered personally to the district officer. When he has seen it he will take the necessary steps and order the arrest of the criminals. But it is certainly not for me to open it. This is a matter of major importance, and it must not be made public prematurely."
"Your assessment is absolutely correct," the Inspector said. "May I ask you to announce me now?"
"The Magistrate had a very full session this morning and tired himself out, so he's taking a rest just now. You wait here, Inspector, and in a little while, when the court resumes, I'll come and fetch you."
"I sincerely hope that with your help the case can be resolved."
"Of course it will, you need say no more. But now I have to go home for a moment to attend to some trifling domestic affairs, so please make yourself comfortable here."
"Please go ahead. I will wait here for you."
Song Jiang stood up and went out. He said to the waiter, "If that officer would like more tea, I'll pay you for it later." Leaving the teahouse he flew home but not before telling his servant to call a clerk from the court and have him wait outside the door of the teahouse. If the court resumed he was go into the teahouse and reassure the Inspector, telling him that the Registrar had everything under control and he was just to wait a little longer. He raced to the stable, saddled his horse and led him out through the back gate. He fitted the bridle and leapt into the saddle but then he rode slowly through the centre of town. Once beyond the East Gate, however, he kicked his horse into a gallop and careered off in the direction of East Riverside. In less than an hour he was outside Chao Gai's manor. The servants went to announce him.

Judgement's required on this illicit booty.
The law is there, to apply it is his duty.
But since officials commit the greater rape,
Friendship demands he help the thieves escape.

Chao Gai, at this moment, was with Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng and Liu Tang drinking wine under a vine trellis in the garden behind the house. The Ruan brothers had already received their share of the booty and returned to Stonetable. When the servants announced that Song Jiang was at the door, Chao Gai asked: "How many people are with him?"
"He's alone," they replied. "He arrived at the gallop and said he must see you urgently."
"Something must have happened!" Chao Gai thought. He hurried out to receive Song Jiang. The latter greeted him and then took him by the arm. They drew aside, into a small chamber, where Chao Gai asked: "Registrar, what brings you here in such haste?"
"There's something you need to know. We are sworn brothers, remember, and I would give my life to help you. The Yellow Mud Ridge affair is discovered! Bai Sheng is in the Jizhou county gaol and has informed on the seven of you. The Governor of Jizhou has sent an agent named Ho with a party of men and there's even been an order from the Grand Preceptor's office demanding your arrest. You are named as leader. Fortunately, this news fell into my hands first! I pretended the Magistrate was sleeping and got the Inspector to wait for me in a teahouse opposite the court, so I could ride over here to warn you. Of thirty-six strategies, flight is always the best. But you'd better get a move on, there's nothing to be gained by waiting! I have to go back and take him in to present his warrant, and then the Magistrate will send to arrest you at once. So you must not delay. Heaven knows what will happen if you don't take this seriously. At any rate, you can't blame me for not warning you."
"Dear brother, how can I ever thank you?" said the startled Chao Gai.
"Forget the courtesies! Prepare to leave and don't waste any more time! I'm going back now."
"Three of the seven are the Ruans. They've taken their share and gone home. The other three are at the back. I'd like to introduce them to you."
Song Jiang followed him to the garden at the back. "Here they are," said Chao Gai, pointing out each in turn. "Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng from Jizhou, and Liu Tang from Donglu." After a few brief words of courtesy, Song Jiang turned and left but not without first urging his friend to make all possible haste. He leapt onto his horse, kicked it into a gallop, and raced back to the government offices.
Chao Gai began to explain to his three friends what had happened: "Do you know why that gentleman came to see us?"
"No, why was he in such a hurry? And who in fact is he?" Wu Yong asked.
"You're in for a shock! If it wasn't for him, our lives might be nearing their end."
"Has word got out? Have we been discovered?"
"Well, we have to thank our friend for treating the matter as urgent and coming to warn us. Bai Sheng is already locked up in Jizhou county gaol and has informed on us. An anti-banditry agent, one Inspector Ho, has been sent with a squad, and there's an order from the Grand Preceptor, requiring the Yuncheng Magistrate to arrest us immediately. Luckily my friend managed to hold the officer in a teahouse and was able to rush out here to warn us. Now he's had to go back to the office and in a moment they'll be sending people to seize us. What ought we to do?"
"If it hadn't been for his warning, we'd all be caught in the net," Wu Yong said. "What is the name of this man to whom we owe so much?"
"He's the court registrar, Song Jiang."
"You mean the one who's known among the rivers and lakes as Song Jiang the Just, the Opportune Rain"?
Chao Gai nodded. "Precisely. We're close friends, sworn brothers." To the others he explained: "Dr. Wu had never met him before. He is universally famous, and deservedly so. I will cer-tainly never regret becoming his sworn brother!" Remembering their situation, Chao Gai turned to Wu Yong again: "But we're in a tight spot. How do we get out of it?"
"There's nothing to discuss. Of thirty-six strategies, flight is always the best."
"That's the same advice Song Jiang gave," said Chao Gai. "The thing is, where do we go?"
"I've been thinking," said Wu Yong. "Let's get our share of the treasure and all go to stay with the Ruans in Stonetable. But we'd better send someone on ahead right away to warn them."
"The Ruans are simple fishermen," said Chao Gai. "How will they be able to put all of us up?"
"You've missed the point!" said Wu Yong. "Stonetable is just a stone's throw from the Marshes of Mount Liang. The mountain stronghold there is flourishing. Neither the army nor the police dare meet that lot face to face. If the pursuit gets too hot, we can always join them!"
"That's a great idea! The only problem is, they might not have us!"
"We've got money, haven't we?" said Wu Yong. "All we do is give them a share and they'll enroll us in the band."
It was like this:

When times are evil, thieves are many;
Our heroes don't know which way to turn.
Because "The Scholar" rules the fort,
Robbers, like officials, have got to be bought.

"Then if it's decided, we should waste no more time. Dr. Wu, you and Liu Tang take some men and go on ahead to the Ruans' to arrange everything, and then come out to meet us on the road. Gongsun Sheng and I will do what's necessary here and then join you."
Wu Yong and Liu Tang made five or six bundles out of the treasure stolen from the birthday convoy and having found five or six villagers to carry them, whom they plied with wine and food first, set off for Stonetable, Wu Yong with his bronze chains hidden in his sleeves, Liu Tang with his cutlass to protect them. There were about ten in the party. Chao Gai and Gongsun Sheng meanwhile made final arrangements at the manor. Those servants who did not want to go with them were given money and sent to find work elsewhere. Those who wanted to go, collected up everything in the manor worth keeping and packed it. We say no more of this.

Wealth is a poisonous snake, I'd say;
To a house's ruin 'twill open the way.
If the hero himself is by riches confounded;

What of officials, whose greed is unbounded?

Meanwhile, Song Jiang had rushed back home and then gone straight to the teahouse, where he found the Inspector looking out for him at the door. "A thousand apologies for keeping you waiting," he said, "but one of my relatives in the village came round to see me over a certain domestic problem, and it took longer than I expected."

"May I trouble you to introduce me now?" the Inspector said.

"Please, just follow me." Together they went to the Magistracy, where the Magistrate, Shi Wenbin, had just gone into session. Song Jiang took the signed order and conducted the Inspector first to the Registrar's office. He told the attendants to move the notice forbidding entry and marched forward to report: "Inspector Ho is here, under orders from the Governor of Jizhou, on urgent business relating to the suppression of banditry. He has been specially sent to catch the thieves and is carrying this sealed document."

The Magistrate received the document, opened it and read it on the spot. What he read horrified him, and he exclaimed: "The Grand Preceptor has sent a member of his personal staff in connection with this, and he's expecting an immediate response. We must send a force to arrest these brigands."

"If we send troops by day," said Song Jiang, "I am afraid the robbers may get wind of it. It would be better to send them at night. Once we've got Chao Gai, the other six should be easy enough to find."

"That Chao Gai of East Riverside is supposed to be a good chap. How can he be involved in a business like this?" said the Magistrate. Nevertheless he summoned the chief of the militia and two officers — one of them was called Zhu Tong and the other Lei Heng, and they were both quite out of the ordinary. These two sergeants presented themselves and received their orders from the district officer. Together with the Chief of Militia they mounted and rode over to the local garrison, where they picked out a hundred infantrymen, cavalry and archers. Then they joined Inspector Ho and the two lieutenants from the stolen convoy, who were needed to identify the culprits. When evening came they equipped themselves with rope and weapons. The Chief of Militia mounted his horse and the two lieutenants did likewise. Each carried a sabre in his belt, a bow and a cutlass. In the midst of their troops they left by the east gate and hastened towards Chao Gai's manor.

When they reached East Riverside, it was already after seven. They first assembled at a little hermitage dedicated to Kuan Yin. Sergeant Zhu said: "That's Chao Gai's manor, right ahead of us. It's in between two roads, see, one in front and one behind. If we all attack at once from the front, he'll escape by the back. If we go to the back he'll get out from the front. I know Chao Gai, and he's not a pushover. Besides, we don't know anything about the other six. All we can be sure of is that they are not fine gentlemen, they're desperate villains. If they counter-attack, supported by a number of villagers, we may have trouble containing them. The best way is to make a diversion on one side in order to attack on the other. We must wait till they start to panic and then pounce. Wouldn't it be best if Sergeant Lei and I separate and attack from different sides? We'll each take half of the troops. We'll all approach on foot, and my force will lay an ambush outside the back gate. The signal will be a whistle, and when it's given you will attack the front gate and try to force an entry. If you see one of them, you'll take him, if you see two, you'll have a pair!"

"Good!" said Sergeant Lei. "You and the Commander attack from the front, Sergeant Zhu, and I'll go and cut off the rear."

"Listen, mate, you've got the wrong end of the stick! Chao Gai's house has three exits. I've been there, I've had plenty of opportunities to observe it. I know all the ways in and out. I wouldn't even need a torch. But if you don't know the layout, he might easily slip through that would be most embarrassing."

The Chief of Militia said: "Quite right, Sergeant Zhu. You take half the men, then."

"Oh, thirty will be more than enough," said Zhu Tong.

So Sergeant Zhu took ten archers and twenty infantrymen and started first. The Chief of Militia mounted again, and Sergeant Lei deployed the cavalry, foot soldiers and archers all around him, for his protection. The infantry preceded the cavalry, and were provided with twenty or thirty torches which brilliantly illuminated the scene: men armed with forks, halberds and sickles, all marching on Chao Gai's manor.

So there they were then, facing Chao Gai's manor, just a few hundred yards from it, when suddenly it burst into flames. The fire that apparently originated in the main hall, soon engulfed the scene in black smoke and filled the sky with red sparks. And before they had gone another ten paces, fire broke out on all sides so that some thirty or forty separate fires could be counted. The flames spread rapidly. When Sergeant Lei, leading the attack with drawn sabre, and the troops behind him cheering, reached the main gate, they broke it down and poured inside. The torches illuminated the scene as if it were broad daylight. Yet there was absolutely no one to be seen. Suddenly a cry went up at the back of the house, followed by an uproar in which shouts of "Stop them in front!" could be made out.

What actually was happening was that Sergeant Zhu intended to let Chao Gai escape, and it was to this end that he had tricked Sergeant Lei into attacking from the front. But Sergeant Lei also wanted to help Chao Gai that is why he had originally wanted to attack from the rear, only Sergeant Zhu had prevented it and he had to take the front. So all this commotion was quite deliberate: the uproar on all sides was intended to encourage Chao Gai to get out at once.

When Sergeant Zhu first arrived at the back of the house, Chao Gai had not yet finished what he had to do. Some servants saw the troops and reported to Chao Gai: "The government troops have come, we must hurry." Chao Gai ordered them to start fires on every side. Then he and Gongsun Sheng mustered the dozen or so servants who were going with them, and making as much noise as possible, burst out of the back gate with drawn swords. As they charged, they shouted: "Stand back or you die! Clear the way if you want to live!"

From the darkness Sergeant Zhu's voice could be heard, shouting: "Stop, Mr. Chao, you won't get away. Zhu Tong is waiting for you!" Chao Gai naturally paid no attention! His only thought was to fight his way out with the others and escape. Sergeant Zhu made various fake manoeuvres which actually left the way open for Chao Gai's escape. On Chao Gai's orders, Gongsun Sheng took the lead, while Chao Gai himself brought up the rear. Sergeant Zhu now ordered an attack on the back gate of the manor by his foot soldiers and archers, and started the cry of: "Stop them in front!" Sergeant Lei, on hearing this, turned round and retreated through the front gate. He ordered his troops to pursue the robbers, while he himself could be seen in the light of the conflagration gazing east and west in the manner of one searching for the enemy. Sergeant Zhu, leaving his troops far behind, raced after Chao Gai, sword in hand. "Sergeant Zhu, why are you pursuing me?" Chao Gai shouted over his shoulder. "I've never done you any harm!" Sergeant Zhu, after first looking to see there was no one close enough to hear him, said: "Didn't you see what I did for you? I didn't trust that blockhead Lei Heng. I got him to attack the front gate so I could let you get away at the back. Didn't you see how I left the way clear for you? But if you want to be safe now, you'd better go to the Marshes of Mount Liang."

"I am deeply in your debt," Chao Gai said. "Some day I shall repay you!" While this was going on, Lei Heng's voice was heard behind them, shouting: "Don't let them get away!" Sergeant Zhu said to Chao Gai: "Don't worry, just keep going. I'll get rid of him." He turned and shouted: "Three of them are escaping along that path to the east. Move it, Sergeant Lei!" Lei Heng gave an order and turned off along the path to the east, with all his men following. Sergeant Zhu continued to talk to Chao Gai as he pretended to pursue him. Actually, it was more as if he was acting as an escort! Gradually however in the darkness Chao Gai disappeared from view. Sergeant Zhu pretended to stumble and collapsed on the ground. When his men caught up with him and helped him to his feet, he said: "I couldn't see the path in the dark. I went off it into a field and slipped and twisted my left ankle."

The Chief of Militia said: "Oh dear! The leader has got away. What are we going to do?"

"No one can say I didn't try," Sergeant Zhu said. "But on a night like this, without a moon, it's just impossible. And none of these soldiers are any good. They were all shirking!"

The Chief of Militia ordered the men to resume the chase. The latter however were thinking to themselves: "The two officers failed, couldn't even get near them — so what can they expect from us?" They made a pretence of pursuing the robbers for a little, and then returned and said: "It's too dark — we can't tell which way to go." Sergeant Lei also continued the pursuit for a while but turned back, saying to himself: "Sergeant Zhu and Chao Gai are good friends. I wouldn't mind betting he wanted him to escape. What's the point in making myself unpopular? Anyway, I wanted him to get away too. He's probably miles away by now. It's just a pity I couldn't let him know I was helping." When he returned, he said: "Not a hope! Those bandits obviously know a thing or two!"

When the Chief of Militia and the two sergeants returned to the manor, it was already long past midnight. Inspector Ho, who had watched them running in all directions, and now saw them, after chasing all night, return empty-handed, could only wring his hands and say: "How can I go back to Jizhou and tell the Governor this?" And all the Chief of Militia could think of was to arrest a few neighbours and send them down to the magistracy.

All this time the Magistrate had been anxiously awaiting the outcome, quite unable to sleep. Now they came to report to him "All the robbers have escaped. We only managed to get a few villagers." He had the villagers brought before him and interrogated them. They all said: "Yes, we are neighbours of Chao Gai. Some of us live about a mile from his domain, others have land which verges on his. But there are always people practising martial arts at his place. How could we know they were engaging in this kind of activity?"

The Magistrate continued to question them for a while, in the hope of finding some clue. One of their number, a close neighbour of Chao Gai's, said: "If you want to know what went on there, the only way is to ask one of his people."

"But they say his household retainers all went with him," the Magistrate objected.

"There were some who didn't want to go. They stayed behind."

Hearing this, the Magistrate hastily dispatched a party to East Riverside, accompanied by the informant for purposes of identification, to bring the retainers in. In less than four hours they returned with two of the villagers. Under interrogation the latter began by denying all knowledge but the beating was too much for them and eventually they confessed: "To begin with there were six. All we know is that one of them was the teacher in our district, Dr. Wu; another was called Gongsun Sheng — that one is a Taoist priest; and there was a big dark fellow by the name of Liu. There were three others but we didn't know them. They came with Dr. Wu. Someone said they were called Ruan and lived in Stonetable, fishermen, he said — three brothers. That's the honest truth."

The Magistrate had their testimony copied down and then handed them over to Inspector Ho. He wrote a detailed report for the provincial Governor. Song Jiang secured the release of the other villagers who had been arrested and sent them home, with the condition that they remain available as witnesses.

Inspector Ho and his party now returned with all speed to Jizhou, taking with them the two villagers. The Governor had just gone into session when they arrived. The Inspector took the villagers in and recounted how Chao Gai had burnt down his house and fled, and then he presented the confessions taken from the two villagers. "In that case," said the Governor when he had heard it all, "bring back Bai Sheng!" Bai Sheng was asked where the three Ruan brothers lived. He knew it was no good trying to hide anything now, so he gave their full names and description and said they lived on the banks of Stonetable Lake. He did the same when asked about the other three.

"Now we've got something to go on," said the Governor, "you can take Bai Sheng back to his cell. Let him remain in custody." He then ordered the Inspector to go to Stonetable: "Bring back those Ruan brothers," he said. "That will give us the key to this case."

But for this next journey of the Inspector's, things would have turned out differently.

Powers of heaven and demon powers converge;
A mighty force in the Marshes will emerge.

The Inspector, He Tao, spoke to his younger brother, He Qing, "These ingots of silver are the reward offered by the yamen, and when we capture the brigands there will be much greater reward. I would not attempt to cheat you. But why did you say that you had put the brigands in your trouser's pocket?"

He Qing put his hand in his breast pocket, and drew forth a folding notepaper with cover, and pointing to it said, "All those brigands are here."

He Tao asked, "But how have their names got written there?"

"I won't deceive you," said He Qing. "The day before yesterday I lost every cash at gambling, and a fellow gambler took me to the Anlo village, about five li outside the North Gate, to an inn owned by a man named Wang, where there were many men assembled who were gambling with small stakes. The magistrate had issued an order that at every inn they must keep a register of the guests who stayed there, and should record their names, where they came from, where they were going to, and what was their business. The register must be sent every month through the chief to the local magistrate for inspection. The waiter at the inn did not know how to write so he asked me to stay there for half a month and keep that register for him."

"It happened that on the third day of the sixth month, seven traders pushing Jiangzhou-made handcarts stopped at the inn to rest. I recognized the leader of them as Chao Gai, the chief of the Dongxi village, in Yuncheng County. Now how did I know that it was him? Because some time before I went to that village with a fellow gambler who sought refuge there. When I took the register and asked for their names a man stepped forward who had a mustache and a small beard, with a white face. He said, "We are all called Li, and have come from Haozhou, with dates, and are going to sell them at the Eastern Capital." I wrote this down although I doubted the statement made. They departed the next day. The proprietor of the inn took me into the village to gamble, and upon passing the corner of a street I saw a man carrying two buckets on a pole over his shoulder. I did not know him but the proprietor of the inn called out to him, 'Mister Bai, where are you going?' The man replied, 'I am taking some vinegar to sell to the wealthy people of the village.'

"The inn proprietor told me that the man was Bai Sheng, and had a nickname 'Daylight Rat.' He was a gambler. At that time I took notice of the matter but afterwards I heard everybody talking that seven traders of dates had captured some birthday presents at the Huangni Ridge by means of some drugged wine. I at once jumped to the conclusion that Chao Gai had done this. So we may arrest Bai Sheng and find out what he knows about the matter. This notebook is my copy of the register."

He Tao was much pleased at this, and took his brother to the Prefecture yamen where the Prefect asked him, "Have you any information about that matter?"

He Tao replied that he now had a slight clue. The Prefect asked them to go with him to the inner apartments to discuss the matter. There He Qing gave him all the details he knew.

The Prefect then ordered eight policemen to accompany He Tao and He Qing to the inn at Anlo village where they got the proprietor to conduct them to the house of Bai Sheng where they arrived by midnight. The proprietor of the inn induced them to open the door but when they struck a light they heard Bai Sheng making a noise on the bed. Upon asking Bai Sheng's wife she said that her husband had a fever. The men seized hold of Bai Sheng and bound him with cords. They saw that his face was very red. They shouted out, "You have done a fine business at the Huangni Ridge!" But Bai Sheng did not confess this. Even when they bound his wife with cords she also remained silent. The men searched the whole house, and they noticed that the ground under the bed was uneven. So they dug there, and about three feet down they found a quantity of gold and silver that discovery excited them. Bai Sheng's face had now turned pale. They then blindfolded him, and his wife, and with the police carrying the booty they set off for Jizhou where they arrived about 5 A.M. They went into the yamen with the prisoners. The Prefect asked who had planned the bandits' raid but Bai Sheng would not say, and even if in danger of death he would not confess and implicate Chao Gai and the other six men. He was then beaten with bamboo about four times until his flesh was broken and his blood was flowing.

The Prefect shouted, "The police have found out that the head of the bandits is Chao Gai, the chief at the Dongxi Village in Yuncheng County, so it is useless for you to screen them. If you will say who the other six men are we will not beat you any more."

Bai Sheng hesitated a little but as he could not endure any more beating with the bamboo he at last confessed, "The chief of the bandits is Chao Gai. He himself came with six other men to get me to carry some wine for them but I do not know who the other six men are."

"That will not matter," said the Prefect. "Go now and arrest Chao Gai, the chief, and we can soon find out where the other six men are." He then ordered that Bai Sheng should be fitted with a large cangue weighing at twenty jin, and that the woman should be chained and confined to the women's jail. He then ordered a dispatch to be prepared and handed to He Tao who was to take with him twenty of the best policemen to arrest Chao Gai and the others. The magistrate at Yuncheng County must also send the two servants of Grand Secretary Liang to try and identify the six men. He Tao, the chief inspector, and his men must be careful as he was afraid that the news of their departure might reach Chao Gai first.

They travelled to Yuncheng County during the starlit night, and upon arriving there, He Tao put his men in an inn with orders to wait there until he came back. He then took two men with him to the yamen. He reached the yamen about 11 A.M. but the magistrate had retired from the early court, and everything was very quiet. He Tao therefore went to a tea-house where he got some tea, and rested a while. After he had drunk a cup of tea he asked the waiter, "How is it that everything is so quiet here today?"

"The magistrate had an early court," said the waiter, "and all the litigants went away also to get some food and have not returned yet."

"Who is on duty today?" asked He Tao.

The waiter pointed to a man and said, "That clerk is on duty today."

He Tao saw that the clerk was leaving the yamen.

The clerk was called Song Jiang, and his style was Gongming. He was the third brother in his family, and his forefathers had always resided at the Song Family Village, in Yuncheng County district. Because he had a dark complexion people called him "Black Song Jiang," and because he had a great reputation for filial piety and for distributing wealth in a good cause he was nicknamed, "Filial and Just Black the Third." His father was living but his mother had died some time before. He had a younger brother Song Qing, who had been nicknamed "Iron Fan," and stayed at home with his father cultivating the fields and supporting the family. Song Jiang earned a living as a clerk in the Yuncheng County yamen. He was a calligraphist and was quite familiar with all the routine of office work. He liked exercising with the lance and cudgel, and was quite good at all kinds of military exercises. He took a great interest in the doings of all bandits and they often came to him for help. No matter what kind of bandit there was, he would help him and keep him at the farmhouse. He kept company with them the whole day, and felt quite satisfied with their friendship. If they wanted to leave at any time he assisted them with money as though it was dirt. He never refused to give money when people asked for it. He was always charitable. He settled disputes and always assisted people in difficulties. He was always buying coffins for the poor, and medicine for sick people.

He always assisted those in distress, and raised those who had been crushed down in life. The result was that his fame was known in all Shandong and Hebei provinces, where he was also known as "Welcome Rain" because his influence was like the falling of rain on parched soil.

Song Jiang was accompanied by an attendant, and as they were leaving the yamen, He Tao, the Inspector, came out and saluted them, saying "Sir, I request you to come and have tea with me."

Song Jiang saw that the man was dressed in uniform, and quickly saluting, said, "Brother, where do you come from?"

He Tao replied that they could talk matters over when they were seated inside drinking tea. Song Jiang agreed to this and they thereupon entered the tea-house, and the attendant was told to wait outside.

"I take leave to inquire your name," said Song Jiang.

He Tao replied, "I am Inspector He Tao, and I come from Jizhou Prefecture. I also beg to inquire your name."

"You must not blame me for not recognizing you," said Song Jiang. He then gave his name and position in the yamen.

He Tao knelt down, and saluted. "I have heard of your fame but I had no opportunity of meeting you before."

"I am afraid," said Song Jiang, "but will you please take the seat of honour?"

"I dare not occupy such a position," said He Tao.

"You come from a higher yamen than this one, and you are also a guest from a distant place," said Song Jiang. After both men pressing each other to take the seat of honour they finally sat down—Song Jiang as host, and He Tao as guest in the seat of honour. Song Jiang then ordered the waiter to bring the tea, and it was soon served. After they had drunk some tea he asked, "What business has brought you here?"

"I won't deceive you. I have come here to arrest some very important persons in this district."

"Is it connected with the bandits business?" asked Song Jiang.

"I have a sealed dispatch here, and I hope that you will help me to get the business done."

"As you are appointed by superiors I must of course help you," said Song Jiang. "But what bandit affairs is it about?"

"It is a matter that you will have to deal with so I will tell you all about it: A party of eight bandits at the Huangni Ridge drugged some wine, and sold it to an escort of fifteen soldiers who were conveying some birthday gifts from Grand Secretary Liang at the Northern Capital for Prime Minister Cai. They seized the eleven loads of presents that were worth about one hundred thousand strings of cash. We have arrested one of the brigands named Bai Sheng, and he confessed that the other seven bandits were in this district.

"There is an officer from the Prime Minister waiting at our head yamen for the completion of this business, so I hope that you will give it immediate attention."

"We must of course arrange for the arrest of the bandits," said Song Jiang, "even though you yourself have brought a dispatch here, not to say about the instruction from the Prime Minister. But I should like to know who are the seven persons that Bai Sheng named."

"I will tell you. The head of the bandits is Chao Gai, the chief of the Dongxi Village in this district. But so far we have not found out the names of the other six men, so I must ask for your assistance."

Song Jiang was surprised at hearing this, and thought, "This Chao Gai is my bosom friend. Now he has committed this serious crime. But if I do not save him he will certainly be arrested." He was very anxious about the matter but replied, "That Chao Gai is evidently a rascal. Everybody in this district say that he is not a good man. Now that he has committed this crime it will be better for him to suffer for it."

"I hope that you will take the matter in hand," said He Tao.

"That will be easy. 'A tortoise in a wine jar is easy to catch.' But you must present the dispatch at the yamen yourself so that after it has been read men can be deputed to arrest the bandits. I dare not presume to open the letter myself. It concerns a very important matter, and it would not do to let the contents leak out, and be known to other men."
"As you understand the matter so well will you accompany me into the yamen?"
"The magistrate has had an early court," said Song Jiang "and being tired he is now taking a rest. You had better wait until the magistrate holds a later court when I will come and inform you."
"I hope that you will help me," said He Tao.
"It is my duty, you need not talk like that. I will now go to my home where I have a few matters to attend to, and you can rest here until I come back."
"All right," said He Tao. "You attend to your affairs, and I will stay here till you come back."
Song Jiang rose, and going into another room told the waiter that He Tao was to be supplied with tea which he would pay for. Upon leaving the tea-house he went with all speed. He however first told his attendant to go into the yamen, and get another man to stand at the door of the tea-house. Should the magistrate hold a second court the man must immediately tell He Tao and say, "The clerk, Song Jiang, is busy just now but he requests you to wait a little longer." He then went to the troughs where the horses were, saddled one, concealed a whip in his sleeve, and led a horse to the back door where he quickly mounted. After leaving the east gate, Song Jiang used his whip, and the horse galloped along towards the Dongxi Village. In less than an hour he drew up at the door of Chao Gai's house. A servant had seen him coming, and had already announced his approach.
At that time Chao Gai, Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and Liu Tang were drinking wine under the vines in the garden. The brothers Ruan had returned to their home at Shijie Village when they had got the money. When Chao Gai heard that the clerk Song Jiang had arrived he asked, "How many men are with him?"
The servant said, "He has come by himself on a horse galloping at full speed, and wants to see you immediately."
"There must be some urgent business," said Chao Gai. He went at once, and upon meeting and saluting Song Jiang they took each other by the hand, and walked into a small room at one side.
"Why do you come here in such haste?" asked Chao Gai.
"Elder brother," said Song Jiang, "we are bosom friends, and therefore I came to save your life at great risk to myself. The affair at the Huangni Ridge has been disclosed. Bai Sheng was arrested and is now in prison at Jizhou Prefecture. He has confessed about the other seven men. An Inspector from Jizhou has arrived with a dispatch, and another order from the Prime Minister, for your immediate arrest, and you are mentioned as the head of the gang of bandits. Fortunately the matter is in my hands. I have told Inspector He Tao, that the magistrate is asleep just now, and told him to wait for me in a tea-house just opposite the entrance to the yamen. Therefore I came flying here on horseback to report the matter to you. Out of thirty-six plans you must select the best and get away at once. What is there to keep you here instead of going away at once? I must go back now and take the Inspector to the yamen, where he will deliver his orders, and as soon as the magistrate sees them you may be sure that he will immediately dispatch men to effect your arrest. So you had better not delay your escape. If there is any failure in your departure you must not blame me."
Chao Gai was surprised at hearing this. He said, "Worthy brother, how can I ever repay you?"
"You need not say much," said Song Jiang. "Get ready at once, and let nothing stand in your way. I must return at once."
Chao Gai said, "Of the seven, the three brothers Ruan have received their share of the booty, and have gone back to their home at Shijie Village. At the back of this room are however three others, and you might come and see them."
Song Jiang went to the back garden, and Chao Gai pointing to the three men there said, "These three men are Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, and Liu Tang."
Song Jiang slightly bowed to them, and then turned round and said to Chao Gai, "Now take care of yourself, and get away at once. I must go now." He went to the door, mounted his horse, and using his whip, galloped off to the town.
"Do you know the man whom I just introduced to you?" asked Chao Gai to the three men.
"Who is he? And why did he depart so hastily?" asked Wu Yong.
"You do not know but had he not come here our lives would be cut short very soon."
The three men were startled at this statement. One of them asked, "But has our affair been disclosed?"
